With an immaculate charm which cannot be defaced.
- 27 The moon is up, and yet it is not night.
Sunset divides the sky with her, a sea Of glory streams along the Alpine height
Of blue Föhn's mountains, Heaven is free
From clouds, but of all colors seems to be,— Melted to one vast Inn of the West,—
Where the Day joins the past Eternity.
While, on the other hand, meek Dian's crest Floats through the azure air—an island of the blest!
- 28 A single star is at her side, and reigns With her o'er half the lovely heaven, but still Yon sunny sea heaves brightly, and remains Roll'd o'er the peak of the far Rætian hill,
As Day and Night contending were until Nature reclaim'd her order—gently flows
The deep-dyed Brenta, where their hues instil
The odorous purple of a new-born rose Which streams upon her stream, and glass'd within it glows.
- 29 Fill'd with the face of Heaven, which from afar,
Comes down upon the waters; all its hues,
From the rich sunset to the rising star.
Their magical variety diffuse.
And now they change: a paler shadow strews

Its mantle o'er the mountains; parting
 day
 Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbues
 With a new color as it gasps away,
 The last still loveliest,—till—'tis gone—and all is gray.

78 Oh Rome! my country! city of the soul!
 The orphans of the heart must turn to
 thee,
 Lone mother of dead empires! and control
 In their shut breasts their petty misery
 What are our woes and sufferance?
 Come and see The cypress,¹ hear the owl, and plod your way O'er steps of broken thrones and temples, Ye!
 Whose agonies are evils of a day—A world is at our feet as fragile as our clay

79 The Niobe of nations! there she stands, Childless and crownless, in her voiceless
 woe;
 An empty urn within her wither'd
 hands,
 Whose holy dust was scatter'd long ago,
 The Scipios' tomb contains no ashes
 now;
 The very sepulchres lie tenantless
 Of their heroic dwellers. dost thou flow,
 Old Tiber! through a marble wilderness?
 Rise, with thy yellow waves, and mantle her distress.

80 The Goth, the Christian, Time, War, Flood, and Fire, Have dealt upon the seven-hill'd city's pride;
 She saw her glories star by star expire.
 And up the steep barbarian monarchs ride,
 Where the car clumb'd the Capitol; far and wide Temple and tower went down, nor left a site:
 Chaos of ruins! who shall trace the void,

O'er the dim fragments cast a lunar
 light,
 And say, "here was, or is," where all is doubly night!

95 I speak not of men's creeds—they rest between Man and his Maker—but of things al-low'd, Avert'd, and known, and daily, hourly seen:—
 The yoke that is upon us doubly bow'd,
 And the intent of tyranny avow'd, The edict of Earth's rulers, who are grown
 The apes of him¹ who humbled once the proud,
 And shook them from their slumbers on the throne—
 Too glorious, were this all his mighty arm had done

96 Can tyrants but by tyrants conquer'd be,
 And Freedom find no champion and no child
 Such as Columbia saw arise when she Sprung forth a Pallas, arm'd and unde-filed?
 Or must such minds be nourish'd in the wild,
 Deep in the unpruned forest, 'midst the roar
 Of cataracts, where nursing Nature smiled
 On infant Washington? Has Earth no
 more Such seeds within her breast, or Europe no such shore?

97 But France got drunk with blood to vomit crime,
 And fatal have her Saturnalia been To Freedom's cause, in every age and clime;
 Because the deadly days which we have seen,²
 And vile Ambition, that built up between Man and his hopes an adamant wall.
 And the base pageant last upon the scene,
 Are grown the pretext for the eternal thrall Which nips life's tree, and dooms man's worst—his second fall.

¹ Napoleon

² The days of the Congress of Vienna, of the Holy Alliance, and of the Second Treaty of Paris (Sept.-Nov., 1815). These constitute the "base pageant" of l. 6. 7.

¹ The cypress is an emblem of mourning; it is a common tree in graveyards

- 98 Yet, Freedom! yet thy banner, torn but flying, Streams like the thunder-storm against the wind;
Thy trumpet voice, though broken now and dying,
The loudest still the tempest leaves behind;
Thy tree hath lost its blossoms, and the rind, Chopp'd by the axe, looks rough and little worth,
But the sap lasts, and still the seed we find 131 Sown deep, even in the bosom of the North.¹
So shall a better Spring less bitter fruit bring forth.
- 128 Arches on arches! as it were that Rome, Collecting the chief trophies of her line,
Would build up all her triumphs in one dome,
Her Coliseum stands, the moonbeams shine
As 'twere its natural torches, for divine Should be the light which streams here 132 to illumine
This long-explored but still exhaustless mine
Of contemplation; and the azure gloom Of an Italian night, where the deep skies assume
- 129 Hues which have words, and speak to ye of heaven, Floats o'er this vast and wondrous monument,
And shadows forth its glory There is given Unto the things of earth, which Time hath bent, A spirit's feeling, and where he hath leant His hand, but broke his scythe, there is 133 a power
And magic in the ruin'd battlement,
For which the palace of the present hour Must yield its pomp, and wait till ages are its dower.
- 130 Oh Time! the beautifier of the dead, Adorner of the ruin, comforter
And only healer when the heart hath bled;
- Time! the corrector when our judgments err,
The test of truth, love—sole philosopher,
For all beside are sophists—from thy thrift,
Which never loses though it doth defer—
Time, the avenger! unto thee I lift My hands, and eyes, and heart, and crave of thee a gift
- Amidst this wreck, where thou hast made a shrine
And temple more divinely desolate, Among thy nightier offerings here are mine,
Ruins of years, though few, yet full of fate.
If thou hast ever seen me too elate, Hear me not; but if calmly I have borne Good, and reserved my pride against the hate Which shall not overwhelm me, let me not have worn This iron in my soul in vain—shall they not mourn?
- And thou, who never yet of human wrong
Left the unbalanced scale, great Nemesis!
Here, where the ancient paid thee homage long—Thou who didst call the Furies from the abyss,
And round Orestes bade them howl and hiss For that unnatural retribution!—just.
Had it but been from hands less near—in this Thy former realm, I call thee from the dust!
Dost thou not hear my heart?—Awake!
thou shalt, and must
- It is not that I may not have incurr'd
For my ancestral faults on mine the wound
I bleed withal, and, had it, been conferr'd
With a just weapon, it had flow'd unbound;
But now my blood shall not sink in the ground;
To thee I do devote it—thou shalt take The vengeance, which shall yet be sought and found,

¹ England¹ The slaying of his mother and her lover, who together had killed his father, Agamemnon

- Which if I have not taken for the sake—
But let that pass—I sleep, but thou shalt yet awake
- 134 And if my voice break forth, 'tis not that now
I shrink from what is suffer'd: let him
speak
Who hath beheld decline upon my brow.
Or seen my mind's convulsion leave it weak.
But in this page a record will I seek Not in the air shall these my words dis-138 perse, Though I be ashes; a far hour shall wreak
The deep prophetic fulness of this verse, And pile on human heads the mountain of my curse!
- 135 That curse shall be Forgiveness—Have I not—Hear me, my mother Earth! behold it,
Heaven!
Have I not had to wrestle with my lot?
Have I not suffer'd things to be forgiven?
Have I not had my brain sear'd, my heart riven, Hopes sapp'd, name blighted, Life's life led away? 139
And only not to desperation driven, Because not altogether of such clay As rote into the souls of those whom I survey
- 136 From mighty wrongs to petty perfidy Have I not seen what human things could do?
From the loud roar of foaming calumny To the small whisper of the as paltry few,
And subtler venom of the reptile crew, The Janus glance of whose significant eye,
Learning to lie with silence, would seem true,
And without utterance, save the shrug or sigh, 140
Deal round to happy fools its speechless obloquy.
- 137 But I have lived, and have not lived in vain.
My mind may lose its force, my blood its fire,
And my frame perish even in conquering pain;
- But there is that within me which shall fire Torture and Time, and breathe when I
expire,
Something unearthly, which they deem not of,
Like the remember'd tone of a mute
lyre, Shall on their soften'd spirits smk, and move
In hearts all rocky now the late remorse of love
- The seal is set. Now welcome, thou dread power!
Nameless, yet thus omnipotent, which
here Walk'st in the shadow of the midnight hour
With a deep awe, yet all distinct from fear;
Thy haunts are ever where the dead walls rear
Their ivy mantles, and the solemn scene Derives from thee a sense so deep and clear
That we become a part of what has been,
And grow unto the spot, all-seem but unseen
- And here the buzz of eager nations ran,
In murmur'd pity, or loud-ron'd applause,
As man was slaughter'd by his fellow-man
And wherefore slaughter'd? wherefore, but because Such were the bloody Cæsar's general laws,
And the imperial pleasure—Wherefore
not?
What matters where we fall to fill the maws
Of worms—on battle-planes or listed spot?¹
Both are but theatres where the chief actors rot.
- I see before me the Gladiator lie:²
He leans up his hand—his manly brow Consents to death, but conquers agony,
And his droop'd head sinks gradually low—

¹ That is, field of the list, or tournament ² Suggested by the statue formerly called The Dying Gladiator, but now thought to represent a wounded warrior, and hence called The Dying Gaul. It is in the Museum of the Capitol

And through his side the last drops, ebbing slow
 From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one,
 Like the first of a thunder-shower, and
 The arena swims around him—he is gone,
 Ere ceased the inhuman shout which hail'd the wretch who won

141 He heard it, but he heeded not—his eyes Were with his heart, and that was far away;
 He reck'd not of the life he lost nor prize,
 But where his rude hut by the Danube
 lay,
 There were his young barbarians all at play,
 There was their Dacian mother!—he,
 their sire,
 Butcher'd to make a Roman holiday—All this rush'd with his blood—Shall he expire
 And unavenged? Arise, ye Goths, and glut you ne'

142 But here, where Murder breathed her bloody stream,
 And here, where buzzing nations choked
 the way,
 And roar'd or murmur'd like a mountain
 stream
 Dashing or winding as its torrent strays, Here, where the Roman million's blame or praise,
 Was death or life, the playthings of a crowd,
 My voice sounds much—and fall the stars' faint rays
 On the arena void—seats crush'd—walls bow'd—
 And galleries, where my steps seem echoes strangely loud

143 A rum—yet what rum! from its mass Walls, palaces, half-cities, have been rear'd;
 Yet oft the enormous skeleton ye pass,
 And marvel where the spoil could have appear'd Hath it indeed been plunder'd, or but clear'd?
 Alas! developed, opens the decay,

¹ After Trajan had conquered the region north of the Lower Danube and had made it into the Roman province of Dacia (101 B. C.), he carried 10,000 captives to Rome and exhibited them in combats for the amusement of the people.

When the colossal fabric's form is near'd:
 It will not bear the brightness of the
 day,
 Which streams too much on all years, man, have reft away.

But when the rising moon begins to climb
 Its topmost arch, and gently pauses
 there,
 When the stars twinkle through the loops of time,
 And the low night-breeze waves along
 the air
 The garland-forest, which the gray walls wear,
 Like laurels on the bald first Cæsar's head,¹ When the light shines serene but doth not glare,
 Then in this magic circle raise the dead Heroes have trod this spot—'tis on their dust ye tread

"While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand;
 When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall,
 And when Rome falls—the World"²
 From our own land Thus spake the pilgrims o'er this mighty wall
 In Saxon times, which we are wont to call Ancient, and these three mortal things are still On their foundations, and unalter'd all, Rome and her Ruin past Redemption's
 skill,
 The World, the same wide den—of thieves, or what ye will

But I forget.—My pilgrim's shrine is won,
 And he and I must part,—so let it be,—
 His task and mine alike are nearly done;

¹ "Suetonius informs us that Julius Cæsar was particularly gratified by that decree of the senate which enabled him to wear a wreath of laurel on all occasions. He was anxious not to show that he was the conqueror of the world, but to hide that he was bald"—Byron See Suetonius's Lives of the Cæsars, 1, 45

² "This is quoted in The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire as a proof that the Coliseum was entire when seen by the Anglo-Saxon pilgrims at the end of the seventh, or the beginning of the eighth century"—Byron See

Yet once more let us look upon the sea,¹⁷⁹
 The midland ocean¹ breaks on him and
 me,
 And from the Alban Mount we now behold
 Our friend of youth, that Ocean, which, when we Beheld it last by Calpe's rock² unfold
 Those waves, we follow'd on till the dark Euxine roll'd

176 Upon the blue Symplegades Long years—
 Long, though not very many—since have done Their work on both; some suffering and some tears
 Have left us nearly where we had begun:
 Yet not in vain our mortal race hath run;
 We have our own reward, and it is
 That we can yet feel gladden'd by the sun,
 And reap from earth, sea, joy almost as dear
 As if there were no man to trouble what is clear.

177 Oh! that the desert were my dwelling-place,
 With one fair Spirit for my minister,³
 That I might all forget the human race, And, hating no one, love but only he!
 Ye elements!—in whose ennobling stir I feel myself exalted—Can ye not Accord me such a being? Do I err In deeming such inhabit many a spot?
 Though with them to converse can rarely¹⁸¹ be our lot.

178 There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
 There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
 There is society, where none intrudes,
 By the deep sea, and music in its roar
 I love not man the less, but Nature more, From these our interviews, in which I steal
 From all I may be, or have been before,
 To mingle with the Universe,⁴ and feel What I can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal.

Roll on, thou deep and dark blue Ocean—roll!
 Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in
 vain;
 Man marks the earth with ruin—his control Stops with the shore; upon the watery plain
 The wrecks are all thy deed, nor doth remain
 A shadow of man's ravage, save his own,
 When, for a moment, like a drop of rain,
 He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan,
 Without a grave, unknell'd, uncoffin'd, and unknown¹

His steps are not upon thy paths,—thy fields
 Are not a spoil for him,—thou dost rise And shake him from thee; the vile strength he wields
 For earth's destruction thou dost all despise, Spurning him from thy bosom to the skies,
 And send'st him, shivering in thy playful spray
 And howling, to his gods, where haply lies His petty hope in some near port or bay,
 And dashest him again to earth:—there let him lay

The armaments which thunderstrike the walls
 Of rock-built cities, bidding nations
 quake,
 And monarchs tremble in their capitals,
 The oak leviathans, whose huge ribs make Their clay creator the vain title take Of lord of thee, and arbiter of war—
 These are thy toys, and, as the snowy flake,
 They melt into thy yeast of waves, which mar Alike the Armada's pride or spoils of

¹ See Scott's The Lay of the Last Minstrel, 6, 14-16 (p. 444).

² Over half of the Spanish fleet which sailed against England in 1588 was destroyed in a sea-storm, as were also most of the French ships captured by Nelson at Trafalgar, in 1805.

182 Thy shores are empires, changed in all save thee—Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, what are they?
Thy waters wash'd them power while they were free,
And many a tyrant since, then shores obey
The stranger, slave, or savage, then decay
Has dried up realms to deserts—not so thou;—
Unchangeable, save to thy wild waves'
play,
Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure
brow
Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now

183 Thou glorious mirror, where the Almighty's form
Glasses itself in tempests, in all time,— Calm or convulsed, in breeze, or gale, or storm,
Icing the pole, or in the torrid clime Dark-heaving—boundless, endless, and sublime,
The image of Eternity, the throne Of the Invisible, even from out thy slime
The monsters of the deep are made, each zone
Obeys thee, thou goest forth, dread, fathomless, alone

184 And I have loved thee, Ocean! and my joy
Of youthful sports was on thy breast to be Borne, like thy bubbles, onward from a boy
I wanton'd with thy breakers—they to
me
Were a delight; and if the freshening sea
Made them a terror—'twas a pleasing
fear,
For I was as it were a child of thee,
And trusted to thy billows far and near,
And laid my hand upon thy mane—as I do
here.

185 My task is done, my song hath ceased, my theme
Has died into an echo; it is fit
The spell should break of this protracted dream.
The torch shall be extinguish'd which hath lit

My midnight lamp—and what is writ, is writ;
Would it were worthier! but I am not
That which I have been—and my visions flit
Less palpably before me—and the glow Which in my spirit dwelt is fluttering, faint, and low

Farewell! a word that must be, and hath been—
A sound which makes us linger;—yet—farewell!
Ye! who have traced the pilgrim to the scene
Which is his last, if in your memories dwell
A thought which once was his, if on ye swell
A single recollection, not in vain
He wore his sandal-shoon and scallopshell,¹ Farewell! with him alone may rest the
pain,
If such there were—with you, the moral of his strain

MANFRED alone—Scene, a Gothic Gallery Time, Midnight.

Man. The lamp must be replenish'd, but even then
It will not burn so long as I must watch:
My slumbers—if I slumber—are not sleep,
But a continuance of enduring thought,
Which then I can resist not: in my heart
There is a vigil, and these eyes but close To look within; and yet I live, and bear ¹The sandals indicated travel by land; the scallop-shell, which was worn in the hat, travel by sea.
²*Hamlet*, I. 5 1067

The aspect and the form of breathing men.
But grief should be the instructor of the wise;

10 Sorrow is knowledge: they who know the most

Must mourn the deepest o'er the fatal truth,

The Tree of Knowledge is not that of Life.
Philosophy and science, and the springs
Of wonder, and the wisdom of the world,

15 I have essay'd, and in my mind there is A power to make these subject to itself—
But they avail not: I have done men good,
And I have met with good even among men—

But this avail'd not: I have had my foes,

20 And none have baffled, many fallen before
me—

But this avail'd not:—Good, or evil, life, Powers, passions, all I see in other beings,
Have been to me as rain unto the sands, Since that all-nameless hour. I have no dread,

25 And feel the curse to have no natural fear, Nor fluttering throb, that beats with hopes or wishes,

Or lurking love of something on the earth.
Now to my task —

Mysterious agency!

Ye spirits of the unbounded Universe!

30 Whom I have sought in darkness and in
light—

Ye, who do compass earth about, and dwell
In subtler essence—ye, to whom the tops Of mountains inaccessible are haunts, And earth's and ocean's caves familiar things—

35 I call upon ye by the written charm Which gives me power upon you—Rise!
Appear! [A pause.]

They come not yet—Now by the voice of him

Who is the first among you—by this sign, Which makes you tremble—by the claims of him

40 Who is undying.—Rise! Appear!— Appear! [A pause.]

If it be so—Spirits of earth and air, Ye shall not thus elude me: by a power,
Deeper than all yet urged, a tyrant-spell,
Which had its birthplace in a star condemn'd,

45 The burning wreck of a demolish'd world,
A wandering hell in the eternal space;
By the strong curse which is upon my soul,

The thought which is within me and around me,

I do compel ye to my will—Appear!

[A star is seen at the darker end of the gallery: it is stationary; and a voice is heard singing.]

First Spirit

50 Mortal! to thy bidding bow'd,
From my mansion in the cloud,
Which the breath of twilight builds,
And the summer's sunset gilds
With the azure and vermillion, 55 Which is mix'd for my pavilion; Though thy quest may be forbidden,
On a star-beam I have ridden:
To thine adjuration bow'd, Mortal—be thy wish avow'd!

Voice of the Second Spirit

60 Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains;
They crown'd him long ago On a throne of rocks, in a robe of clouds,

With a diadem of snow.
Around his waist are forests braec'd, 65 The avalanche in his hand, But ere it fall, that thundering ball Must pause for my command
The glacier's cold and restless mass Moves onward day by day:

70 But I am he who bids it pass,
Or with its ice delay
I am the spirit of the place,
Could make the mountain bow
And quiver to his cavern'd base—75 And what with me would thou?

Voice of the Third Spirit

In the blue depth of the waters, Where the wave hath no strife,
Where the wind is a stranger,
And the sea-snake hath life, 80 Where the mermaid is decking Her green hair with shells,
Like the storm on the surface Came the sound of thy spells; O'er my calm Hall of Coral 85 The deep echo roll'd—
To the Spirit of Ocean Thy wishes unfold!

Fourth Spirit

Where the slumbering earthquake Lies pillow'd on fire,
And the lakes of bitumen Rise boilingly higher;
Where the roots of the Andes Strike deep in the earth,
As their summits to heaven

95 Shoot soaringly forth;
I have quitted my birthplace, Thy bidding to bide—Thy spell hath subdued me,
Thy will be my guide!

Fifth Spirit

100 I am the rider of the wind,
The stirrer of the storm,
The hurricane I left behind Is yet with lightning warm,
To speed to thee, o'er shore and sea 105 I swept upon the blast
The fleet I met sail'd well, and yet
'Twill sink ere night be past.

Sixth Spirit

My dwelling is the shadow of the night, Why doth thy magic torture me with
light?

Seventh Spirit

110 The star which rules thy destiny Was ruled, ere earth began, by me
It was a world as fresh and fair As e'er revolved round sun in an Its course was free and regular.
115 Space bosom'd not a lovelier star
The hour arrived—and it became A wandering mass of shapeless flame,
A pathless comet, and a curse,
The menace of the universe, 120 Still rolling on with innate force, Without a sphere, without a course,
A bright deformity on high,
The monster of the upper sky!
And thou! beneath its influence born—125 Thou worm! whom I obey and scorn—Forced by a power (which is not thine,
And lent thee but to make thee mine)
For this brief moment to descend, Where these weak spirits round thee bend
130 And parley with a thing like thee—What wouldst thou, child of Clay! with
me?

The Seven Spirits

Earth, ocean, air, night, mountains, winds, thy star,
Are at thy beck and bidding, child of Clay!
Before thee at thy quest their spirits are—135 What wouldst thou with us, son of mortals—say?

Man. Forgetfulness—

First Spirit. Of what—of whom—and why?

Man. Of that which is within me; read it there—

Ye know it, and I cannot utter it.

Spirit. We can but give thee that which we possess.

140 Ask of us subjects, sovereignty, the power O'er earth—the whole, or portion—or a sign

Which shall control the elements, whereof
We are the dominators,—each and all,
These shall be thine

Man. Oblivion, self-oblivion!

145 Can ye not wring from out the hidden realms

Ye offer so profusely what I ask?

Spirit. It is not in our essence, in our skill;

But—thou may'st die

Man. Will death bestow it on me?

Spirit. We are immortal, and do not forget;

150 We are eternal, and to us the past Is, as the future, present Art thou an-swer'd?

Man. Ye mock me—but the power which brought ye here

Hath made you mine Slaves, scoff not at my will!

The mind, the spirit, the Promethean spark,

155 The lightning of my being, is as bright, Pervading, and far darting as your own,
And shall not yield to yours, though coop'd in clay!

Answer, or I will teach you what I am.

Spirit. We answer as we answer'd; our reply

160 Is even in thine own words.

Man. Why say ye so?

Spirit. If, as thou say'st, thine essence be as ours,

We have replied in telling thee, the thing Mortals call death hath nought to do with us

Man. I then have call'd ye from your realms in vain,

165 Ye cannot, or ye will not, aid me

Spirit. Say,

What we possess we offer, it is thine.

Bethink ere thou dismiss us, ask again—Kingdom, and sway, and strength, and length of days—

Man. Accursed! what have I to do with days?

170 They are too long already.—Hence—be-
gone!

Spirit. Yet pause: being here, our will 210 would do thee service;

Bethink thee, is there then no other gift Which we can make not worthless in thine
eyes?

Man. No, none: yet stay—one moment, 215 ere we part,

175 I would behold ye face to face. I hear Your voices, sweet and melancholy sounds.
As music on the waters; and I see The steady aspect of a clear large star, But nothing more. Approach me as ye 220
are,

180 Or one, or all, in your accustomed forms.
Spirit We have no forms, beyond the elements

Of which we are the mind and principle.
But choose a form—in that we will appear 225

Man. I have no choice; there is no form on earth

185 Hideous or beautiful to me. Let him, Who is most powerful of ye, take such aspect 230

As unto him may seem most fitting—Come!
Seventh Spirit (appearing in the shape of a beautiful female figure). Behold!

Man. Oh God! if it be thus, and thou 235 Art not a madness and a mockery, 190 I yet might be most happy, I will clasp
thee,

And we again will be—

[*The figure vanishes
My heart is crush'd!*

[MANFRED falls senseless. 240

(A voice is heard in the Incantation which follows.)

When the moon is on the wave,
And the glow-worm in the grass,
And the meteor on the grave, 195 And the wisp on the morass;
When the falling stars are shooting,
And the answer'd owls are hooting,
And the silent leaves are still In the shadow of the hill, 200 Shall my soul be upon thine,
With a power and with a sign 250

Though thy slumber may be deep,
Yet thy spirit shall not sleep;
There are shades that will not vanish, 205 There are thoughts thou canst not banish;

By a power to thee unknown,
Thou canst never be alone;
Thou art wrapt as with a shroud,
Thou art gather'd in a cloud;

And forever shalt thou dwell
In the spirit of this spell.

Though thou seest me not pass by,
Thou shalt feel me with thine eye
As a thing that, though unseen, Must be near thee, and hath been;
And when in that secret dread Thou hast turn'd around thy head, Thou shalt marvel I am not As thy shadow on the spot,
And the power which thou dost feel Shall be what thou must conceal.

And a magic voice and verse Hath baptized thee with a curse;
And a spirit of the air Hath begirt thee with a snare;
In the wind there is a voice Shall forbid thee to rejoice,
And to thee shall night deny
All the quiet of her sky;
And the day shall have a sun,
Which shall make thee wish it done.

From thy false tears I did distil
An essence which hath strength to kill;
From thy own heart I then did wring
The black blood in its blackest spring; From thy own smile I snatch'd the snake,
For there it coil'd as in a brake;¹
From thy own lip I drew the charm Which gave all these their chiefest harm;
240 In proving every poison known,
I found the strongest was thine own.

By thy cold breast and serpent smile,
By thy unfathom'd gulfs of guile,
By that most seeming virtuous eye, 245 By thy shut soul's hypocrisy;
By the perfection of thine art Which pass'd for human thine own
heart;
By thy delight in others' pain,
And by thy brotherhood of Cain, 250 I call upon thee! and compel Thyself to be thy proper hell!

And on thy head I pour the vial Which doth devote thee to this trial;
Nor to slumber, nor to die, 255 Shall be in thy destiny; Though thy death shall still seem near To thy wish, but as a fear; Lo! the spell now works around thee,

¹ thicket

And the clankless chain hath bound
thee;
260 O'er thy heart and brain together Hath the word been pass'd—now wither!

SCENE II

The Mountain of the Jungfrau.—Time, Morning.—MANFRED alone upon the Cliffs.

Man. The spirits I have raised abandon
me,
The spells which I have studied baffle me,
The remedy I reek'd of tortured me,
I lean no more on superhuman aid, 5 It hath no power upon the past, and for The future, till the past be gulf'd in darkness,
It is not of my search.—My mother Earth!
And thou fresh breaking day, and you, ye mountains,
Why are ye beautiful? I cannot love ye 10 And thou, the bright eye of the universe, That openest over all, and unto all Art a delight—thou shin'st not on my
heart.
And you, ye crags, upon whose extreme edge
I stand, and on the torrent's brink beneath 15 Behold the tall pines dwindled as to shrubs
In dizziness of distance, when a leap, A stir, a motion, even a breath, would bring
My breast upon its rocky bosom's bed
To rest forever—wherefore do I pause?
20 I feel the impulse—yet I do not plunge,
I see the peril—yet do not recede;
And my brain reels—and yet my foot is firm:
There is a power upon me which withholds,
And makes it my fatality to live, 25 If it be life to wear within myself This barrenness of spirit, and to be My own soul's sepulchre, for I have ceased To justify my deeds unto myself—
The last infirmity of evil. Ay, 30 Thou winged and cloud-cleaving minister.
[An eagle passes
Whose happy flight is highest into heaven, Well may'st thou swoop so near me—I should be Thy prey, and gorge thine eaglets, thou art gone
Where the eye cannot follow thee; but thine
35 Yet pierces downward, onward, or above,
With a pervading vision—Beautiful!
How beautiful is all this visible world!¹

¹ See Hamlet, II, 2, 288 ff

How glorious in its action and itself!
But we, who name ourselves its sovereigns, we,
40 Half dust, half deity, alike unfit To sink or soar, with our mix'd essence
make
A conflict of its elements, and breathe
The breath of degradation and of pride, Contending with low wants and lofty will, 45 Till our mortality predominates, And men are—what they name not to themselves,
And trust not to each other. Hark! the note, [The Shepherd's pipe in the distance is heard.
The natural music of the mountain reed—
For here the patriarchal days are not 50 A pastoral fable—pipes in the liberal air, Mix'd with the sweet bells of the sauntering herd;
My soul would drink those echoes Oh, that I were
The viewless spirit of a lovely sound,
A living voice, a breathing harmony, 55 A bodiless enjoyment¹—born and dying
With the blest tone which made me!

Enter from below a CHAMOIS HUNTER.

Chamois Hunter. Even so This way the chamois leapt: her nimble feet Have baffled me, my gains today will scarce Repay my break-neck travail.—What is
here?
60 Who seems not of my trade, and yet hath reach'd
A height which none even of our mountaineers,
Save our best hunters, may attain: his garb
Is goodly, his mien manly, and his air Proud as a free-born peasant's, at this distance:
65 I will approach him nearer Man. (not perceiving the other). To be thus—Gray-hair'd with anguish, like these blasted pines,
Wrecks of a single winter, barkless, branchless,
A blighted trunk upon a cursed root,
Which but supplies a feeling to decay—70 And to be thus, eternally but thus, Having been otherwise! Now furrow'd o'er
With wrinkles, plough'd by moments,— not by years,—

And hours, all tortured into ages—hours Which I outlive!—Ye toppling crags of ice!

76 Ye avalanches, whom a breath draws down In mountainous o'erwhelming, come and crush me!

I hear ye momentarily above, beneath,
'Crash with a frequent conflict, but ye
pass,

And only fall on things that still would 110
live,

80 On the young flourishing forest, or the hut
And hamlet of the harmless villager

C. Hun The mists begin to rise from up the valley.

I'll warn him to descend, or he may chance To lose at once his way and life together

85 Man The mists boil up around the 115 glaciers; clouds

Rise curling fast beneath me, white and sulphur,

Like foam from the roused ocean of deep
hell,

Whose every wave breaks on a living
shore,

Heap'd with the damn'd like pebbles.—
I am giddy

90 C. Hun I must approach him cau- 120 tiously; if near,

A sudden step will startle him, and he Seems tottering already

Man Mountains have fallen, Leaving a gap in the clouds, and with the shock

Rocking their Alpine brethren; filling up

95 The ripe green valleys with destruction's 125 splinters,

Damming the rivers with a sudden dash, Which crush'd the waters into mist and made

Their fountains find another channel—
thus,

Thus, in its old age, did Mount Rosenberg—

100 Why stood I not beneath it?

C. Hun Friend! have a care, Your next step may be fatal!—for the love

Of him who made you, stand not on that brink!

Man. (not hearing him) Such would have been for me a fitting tomb;

My bones had then been quiet in their depth;

105 They had not then been strewn upon the rocks

For the wind's pastime—as thus—thus they shall be—

In this one plunge.—Farewell, ye opening heavens!

Look not upon me thus reproachfully—Ye were not meant for me—Earth! take these atoms!

[As MANFRED is in act to spring from the cliff, the CHAMOIS HUNTER seizes and retains him with a sudden grasp]

C. Hun Hold, madman!—though awearry of thy life,

Stain not our pure vales with thy guilty
blood:

Away with me—I will not quit my hold Man I am most sick at heart—nay, grasp me not—

I am all feebleness—the mountains whirl

115 Spinning around me—I grow blind—What art thou?

C. Hun I'll answer that anon Away with me!

The clouds grow thicker—there—now lean on me—

Place your foot here—here, take this staff, and cling

A moment to that shrub—now give me your hand,

120 And hold fast by my girdle—softly—
well—

The Chalet will be gain'd within an hour.
Come on, we'll quickly find a surer footing,

And something like a pathway, which the torrent

Hath wash'd since winter—Come, 'tis bravely done—

125 You should have been a hunter—Follow me. [As they descend the rocks with difficulty, the scene closes.]

A Cottage amongst the Bernese Alps

MANFRED and the CHAMOIS HUNTER.

C. Hun. No, no—yet pause—thou must not yet go forth:

Thy mind and body are alike unfit To trust each other, for some hours, at least;

When thou art better, I will be thy guide—
But whither?

Man. It imports not: I do know My route full well, and need no further guidance.

King Lear, Edgar seizes Gloucester, his blind father, as he is about to leap from what he thinks is Dover Cliff.

- C. Hun.* Thy garb and gait bespeak thee of high lineage—
One of the many chiefs, whose castled crags Look o'er the lower valleys—which of these 10 May call thee lord? I only know their portals;
My way of life leads me but fairly down
To bask by the huge hearths of those old halls, Carousing with the vassals, but the paths,
Which step from out our mountains to their doors, 15 I know from childhood—which of these is thine?
Man. No matter.
C. Hun. Well, sir, pardon me the question,
And be of better cheer. Come, taste my wine;
'Tis of an ancient vintage, many a day
'Thas thaw'd my veins among our glaciers, now 20 Let it do thus for thine. Come, pledge me fairly Man. Away, away! there's blood upon the bowl!
Will it then never—never sink in the earth?
C. Hun. What dost thou mean? thy senses wander from thee Man. I saw 'tis blood—my blood! the pure warm stream 25 Which ran in the veins of my fathers, and in ours
When we were in our youth, and had one heart,
And loved each other as we should not love,
And this was shed: but still it rises up, Coloring the clouds, that shut me out from heaven, 30 Where thou art not—and I shall never be
C. Hun. Man of strange words, and some half-maddening sun, Which makes thee people vacancy, what's e'er Thy dread and sufferance be, there's comfort yet—
The aid of holy men, and heavenly patience—35 Man. Patience and patience! Hence—that word was made For brutes of burthen, not for birds of prey; Preach it to mortals of a dust like thine.—
I am not of thine order.
C. Hun. Thanks to heaven!
- I would not be of thine for the free fame 40 Of William Tell; but whatsoe'er thine ill,
It must be borne, and these wild starts are useless.
Man. Do I not bear it?—Look on me—I live
C. Hun. This is convulsion, and no healthful life.
Man. I tell thee, man! I have lived many years, 45 Many long years, but they are nothing now
To those which I must number. ages—ages—Space and eternity—and consciousness,
With the fierce thirst of death—and still unslaked!
C. Hun. Why, on thy brow the seal of middle age 50 Hath scarce been set, I am thine elder far.
Man. Think'st thou existence doth depend on time?
It doth, but actions are our epochs: mine
Have made my days and nights imperishable, Endless, and all alike, as sands on the shore, 55 Innumerable atoms, and one desert, Barren and cold, on which the wild waves break,
But nothing rests, save carcasses and wrecks,
Rocks, and the salt-surf weeds of bitterness.
C. Hun. Alas! he's mad—but yet I must not leave him.
60 Man. I would I were—for then the things I see Would be but a distemper'd dream.
C. Hun. What is it
That thou dost see, or think thou look'st upon?
Man. Myself, and thee—a peasant of the Alps—Thy humble virtues, hospitable home, 65 And spirit patient, pious, proud, and free.
Thy self-respect, grafted on innocent thoughts;
Thy days of health, and nights of sleep, thy toils,
By danger dignified, yet guiltless; hopes Of cheerful old age and a quiet grave, 70 With cross and garland over its green turf.
And thy grandchildren's love for epitaph.
This do I see—and then I look within—It matters not—my soul was scorch'd already!
C. Hun. And wouldst thou then exchange thy lot for mine?

75 Man. No, friend! I would not wrong thee, nor exchange

My lot with living being: I can bear—However wretchedly, 'tis still to bear—In life what others could not brook to dream,

But perish in their slumber.

C. Hun. And with this—

80 This cautious feeling for another's pain, Canst thou be black with evil!—say not so.

Can one of gentle thoughts have wreak'd revenge

Upon his enemies?

Man. Oh! no, no, no!

My injuries came down on those who loved
me—

85 On those whom I best loved. I never quell'd!

An enemy, save in my just defence—
But my embrace was fatal.

C. Hun. Heaven give thee rest!

And penitence restore thee to thyself,
My prayers shall be for thee

Man. I need them not—

90 But can endure thy pity. I depart—

'Tis time—farewell!—Here's gold, and thanks for thee;

No words—it is thy due. Follow me not—I know my path—the mountain peril's past:

And once again I charge thee, follow not!
[Exit MANFRED]

A lower Valley in the Alps.—A Cataract.

Enter MANFRED.

It is not noon—the sunbow's rays still arch

The torrent with the many hues of heaven,
And roll the sheeted silver's waving column O'er the crag's headlong perpendicular,

5 And fling its lines of foaming light along,
And to and fro, like the pale courier's tail,

The giant steed, to be bestrode by Death,
As told in the Apocalypse.² No eyes But mine now drink this sight of loveli-
ness;

10 I should be sole in this sweet solitude,
And with the Spirit of the place divide The homage of these waters.—I will call her.

[MANFRED takes some of the water into the palm of his hand, and flings it into the air, muttering the adjuration. After a pause, the WITCH of the ALPS rises beneath the arch of the sunbow of the torrent.

Beautiful Spirit! with thy hair of light,
And dazzling eyes of glory, in whose form

15 The charms of earth's least mortal daughters grow

To an unearthly stature, in an essence Of purer elements; while the hues of youth,—

Carnation'd like a sleeping infant's cheek, Rock'd by the beating of her mother's
heart,

20 Or the rose tints, which summer's twilight leaves

Upon the lofty glacier's virgin snow, The blush of earth embracing with her
heaven,—

Tinge thy celestial aspect, and make tame
The beauties of the sunbow which bend-o'er thee.

25 Beautiful Spirit! in thy calm clear brow, Wherein is glass'd serenity of soul,
Which of itself shows immortality,
I read that thou wilt pardon to a son Of Earth, whom the abstruser powers permit

30 At times to commune with them—if that he

Avail him of his spells—to call thee thus,
And gaze on thee a moment

Witch. Son of Earth!

I know thee, and the powers which give thee power;

I know thee for a man of many thoughts, 35 And deeds of good and ill, extreme in both,

Fatal and fated in thy sufferings

I have expected this—what wouldst thou with me?

Man. To look upon thy beauty—nothing further.

The face of the earth hath madden'd me and I

40 Take refuge in her mysteries, and pierce
To the abodes of those who govern her—But they can nothing aid me. I have sought

From them what they could not bestow, and now

I search no further

Witch. What could be the quest

45 Which is not in the power of the most powerful,

The rulers of the invisible?

Man. A boon;

But why should I repeat it? 'twere in vain.

Witch. I know not that; let thy lips utter it.

² Revelation, 6, 8

Man. Well, though it torture me, 'tis but the same; 50 My pangs shall find a voice. From my youth upwards
 My spirit walk'd not with the souls of
 men,
 Nor look'd upon the earth with human eyes,¹
 The thirst of their ambition was not mine,
 The aim of their existence was not mine; 55 My joys, my griefs, my passions, and my powers,
 Made me a stranger; though I wore the form
 I had no sympathy with breathing flesh.
 Nor midst the creatures of clay that girded
 me
 Was there but one who—but of her anon 60 I said with men, and with the thoughts of
 men,
 I held but slight communion; but instead,
 My joy was in the wilderness,—to breathe
 The difficult air of the iced mountain's top, Where the birds dare not build, nor insect's wing
 65 Flit o'er the herbless granite; or to plunge Into the torrent, and to roll along On the swift whirl of the new breaking wave
 Of river-stream, or ocean, in their flow In these my early strength exulted, or 70 To follow through the night the moving
 moon,
 The stars and their development; or catch The dazzling lightnings till my eyes grew dim;
 Or to look, list'ning, on the scatter'd
 leaves,
 While autumn winds were at their evening
 song
 75 These were my pastimes, and to be alone, For if the beings, of whom I was one,— Hating to be so,—cross'd me in my path,
 I felt myself degraded back to them,
 And was all clay again. And then I dived, 80 In my lone wanderings, to the caves of
 death,
 Searching its cause in its effect; and drew From wither'd bones, and skulls, and heap'd up dust, Conclusions most forbidden. Then I pass'd
 The nights of years in sciences untaught, 85 Save in the old time; and with time and toil,
 And terrible ordeal, and such penance
 As in itself hath power upon the air,
 And spirits that do compass air and earth,

Space, and the peopled infinite, I made 90 Mine eyes familiar with Eternity, Such as, before me, did the Magi, and He who from out their fountain dwellings raised Eros and Anteros, at Gadara.¹
 As I do these;—and with my knowledge grew 95 The thirst of knowledge, and the power and joy
 Of this most bright intelligence, until—Witch. Proceed Man. Oh! I but thus prolong'd my words,
 Boasting these idle attributes, because As I approach the core of my heart's grief—
 100 But to my task. I have not named to thee Father, or mother, mistress, friend, or being,
 With whom I wore the chain of human ties;
 If I had such, they seem'd not such to me;
 Yet there was one—Witch. Spare not thyself—proceed 105 Man. She was like me in lineaments, her eyes,
 Her hair, her features, all, to the very tone Even of her voice, they said were like to mine;
 But soften'd all, and temper'd into beauty
 She had the same lone thoughts and wanderings, 110 The quest of hidden knowledge, and a mind
 To comprehend the universe: nor these Alone, but with them gentler powers than
 mine,
 Pity, and smiles, and tears—which I had
 not;
 And tenderness—but that I had for her.
 115 Humility—and that I never had.
 Her faults were mine—her virtues were her own—
 I loved her, and destroy'd her!
Witch. With thy hand?
Man. Not with my hand, but heart—which broke her heart; It gazed on mine, and wither'd. I have shed 120 Blood, but not hers—and yet her blood was shed;
 I saw—and could not stanch it.

- Witch.* And for this—
A being of the race thou dost despise, The order, which thine own would rise above,
Mingling with us and ours,—thou dost forego 135 The gifts of our great knowledge, and shrink 'st back To recreant mortality—Away!
Man. Daughter of Air! I tell thee, since that hour—
But words are breath—look on me in my
sleep,
Or watch my watchings—Come and sit by
me!
- 130 My solitude is solitude no more, But peopled with the Furies,—I have guash'd
My teeth in darkness till returning morn, Then cursed myself till sunset;—I have pray'd
For madness as a blessing—'tis denied
me
135 I have affronted death—but in the war Of elements the waters shrunk from me, And fatal things pass'd harmless; the cold hand
Of an all-pitiless demon held me back, Back by a single hair, which would not break 140 In fantasy, imagination, all The effluence of my soul—which one day was
A Cræsus in creation—I plunged deep, But, like an ebbing wave, it dash'd me back Into the gulf of my unfathom'd thought 145 I plunged amidst mankind—Forgetfulness
I sought in all, save where 'tis to be found And that I have to learn, my science.
My long-pursued and superhuman art,
Is mortal here: I dwell in my despair—150 And live—and live forever.
- Witch.* It may be
That I can aid thee.
Man. To do this thy power Must wake the dead, or lay me low with them.
Do so—in any shape—in any hour—
With any torture—so it be the last 155 Witch. That is not in my province; but if thou Wilt swear obedience to my will, and do My bidding, it may help thee to thy wishes Man. I will not swear—Obey! and whom? the spirits Whose presence I command, and be the slave 160 Of those who served me—Never!
- Witch.* Is this all?
Hast thou no gentler answer?—Yet be-think thee,
And pause ere thou rejectest.
Man. I have said it Witch. Enough! I may retire then—say!
Man. Retire!
[The WITCH disappears.

Loathing our life, and dreading still to die.
In all the days of this detested yoke—
This vital weight upon the struggling
heart,
Which sinks with sorrow, or beats quick with pain, 170 Or joy that ends in agony or faintness—In all the days of past and future, for In life there is no present, we can number How few—how less than few—wherein the soul
Forbears to pant for death, and yet draw
175 As from a stream in winter, though the chill
Be but a moment's I have one resource Still in my science—I can call the dead,
And ask them what it is we dread to be The sternest answer can but be the Grave.

An answer and his destiny²—he slew 185 That which he loved, unknowing what he slew,
And died unpardon'd—though he call'd in aid
The Phrygian Jove, and in Phigalia roused
The Arcadian Evocators to compel
The indignant shadow to depose her

¹ Samuel See 1 Samuel, 28 9 ff² Pausanias, King of Sparta (470-470 B. C.), being enamored of the Byzantine maiden Cleoneia, demanded her as his mistress. One night as she entered his room, he mistook her for an enemy and killed her. He was haunted by her image until in the temple at Heraclea he invoked her spirit and gained the information that he would soon be delivered from all his troubles. The oracle was fulfilled by his death. The story is told in Pausanias's Life of Cleoneia, 6. See also Bulwer-Lytton's Pausanias the Spartan.

In words of dubious import, but fulfill'd.
 If I had never lived, that which I love
 Had still been living; had I never loved,
 That which I love would still be beautiful,

SCENE III

The Summit of the Jungfrau Mountain.

Enter FIRST DESTINY

The moon is rising broad, and round, and bright.

And here on snows, where never human foot

Of common mortal trod, we nightly tread,
 And leave no traces o'er the savage sea,

5 The glassy ocean of the mountain ice, We skim its rugged breakers, which put on The aspect of a tumbling tempest's foam, Frozen in a moment—a dead whirlpool's image:

And this most steep fantastic pinnacle, 10 The fretwork of some earthquake—where the clouds.

Pause to repose themselves in passing by—

Is sacred to our revels, or our vigils, Here do I wait my sisters, on our way To the Hall of Arimanes, for tonight

15 Is our great festival—'tis strange they come not.

A Voice without, singing

The captive usurper, Hurl'd down from the throne.
 Lay buried in torpor, Forgotten and lone;

20 I broke through his slumbers,
 I shiver'd his chain,
 I leagu'd him with numbers—
 He's tyrant again!

With the blood of a million he'll answer my care,

25 With a nation's destruction—his flight and despair.

Second Voice, without

The ship sail'd on, the ship sail'd fast,
 But I left not a sail, and I left not a mast;
 There is not a plank of the hull or the deck,
 And there is not a wretch to lament o'er his wreck,

30 Save one, whom I held, as he swam, by the hair,

And he was a subject, well worthy my care;

A traitor on land, and a pirate at sea—¹
 But I saved him to wreak further havoc for me!

First Destiny, answering

The city lies sleeping;

The morn, to deplore it,

May dawn on it weeping:

Sullenly, slowly,
 The black plague flew o'er it—

Thousands lie lowly;

40 Tens of thousands shall perish;

The living shall fly from

The sick they should cherish;

But nothing can vanquish

The touch that they die from.

45 Sorrow and anguish,

And evil and dread,

Envelop a nation;

The blest are the dead,

Who see not the sight

50 Of their own desolation,

This work of a night—

This wreck of a realm—this deed of my doing—

For ages I've done, and shall still be renewing!

Enter the SECOND and THIRD DESTINIES

The Three

Our hands contain the hearts of men,

55 Our footsteps are their graves;

We only give to take again

The spirits of our slaves!

First Des. Welcome!—Where's Nemesis?

Second Des. At some great work; But what I know not, for my hands were full

Third Des. Behold she cometh

Enter NEMESIS.

60 First Des. Say, where hast thou been?
 My sisters and thyself are slow tonight.

Nem. I was detain'd repairing shatter'd thrones,

¹ Byron may refer to Thomas Lord Cochrane (1775-1860). See Glossary.

Marrying fools, restoring dynasties, Avenging men upon their enemies, 65 And making them repent their own revenge;
 Goadung the wise to madness; from the dull
 Shaping out oracles to rule the world Afresh, for they were waxing out of date,
 And mortals dared to ponder for themselves, 70 To weigh kings in the balance, and to
 speak
 Of freedom, the forbidden fruit.—Away!
 We have outstay'd the hour—mount we our clouds. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV

The Hall of Arimanes¹—Arimanes on his Throne, a Globe of Fire, surrounded by the Spirits.

Hymn of the Spirits

Hail to our Master!—Prince of Earth and
 Air!
 Who walks the clouds and waters—in his hand
 The sceptre of the elements, which tear Themselves to chaos at his high command!
 5 He breatheth—and a tempest shakes the
 sea;
 He speaketh—and the clouds reply in thunder;
 He gazeth—from his glance the sunbeams flee,
 He moveth—earthquakes rend the world asunder.
 Beneath his footsteps the volcanoes rise, 10 His shadow is the Pestilence, his path
 The comets herald through the crackling
 skies;
 And planets turn to ashes at his wrath.
 To him War offers daily sacrifice, To him Death pays his tribute, Life is his,
 15 With all its infinite of agonies—
 And his the spirit of whatever is!

Enter the DESTINIES and NEMESIS.

First Des. Glory to Arimanes! on the earth

His power increaseth—both my sisters did His bidding, nor did I neglect my duty!

20 Second Des. Glory to Arimanes! we who bow

The necks of men, bow down before his throne!

Third Des. Glory to Arimanes! we await His nod!

Nem. Sovereign of sovereigns! we are thine,
 And all that liveth, more or less, is ours, 25 And most things wholly so; still to increase
 Our power, increasing thine, demands our
 care,
 And we are vigilant. Thy late commands
 Have been fulfill'd to the utmost.

A Spirit. What is here?
 A mortal!—Thou most rash and fatal wretch.

Bow down and worship!

30 Second Spirit. I do know the man—A Magian of great power, and fearful skill!

Third Spirit. Bow down and worship, slave!

What, know'st thou not Thine and our Sovereign?—Tremble, and obey!

All the Spirits Prostrate thyself, and thy condemned clay, 35 'Child of the Earth! or dread the worst

Man I know it;
 And yet ye see I kneel not.

Fourth Spirit 'Twill be taught thee.

Man 'Tis taught already;—many a night on the earth, On the bare ground, have I bow'd down my face,
 And strew'd my head with ashes, I have known

40 The fulness of humiliation, for I sunk before my vain despair, and knelt
 To my own desolation.

Fifth Spirit. Dost thou dare Refuse to Arimanes on his throne What the whole earth accords, beholding
 not

45 The terror of his glory?—Crouch, I say Man Bid him bow down to that which is above him,

The overruling Infinite—the Maker Who made him not for worship—let him kneel,

And we will kneel together.

The Spirits. Crush the worm!
 50 Tear him in pieces!—

First Des. Hence! avaunt!—he's mine.
 Prince of the Powers invisible! This man Is of no common order, as his port And presence here denote; his sufferings

¹ Cp. the description of the Hall of Eblis in Beckford's Vathek (p. 141b, 22 ff.)

Have been of an immortal nature, like 55 Our own; his knowledge, and his powers and will,

As far as is compatible with clay, Which clogs the ethereal essence, have been such

As clay hath seldom borne, his aspirations Have been beyond the dwellers of the
 earth,

60 And they have only taught him what we know—

That knowledge is not happiness, and science

But an exchange of ignorance for that Which is another kind of ignorance

This is not all—the passions, attributes

65 Of earth and heaven, from which no power, nor being,

Nor breath from the worm upwards is exempt,

Have pierced his heart, and in their consequence

Made him a thing which I, who pity not, Yet pardon those who pity He is mine,

70 And thine, it may be, be it so, or not,
 No other Spirit in this region hath

A soul like his—or power upon his soul.

Nem. What doth he here then?

First Des. Let him answer that Man. Ye know what I have known, and without power

75 I could not be amongst ye but there are Powers deeper still beyond—I come in quest

Of such, to answer unto what I seek

Nem. What wouldst thou?

Man. Thou canst not reply to me

Call up the dead—my question is for them

80 New. Great Animanes, doth thy will avouch

The wishes of this mortal?

Art. Yea

Nem. Whom wouldst thou

Unharnel?

Man. One without a tomb—call up Astarte.

Nemesis

Shadow! or Spirit!

85 Whatever thou art,
 Which still doth inherit

The whole or a part

Of the form of thy birth,

Of the mould of thy clay,

90 Which return'd to the earth,— Reappear to the day!

Bear what thou borest,

The heart and the form,

And the aspect thou worst

95 Redeem from the worm.

Appear!—Appear!—Appear!

Who sent thee there requires thee here!

[The Phantom of ASTARTE rises and stands in the midst.]

Man. Can this be death? there's bloom upon her cheek;

But now I see it is no living hue,

100 But a strange hectic—like the unnatural red

Which Autumn plants upon the perish'd leaf.

It is the same! Oh, God! that I should dread

To look upon the same—Astarte!—No,
 I cannot speak to her—but bid her speak—

105 Forgive me or condemn me.

Nemesis

By the power which hath broken

The grave which enthral'd thee,

Speak to him who hath spoken.

O! those who have call'd thee!

Man. She is silent,

110 And in that silence I am more than an-swer'd.

Nem. My power extends no further

Prince of Air!

It rests with thee alone—command her voice

Art. Spirit—obey this sceptic!

Nem. Silent still!

She is not of our order, but belongs

115 To the other powers. Mortal! thy quest is vain,

And we are baffled also

Man. Hear me, hear me—

Astarte! my beloved! speak to me.

I have so much endured—so much endure—

Look on me! the grave hath not changed thee more

120 Than I am changed for thee Thou lovedst
 me

Too much, as I loved thee we were not made

To torture thus each other, though it were The deadliest sin to love as we have loved

Say that thou loath'st me not—that I do bear

125 This punishment for both—that thou wilt
 be

One of the blessed—and that I shall die,
 For hitherto all hateful things conspire

To bind me in existence—in a life Which makes me shrink from immortality—

130 A future like the past. I cannot rest I know not what I ask, nor what I seek

I feel but what thou art, and what I am.

And I would hear yet once before I perish
The voice which was my music—Speak to me!

135 For I have call'd on thee in the still night, Startled the slumbering birds from the hush'd boughs,
And woke the mountain wolves, and made the caves
Acquainted with thy vainly echoed name.
Which answer'd me—many things an-swer'd me—

140 Spirits and men—but thou wert silent all Yet speak to me! I have outwatch'd the stars,
And gazed o'er heaven in vain in search of thee Speak to me! I have wander'd o'er the
earth,
And never found thy likeness—Speak to
me!

145 Look on the fiends around—they feel for
me:
I fear them not, and feel for thee alone—Speak to me! though it be in wrath.— but say—
I seek not what—but let me hear thee once—

This once—once more!
Phantom of Astarte Manfred!

Man Say on, say on—

150 I live but in the sound—it is thy voice!
Phan Manfred! Tomorrow ends thine earthly ills.

Farewell!

Man Yet one word more—am I forgiven?

Phan. Farewell!

Man Say, shall we meet again?

Phan. Farewell!

Man. One word for mercy!

Say, thou lovest me

Phan. Manfred!

[The Spirit of ASTARTE disappears.]

155 Nem She's gone, and will not be re-call'd,

Her words will be fulfill'd Return to the
earth.

A Spirit He is convulsed—This is to be a mortal

And seek the things beyond mortality

Another Spirit. Yet, see, he mastereth himself, and makes

160 His torture tributary to his will Had he been one of us, he would have made

An awful spirit.

Nem Hast thou further question
Of our great sovereign, or his worshippers?

Man None

Nem. Then for a time farewell.

Man. We meet then! Where? On the
earth?—

Even as thou wilt. and for the grace accorded

I now depart a debtor Fare ye well!

[Exit MANFRED.
(Scene closes)]

A Hall in the Castle of Manfred.

MANFRED and HERMAN.

Man What is the hour?

Her. It wants but one till sunset,
And promises a lovely twilight.

Man Say,
Are all things so disposed of in the tower
As I directed?

Her. All, my lord, are ready 5 Here is the key and casket.

Man It is well
Thou may'st retire [Exit HERMAN.]

Man (alone) There is a calm upon me—Inexplicable stillness! which till now
Did not belong to what I knew of life.

10 If that I did not know philosophy
To be of all our vanities the moiliest,
The merest word that ever fool'd the ear From out the schoolman's jargon, I should deem

The golden secret, the sought "Kalon,"
found,

And seated in my soul. It will not last, 15 But it is well to have known it, though but once.

It hath enlarged my thoughts with a new sense,

And I within my tablets would note down
That there is such a feeling. Who is there?

Re-enter HERMAN.

Her My lord, the abbot of St. Maurice craves

20 To greet your presence.

Enter the ABBOT OF ST. MAURICE.

Abbot Peace be with Count Manfred!

Man Thanks, holy father! welcome to these walls,

Thy presence honors them, and blesseth those

Who dwell within them.

Abbot. Would it were so, Count!—
But I would fain confer with thee alone.

1 The beautiful; the best of human existence

25 Man. Herman, retire.—What would my reverend guest?

Abbot. Thus, without prelude:—Age and zeal, my office,

And good intent, must plead my privilege;
Our near, though not acquainted neighborhood,

May also be my herald. Rumors strange,

30 And of unholy nature, are abroad,

And busy with thy name; a noble name For centuries: may he who bears it now Transmit it unimpair'd!

Man. Proceed,—I listen

Abbot. 'Tis said thou holdest converse with the things

35 Which are forbidden to the search of man,
That with the dwellers of the dark abodes,
The many evil and unheavenly spirits Which walk the valley of the shade of
death,

Thou communest. I know that with mankind,

40 Thy fellows in creation, thou dost rarely Exchange thy thoughts, and that thy solitude

Is as an anchorite's, were it but holy.

Man. And what are they who do avouch these things?

Abbot. My pious brethren—the scared peasantry—

45 Even thy own vassals—who do look on
thee

With most unquiet eyes. Thy life's in peril

Man. Take it

Abbot. I come to save, and not destroy I would not pry into thy secret soul, But if these things be sooth, there still is time

50 For penitence and pity. reconcile thee With the true church, and through the church to heaven

Man. I hear thee. This is my reply:
whate'er

I may have been, or am, doth rest between Heaven and myself. I shall not choose a mortal

55 To be my mediator. Have I sinn'd Against your ordinances? prove and punish!

Abbot. My son! I did not speak of punishment,

But penitence and pardon,—with thyself
The choice of such remains—and for the last,

60 Our institutions and our strong belief Have given me power to smooth the path from sin

To higher hope and better thoughts, the first

I leave to heaven,—“Vengeance is mine alone!”¹

So saith the Lord, and with all humbleness

65 His servant echoes back the awful word

Man. Old man! there is no power in holy men,

Nor charm in prayer, nor purifying form
Of penitence, nor outward look, nor fast, Nor agony—nor, greater than all these,

70 The innate tortures of that deep despair,
Which is remorse without the fear of hell,
But all in all sufficient to itself Would make a hell of heaven²—can exorcise

From out the unbounded spirit the quick
sense

75 Of its own sins, wrongs, sufferance, and

Upon itself; there is no future pang
Can deal that justice on the self-condemn'd
He deals on his own soul

Abbot. All this is well.

For this will pass away, and be succeeded 80 By an auspicious hope, which shall look up

With calm assurance to that blessed place, Which all who seek may win, whatever be Their earthly errors, so they be atoned.

And the commencement of atonement is 85 The sense of its necessity. Say on—

And all our church can teach thee shall be taught;

And all we can absolve thee shall be par-don'd.

Man. When Rome's sixth emperor³ was near his last,

The victim of a self-inflicted wound,

90 To shun the torments of a public death

From senates once his slaves, a certain soldier,

With show of loyal pity, would have stanch'd

The gushing throat with his officious robe, The dying Roman thrust him back, and said—

95 Some empire still in his expiring glance—“It is too late—is this fidelity?”

Abbot. And what of this?

Man. I answer with the Roman—“It is too late!”

Abbot. It never can be so,

To reconcile thyself with thy own soul,

100 And thy own soul with heaven. Hast thou no hope?

'Tis strange—even those who do despair
above,

² See Paradise Lost, 1, 254-55.

³ Nero, Emperor of Rome (54-68). See Biographical Lives of the Caesars, 6, 40.

Yet shape themselves some fantasy on
earth,
To which frail twig they cling, like drowning men.

Man. Ay—father! I have had those earthly visions,

105 And noble aspirations in my youth,
To make my own the mind of other men,
The enlightener of nations, and to rise
I knew not whither—it might be to fall;
But fall, even as the mountain-cataract,

110 Which, having leapt from its more dazzling height,
Even in the foaming strength of its abyss (Which casts up misty columns that become

Clouds raining from the re-ascended
skies),

Lies low but mighty still—But this is past, 115 My thoughts mistook themselves

Abbot. And wherefore so?

Man. I could not tame my nature down, for he

Must serve who fain would sway; and soothe, and sue,

And watch all time, and pry into all place.
And be a living lie, who would become 120 A mighty thing amongst the mean, and

The mass are; I disdain'd to mingle with A herd, though to be leader—and of wolves.

The lion is alone, and so am I Abbot. And why not live and act with other men?

125 Man. Because my nature was averse from life;

And yet not cruel; for I would not make,
But find a desolation. Like the wind,

The red-hot breath of the most lone simoom,

Which dwells but in the desert, and sweeps
o'er

30 The barren sands which bear no shrubs to blast,

And revels o'er their wild and arid waves,
And seeketh not, so that it is not sought, But being met is deadly,—such hath been The course of my existence, but there came

35 Things in my path which are no more

Abbot. Alas!

I 'gin to fear that thou art past all aid From me and from my calling; yet so young,

I still would—

Man. Look on me! there is an order Of mortals on the earth, who do become 40 Old in their youth, and die ere middle age,

Without the violence of warlike death;
Some perishing of pleasure, some of study,
Some worn with toil, some of mere weariness,

Some of disease, and some insanity, 145 And some of wither'd or of broken hearts,

For this last is a malady which slays More than are number'd in the lists of Fate,

Taking all shapes, and bearing many names.

Look upon me! for even of all these things 150 Have I partaken; and of all these things,

One were enough, then wonder not that I Am what I am, but that I ever was,

Or having been, that I am still on earth.

Abbot. Yet, hear me still—

Man. Old man! I do respect

155 Thine order, and revere thine years; I

Thy purpose pious, but it is in vain.

Think me not churlish; I would spare thyself,

Far more than me, in shunning at this
time

All further colloquy; and so—farewell

[Exit MANFRED]

160 Abbot. This should have been a noble creature: he

Hath all the energy which would have made

A goodly frame of glorious elements,

Had they been wisely mingled, as it is,
It is an awful chaos—light and darkness,

165 And mind and dust, and passions and pure thoughts

Mix'd, and contending without end or order,—

All dormant or destructive; he will perish,
And yet he must not, I will try once more.

For such are worth redemption, and my duty

170 Is to dare all things for a righteous end I'll follow him—but cautiously, though surely.

[Exit ABBOT.]

Another Chamber.

MANFRED and HERMAN.

Her. My lord, you bade me wait on you at sunset

He sinks behind the mountain.

Man. Doth he so?
I will look on him.

[MANFRED advances to the Window of the Hall.]

Glorious orb! the idol

Of early nature, and the vigorous race

5 Of undiseased mankind, the giant sons Of the embrace of angels,¹ with a sex More beautiful than they, which did draw
 down
 The erring spirits who can ne'er return.—
 Most glorious orb! that wert a worship, ere 10 The mystery of thy making was reveal'd!
 Thou earliest minister of the Almighty, Which gladden'd, on their mountain tops, the hearts
 Of the Chaldean shepherds,² till they pour'd
 Themselves in orisons! Thou material God!
 15 And representative of the Unknown—Who chose thee for his shadow! Thou chief star!
 ('entre of many stars' which mak'st our
 earth
 Endurable, and temperest the hues And hearts of all who walk within thy rays!
 20 Sire of the seasons! Monarch of the elms,
 And those who dwell in them! for near or far,
 Our inborn spirits have a tint of thee Even as our outward aspects,—thou dost
 rise,
 And shine, and set in glory Fare thee
 well!
 25 I ne'er shall see thee more As my first glance
 Of love and wonder was for thee, then take My latest look; thou wilt not beam on one To whom the gifts of life and warmth have been
 Of a more fatal nature He is gone 30 I follow. [Exit MANFRED.

The Mountains—The Castle of Manfred at some distance—A Terrace before a Tower.—Time, Twilight.

HERMAN, MANUEL, and other Dependants of MANFRED.

Her. 'Tis strange enough, night after night, for years,
 He hath pursued long vigils in this tower, Without a witness. I have been within it,— So have we all been oftentimes; but from it, 5 Or its contents, it were impossible To draw conclusions absolute, of aught His studies tend to. To be sure, there is One chamber where none enter. I would give

² The Chaldeans were especially versed in astrology

The fee of¹ what I have to come these three years, 10 To pore upon its mysteries.
 Manuel. 'Twere dangerous:
 Content thyself with what thou know'st already.
 Her. Ah! Manuel! thou art elderly and wise,
 And couldst say much, thou hast dwelt within the castle—
 How many years is 't?
 Manuel. Ere Count Manfred's birth, 15 I served his father, whom he nought resembles
 Her. There be more sons in like predicament.
 But wherein do they differ?
 Manuel. I speak not Of features or of form, but mind and habits, Count Sigismund was proud, but gay and
 free,— 20 A warrior and a reveller, he dwelt not With books and solitude, nor made the night
 A gloomy vigil, but a festal time, Merrier than day, he did not walk the rocks
 And forests like a wolf, nor turn aside 25 From men and their delights.
 Her. Beshrew the hour, But those were jocund times! I would that such Would visit the old walls again, they look As if they had forgotten them Manuel. These walls Must change their chieftain first Oh! I have seen 30 Some strange things in them, Herman Her. Come, be friendly Relate me some to while away our watch
 I've heard thee darkly speak of an event Which happen'd hereabouts, by this same tower Manuel. That was a night indeed! I do remember 35 'Twas twilight, as it may be now, and such Another evening;—yon red cloud, which rests
 On Eiger's pinnacle, so rested then,— So like that it might be the same; the wind Was faint and gusty, and the mountain snows 40 Began to glitter with the climbing moon.
 Count Manfred was, as now, within his tower,—
 How occupied, we knew not, but with him

The sole companion of his wanderings
And watchings—her, whom of all earthly things

45 That lived, the only thing he seem'd to love,—

As he, indeed, by blood was bound to do, The lady Astarte, his—

Hush! who comes here?

Enter the ABBOT.

Abbot. Where is your master?

Her Yonder in the tower

Abbot. I must speak with him

Manuel. 'Tis impossible;

50 He is most private, and must not be thus Intruded on.

Abbot. Upon myself I take The forfeit of my fault, if fault there
be—

But I must see him

Her Thou hast seen him once This eve already

Abbot. Herman! I command thee,

55 Knock, and apprise the Count of my approach

Her. We dare not

Abbot Then it seems I must be herald
Of my own purpose

Manuel Reverend father, stop—
I pray you pause.

Abbot Why so?

Manuel But step this way,
And I will tell you further. [Exeunt.]

Interior of the Tower

MANFRED alone.

The stars are forth, the moon above the tops

Of the snow-shining mountains.—Beautiful!

I linger yet with Nature, for the night Hath been to me a more familiar face

5 Than that of man, and in her starry shade Of dim and solitary loveliness,

I learn'd the language of another world.¹

I do remember me, that in my youth, When I was wandering,—upon such a
night

10 I stood within the Coliseum's wall,
'Midst the chief relics of almighty Rome.
The trees which grew along the broken arches

Waved dark in the blue midnight, and the

Shone through the rents of ruin; from afar

15 The watch-dog bay'd beyond the Tiber;
and

More near from out the Cæsar's palace

The owl's long cry; and, interruptedly,
Of distant sentinels the fitful song

Begun and died upon the gentle wind

20 Some cypresses beyond the time-worn breach

Appear'd to skirt the horizon, yet they stood

Within a bowshot Where the Cæsars
dwelt,

And dwell the tuneless birds of night, amidst

A grove which springs through levell'd battlements,

25 And twines its roots with the imperial hearths,

Ivy usurps the laurel's place of growth,
But the gladiator's bloody Cuirass stands,

A noble wreck in ruinous perfection, While Cæsar's chambers, and the Augustan halls,

30 Grovel on earth in indistinct decay

And thou didst shine, thou rolling moon, upon

All this, and cast a wide and tender light, Which soften'd down the hoar austerity

Of rugged desolation, and fill'd up,

35 As 'twere anew, the gaps of centuries, Leaving that beautiful which still was

so,
And making that which was not, till the
place

Became religion, and the heart ran o'er With silent worship of the great of old,—

40 The dead but sceptred sovereigns, who still rule

Our spirits from their urns

'Twas such a night!

'Tis strange that I recall it at this time,
But I have found our thoughts take wildest flight

Even at the moment when they should array

45 Themselves in pensive order.

Enter the ABBOT.

Abbot. My good lord!

I crave a second grace for this approach;
But yet let not my humble zeal offend

By its abruptness—all it hath of ill

Recoils on me; its good in the effect

50 May light upon your head—could I say
heart—

Could I touch that, with words or prayers, I should Recall a noble spirit which hath wander'd, But is not yet all lost.

Man. Thou know'st me not,
My days are number'd, and my deeds recorded,

85 Retire, or 't will be dangerous—Away!

Abbot Thou dost not mean to menace
me?

Man. Not I,
I simply tell thee peril is at hand,
And would preserve thee

Abbot What dost thou mean?

Man Look there!

What dost thou see?

Abbot Nothing

Man Look there, I say,

60 And steadfastly,—now tell me what thou seest!

Abbot That which should shake me, but I fear it not.

I see a dusk and awful figure rise,
Like an infernal god, from out the earth, His face wrapt in a mantle, and his form

65 Robed as with angry clouds he stands between

Thyself and me—but I do fear him not

Man. Thou hast no cause, he shall not harm thee, but

His sight may shock thine old limbs into palsy

I say to thee—Retire!

Abbot And I reply—

70 Never—till I have battled with this fiend — What doth he here?

Man Why—ay—what doth he here?

I did not send for him,—he is unbidden

Abbot. Alas! lost mortal! what with guests like these

Hast thou to do? I tremble for thy sake

75 Why doth he gaze on thee, and thou on him?

Ah! he unveils his aspect. on his brow
The thunder-scars are graven from his eye

Glares forth the immortality of hell—

Avaunt!

Man Pronounce—what is thy mission?

Spirit. Come!

80 Abbot. What art thou, unknown being?
answer!—speak!

Spirit. The genius of this mortal—Come! 'tis time.

Man. I am prepared for all things, but deny

The power which summons me. Who sent thee here?

Spirit Thou 'lt know anon—Come!
come!

Man I have commanded

85 Things of an essence greater far than
thine,

And striven with thy masters Get thee hence!

Spirit Mortal! thine hour is come—Away! I say

Man I knew, and know my hour is come, but not

To render up my soul to such as thee

90 Away! I'll die as I have lived—alone

Spirit. Then I must summon up my brethren—Rise!

[Other Spirits rise up

Abbot Avaunt! ye evil ones!—Avaunt!
I say,

Ye have no power where piety hath power,
And I do charge ye in the name—

Spirit Old man!

95 We know ourselves, our mission, and thine
order,

Waste not thy holy words on idle uses.

It were in vain: this man is fortified

Once more I summon him—Away! Away!

Man I do defy ye,—though I feel my soul

100 Is ebbing from me, yet I do defy ye,

Not will I hence, while I have earthly breath

To breathe my scorn upon ye—earthly strength

To wrestle, though with spirits, what ye

Shall be ta'en limb by limb

Spirit Reluctant mortal!

105 Is this the Magian who would so pervade

The world invisible, and make himself

Almost our equal? Can it be that thou Art thus in love with life? the very life

Which made thee wretched!

Man. Thou false fiend, thou heest!

110 My life is in its last hour,—that I know,

Nor would redeem a moment of that hour,

I do not combat against death, but thee
And thy surrounding angels, my past

power,
Was purchased by no compact with thy crew,

115 But by superior science—penance, daring.
And length of watching, strength of mind.

and skill In knowledge of our fathers—when the

earth
Saw men and spirits walking side by side.

And gave ye no supremacy. I stand 120 Upon my strength—I do defy—deny—Sputin back, and scorn ye!

Spirit. But thy many crimes Have made thee—

Man. What are they to such as thee?
Must crimes be punish'd but by other crimes,
And greater criminals?—Back to thy
hell!

125 Thou hast no power upon me, that I feel, 1 Thou never shalt possess me, that I know What I have done is done, I bear within A torture which could nothing gain from thine.

The mind which is immortal makes itself 130 Requital for its good or evil thoughts,— Is its own origin of ill and end And its own place and time,¹ its innate
sense,

When stripp'd of this mortality, derives

No color from the fleeting things without,

135 But is absorb'd in sufferance or in joy.
Born from the knowledge of its own desert.

Thou didst not tempt me, and thou couldst not tempt me,

I have not been thy dupe, nor am thy prey—

But was my own destroyer, and will be

140 My own hereafter — Back, ye baffled fiends!

The hand of death is on me—but not yours [The Demons disappear.]

Abbot. Alas! how pale thou art—thy lips are white—

And thy breast heaves—and in thy gasping throat

The accents rattle Give thy prayers to
heaven—

145 Pray—albeit but in thought,—but die not thus

Man. 'Tis over—my dull eyes can fix thee not;

But all things swim around me, and the
earth

Heaves as it were beneath me. Fare thee
well!

Give me thy hand

Abbot. Cold—cold—even to the
heart—

150 But yet one prayer—Alas! how fares it with thee?

Man. Old man! 't is not so difficult to die. [MANFRED expires]

Abbot. He's gone—his soul hath ta'en its earthless flight;

Whither? I dread to think—but he is gone.

SO, WE'LL GO NO MORE A-ROVING
1817 1830

So, we'll go no more a-roving
So late into the night, Though the heart be still as loving,
And the moon be still as bright.

5 For the sword outwears its sheath,
And the soul outwears the breast,
And the heart must pause to breathe,
And love itself have rest.

Though the night was made for loving, 10 And the day returns too soon, Yet we'll go no more a-roving
By the light of the moon.

MY BOAT IS ON THE SHORE
1817 1821

My boat is on the shore,
And my bark is on the sea,
But, before I go, Tom Moore,
Here's a double health to thee!

5 Here's a sigh to those who love me,
And a smile to those who hate,
And, whatever sky's above me,
Here's a heart for every fate.

Though the ocean roar around me, 10 Yet it still shall hear me on;
Though a desert should surround me,
It hath springs that may be won.

Were 't the last drop in the well, 15 As I gasp'd upon the brink, Ere my fainting spirit fell,
'T is to thee that I would drink.

With that water, as this wine, 20 The libation I would pour Should be—peace with thine and mine,
And a health to thee, Tom Moore.

STRAHAN, TONSON, LINTOT OF THE TIMES

1818 1830

Strahan, Tonson, Lintot of the times, Patron and publisher of rhymes,
For thee the bard up Pindus climbs,
My Murray.

5 To thee, with hope and terror dumb,
The unfledged MS. authors come; Thou printest all—and sellest some—
My Murray.

Upon thy table's baize so green 10 The last new Quarterly is seen;
But where is thy new Magazine,
My Murray?

Along thy sprucest bookshelves shine
The works thou deemest most divine—15 The Art of Cookery, and mine,
My Murray

Tours, Travels, Essays, too, I wist,
And Sermons, to thy mill bring grist,
And then thou hast the Navy List, 20 My Murray.

And Heaven forbid I should conclude Without "the Board of Longitude," Although this narrow paper would,

MAZEPPA

1818 1819

"T was after dread Pultowa's day, When fortune left the royal Swede,¹ Around a slaughter'd army lay,
No more to combat and to bleed.
5 The power and glory of the war, Faithless as their vain votaries, men,
Had pass'd to the triumphant Czai,
And Moscow's walls were safe again, Until a day more dark and drear,² 10 And a more memorable year, Should give to slaughter and to shame
A mightier host and haughtier name,
A greater wreck, a deeper fall,
A shock to one—a thunderbolt to all.
15 Such was the hazard of the die;
The wounded Charles was taught to fly
By day and night through field and flood, Stain'd with his own and subjects' blood;
For thousands fell that flight to aid.
20 And not a voice was heard t' upbraid Ambition in his humbled hour, When truth had nought to dread from
power.

His horse was slain, and Gieta gave His own—and died the Russians' slave 25 This too sinks after many a league Of well sustain'd but vain fatigue,
And in the depth of forests darkling.
The watch-fires in the distance sparkling—
The beacons of surrounding foes—30 A king must lay his limbs at length Are these the laurels and repose
For which the nations strain their strength?
They laid him by a savage tree,
In outworn nature's agony;
35 His wounds were stiff, his limbs were stark;

¹ Charles XII, King of Sweden (1697-1718), whose forces were almost annihilated by those of Peter the Great of Russia, in the Battle of Poltava, July 8, 1709.

² A reference to Napoleon's Russian campaign of 1812, in which Moscow was burned and the French army almost destroyed by hunger and cold on the return march.

The heavy hour was chill and dark,
The fever in his blood forbade
A transient slumber's fitful aid And thus it was, but yet through all, 40 Kinglike the monarch bore his fall,
And made, in this extreme of ill, His pangs the vassals of his will All silent and subdued were they,
As once the nations round him lay.
45 A band of chiefs!—alas! how few,
Since but the fleeting of a day Had thinn'd it, but this wreck was true
And chivalrous upon the clay
Each sat him down, all sad and mute, 50 Beside his monarch and his steed,
For danger levels man and brute,
And all are fellows in their need.
Among the rest, Mazeppa made His pillow in an old oak's shade—55 Himself as rough, and scarce less old,
The Ukraine's Hetman,¹ calm and bold.
But first, outspent with this long course,
The Cossack prince rubb'd down his horse,
And made for him a leafy bed, 60 And smooth'd his fetlocks and his mane, And slack'd his girth, and stripp'd his rein.

And joy'd to see how well he fed;
For until now he had the dread His wearied courser might refuse 65 To browse beneath the midnight dews
But he was hardy as his lord,
And little cared for bed and board;
But spirited and docile, too, Whate'er was to be done, would do 70 Shaggy and swift, and strong of limb, All Tartar-like he carried him;
Obey'd his voice, and came to call,
And knew him in the midst of all:
Though thousands were around,— and
Night,

75 Without a star, pursued her flight,— That steed from sunset until dawn
His chief would follow like a fawn.

This done, Mazeppa spread his cloak And laid his lance beneath his oak, 80 Felt if his arms in order good
The long day's march had well withstood—
If still the powder fill'd the pan,
And flints unloosen'd kept their lock—His sabre's hilt and scabbard felt, 85 And whether they had chafed his belt;
And next the venerable man,
From out his haversack and can Prepared and spread his slender stock;

¹ The Cossack chief from Ukraine, a district in Russia lying in the valley of the river Dnieper. Mazeppa had deserted from the Russians and joined the Swedes.

- And to the monarch and his men 90 The whole or portion offer'd then With far less of inquietude Than courtiers at a banquet would.
 And Charles of this his slender share With smiles partook a moment there, 95 To force of cheer a greater show,
 And seem above both wounds and woe.
 And then he said—"Of all our band,
 Though firm of heart and strong of hand,
 In skirmish, march, or forage, none 100 Can less have said or more have done Than thee, Mazeppa¹ on the earth
 So fit a pair had never birth, Since Alexander's days till now.
 As thy Bucephalus and thou 105 All Scythia's fame to thine should yield For pricking on o'er flood and field" Mazeppa answer'd—"Ill betide
 The school wherein I learn'd to ride" Quoth Charles—"Old Hetman, wherefore 110 Since thou hast learn'd the art so well?" Mazeppa said—"T were long to tell.
 And we have many a league to go,
 With every now and then a blow,
 And ten to one at least the foe, 115 Before our steeds may graze at ease Beyond the swift Borysthenes.
 And, Sire, your limbs have need of rest.
 And I will be the sentinel
 Of this your troop"—"But I request," 120 Said Sweden's monarch, "thou wilt tell This tale of thine, and I may reap.
 Perchance, from this the boon of sleep.
 For at this moment from my eyes
 The hope of present slumber flies" 125 "Well, Sire, with such a hope, I'll track My seventy years of memory back—I think 't was in my twentieth spring.—
 Ay, 't was,—when Casimir was king!—
 John Casimir,—I was his page 130 Six summers, in my earlier age.
 A learned monarch, faith! was he,
 And most unlike your majesty.
 He made no wars, and did not gain
 New realms to lose them back again.
 135 And (save debates in Warsaw's diet)
 He reign'd in most unseemly quiet:
 Not that he had no cares to vex;
 He loved the muses and the sex;
 And sometimes these so froward are.
 140 They made him wish himself at war; But soon his wrath being o'er, he took Another mistress—or new book:
 And then he gave prodigious fêtes—
- All Warsaw gather'd round his gates 145 To gaze upon his splendid court,
 And dames, and chiefs, of princely port:
 He was the Polish Solomon,
 So sung his poets, all but one,
 Who, being unpension'd, made a satire, 150 And boasted that he could not flatter.
 It was a court of jousts and mimes,
 Where every courtier tried at rhymes,
 Even I for once produced some verses,
 And sign'd my odes 'Despairing Thyrsis.' 155 There was a certain Palatine, A count of fair and high descent.
 Rich as a salt² or silver mine;
 And he was proud, ye may divine,
 As if from heaven he had been sent 160 He had such wealth in blood and ore
 As few could match beneath the throne,
 And he would gaze upon his store.
 And o'er his pedigree would pore, Until by some confusion led, 165 Which almost look'd like want of head.
 He thought their merits were his own
 His wife was not of his opinion.
 His junior she by thirty years.
 (Grew daily tired of his dominion.
 170 And, after wishes, hopes, and fears,
 To virtue a few farewell tears
 A restless dream or two, some glances At Warsaw's youth, some songs, and dances,
 Awaited but the usual chances, 175 Those happy accidents which render The coldest dames so very tender,
 To deck her Count with titles given.
 'T is said, as passports into heaven.
 But, strange to say, they rarely boast 180 Of these, who have deserved them most
- "I was a goodly stripling then:
 At seventy years I so may say.
 That there were few, or boys or men,
 Who, in my dawning time of day, 185 Of vassal or of knight's degree, Could vie in vanities with me;
 For I had strength, youth, gaiety.
 A port, not like to this ye see,
 But smooth, as all is rugged now.
 190 For time, and care, and war, have plough'd
 My very soul from out my brow:
 And thus I should be disavow'd By all my kind and kin, could they Compare my day and yesterday;
 195 This change was wrought, too, long ere age Had ta'en my features for his page;
 With years, ye know, have not declined

¹ John Casimir was King of Poland from 1649 to 1668

² The wealth of Poland consists largely in salt mines

My strength, my courage, or my mind, Or at this hour I should not be 200 Telling old tales beneath a tree,
 With starless skies my canopy
 But let me on: Theresa's form—Methinks it glides before me now, Between me and yon chestnut's bough, 205 The memory is so quick and warm;
 And yet I find no words to tell The shape of her I loved so well:
 She had the Asiatic eye,
 Such as our Turkish neighborhood 210 Hath mingled with our Polish blood, Dark as above us is the sky;
 But through it stole a tender light,
 Like the first moonrise of midnight,
 Large, dark, and swimming in the stream, 215 Which seem'd to melt to its own beam.
 All love, half languor, and half fire,
 Like saints that at the stake expire,
 And lift their raptured looks on high,
 As though it were a joy to die.
 220 A brow like a midsummer lake, Transparent with the sun therein,
 When waves no murmur dare to make,
 And heaven beholds her face within A cheek and lip—but why proceed?
 225 I loved her then, I love her still:
 And such as I am, love indeed In fierce extremes—in good and ill
 But still we love even in our rage,
 And haunted to our very age 230 With the vain shadow of the past.
 As is Mazeppa to the last.

“We met—we gazed—I saw, and sigh’d,
 She did not speak, and yet replied;
 There are ten thousand tones and signs 235 We hear and see, but none defines—Involuntary sparks of thought, Which strike from out the heart o’er-wrought,
 And form a strange intelligence, Alike mysterious and intense, 240 Which link the burning chain that binds, Without their will, young hearts and minds.
 Conveying, as the electric wire,
 We know not how, the absorbing fire
 I saw, and sigh’d—in silence wept.
 245 And still reluctant distance kept.
 Until I was made known to her,
 And we might then and there confer Without suspicion—then, even then,
 I long’d, and was resolved to speak;
 250 But on my lips they died again,
 The accents tremulous and weak,
 Until one hour—There is a game,
 A frivolous and foolish play, Wherewith we while away the day:

255 It is—I have forgot the name—
 And we to this, it seems, were set,
 By some strange chance, which I forgot I reek’d not if I won or lost,
 It was enough for me to be 260 So near to hear, and oh! to see The being whom I loved the most I watch’d her as a sentinel, (May ours this dark night watch as well!) Until I saw, and thus it was, 265 That she was pensive, nor perceived Her occupation, nor was grieved Nor glad to lose or gain; but still Play’d on for hours, as if her will Yet bound her to the place, though not 270 That hers might be the winning lot.
 Then through my brain the thought did
 pass
 Even as a flash of lightning there,
 That there was something in her air
 Which would not doom me to despair; 275 And on the thought my words broke forth, All incoherent as they were;
 Their eloquence was little worth,
 But yet she listen’d—’t is enough—
 Who listens once will listen twice; 280 Her heart, be sure, is not of ice,
 And one refusal no rebuff

“I loved, and was beloved again—
 They tell me, Sir, you never knew Those gentle frailties, if ’t is true.
 285 I shorten all my joy or pain;
 To you ’t would seem absurd as vain.
 But all men are not born to reign.
 Or o’er their passions, or as you Thus o’er themselves and nations too 290 I am—or rather was—a prince.
 A chief of thousands, and could lead Them on where each would foremost bleed;
 But could not o’er myself evince
 The like control—But to resume 295 I loved, and was beloved again;
 In sooth, it is a happy doom,
 But yet where happiest ends in pain
 We met in secret, and the hour Which led me to that lady’s bower 300 Was fiery Expectation’s dower My days and nights were nothing—all Except that hour, which doth recall,
 In the long lapse from youth to age, No other like itself. I’d give 305 The Ukraine back again to live
 It o’er once more, and be a page,
 The happy page, who was the lord
 Of one soft heart, and his own sword.
 And had no other gem nor wealth 310 Save nature’s gift of youth and health

We met in secret—doubly sweet,
 Some say, they find it so to meet,
 I know not that—I would have given My life but to have call'd her mine 315 In the full view of earth and heaven;
 For I did oft and long repine
 That we could only meet by stealth.

“For lovers there are many eyes,
 And such there were on us; the devil 320 On such occasions should be civil—
 The devil!—I'm loth to do him wrong,
 It might be some untoward saint,
 Who would not be at rest too long.
 But to his pious bile gave vent—325 But one fair night, some lurking spies Surprised and seized us both.
 The Count was something more than wroth—
 I was unarm'd; but if in steel,
 All cap-à-pie from head to heel, 330 What 'gainst their numbers could I do?
 'T was near his castle, far away From city or from succor near,
 And almost on the break of day;
 I did not think to see another, 335 My moments seem'd reduced to few,
 And with one prayer to Mary Mother,
 And, it may be, a saint or two,
 As I resign'd me to my fate,
 They led me to the castle gate:
 340 Theresa's doom I never knew,
 Our lot was henceforth separate.
 An angry man, ye may opine,
 Was he, the proud Count Palatine;
 And he had reason good to be, 345 But he was most enraged lest such An accident should chance to touch Upon his future pedigree;
 Nor less amazed, that such a blot His noble 'scutcheon should have got, 350 While he was highest of his line, Because unto himself he seem'd
 The first of men, nor less he deem'd In others' eyes, and most in mine.
 355 Had reconciled him to the thing;
 But with a stripling of a page—
 I felt, but cannot paint his rage.

“‘Bring forth the horse!’—the horse was brought;
 In truth, he was a noble steed, 360 A Tartar of the Ukraine breed,
 Who look'd as though the speed of thought Were in his limbs; but he was wild, Wild as the wild deer, and untaught,
 With spur and bridle undefiled—

365 'T was but a day he had been caught;
 And snorting, with erected mane,
 And struggling fiercely, but in vain,
 In the full foam of wrath and dread
 To me the desert-born was led:
 370 They bound me on, that menial throng; Upon his back with many a thong;
 Then loosed him with a sudden lash—Away!—away!—and on we dash!
 Torrents less rapid and less rash.

375 “Away!—away! My breath was gone, I saw not where he hurried on:
 'T was scarcely yet the break of day,
 And on he foam'd—away!—away!
 The last of human sounds which rose, 380 As I was darted from my foes,
 Was the wild shout of savage laughter, Which on the wind came roaring after A moment from that rabble rout:
 With sudden wrath I wrench'd my head, 385 And snapp'd the cord, which to the mane Had bound my neck in lieu of rein,
 And, writhing half my form about, Howl'd back my curse, but 'midst the tread,
 The thunder of my courser's speed, 390 Perchance they did not hear nor heed.
 It vexes me—for I would fain Have paid their insult back again.
 I paid it well in after days:
 There is not of that castle gate, 395 Its drawbridge and portcullis' weight, Stone, bar, moat, bridge, or barrier left,
 Nor of its fields a blade of grass,
 Save what grows on a ridge of wall, Where stood the hearth-stone of the hall;
 400 And many a time ye there might pass, Nor dream that e'er that fortress was.
 I saw its turrets in a blaze,
 Their crackling battlements all cleft,
 And the hot lead pour down like rain 405 From off the scorch'd and blackening roof, Whose thickness was not vengeance-proof
 They little thought that day of pain,
 When launch'd, as on the lightning's flash,
 They bade me to destruction dash, 410 That one day I should come again, With twice five thousand horse, to thank The Count for his uncourteous ride
 They play'd me then a bitter prank,
 When, with the wild horse for my guide, 415 They bound me to his foaming flank.
 At length I play'd them one as frank—For time at last sets all things even—
 And if we do but watch the hour,
 There never yet was human power 420 Which could evade, if unforgiven,

The patient search and vigil long
Of him who treasures up a wrong.

“Away, away, my steed and I,
Upon the pinions of the wind, 425 All human dwellings left behind,
We sped like meteors through the sky,
When with its crackling sound the night
Is chequer’d with the Northern light.
Town—village—none were on our track, 430 But a wild plain of far extent,
And bounded by a forest black,
And, save the scarce seen battlement
On distant heights of some strong hold,
Against the Tartars built of old, 435 No trace of man. The year before A Turkish army had march’d o’er,
And where the Spani’s¹ hoof hath trod,
The verdure flies the bloody sod:
The sky was dull, and dim, and gray, 440 And a low breeze crept moaning by—I could have answer’d with a sigh—
But fast we fled, away, away—
And I could neither sigh nor pray;
And my cold sweat-drops fell like rain 445 Upon the courser’s bristling mane;
But, snoring still with rage and fear,
He flew upon his far career At times I almost thought, indeed,
He must have slacken’d in his speed, 450 But no—my bound and slender frame Was nothing to his angry might.
And merely like a spur became Each motion which I made to free
My swollen limbs from their agony 455 Increased his fury and affright:
I tried my voice,—’t was faint and low—
But yet he swerved as from a blow,
And, starting to each accent, sprang
As from a sudden trumpet’s clang.
460 Meantime my cords were wet with gore,
Which, oozing through my limbs, ran o’er:
And in my tongue the thirst became A something fierier far than flame

“We near’d the wild wood—’t was so wide, 465 I saw no bounds on either side;
’T was studded with old sturdy trees.
That bent not to the roughest breeze
Which howls down from Siberia’s waste, And strips the forest in its haste,— 470 But these were few and far between, Set thick with shrubs more young and green,
Luxuriant with their annual leaves, Ere strown by those autumnal eves
That nip the forest’s foliage dead.
475 Discolor’d with a lifeless red,

Which stands thereon like stiffen’d gore
Upon the slain when battle’s o’er,
And some long winter’s night hath shed
Its frost o’er every tombless head, 480 So cold and stark the raven’s beak May peck unpierced each frozen cheek
’T was a wild waste of underwood,
And here and there a chestnut stood,
The strong oak, and the hardy pine; 485 But far apart—and well it were,
Or else a different lot were mine—
The boughs gave way, and did not tear
My limbs; and I found strength to bear
My wounds, already scarr’d with cold, 490 My bonds forbade to loose my hold.
We rustled through the leaves like wind,
Left shrubs, and trees, and wolves behind,
By night I heard them on the track,
Their troop came hard upon our back, 495 With their long gallop, which can tire
The hound’s deep hate, and hunter’s fire Where’er we flew they follow’d on,
Nor left us with the morning sun,
Behind I saw them, scarce a rood, 500 At day-break winding through the wood,
And through the night had heard their feet
Their stealing, rustling step repeat Oh! how I wish’d for spear or sword,
At least to die amidst the horde, 505 And perish—if it must be so—
At bay, destroying many a foe!
When first my courser’s race begun,
I wish’d the goal already won;
But now I doubted strength and speed 510 Vain doubt! his swift and savage breed Had nerved him like the mountain-roe;
Nor faster falls the blinding snow Which whelms the peasant near the door Whose threshold he shall cross no more, 515 Bewilder’d with the dazzling blast, Than through the forest-paths he pass’d—Untired, untamed, and worse than wild;
All furious as a favor’d child Balk’d of its wish; or fiercer still—520 A woman piqued—who has her will!

“The wood was past. ’t was more than noon,
But chill the air, although in June;
Or it might be my veins ran cold—Prolong’d endurance tames the bold; 525 And I was then not what I seem,
But headlong as a wintry stream,
And wore my feelings out before I well could count their causes o’er.
And what with fury, fear, and wrath, 530 The tortures which beset my path, Cold, hunger, sorrow, shame, distress,
Thus bound in nature’s nakedness

- (Sprung from a race whose rising blood,
When sturr'd beyond its calmer mood, 535 And trodden hard upon, is like The rattle-snake's, in act to strike), What marvel if this worn-out trunk Beneath its woes a moment sunk?
The earth gave way, the skies roll'd round, 540 I seem'd to sink upon the ground;
But err'd, for I was fastly bound My heart turn'd sick, my brain grew sore.
And throb'd awfully, then beat no more
The skies spun like a mighty wheel, 545 I saw the trees like drunkards reel,
And a slight flash sprang o'er my eyes,
Which saw no farther: he who dies (Can die no more than then I died, O'er-tortured by that ghastly ride 550 I felt the blackness come and go, And strove to wake, but could not make My senses climb up from below
I felt as on a plank at sea,
When all the waves that dash o'er thee, 555 At the same time upheave and overwhelm,
And hurl thee towards a desert realm My undulating life was as The fancied lights that fitting pass Our shut eyes in deep midnight, when 560 Fever begins upon the brain.
But soon it pass'd, with little pain.
But a confusion worse than such I own that I should deem it much, Dying, to feel the same again; 565 And yet I do suppose we must Feel far more ere we turn to dust
No matter, I have bared my brow Full in Death's face—before—and now
- “My thoughts came back, where was I?
Cold,
570 And numb, and giddy: pulse by pulse Life reassumed its lingering hold,
And throb by throb,—till grown a pang
Which for a moment would convulse, My blood reflow'd, though thick and
chill;
575 My ear with uncouth noises rang.
My heart began once more to thrill.
My sight return'd, though dim, alas!
And thicken'd, as it were, with glass Methought the dash of waves was nigh.
580 There was a gleam too of the sky, Studded with stars;—it is no dream.
The wild horse swims the wilder stream!
The bright broad river's gushing tide Sweeps, winding onward, far and wide.
585 And we are half-way, struggling o'er To yon unknown and silent shore.
The waters broke my hollow trance.
And with a temporary strength
- My stiffen'd limbs were rebaptized 590 My courser's broad breast proudly braves,
And dashes off the ascending waves,
And onward we advance!
We reach the shippery shore at length.
A haven I but little prized, 595 For all behind was dark and drear.
And all before was night and fear
How many hours of night or day
In those suspended pangs I lay,
I could not tell; I scarcely knew 600 If this were human breath I drew
- “With glossy skin, and dripping mane,
And reeling limbs, and reeking flank,
The wild steed's snowy nerves still strain
Up the repelling bank 605 We gain the top—a boundless plain Spreads through the shadow of the night,
And onward, onward, onward, seems,
Like precipices in our dreams,
To stretch beyond the sight, 610 And here and there a speck of white Or scatter'd spot of dusky green, In masses broke into the light,
As rose the moon upon my right But nought distinctly seen 615 In the dim waste would indicate The omen of a cottage gate.
No twinkling taper from afar Stood like a hospitable star,
Not even an ignis-fatuus rose 620 To make him merry with my woes.
That very cheat had cheer'd me then!
Although detected, welcome still,
Reminding me, through every ill,
Of the abodes of men
- “Onward we went—but slack and slow, 625 His savage force at length o'er-spent,
The drooping courser, faint and low,
All feebly foaming went.
A sickly infant had had power 630 To guide him forward in that hour,
But, useless all to me,
His new-born tameness nought avail'd—
My limbs were bound, my force had fail'd, Perchance, had they been free 635 With feeble effort still I tried To rend the bonds so starkly tied.
But still it was in vain,
My limbs were only wrung the more,
And soon the idle strife gave o'er, 640 Which but prolong'd their pain
The dizzy race seem'd almost done, Although no goal was nearly won.
Some streaks announced the coming sun—
How slow, alas! he came!
645 Methought that mist of dawning gray

Would never dapple into day:
How heavily it roll'd away—
Before the eastern flame
Rose crimson, and deposed the stars, 650 And call'd the radiance from their cars,
And fill'd the earth, from his deep throne,
With lonely lustre, all his own

“Up rose the sun; the mists were curl'd Back from the solitary world 655 Which lay around, behind, before What boot'd it to traverse o'er Plain, forest, river? Man nor brute, Nor dint of hoof, nor print of foot,
Lay in the wild luxuriant soil;
660 No sign of travel, none of toil,
The very air was mute;
And not an insect's shrill small horn, Nor matin bird's new voice was borne From herb nor thicket Many a wretch 665 Panting as if his heart would burst,
The weary brute still stagger'd on,
And still we were—or seem'd—alone
At length, while reeling on our way, Methought I heard a courser neigh, 670 From out yon tuft of blackening firs
Is it the wind those branches stir?
No, no! from out the forest prance
A trampling troop; I see them come!
In one vast squadron they advance!
675 I strove to cry—my lips were dumb!
The steeds rush on in plunging pride,
But where are they the reins to guide?
A thousand horse—and none to ride!
With flowing tail, and flying mane, 680 Wide nostrils never stretch'd by pain, Mouths bloodless to the bit or rein,
And feet that iron never shod,
And flanks unscar'd by spur or rod,
A thousand horse, the wild, the free, 685 Like waves that follow o'er the sea, Came thickly thundering on,
As if our faint approach to meet,
The sight re-nerved my courser's feet,
A moment staggering, feebly fleet, 690 A moment, with a faint low neigh, He answer'd, and then fell,
With gasps and glazing eyes he lay,
And reeking limbs immovable—
His first and last career is done!
695 On came the troop—they saw him stoop, They saw me strangely bound alone
His back with many a bloody thong
They stop—they start—they snuff the air, Gallop a moment here and there, 700 Approach, retire, wheel round and round, Then plunging back with sudden bound.

¹ lark's

² A Russian measure equal to 3500 feet

Headed by one black mighty steed,
Who seem'd the patriarch of his breed,
Without a single speck or hair 705 Of white upon his shaggy hide; They snort—they foam—neigh—sweave aside,
And backward to the forest fly,
By instinct, from a human eye.
They left me there to my despair, 710 Lunk'd to the dead and stiffening wretch, Whose lifeless limbs beneath me stretch,
Relieved from that unwonted weight,
From whence I could not extricate Nor him nor me—and there we lay, 715 The dying on the dead!
I little deem'd another day Would see my houseless, helpless head

“And there from morn to twilight bound,
I felt the heavy hours toil round, 720 With just enough of life to see My last of suns go down on me.
In hopeless certainty of mind,
That makes us feel at length resign'd
To that which our foreboding years 725 Present the worst and truest of fears Inevitable—even a hood Not more mild for coming soon.
Yet shunn'd and dreaded with such care,
As if it only were a snare 730 That Prudence might escape
At times both wish'd for and unlored
At times sought with self-pointed sword, Yet still a dark and hideous close To even intolerable woes, 735 And welcome in no shape
And, strange to say, the sons of pleasure,
They who have revell'd beyond measure
In beauty, wassail, wine, and treasure, Die calm, or calmer, oft than he 740 Whose heritage was misery For he who hath in turn run through All that was beautiful and new, Hath nought to hope, and nought to leave,
And, save the future (which is view'd 745 Not quite as men are base or good, But as their nerves may be endured).
With nought perhaps to grieve
The wretch still hopes his woes must end, And Death, whom he should deem his friend, 750 Appears, to his distemper'd eyes, Arrived to rob him of his prize.
The tree of his new Paradise Tomorrow would have given him all, Repaid his pangs, repair'd his fall; 755 Tomorrow would have been the first Of days no more deplored or curs'd.

But bright, and long, and beckoning years,
 Seen dazzling through the mist of tears,
 Guerdon of many a painful hour;
 760 Tomorrow would have given him power To rule, to shine, to smite, to save—
 And must it dawn upon his grave?

“The sun was sinking—still I lay Chain’d to the chill and stiffening steed, 765 I thought to mingle there our clay,
 And my dim eyes of death had need;
 No hope arose of being freed.
 I cast my last looks up the sky,
 And there between me and the sun 770 I saw the expecting raven fly, Who scarce would wait till both should
 die,
 Ere his repast begun;
 He flew, and perch’d, then flew once more,
 And each time nearer than before;
 775 I saw his wing through twilight flit,
 And once so near me he alit I could have smote, but lack’d the strength;
 But the slight motion of my hand,
 And feeble searching of the sand, 780 The exerted throat’s faint struggling noise,
 Which scarcely could be called a voice, Together scared him off at length.—
 I know no more—my latest dream Is something of a lovely star 785 Which fix’d my dull eyes from afar, And went and came with wandering beam,
 And of the cold, dull, swimming, dense Sensation of recurring sense,
 And then subsiding back to death, 790 And then again a little breath,
 A little thrill, a short suspense,
 An icy sickness curdling o’er My heart, and sparks that cross’d my brain—
 A gasp, a throb, a start of pain, 795 A sigh, and nothing more

“I woke—where was I?—Do I see A human face look down on me?
 And doth a roof above me close?
 Do these limbs on a couch repose?
 800 Is this a chamber where I lie?
 And is it mortal yon bright eye,
 That watches me with gentle glance?
 I closed my own again once more,
 As doubtful that my former trance 805 Could not as yet be o’er.
 A slender girl, long-hair’d, and tall, Sate watching by the cottage wall:
 The sparkle of her eye I caught,

Even with my first return of thought; 810 For ever and anon she threw A prying, pitying glance on me
 With her black eyes so wild and free:
 I gazed, and gazed, until I knew No vision it could be,— 815 But that I lived, and was released From adding to the vulture’s feast:
 And when the Cossack maid beheld My heavy eyes at length unseal’d, She smiled—and I essay’d to speak, 820 But fail’d—and she approach’d, and
 made
 With lip and finger signs that said,
 I must not strive as yet to break
 The silence, till my strength should be Enough to leave my accents free; 825 And then her hand on mine she laid;
 And smooth’d the pillow for my head,
 And stole along on tiptoe tread,
 And gently oped the door, and spake
 In whispers—ne’er was voice so sweet!
 830 Even music follow’d her light feet.
 But those she call’d were not awake,
 And she went forth, but, ere she pass’d, Another look on me she cast, Another sign she made, to say, 835 That I had nought to fear, that all Were near, at my command or call,
 And she would not delay
 Her due return—while she was gone, Methought I felt too much alone 840 “She came with mother and with sire—What need of more?—I will not tire With long recital of the rest, Since I became the Cossack’s guest.
 They found me senseless on the plain, 845 They bore me to the nearest hut,
 They brought me into life again—
 Me—one day o’er their realm to reign!
 Thus the vain fool who strove to glut His rage, refining on my pain, 850 Sent me forth to the wilderness, Bound, naked, bleeding, and alone,
 To pass the desert to a throne,— What mortal his own doom may guess?
 Let none despond, let none despair!
 855 Tomorrow the Borysthene May see our coursers graze at ease Upon his Turkish bank, and never Had I such welcome for a river
 As I shall yield when safely there.
 860 Comrades, good night!”—The Hetman threw
 His length beneath the oak-tree shade,
 With leafy couch already made,
 A bed nor comfortless nor new
 To him, who took his rest where’er

865 The hour arrived, no matter where.
 His eyes the hastening slumbers steep.
 And if ye marvel Charles forgot To thank his tale, he wonder'd not,— The king had been an hour asleep

From DON JUAN 1818-23 1819-24

DEDICATION
 1818 1819

1 Bob Southey! You're a poet — Poet-laureate, And representative of all the race, Although 'tis true that you turn'd out a Tory at Last, yours has lately been a common case,¹
 And now, my Epic Renegade! what are ye at?
 With all the Lakers,² in and out of
 place?
 A nest of tuneful persons, to my eye Like "four and twenty Blackbirds in a pye,

2 "Which pye being open'd they began to sing," (This old song and new simile holds good),
 "A dainty dish to set before the King," Or Regent,³ who admires such kind of food;—
 And Coleridge, too, has lately taken wing, But like a hawk encumbered with his hood,— Explaining metaphysics to the nation—
 I wish he would explain his Explanation⁴

3 You, Bob! are rather insolent, you know.
 At being disappointed in your wish To supersede all warblers here below,
 And be the only Blackbird in the dish.
 And then you overstrain yourself, or so,
 And tumble downward like the flying fish Gasping on deck, because you soar too high, Bob,
 And fall, for lack of moisture, quite a-dry.
 Bob!

¹ Southey, like Wordsworth and Coleridge, was at one time an ardent Republican, but the excesses and failures of the French Revolution led him finally to become a Tory

² Wordsworth, Coleridge, and others, so called because of their residence in the Lake District.

⁴ A reference to Coleridge's Biographia Literaria which appeared in 1817.

4 And Wordsworth, in a rather long Excursion (I think the quarto holds five hundred pages),

Has given a sample from the vasty version Of his new system to perplex the sages.
 'Tis poetry—at least by his assertion,
 And may appear so when the dog-star rages—

And he who understands it would be able To add a story to the Tower of Babel.

5 You—Gentlemen! by dint of long seclusion

From better company, have kept your
 At Keswick,¹ and, through still continued fusion

Of one another's minds, at last have grown

To deem as a most logical conclusion,
 That Poesy has wreaths for you alone
 There is a narrowness in such a notion, Which makes me wish you'd change your lakes for ocean

6 I would not imitate the petty thought, Nor coin my self-love to so base a vice,

For all the glory your conversion brought, Since gold alone should not have been its price

You have your salary—was't for that you wrought?

And Wordsworth has his place in the Excise²

You're shabby fellows—true—but poets
 still,

And duly seated on the immortal hill

7 Your brows may hide the baldness of your brows—

Perhaps some virtuous blushes;—let them go—

To you I envy neither fruit nor boughs—
 And for the fame you would engross
 below,

The field is universal, and allows Scope to all such as feel the inherent glow.

Scott, Rogers, Campbell, Moore, and Crabbe will try

'Gainst you the question with posterity

² Wordsworth was appointed Distributor of Stamps for Westmoreland in 1813, but he never had any connection with the excise.

³ Wreaths of honor made from leaves of the bay-tree a kind of laurel.

- 8 For me, who, wandering with pedestrian Muses,
Contend not with you on the winged steed,
I wish your fate may yield ye, when she chooses,
The fame you envy, and the skill you need;
And recollect a poet nothing loses
In giving to his brethren their full meed
Of merit, the complaint of present days Is not the certain path to future praise.
- 9 He that reserves his laurels for posterity (Who does not often claim the bright reversion)
Has generally no great crop to spare it, he Being only injured by his own assertion,
And although here and there some glorious rarity
Arise like Titan from the sea's immersion,
The major part of such appellants go To—God knows where—for no one else can know
- 10 If, fallen in evil days on evil tongues,¹ Milton appealed to the Avenger, Time, If Time, the Avenger, execrates his wrongs,
And makes the word "Miltonic" mean
"sublime,"
He deign'd not to belie his soul in songs, Nor turn his very talent to a crime;
He did not loathe the Sire to laud the Son,
But closed the tyrant-hater he begun.²
- 11 Think'st thou, could he—the blind Old Man—arise,
Like Samuel from the grave,³ to freeze once more
The blood of monarchs with his prophecies,
Or be alive again—again all hoar With time and trials, and those helpless
eyes,
And heartless daughters⁴—worn—and pale—and poor;
Would he adore a sultan? he obey
The intellectual eunuch Castlereagh?
- 12 Cold-blooded, smooth-faced, placid miscreant!
Dabbling its sleek young hands in Erin's gore,
- 13 An orator of such set trash of phrase Ineffably—legitimately vile,
That even its grossest flatterers dare not praise,
Nor foes—all nations—condescend to smile,
Not even a sprightly blunder's spark can blaze
From that Ixion grindstone's ceaseless
toil,
That turns and turns to give the world a notion
Of endless torments and perpetual motion
- 14 A bungler even in its disgusting trade, And botching, patching, leaving still behind
Something of which its masters are afraid, States to be curb'd, and thoughts to be confined,
Conspiracy or Congress to be made—Cobbling at manacles for all mankind—A tinkering slave-maker, who mends old chains,
With God's and man's abhorrence for its gains.
- 15 If we may judge of matter by the mind, Emasculated to the marrow It Hath but two objects, how to serve, and bind, Deeming the chain it wears even men may fit,
Eutropius of its many masters,—blind
To worth as freedom, wisdom as to wit Fearless—because no feeling dwells in ice, Its very courage stagnates to a vice
- 16 Where shall I turn me not to view its bonds,
For I will never feel them?—Italy!
Thy late reviving Roman soul desponds Beneath the lie this State-thing breathed o'er thee—
Thy clanking chain, and Erin's yet green wounds,
Have voices—tongues to cry aloud for
me

¹ See Paradise Lost, 7 28² Byron here contrasts Milton and Southey³ See 1 Samuel, 28 7 ff⁴ A reference to the shameful treatment which Milton is said to have received from his eldest daughters

Europe has slaves, allies, kings, armies
still,
And Southey lives to sing them very ill

17 Meantime, Sir Laureate, I proceed to dedicate,

In honest simple verse, this song to you And, if in flattering strains I do not predicate,

'Tis that I still retain my "buff and blue,"

My politics as yet are all to educate Apostasy 's so fashionable, too,
To keep one creed's a task grown quite Herculean

Is it not so, my Tory, Ultra-Julian?

From CANTO I
1818 1819

1 I want a hero an uncommon want, When every year and month sends forth a new one.

Till, after cloying the gazettes with cant,
The age discovers he is not the true one Of such as these I should not care to vaunt.

I'll therefore take our ancient friend
Don Juan—

We all have seen him, in the pantomime.
Sent to the devil somewhat ere his time

5 Brave men were living before Agamemnon And since, exceeding valorous and sage, A good deal like him too, though quite the same none,

But then they shone not on the poet's page.

And so have been forgotten—I condemn
none,

But can't find any in the present age Fit for my poem (that is, for my new
one),

So, as I said, I'll take my friend Don Juan

6 Most epic poets plunge "in medias res" (Horace makes this the heroic turnpike road),

¹ The colors of the uniform adopted by members of the Whig Club hence, the binding of The Edinburgh Review, the Whig organ

² "I allude not to our friend Landor's hero the traitor Count Julian, but to Gibbon's hero, vulgarly called 'The Apostate'."—Byron

³ A short version of Shadwell's Libertine, acted under the title of Don Juan, or, The Libertine Destroyed. At the conclusion of the last Act, Don Juan is thrown into the flames by the Puritans

⁴ Into the middle of things (Horace, Ars Poetica, 148)

And then your hero tells, whene'er you please,

What went before—by way of episode,
While seated after dinner at his ease,
Beside his mistress in some soft abode, Palace, or garden, paradise or cavern, Which serves the happy couple for a tavern.

7 That is the usual method, but not mine—
My way is to begin with the beginning;
The regularity of my design

Forbids all wandering as the worst of sinning,

And therefore I shall open with a line (Although it cost me half an hour in spinning)

Narrating somewhat of Don Juan's father,

And also of his mother, if you'd rather 8 In Seville was he born, a pleasant city, Famous for oranges and women—he Who has not seen it will be much to pity,

So says the proverb—and I quite agree;
Of all the Spanish towns is none more pretty,

Cádiz, perhaps—but that you soon may
see,

Don Juan's parents lived beside the river, A noble stream, and call'd the Guadalquivir.

9 His father's name was José—Don, of course,—

A true Hidalgo,¹ free from every stain Of Moor or Hebrew blood, he traced his source

Through the most Gothic gentlemen of Spain,²

A better cavalier ne'er mounted horse,
Or, being mounted, e'er got down again, Than José, who begot our hero, who Begot—but that's to come—Well, to renew.

10 His mother was a learned lady,³ famed For every branch of every science
known—

In every Christian language ever named,
With virtues equal'd by her wit alone.
She made the cleverest people quite ashamed,

² That is, of the purest Spanish stock. The Goths established the Visigothic kingdom in Spain and southern France in the fifth century, and were the ancestors of the later Spanish nobility

³ Stanzas 1029 are said to refer to Byron's wife

And even the good with inward envy
groan,
Finding themselves so very much exceeded In their own way by all the things that she did.

- 11 Her memory was a mine. she knew by heart

All Calderon and greater part of Lope, So that if any actor miss'd his part She could have served him for the prompter's copy;
For her Feinagle's were an useless art,
And he himself obliged to shut up shop—he Could never make a memory so fine as That which adorn'd the brain of Donna Inez

- 12 Her favorite science was the mathematical,

Her noblest virtue was her magnanimity;
Her wit (she sometimes tried at wit) was Attic¹ all,
Her serious saying darken'd to subtilimty;
In short, in all things she was fairly what I call
A prodigy—her morning dress was dimity,
Her evening silk, or, in the summer muslin,
And other stuffs, with which I won't stay puzzling

- 13 She knew the Latin—that is, "the Lord's prayer,"

And Greek—the alphabet—I'm nearly sure;
She read some French romances here and
there,
Although her mode of speaking was not pure,
For native Spanish she had no great care.
At least her conversation was obscure.
Her thoughts were theorems, her words a problem
As if she deem'd that mystery would ennoble 'em

- 14 She liked the English and the Hebrew
tongue,
And said there was analogy between
'em;

She proved it somehow out of sacred song.
But I must leave the proofs to those who've seen 'em,

But this I heard her say, and can't be wrong,

And all may think which way their judgments lean 'em,
" 'Tis strange—the Hebrew noun which means 'I am,'

The English always use to govern d—n "

Some women use their tongues—she look'd a lecture,

Each eye a sermon, and her brow a homily,

An all-in-all sufficient self-director,
Like the lamented late Sir Samuel Romilly,

The Law's expounder, and the State's corrector,

Whose suicide was almost an anomaly—One sad example more, that "All is vanity,"—¹

(The jury brought their verdict in "Insanity")

- 16 In short, she was a walking calculation, Miss Edgeworth's novels stepping from their covers,

Or Mrs Trimmer's books on education, (O, "Celebs' Wife" set out in quest of lovers,

Morality's prim personification,
In which not Envy's self a flaw discovers;

To others' share let "female errors fall,"² For she had not even one—the worst of all

- 17 Oh! she was perfect past all parallel—(Of any modern female saint's comparison;

So far above the cunning powers of hell, Her guardian angel had given up his garrison,

Even her minutest motions went as well As those of the best time-piece made by Harrison

In virtues nothing earthly could surpass
her,

Save thine "incomparable oil," Macassar!³

- 18 Perfect she was, but as perfection is Insipid in this naughty world of ours, Where our first parents never learn'd to kiss

² Pope, The Rape of the Lock, 2, 17

³ A description of the virtues of the "incomparable oil of Macassar" was included in Alexander Rowland's An Historical, Philosophical, and Practical Essay on the Human Hair (1816)

- Till they were exiled from their earlier
bowers,
Where all was peace, and innocence, and bliss (I wonder how they got through the twelve hours),
Don José, like a lineal son of Eve, Went plucking various fruit without her leave.
- 19 He was a mortal of the careless kind.
With no great love for learning, or the learn'd,
Who chose to go where'er he had a mind,
And never dream'd his lady was con-cern'd;
The world, as usual, wickedly melmed
To see a kingdom or a house o'er-turn'd, Whisper'd he had a mistress, some said two,
But for domestic quarrels one will do
- 20 Now Donna Inez had, with all her merit, A great opinion of her own good qualities,
Neglect, indeed, requires a saint to bear it.
And such, indeed, she was in her moralities;
But then she had a devil of a spirit,
And sometimes mix'd up fancies with realities,
And let few opportunities escape
Of getting her hege lord into a scrape
- 21 This was an easy matter with a man Oft in the wrong, and never on his guard,
And even the wisest, do the best they can,
Have moments, hours, and days, so unprepared,
That you might "bram them with their lady's fan,"
And sometimes ladies hit exceeding hard,
And fans turn into falchions in fair
hands,
And why and wherefore no one understands
- 22 'Tis pity learned virgins ever wed
With persons of no sort of education Or gentlemen, who, though well born and bred,
Grow tired of scientific conversation,
I don't choose to say much upon this
head,
I'm a plain man, and in a single station.
- But—Oh! ye lords of ladies intellectual, Inform us truly, have they not hen-peck'd you all?
- 23 Don José and his lady quarrell'd—why,
Not any of the many could divine, Though several thousand people chose to try,
'Twas surely no concern of theirs nor
mine,
I loathe that low vice—curiosity,
But if there's anything in which I shame,
'Tis in arranging all my friends' affairs,
Not having, of my own, domestic cares.
- 24 And so I interfered, and with the best Intentions, but their treatment was not
kind;
I think the foolish people were possess'd,
For neither of them could I ever find, Although their porter afterwards confess'd—But that's no matter, and the worst's
behind.
For little Juan o'er me threw, down stairs,
A pail of housemaid's water unawares.
- 25 A little curly-headed, good-for-nothing,
And mischief-making monkey from his birth,
His parents ne'er agreed except in doting Upon the most unquiet imp on earth; Instead of quarrelling, had they been but both in Then senses, they'd have sent young master forth
To school, or had him soundly whipp'd at home,
To teach him manners for the time to
come.
- 26 Don José and the Donna Inez led
For some time an unhappy sort of life, Wishing each other, not divorced, but dead,
They lived respectably as man and wife,
Then conduct was exceedingly well-bred,
And gave no outward signs of inward
strife,
Until at length the smother'd fire broke
out,
And put the business past all kind of doubt.
- 27 For Inez call'd some druggists and physicians,
And tried to prove her loving lord was mad,¹

her husband's supposed insanity

But as he had some lucid intermissions,
 She next decided he was only bad;
 Yet when they ask'd her for her depositions,
 No sort of explanation could be had.
 Save that her duty both to man and God Required this conduct—which seem'd very odd.

28 She kept a journal, where his faults were noted,
 And open'd certain trunks of books and letters,
 All which might, if occasion served, be quoted;
 And then she had all Seville for abettors, Besides her good old grandmother (who doted);
 The hearers of her case became repent-ers,
 Then advocates, inquisitors, and judges.
 Some for amusement, others for old grudges

29 And then this best and meekest woman bore
 With such serenity her husband's woes,
 Just as the Spartan ladies did of yore, Who saw their spouses kill'd, and nobly chose
 Never to say a word about them more—Calmly she heard each calumny that rose,
 And saw his agonies with such sublimity, That all the world exclaim'd, "What magnanimity!"

30 No doubt this patience, when the world is damning us,
 Is philosophic in our former friends.
 'Tis also pleasant to be deem'd magnanimous,
 The more so in obtaining our own ends.
 And what the lawyers call a "malus animus"¹
 Conduct like this by no means complements:
 Revenge in person's certainly no virtue.
 But then 'tis not my fault, if others hurt you

31 And if our quarrels should rip up old stories,
 And help them with a lie or two additional,
 I'm not to blame, as you well know—no more is ¹ malice aforethought

Any one else—they were become traditional;
 Besides, their resurrection aids our glories By contrast, which is what we just were wishing all:
 And science profits by this resurrection—Dead scandals form good subjects for dissection.

32 Their friends had tried at reconciliation, Then their relations, who made matters worse, ('Twere hard to tell upon a like occasion To whom it may be best to have recourse—
 I can't say much for friend or yet relation):
 The lawyers did their utmost for divorce,
 But scarce a fee was paid on either side Before, unluckily, Don José died

33 He died—and most unluckily, because According to all hints I could collect From counsel learned in those kinds of laws (Although their talk's obscure and cir-cumspect),
 His death contrived to spoil a charming cause,
 A thousand pities also with respect To public feeling, which on this occasion Was manifested in a great sensation.

34 But ah! he died, and buried with him lay The public feeling and the lawyers' fees
 His house was sold, his servants sent away,
 A Jew took one of his two mistresses,
 A priest the other—at least so they say.
 I ask'd the doctors after his disease—He died of the slow fever called the tertian,
 And left his widow to her own aversion

35 Yet José was an honorable man, That I must say, who knew him very
 well, Therefore his frailties I'll no further scan,
 Indeed there were not many more to tell.
 And if his passions now and then out-ran Discretion, and were not so peaceable As Numa's (who was also named Pompilius),
 He had been ill brought up, and was born bilious.

- 36 Whate'er might be his worthlessness or worth, Poor fellow! he had many things to wound him,
 Let's own—since it can do no good on earth—
 It was a trying moment that which found him Standing alone beside his desolate hearth, Where all his household gods lay shiver'd round him.
 No choice was left his feelings or his pride, Save death or Doctors' Commons¹—so he died
- 37 Dying intestate, Juan was sole heir To a chancery suit, and mesuages² and lands,
 Which, with a long minority and care, Promised to turn out well in proper hands Inez became sole guardian, which was fair,
 And answer'd but to nature's just demands;
 An only son left with an only mother Is brought up much more wisely than another.
- 38 Sagest of women, even of widows, she Resolved that Juan should be quite a paragon, And worthy of the noblest pedigree:
 (His sire was of Castile, his dam from Aragon)
 Then for accomplishments of chivalry,
 In case our lord the king should go to war again,
 He learn'd the arts of riding, fencing, gunnery,
 And how to scale a fortress—or a nunnery.
- 39 But that which Donna Inez most desired,
 And saw into herself each day before all The learned tutors whom for him she hired,
 Was, that his breeding should be strictly moral Much into all his studies she inquired,
 And so they were submitted first to her, all,
 Arts, sciences, no branch was made a mystery To Juan's eyes, excepting natural history.
- 40 The languages, especially the dead,
 The sciences, and most of all the abstruse,
 The arts, at least all such as could be said To be the most remote from common use,
 In all these he was much and deeply read.
 But not a page of anything that's loose,
 Or hints continuation of the species,
 Was ever suffer'd, lest he should grow vicious
- 41 His classic studies made a little puzzle, Because of filthy loves of gods and goddesses,
 Who in the earlier ages raised a bustle,
 But never put on pantaloons or bodices;
 His reverend tutors had at times a tussle,
 And for their Æneids, Ihads, and Odysseys,
 Were forced to make an odd sort of apology,
 For Donna Inez dreaded the Mythology
- 42 Ovid's a rake, as half his verses show him, Anacreon's morals are a still worse sample, Catullus scarcely has a decent poem,
 I don't think Sappho's Ode a good example, Although Longinus tells us there is no hymn Where the sublime soars forth on wings more ample,³ But Virgil's songs are pure, except that horrid one Beginning with "Formosum Pastor Corydon."
- 43 Lucretius' irreligion is too strong For early stomachs, to prove wholesome food;
 I can't help thinking Juvenal was wrong,
 Although no doubt his real intent was good,
 For speaking out so plainly in his song,
 So much indeed as to be downright rude;
 And then what proper person can be partial To all those nauseous epigrams of Martial?
- 44 Juan was taught from out the best edition.
 Expurgated by learned men, who place,

¹ That is, divorce. The Doctor's Commons, originally a common dining hall of the Association of Doctors of Civil Law, in London, consisted of a number of buildings which were used by courts having jurisdiction over marriage licenses, divorces, etc.

² Dwelling houses, with adjacent buildings and lands

³ See his essay On the Sublime 10. The ode referred to is entitled To a Loved One.

⁴ Handsome Shepherd Corydon — Eclogues, 2

Judiciously, from out the schoolboy's vision,

The grosser parts; but, fearful to deface Too much their modest bard by this omission,

And pitying sore this mutilated case.
They only add them all in an appendix,
Which saves, in fact, the trouble of an index;

45 For there we have them all "at one fell swoop,"¹

Instead of being scatter'd through the pages,

They stand forth marshall'd in a handsome troop,

To meet the ingenuous youth of future ages,

Till some less rigid editor shall stoop
To call them back into their separate cages,

Instead of standing staring all together,
Like garden gods—and not so decent either.

46 The Missal too (it was the family Missal)
Was ornamented in a sort of way

Which ancient mass-books often are, and this all Kinds of grotesques illumined; and how they,

Who saw those figures on the margin kiss all,

Could turn their optics to the text and pray,

Is more than I know—But Don Juan's mother

Kept this herself, and gave her son another

47 Sermons he read, and lectures he endured.
And homilies, and lives of all the saints.

To Jerome and to Chrysostom inured,
He did not take such studies for restraints;

But how faith is acquired, and then insured,

So well not one of the aforesaid paints
As Saint Augustine in his fine Confessions,²

Which make the reader envy his transgressions.

48 This, too, was a seal'd book to little Juan—

I can't but say that his mamma was right,

If such an education was the true one.

She scarcely trusted him from out her sight;

Her maids were old, and if she took a new one,

You might be sure she was a perfect fright,

She did this during even her husband's life—

I recommend as much to every wife.

49 Young Juan wax'd in godliness and grace.

At six a charming child, and at eleven

With all the promise of as fine a face
As e'er to man's maturer growth was given

He studied steadily and grew apace,
And seem'd, at least, in the right road

To heaven,
For half his days were pass'd at church,

the other
Between his tutors, confessor, and mother

50 At six, I said, he was a charming child, At twelve he was a fine, but quiet boy,

Although in infancy a little wild, They tamed him down amongst them to destroy

His natural spirit not in vain they toil'd.

At least it seem'd so, and his mother's joy

Was to declare how sage, and still, and steady,

Her young philosopher was grown already.

51 I had my doubts, perhaps I have them still,
But what I say is neither here nor there

I knew his father well, and have some skill

In character—but it would not be fair
From sire to son to augur good or ill:

He and his wife were an ill sorted pair—
But scandal's my aversion—I protest Against all evil speaking, even in jest

52 For my part I say nothing—nothing—but This I will say—my reasons are my own—

That if I had an only son to put To school (as God be praised that I have none),

'Tis not with Donna Inez I would shut

Him up to learn his catechism alone, No—no—I'd send him out betimes to college,

For there it was I pick'd up my own knowledge

² See especially Bk 1, ch 9, and Bk 2, ch 2

- 53 For there one learns—'tis not for me to boast, Though I acquired—but I pass over that,
 As well as all the Greek I since have lost :
 I say that there's the place—but "Verbum sat,"¹
 I think I pick'd up too, as well as most, Knowledge of matters—but no matter what— I never married—but, I think, I know That sons should not be educated so

- 200 My poem's epic, and is meant to be Divided in twelve books, each book containing,
 With love, and war, a heavy gale at sea.
 A list of ships, and captains, and kings reigning,
 New characters, the episodes are three
 A panoramic view of hell's in framing,
 After the style of Virgil and of Homer.
 So that my name of Epic's no misnomer
- 201 All these things will be specified in time,
 With strict regard to Aristotle's rules,²
 The *Vade Mecum*³ of the true sublime, Which makes so many poets, and some fools Prose poets like blank-verse, I'm fond of rhyme, Good workmen never quarrel with their tools;
 I've got new mythological machinery,
 And very handsome supernatural scenery
- 202 There's only one slight difference between Me and my epic brethren gone before,
 And here the advantage is my own, I ween (Not that I have not several merits more, But this will more peculiarly be seen);
 They so embellish, that 'tis quite a bore Their labyrinth of fables to thread through, Whereas this story's actually true
- 203 If any person doubt it, I appeal To history, tradition, and to facts,
 To newspapers, whose truth all know and feel,
 To plays in five, and operas in three acts;
 All these confirm my statement a good deal,
 But that which more completely faith exacts
- 1 a word to the wise is sufficient 2 Regarding the utilities of time, place and action 3 handbook (literally, go with me)
- Is, that myself, and several now in Seville, Saw Juan's last elopement with the devil.
- 204 If ever I should condescend to prose, I'll write poetical commandments, which Shall supersede beyond all doubt all those That went before; in these I shall enrich My text with many things that no one knows,
 And carry precept to the highest pitch:
 I'll call the work "Longinus o'er a Bottle, Or, Every Poet his own Aristotle."
- 205 Thou shalt believe in Milton, Dryden, Pope;
 Thou shalt not set up Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey,
 Because the first is crazed beyond all hope,
 The second drunk, the third so quaint and mouthy
 With Crabbe it may be difficult to cope,
 And Campbell's Hippocrene is somewhat diouthy.
 Thou shalt not steal from Samuel Rogers, nor Commit—flirtation with the muse of Moore.
- Thou shalt not covet Mr Sotheby's Muse, His Pegasus, nor anything that's his;
 Thou shalt not bear false witness like "the Blues,"¹—(There's one, at least, is very fond of this);
 Thou shalt not write, in short, but what I choose,
 This is true criticism, and you may kiss—
 Exactly as you please, or not,—the rod;
 But if you don't, I'll lay it on, by G—d!
- 207 If any person should presume to assert This story is not moral, first, I pray, That they will not cry out before they're hurt,
 Then that they'll read it o'er again, and say (But, doubtless, nobody will be so pert),
 That this is not a moral tale, though gay;
 Besides, in Canto Twelfth, I mean to show
 The very place where wicked people go.
- 208 If, after all, there should be some so blind
 To their own good this warning to despise, 1 The Bluestockings, a name applied to a society of women affecting an interest in literature and politics. The idea originated about 1750, but the name here given was first used about 1790. See Byron's The Blues; also Ethel R. Wheeler's Famous Blue-Stockings (London, 1910)

- Let by some tortuosity of mind,
Not to believe my verse and their own
eyes,
And cry that they "the moral cannot find,"
I tell him, if a clergyman, he lies;
Should captains the remark, or critics,
make,
They also lie too—under a mistake
- 209 The public approbation I expect, And beg they'll take my word about the moral,
Which I with their amusement will connect (So children cutting teeth receive a coral),
Meantime they'll doubtless please to recollect
My epical pretensions to the laurel:
For fear some prudish readers should grow skittish,
I've bribed my grandmother's review—the British.
- 210 I sent it in a letter to the Editor, Who thank'd me duly by return of post—
I'm for a handsome article his creditor; Yet, if my gentle Muse he please to roast,
And break a promise after having made it
her,
Denying the receipt of what it cost,
And smear his page with gall instead of honey,
All I can say is—that he had the money.
- 211 I think that with this holy new alliance
I may ensure the public, and defy All other magazines of art or science, Daily, or monthly, or three monthly; I Have not essay'd to multiply their clients, Because they tell me 'twere in vain to
try,
And that The Edinburgh Review and Quarterly
Treat a dissenting author very martyrly¹
- 212 "Non ego hoc ferrem calidâ juventû Consule Planco,"² Horace said, and so Sav I; by which quotation there is meant a Hint that some six or seven good years ago
- (Long ere I dreamt of dating from the Brenta)
I was most ready to return a blow,
And would not brook at all this sort of thing
In my hot youth—when George the Third was King
- 213 But now at thirty years my hair is gray (I wonder what it will be like at forty!
I thought of a peruke the other day) — My heart is not much greener, and, in short, I Have squander'd my whole summer while
'twas May,
And feel no more the spirit to retort, I Have spent my life, both interest and principal,
And deem not, what I deem'd, my soul invincible.
- 214 No more—no more—Oh! never more on me
The freshness of the heart can fall like
dew,
Which out of all the lovely things we see Extracts emotions beautiful and new;
Hived in our bosoms like the bag o' the bee.
Think'st thou the honey with those objects grew?
Alas! 'twas not in them, but in thy power To double even the sweetness of a flower
- 215 No more—no more—Oh! never more, my
heart,
Canst thou be my sole world, my universe!
Once all in all, but now a thing apart, Thou canst not be my blessing or my curse:
The illusion's gone forever, and thou art Insensible, I trust, but none the worse,
And in thy stead I've got a deal of judgment,
Though heaven knows how it ever found a lodgment.
- 216 My days of love are over; me no more
The charms of maid, wife, and still less of widow,
Can make the fool of which they made before,—
In short, I must not lead the life I do;
The credulous hope of mutual minds is
o'er,
The copious use of claret is forbid too,
So for a good old-gentlemanly vice I think I must take up with avarice.

¹ Both of these journals were hostile to Byron. See English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (p. 485), which was inspired by an attack upon Byron published in The Edinburgh Review, Jan., 1808 (Vol. 11, pp. 285-89).

² I should not have endured this in my passion-ate youth in the consulship of Planco.—Horace, Odes, III, 14, 27.

- 217 Ambition was my idol, which was broken Before the shrines of Sorrow, and of Pleasure,
 And the two last have left me many a token O'er which reflection may be made at leisure,
 Now, like Friar Bacon's brazen head, I've spoken,
 "Time is, Time was, Time's past"— a chyme² treasure Is glittering youth, which I have spent betimes—
 My heart in passion, and my head on rhymes
- 218 What is the end of fame? 'tis but to fill A certain portion of uncertain paper
 Some liken it to climbing up a hill Whose summit, like all hills, is lost in vapor,
 For this men write, speak, preach, and heroes kill,
 And bards burn what they call their "midnight taper,"
 To have, when the original is dust, A name, a wretched picture, and worse bust
- 219 What are the hopes of man? Old Egypt's King
 Cheops erected the first pyramid
 And largest, thinking it was just the thing To keep his memory whole, and mummy hid
 But somebody or other rummaging, Burglariously broke his coffin's lid
 Let not a monument give you or me hopes, Since not a pinch of dust remains of Cheops
- 220 But I, being fond of true philosophy, Say very often to myself, "Alas!
 All things that have been born were born to die,
 And flesh (which Death mows down to hay) is grass,⁴ You've pass'd your youth not so unpleasantly,
 And if you had it o'er again—'twould
 pass—
 So thank your stars that matters are no
 worse,
 And read your Bible, sir, and mind your purse"
- 221 But for the present, gentle reader! and Still gentler purchaser! the bard—that's
 I—Must, with permission, shake you by the
 hand,
 And so "Your humble servant, and good-bye!"
 We meet again, if we should understand Each other, and if not, I shall not try Your patience further than by this short sample—
 'Twere well if others follow'd my example.
- 222 "Go, little book, from this my solitude!
 I cast thee on the waters—go thy ways!
 And if, as I believe, thy vein be good,
 The world will find thee after many
 days."
 When Southey's read, and Wordsworth understood,
 I can't help putting in my claim to praise—
 The four first rhymes are Southey's, every line.
 For God's sake, reader! take them not for mine!

From CANTO II
 1818-19 1819

- 44 The ship was evidently settling now² Fast by the head, and, all distinction
 gone,
 Some went to prayers again, and made a vow
 Of candles to their saints—but there were none
 To pay them with, and some look'd o'er the bow;
 Some hoisted out the boats, and there was one
 That begg'd Pedrillo for an absolution, Who told him to be damn'd—in his confusion

- 45 Some lash'd them in their hammocks; some put on
 Their best clothes, as if going to a fair;
 Some curs'd the day on which they saw the sun,
 And gnash'd their teeth, and howling, tore their hair;
 And others went on as they had begun, Getting the boats out, being well aware That a tight boat will live in a rough sea, Unless with breakers close beneath her lee.

² The ship in which Juan and his tutor Pedrillo left Spain for Italy was wrecked in a storm

- 46 The worst of all was, that in their condition, Having been several days in great distress,
 'Twas difficult to get out such provision As now might render their long suffering less:
 Men, even when dying, dislike inanition;
 Their stock was damaged by the weather's stress
 Two casks of biscuit, and a keg of butter,
 Were all that could be thrown into the cutter
- 47 But in the long-boat they contrived to stow
 Some pounds of bread, though injured by the wet;
 Water, a twenty-gallon cask or so,
 Six flasks of wine: and they contrived to get A portion of their beef up from below,
 And with a piece of pork, moreover, met,
 But scarce enough to serve them for a luncheon—
 Then there was rum, eight gallons in a puncheon¹
- 48 The other boats, the yawl and pinnace, had Been stove in the beginning of the gale,
 And the long-boat's condition was but bad,
 As there were but two blankets for a sail,
 And one oar for a mast, which a young lad Threw in by good luck over the ship's rail,
 And two boats could not hold, far less be stored,
 To save one half the people then on board.
- 49 'Twas twilight, and the sunless day went down Over the waste of waters; like a veil,
 Which, if withdrawn, would but disclose the frown
 Of one whose hate is mask'd but to assail Thus to their hopeless eyes the night was shown,
 And grimly darkled o'er the faces pale,
 And the dim desolate deep: twelve days had Fear Been their familiar,² and now Death was here
- 50 Some trial had been making at a raft.
 With little hope in such a rolling sea.
 A sort of thing at which one would have laugh'd, If any laughter at such times could be,
¹ A kind of large cask ² attendant spirit
- Unless with people who too much have quaff'd,
 And have a kind of wild and horrid glee, Half epileptical, and half hysterical — Their preservation would have been a miracle
- 51 At half-past eight o'clock, booms, hen-coops, spars,
 And all things, for a chance, had been cast loose
 That still could keep afloat the struggling tars,
 For yet they strove, although of no great use:
 There was no light in heaven but a few stars,
 The boats put off o'ererowed with their crews;
 She gave a heel, and then a lurch to port,
 And, going down head foremost—sunk, in short
- 52 Then rose from sea to sky the wild farewell—Then shriek'd the timid, and stood still the brave—Then some leap'd overboard with dreadful yell,
 As eager to anticipate their grave,
 And the sea yawn'd around her like a hell,
 And down she suck'd with her the whirling wave,
 Like one who grapples with his enemy,
 And strives to strangle him before he die
- 53 And first one universal shriek there rush'd, Louder than the loud ocean, like a crash
 Of echoing thunder; and then all was hush'd, Save the wild wind and the remorseless dash
 Of billows; but at intervals there gush'd, Accompanied with a convulsive splash,
 A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry Of some strong swimmer in his agony
- 54 The boats, as stated, had got off before,
 And in them crowded several of the crew;
 And yet their present hope was hardly more Than what it had been, for so strong it blew
 There was slight chance of reaching any shore:
 And then they were too many, though so few—

Nine in the cutter, thirty in the boat,
Were counted in them when they got afloat.

103 As they drew nigh the land, which now was seen

Unequal in its aspect here and there, They felt the freshness of its growing
green,
That waved in forest-tops, and smooth'd
the air,

And fell upon their glazed eye like a screen From glistening waves, and skies so hot and bare—

Lovely seem'd any object that should sweep Away the vast, salt, dread, eternal deep.

104 The shore look'd wild, without a trace of
man,

And girt by formidable waves, but they Were mad for land, and thus their course they ran,

Though right ahead the roaring breakers
lay.

A reef between them also now began To show its boiling surf and bounding spray,

But finding no place for their landing better,

They ran the boat for shore,—and overset
her.

105 But in his native stream, the Guadalquivir, Juan to lave his youthful limbs was wont;

And having learnt to swim in that sweet river,

Had often turn'd the art to some account

A better swimmer you could scarce see ever.
He could, perhaps, have pass'd the Hellespont,

As once (a feat on which ourselves we prided)

Leander, Mr. Ekenhead, and I did.¹

106 So here, though faint, emaciated, and stark,

He buoy'd his boyish limbs, and strove to ply

With the quick wave, and gam, ere it was dark,

The beach which lay before him, high and dry:

The greatest danger here was from a shark,

That carried off his neighbor by the thigh,
As for the other two, they could not swim,
So nobody arrived on shore but him

107 Nor yet had he arrived but for the oar, Which, providentially for him, was wash'd

Just as his feeble arms could strike no
more,

And the hard wave o'erwhelmed him as
'twas dash'd

Within his grasp; he clung to it, and sore
The waters beat while he thereto was lash'd,

At last, with swimming, wading, scrambling, he

Roll'd on the beach, half senseless, from the sea.

108 There, breathless, with his digging nails he clung

Fast to the sand, lest the returning wave, From whose reluctant roar his life he wrung,

Should suck him back to her insatiate grave:

And there he lay, full length, where he was flung,

Before the entrance of a cliff-worn cave,
With just enough of life to feel its pain.

And deem that it was saved, perhaps in vain

109 With slow and staggering effort he arose, But sunk again upon his bleeding knee And quivering hand, and then he look'd for those

Who long had been his mates upon the
sea;

But none of them appear'd to share his woes,

Save one, a corpse, from out the fam-ish'd three,

Who died two days before, and now had found

An unknown barren beach for burial-ground

110 And as he gazed, his dizzy brain spun fast.
And down he sunk, and as he sunk, the sand

Swam round and round, and all his senses pass'd.

He fell upon his side, and his stretch'd
hand

Droop'd dripping on the oar (their jury-mast).¹

¹ Byron and Ekenhead, an officer in the British navy, swam across the Hellespont on May 3, 1810. See Byron's poem, Written After Swimming from Neuton to Abydos.

And, like a wither'd lily, on the land
His slender frame and pallid aspect lay,
As fair a thing as e'er was form'd of clay.

111 How long in his damp trance young Juan lay
He knew not, for the earth was gone for him,
And time had nothing more of night nor day
For his congealing blood, and senses dim,
And how this heavy faintness pass'd away
He knew not, till each painful pulse and limb,
And tingling vein, seem'd throbbing back to life,
For Death, though vanquish'd, still retired with strife.

112 His eyes he open'd, shut, again unclosed,
For all was doubt and dizziness, he thought He still was in the boat, and had but dozed,
And felt again with his despair o'er-wrought,
And wish'd it death in which he had reposed,
And then once more his feelings back were brought,
And slowly by his swimming eyes was seen A lovely female face of seventeen.

113 'Twas bending close o'er his, and the small mouth Seem'd almost prying into his for breath,
And chafing him, the soft warm hand of youth Recall'd his answering spirits back from death;
And, bathing his chill temples, tried to soothe Each pulse to animation, till beneath Its gentle touch and trembling care, a sigh
To these kind efforts made a low reply

114 Then was the cordial pour'd, and mantle flung Around his scarce-clad limbs; and the fair arm Raised higher the faint head which o'er it hung;
And her transparent cheek, all pure and warm, Pillow'd his death-like forehead; then she wrung
His dewy curls, long drench'd by every storm,

And watch'd with eagerness each throb that drew A sigh from his heaved bosom—and hers, too.

115 And lifting him with care into the cave,
The gentle girl, and her attendant,—one Young, yet her elder, and of brow less grave,
And more robust of figure—then begun To kindle fire, and as the new flames gave Light to the rocks that roof'd them, which the sun
Had never seen, the maid, or whatsoe'er
She was, appear'd distinct, and tall, and fair.

116 Her brow was overhung with curls of gold,
That sparkled o'er the auburn of her hair,
Her clustering hair, whose longer locks were roll'd In braids behind, and though her stature were Even of the highest for a female mould,
They nearly reach'd her heel, and in her air
There was a something which bespoke command,
As one who was a lady in the land.

117 Her hair, I said, was auburn, but her eyes Were black as death, their lashes the same hue, Of downcast length, in whose silk shadow lies Deepest attraction, for when to the view Forth from its raven fringe the full glance flies, Ne'er with such force the swiftest arrow flew;
'Tis as the snake late coil'd, who pours his length,
And hurls at once his venom and his strength.

118 Her brow was white and low, her cheek's pure dye Like twilight rosy still with the set sun.
Short upper lip—sweet lips! that make us sigh Ever to have seen such, for she was one Fit for the model of a statuary (A race of mere impostors, when all's done—I've seen much finer women, ripe and real.
Than all the nonsense of their stone ideal)

- 119 I'll tell you why I say so, for 'tis just One should not rail without a decent cause.
 There was an Irish lady, to whose bust I ne'er saw justice done, and yet she was A frequent model; and if e'er she must Yield to stern Time and Nature's wrin-kling laws,
 They will destroy a face which mortal
 thought Ne'er compass'd, nor less mortal chisel wrought.
- 120 And such was she, the lady of the cave:
 Her dress was very different from the Spanish,
 Simpler, and yet of colors not so grave,
 For, as you know, the Spanish women
 banish
 Bright hues when out of doors, and yet, while wave Around them (what I hope will never vanish)
 The *basquina*¹ and the mantilla,² they Seem at the same time mystical and gay.
- 121 But with our damsel this was not the case:
 Her dress was many-color'd, finely spun;
 Her locks curl'd negligently round her face,
 But through them gold and gems profusely shone:
 Her girdle sparkled, and the richest lace Flaw'd in her veil, and many a precious stone Flash'd on her little hand; but, what was shocking, Her small snow feet had slippers, but no stocking.
- 122 The other female's dress was not unlike,
 But of inferior materials: she Had not so many ornaments to strike, Her hair had silver only, bound to be Her dowry, and her veil, in form alike, Was coarser, and her air, though firm, less free.
 Her hair was thicker, but less long; her
 eyes
 As black, but quicker, and of smaller size.
- 123 And these two tended him, and cheer'd him
 both
 With food and raiment, and those soft attentions,
 Which are—(as I must own)—of female growth,
- And have ten thousand delicate inventions:
 They made a most superior mess of broth,
 A thing which poesy but seldom mentions,
 But the best dish that e'er was cook'd since Homer's
 Achilles order'd dinnuer for new comers.¹
- 124 I'll tell you who they were, this female
 pair,
 Lest they should seem princesses in disguise,
 Besides, I hate all mystery, and that air Of clap-trap, which your recent poets
 prize,
 And so, in short, the girls they really were They shall appear before your curious
 eyes, Mistress and maid, the first was only daughter
 Of an old man, who lived upon the water.
- 125 A fisherman he had been in his youth,
 And still a sort of fisherman was he,
 But other speculations were, in sooth,
 Added to his connection with the sea,
 Perhaps not so respectable, in truth:
 A little smuggling, and some piracy,
 Left him, at last, the sole of many masters Of an ill-gotten million of piastres.²
- 126 A fisher, therefore, was he,—though of
 men,
 Like Peter the Apostle,³—and he fish'd For wandering merchant vessels, now and then,
 And sometimes caught as many as he wish'd,
 The cargoes he confiscated, and gain He sought in the slave-market too, and dish'd
 Full many a morsel for that Turkish trade, By which, no doubt, a good deal may be made.
- 127 He was a Greek, and on his isle had built (One of the wild and smaller Cyclades)
 A very handsome house from out his guilt,
 And there he lived exceedingly at ease.
 Heaven knows what cash he got, or blood he spilt.
 A sad old fellow was he, if you please;
 But this I know, it was a spacious building, Full of barbaric carving, paint, and gild-
 ing.

¹ Ajax, Ulysses, and Phoenix are brought before Achilles, who then leads them into the tent and sets meat and wine before them. See the Iliad, 9, 103 ff.

² A coin worth about a dollar.

² A kind of veil, covering the head and shoulders

- 128 He had an only daughter, call'd Haidée,
The greatest heiress of the Eastern Isles; Besides, so very beautiful was she,
Her dowry was as nothing to her smiles: 133
Still in her teens, and like a lovely tree She grew to womanhood, and between whiles - Rejected several suitors, just to learn How to accept a better in his turn.
- 129 And walking out upon the beach, below
The cliff, towards sunset, on that day she
found,
Insensible,—not dead, but nearly so,— Don Juan, almost famish'd, and half drown'd;
But being naked, she was shock'd. you
know,
Yet deem'd herself in common pity
bound,
As far as in her lay, "to take him in,
A stranger,"¹ dying, with so white a skin
- 130 But taking him into her father's house Was not exactly the best way to save,
But like conveying to the cat the mouse,
Or people in a trance into their grave.
Because the good old man had so much "vous,"²
Unlike the honest Arab thieves so brave, He would have hospitably cured the 135 stranger
And sold him instantly when out of danger.
- 131 And therefore, with her maid, she thought it best (A virgin always on her maid relies)
To place him in the cave for present rest:
And when, at last, he open'd his black
eyes,
Their charity increased about their guest,
And their compassion grew to such a size,
It open'd half the turnpike gates to
heaven—
(St. Paul says, 'tis the toll which must 136 be given)³
- 132 They made a fire,—but such a fire as they Upon the moment could contrive with such Materials as were cast up round the bay,— Some broken planks, and oars, that to the touch
Were nearly tinder, since so long they lay
A mast was almost crumbled to a crutch; But, by God's grace, here wrecks were in such plenty,
- That there was fuel to have furnish'd twenty.
- He had a bed of furs, and a pelisse,¹ For Haidée stripp'd her sables off to make His couch; and, that he might be more at ease,
And warm, in case by chance he should awake,
They also gave a petticoat apiece, She and her maid,—and promised by daybreak
To pay him a fresh visit, with a dish For breakfast, of eggs, coffee, bread, and fish.
- 134 And thus they left him to his lone repose.
Juan slept like a top, or like the dead, Who sleep at last, perhaps (God only knows),
Just for the present, and in his lull'd
head
Not even a vision of his former woes Throb'd in accursed dreams, which sometimes spread Unwelcome visions of our former years, Till the eye, cheated, opens thick with tears.
- Young Juan slept all dreamless:—but the maid,
Who smooth'd his pillow, as she left the den Look'd back upon him, and a moment staid.
And turn'd, believing that he call'd again
He slumber'd, yet she thought, at least she said (The heart will slip, even as the tongue and pen),
He had pronounced her name—but she forgot
That at this moment Juan knew it not.
- And pensive to her father's house she went,
Enjoining silence strict to Zoe, who Better than her knew what, in fact, she meant,
She being wiser by a year or two:
A year or two's an age when rightly spent,
And Zoe spent hers, as most women do,
In gaining all that useful sort of knowledge
Which is acquired in Nature's good old college.

¹ A kind of long outer garment

174 And thus a moon roll'd on, and fair
 Hardee
 Paid daily visits to her boy, and took Such plentiful precautions, that still he Remain'd unknown within his craggy nook;

At last her father's prows put out to sea,
 For certain merchantmen upon the look,
 Not as of yore to carry off an Io,
 But three Ragusan vessels bound for Scio

175 Then came her freedom, for she had no mother,
 So that, her father being at sea, she was Free as a married woman, or such other Female, as where she likes may freely
 pass, Without even the encumbrance of a brother.

The freest she that ever gazed on glass
 I speak of Christian lands in this comparison,
 Where wives, at least, are seldom kept in garrison

176 Now she prolonged her visits and her talk (For they must talk), and he had learnt to say
 So much as to propose to take a walk,—
 For little had he wander'd since the day On which, like a young flower snapp'd from the stalk, Drooping and dewy on the beach he
 lay,—

And thus they walk'd out in the afternoon,
 And saw the sun set opposite the moon

177 It was a wild and breaker-beaten coast.
 With cliffs above, and a broad sandy
 shore,
 Guarded by shoals and rocks as by an host,
 With here and there a creek, whose aspect wore
 A better welcome to the tempest-tost,
 And rarely ceased the haughty billow's
 roar,
 Save on the dead long summer days, which
 make
 The outstretch'd ocean glitter like a lake.

178 And the small ripple spilt upon the beach Scarcely o'erpass'd the cream of your champagne,
 When o'er the brim the sparkling bumpers reach,
 That spring-dew of the spirit! the heart's rain!

Few things surpass old wine, and they may preach
 Who please,—the more because they preach in vain,— Let us have wine and women, mirth and laughter,
 Sermons and soda-water the day after 179 Man, being reasonable, must get drunk,

 The best of life is but intoxication Glory, the grape, love, gold, in these are sunk
 The hopes of all men, and of every nation, Without their sap, how branchless were the trunk Of life's strange tree, so fruitful on occasion!
 But to return.—(Get very drunk, and when You wake with headache, you shall see what then

180 Ring for your valet—bid him quickly
 bring Some hock and soda-water, then you'll
 know
 A pleasure worthy Xerxes the great king.
 For not the blest sherbet, sublimed with snow,
 Nor the first sparkle of the desert spring,
 Nor Burgundy in all its sunset glow.
 After long travel, ennui, love, or slaughter, Vie with that draught of hock and soda-water

The coast—I think it was the coast that I Was just describing—Yes, it was the coast—
 Lay at this period quiet as the sky.
 The sands untumbled, the blue waves unfost,
 And all was stillness, save the sea-bird's cry
 And dolphin's leap, and little billow
 crest
 By some low rock or shelf, that made it flet
 Against the boundary it scateely wet

182 And forth they wander'd, her sire being
 gone,
 As I have said, upon an expedition.
 And mother, brother, guardian, she had
 none,
 Save Zoe, who, although with due precision
 She waited on her lady with the sun, Thought daily service was her only mission,

Bringing warm water, wreathing her long tresses,
And asking now and then for cast-off dresses.

183 It was the cooling hour, just when the rounded
Red sun sinks down behind the azure
hill,
Which then seems as if the whole earth it bounded,
Circling all nature, hush'd, and dim, and
still,
With the far mountain-crescent half surrounded
On one side, and the deep sea calm and chill,
Upon the other, and the rosy sky,
With one star sparkling through it like an eye.

184 And thus they wander'd forth, and hand in hand,
Over the shining pebbles and the shells, Glided along the smooth and harden'd
sand,
And in the worn and wild receptacles Work'd by the storms, yet work'd as it were plann'd,
In hollow halls, with sparry roofs and cells,
They turn'd to rest; and, each clasp'd by an arm,
Yielded to the deep twilight's purple charm

185 They look'd up to the sky, whose floating glow Spread like a rosy ocean, vast and
bright,
They gazed upon the glittering sea below, Whence the broad moon rose circling into sight,
They heard the waves splash, and the wind so low,
And saw each other's dark eyes darting
light
Into each other—and, beholding this,
Their lips drew near, and clung into a kiss.

186 A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth, and
love,
And beauty, all concentrating like rays
Into one focus, kindled from above;
Such kisses as belong to early days, Where heart, and soul, and sense, in concent move,
And the blood's lava, and the pulse a blaze,

Each kiss a heart-quake,—for a kiss's
strength,
I think it must be reckon'd by its length.

187 By length I mean duration, theirs endured Heaven knows how long—no doubt they never reckon'd;
And if they had, they could not have secured
The sum of their sensations to a second They had not spoken; but they felt allured,
As if their souls and lips each other beckon'd,
Which, being join'd, like swarming bees they clung—Their hearts the flowers from whence the honey sprung

188 They were alone, but not alone as they Who shut in chambers think it loneli-
ness,
The silent ocean, and the starlight bay,
The twilight glow, which momentarily grew
less,
The voiceless sands, and dropping caves, that lay Around them, made them to each other press,
As if there were no life beneath the sky Save theirs, and that their life could never die.

189 They fear'd no eyes nor ears on that lone beach,
They felt no terrors from the night,
they were
All in all to each other, though their speech
Was broken words, they thought a language there,—
And all the burning tongues the passions teach
Found in one sigh the best interpreter Of nature's oracle—first love,—that all Which Eve has left her daughters since her fall

189 Alas! the love of women! it is known To be a lovely and a fearful thing;
For all of theirs upon that die is thrown,
And if 'tis lost, life hath no more to bring
To them but mockeries of the past alone,
And their revenge is as the tiger's
spring,

Deadly, and quick, and crushing; yet, as real Torture is theirs, what they inflict they feel.

To make us understand each good old maxim,
 So good—I wonder Castlereagh don't tax
 'em.

200 They are right; for man, to man so oft unjust,
 Is always so to women, one sole bond Awaits them, treachery is all then trust, Taught to conceal, their bursting hearts despond
 Over their idol, till some wealthier lust Buys them in marriage—and what rests beyond?
 A thankless husband, next a faithless lover,
 Then dressing, nursing, praying, and all's over.

204 And now 'twas done—on the lone shore were plighted
 Their hearts, the stars, their nuptial torches, shed
 Beauty upon the beautiful they lighted.
 Ocean their witness, and the cave their bed,
 By their own feelings hallow'd and united,
 Their priest was Solitude, and they were wed
 And they were happy, for to their young
 eyes
 Each was an angel, and earth paradise

201 Some take a lover, some take drams or prayers,
 Some mind their household, others dissipation,
 Some run away, and but exchange their cares,
 Losing the advantage of a virtuous station,
 Few changes e'er can better their affairs,
 Thems being an unnatural situation,
 From the dull palace to the dirty hovel Some play the devil, and then write a novel.

From CANTO III
 1819-20 1821
 78 And now they¹ were diverted by their
 smile,
 Dwarfed, dancing-girls, black eunuchs, and a poet,—
 Which made then new establishment complete,
 The last was of great fame, and liked to show it.
 His verses rarely wanted then due feet—
 And for his theme—he seldom sung below it,
 He being paid to satirize or flatter,
 As the psalm says, “inditing a good matter”²

202 Haidée was Nature's bride, and knew not
 this:
 Haidée was Passion's child, born where
 the sun
 Showers triple light, and scorches even the kiss
 Of his gazelle-eyed daughters, she was
 one Made but to love, to feel that she was his
 Who was her chosen what was said or done
 Elsewhere was nothing She had nought to fear,
 Hope, care, nor love beyond,—her heart beat here.

79 He praised the present, and abused the
 past,
 Reversing the good custom of old days,
 An Eastern anti-jacobin³ at last He turn'd, preferring pudding to no praise—
 For some few years his lot had been o'ercast
 By his seeming independent in his lays,
 But now he sung the Sultan and the Pacha With truth like Southey, and with verse like Crashaw

203 And oh! that quickening of the heart, that beat!
 How much it costs us! yet each rising throb
 Is in its cause as its effect so sweet,
 That Wisdom, ever on the watch to rob Joy of its alchemy, and to repeat Fine truths; even Conscience, too, has a tough job

80 He was a man who had seen many changes, And always changed as true as any needle;

 absence of Haidée's father

² The poet represents Southey

 Southey, became anti-Jacobins after the excesses and failures of the French Revolution

His polar star being one which rather ranges,
And not the fix'd—he knew the way to wheedle;
So vile he 'scaped the doom which oft avenges;
And being fluent (save indeed when fee'd ill),
He lied with such a fervor of intention—There was no doubt he earn'd his laureate pension.

81 But he had genius,—when a turncoat has it,
The "Vates irritabilis"¹ takes care That without notice few full moons shall pass it;
Even good men like to make the public stare —
But to my subject—let me see—what was it?—
Oh!—the third canto—and the pretty
pair—Then loves, and feasts, and house, and dress, and mode
Of living in their insular abode

82 Their poet, a sad trimmer,² but no less In company a very pleasant fellow,
Had been the favorite of full many a mess Of men, and made them speeches when half mellow;
And though his meaning they could rarely guess,
Yet still they deign'd to hucup or to bellow
The glorious meed of popular applause (Of which the first ne'er knows the second cause.

83 But now being lifted into high society,
And having pick'd up several odds and ends
Of free thoughts in his travels, for variety, He deem'd, being in a lone isle, among friends,
That without any danger of a riot, he Might for long lying make himself amends;
And singing as he sung in his warm youth, Agree to a short amistice with truth

84 He had travell'd 'mongst the Arabs, Turks, and Franks,
And knew the self-loves of the different nations,

And having lived with people of all ranks,
Had something ready upon most occasions—
Which got him a few presents and some thanks
He varied with some skill his adulations,
To "do at Rome as Romans do,"¹ a piece Of conduct was which he observed in Greece

85 Thus, usually, when he was asked to sing, He gave the different nations something national,
'Twas all the same to him—"God save the king,"

If Pindar sang horse-races, what should hinder Himself from being as pliable as Pindar?

86 In France, for instance, he would write a chanson,⁴
In England a six canto quaito tale, In Spain he'd make a ballad or romance on
The last war—much the same in Portugal,
In Germany, the Pegasus he'd prance on Would be old (Goethe's—(see what says De Stael),⁵
In Italy he'd ape the "Trecentisti,"⁶ In Greece, he'd sing some sort of hymn like this t' ye

1

The isles of Greece, the isles of Greece!
Where burning Sappho loved and sung,
Where grew the arts of war and peace,
Where Delos rose, and Phœbus sprung!
Eternal summer gilds them yet,
But all, except their sun, is set

And Marathon looks on the sea,
And musing there an hour alone,
I dream'd that Greece might still be free,
For standing on the Persians' grave,
I could not deem myself a slave

4

A king's fate on the rocky brow
Which looks o'er sea-born Salamis,
And ships, by thousands, lay below,
And men in nations;—all were his!
He counted them at break of day—
And when the sun set where were they?

5

And where are they? and where art thou, My country? On thy voiceless shore
The heroic lay is tuneless now—
The heroic bosom beats no more!
And must thy lyre, so long divine, Degenerate into hands like mine?

To feel at least a patriot's shame,
Even as I sing, suffuse my face,
For what is left the poet here?
For Greeks a blush—for Greece a tear

7

Must we but weep o'er days more blest?
Must we but blush?—Our fathers bled Earth! render back from out thy breast
A remnant of our Spartan dead!
Of the three hundred grant but three,
To make a new Thermopylæ!

8

What, silent still? and silent all?
Ah! no,—the voices of the dead Sound like a distant torrent's fall,
And answer, "Let one living head,
But one arise,—we come, we come!"
'Tis but the living who are dumb

9

In vain—in vain; strike other chords;
Fill high the cup with Samian wine!
Leave battles to the Turkish hordes,
And shed the blood of Scio's vine!
Hark, rising to the ignoble call—How answers each bold Bacchanal!

10

You have the Pyrrhic dance! as yet, Where is the Pyrrhic phalanx² gone?
Of two such lessons, why forget The nobler and the manlier one?
You have the letters Cadmus gave—Think ye he meant them for a slave!

11

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
We will not think of themes like these!
It made Anacreon's song divine.
He served—but served Polykrates—
A tyrant, but our masters then Were still, at least, our countrymen

12

The tyrant of the Chersonese
' Was freedom's best and bravest friend;
That tyrant was Miltiades!
Oh! that the present hour would lend Another despot of the kind!
Such chains as his were sure to bind

13

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
On Suli's rock, and Parga's shore, Exists the remnant of a line
Such as the Doric mothers bore,
And there, perhaps, some seed is sown,
The Heracleidan³ blood might own.

14

Trust not for freedom to the Franks—
They have a king who buys and sells,
In native swords, and native ranks,
The only hope of courage dwells,
But Turkish force, and Latin fraud,
Would break your shield, however broad.

15

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
Our virgins dance beneath the shade—
I see their glorious black eyes shine,
But gazing on each glowing maid,
My own the burning tear-drop laves,
To think such breasts must suckle slaves.

16

Place me on Sunium's marbled steep, Where nothing, save the waves and I,
May hear our mutual murmurs sweep,
There, swan-like, let me sing and die.⁴
A land of slaves shall ne'er be mine—Dash down yon cup of Samian wine!

87 Thus sung, or would, or could, or should have sung,

The modern Greek, in tolerable verse:
If not like Orpheus quite, when Greece was young,

⁶ The swan was said to sing melodiously when about to die

Yet in these times he might have done much worse.

His strain display'd some feeling—right or wrong,

And feeling, in a poet, is the source Of others' feeling; but they are such harms, And take all colors—like the hands of dyers

88 But words are things, and a small drop of ink,

Falling like dew, upon a thought, produces

That which makes thousands, perhaps millions, think,

'Tis strange, the shortest letter which man uses

Instead of speech, may form a lasting link Of ages; to what straits old Time reduces

Frail man, when paper—even a rag like
this,

Survives himself, his tomb, and all that's his!

89 And when his bones are dust, his grave a blank,

His station, generation, even his nation,
Become a thing, or nothing, save to rank
In chronological commemoration,

Some dull MS oblivion long has sunk, Or graven stone found in a barrack's station

In digging the foundation of a closet,
May turn his name up, as a rare deposit.

90 And glory long has made the sages smile,
'Tis something, nothing, words, illusion,
wind—

Depending more upon the historian's style Than on the name a person leaves behind.

A little heavy, but no less divine

An independent being in his day—Learn'd, mous, temperate in love and

But his life falling into Johnson's way:

¹ He defeated the French in the Battle of Blenheim, in 1704. See Southey's The Battle of Blenheim (p. 400), also Addison's The Cambray Campaign

For the first Mrs Milton left his house.

92 All these are, certainly, entertaining facts, Like Shakespeare's stealing deer,² Lord Bacon's bribes,³

Like Titus' youth,⁴ and Cæsar's earliest acts,

Like Burns (whom Doctor Currie well describes),

Like Cromwell's pranks,⁵—but although truth exacts

These amiable descriptions from the scribes,

As most essential to their hero's story,
They do not much contribute to his glory

93 All are not moralists, like Southey, when He prated to the world of "Pantisoc-

- A drowsy frowzy poem, call'd The Excursion,¹ Writ in a manner which is my aversion.
- 95 He there builds up a formidable dyke Between his own and others' intellect But Wordsworth's poem, and his followers, like Joanna Southcote's Shiloh,² and her sect,
Are things which in this century don't strike
The public mind,—so few are the elect,
And the new births of both their stale vulgaries
Have proved but dropsies, taken for divin-
ities.
- 96 But let me to my story: I must own,
If I have any fault, it is digression—Leaving my people to proceed alone, While I soliloquize beyond expression But these are my addresses from the throne,
Which put off business to the ensuing session Forgetting each omission is a loss to The world, not quite so great as Anaxagoras
- 97 I know that what our neighbors call “longueurs,”³ (We've not so good a word, but have the thing,
In that complete perfection which insures An epic from Bob Southey every
spring),
Form not the true temptation which allures The reader, but 'twould not be hard to bring
Some fine examples of the epopée,⁴
To prove its grand ingredient is ennui.⁵
- 98 We learn from Horace, “Homer sometimes sleeps,”⁶
We feel without him, Wordsworth sometimes wakes,—
To show with what complacency he creeps, With his dear “Waggoners,” around his lakes
He wishes for “a boat” to sail the deeps—Of ocean?—No, of air; and then he makes Another outcry for a “a little boat,”⁷
And drivels seas to set it well afloat.
- 99 If he must fain sweep o'er the ethereal
plain,
And Pegasus runs restive in his “Waggon,”
'Could he not beg the loan of Charles's Wain?
Or pray Medea for a single dragon?
Or if, too classic for his vulgar brain, He fear'd his neck to venture such a nag on,
And he must needs mount nearer to the
moon,
'Could not the blockhead ask for a balloon?
- 100 “Pedlars,” and “Boats,” and “Waggons,”⁸ Oh! ye shades Of Pope and Dryden, are we come to
this?
That trash of such sort not alone evades
'Contempt, but from the bathos' vast abyss
Floats scumlike uppermost, and these Jack 'Ades
Of sense and song above your graves may hiss—
The “little boatman” and his “Peter Bell”
Can sneer at him who drew “Achitophel!”⁹
- 101 T' our tale — The feast was over, the slaves
gone,
The dwarfs and dancing girls had all retired,
The Arab lore and poet's song were done,
And every sound of revelry expired,
The lady and her lover, left alone,
The rosy flood of twilight's sky admired.—
Ave Maria! o'er the earth and sea, That heavenhest hour of Heaven is worthiest thee!
- 102 Ave Maria! blessed be the hour!
The time, the clime, the spot, where I so oft
Have felt that moment in its fullest power Sink o'er the earth so beautiful and soft,
While swung the deep bell in the distant
tower,
Or the faint dying day-hymn stole aloft,
And not a breath crept through the rosy
air,
And yet the forest leaves seem'd stirr'd with prayer.

¹ See p. 274.² Joanna Southcott was a visionary who prophesied that she would give birth to a second Shiloh, or Messiah, on Oct. 19, 1814. When that time came, she fell into a trance and died ten days later.³ tedious passages⁴ epic⁵ languid weariness⁶ See Poetics, §59.⁷ Peter Bell, at 1⁸ Charles's Wagon, the constellation known as the Dipper⁹ Dryden of whom Wordsworth was not fond. See Wordsworth's Essay, Supplementary to the Preface

- 103 Ave Maria! 'tis the hour of prayer! .
 Ave Maria! 'tis the hour of love!
 Ave Maria! may our spirits dare Look up to thine and to thy Son's above! 107 Ave Maria! oh that face so fair!
 Those downcast eyes beneath the Almighty dove—
 What though 'tis but a pictured image?—
 strike—
 That painting is no idol,—'tis too like
- 104 Some kinder casuists are pleased to say, In nameless print—that I have no devotion;
 But set those persons down with me to pray,
 And you shall see who has the properest notion
 Of getting into heaven the shortest way, 108 My altars are the mountains and the ocean,
 Earth, air, stars,—all that springs from the great Whole,
 Who hath produced, and will receive the
 soul .
- 105 Sweet hour of twilight!—in the solitude
 Of the pine forest, and the silent shore Which bounds Ravenna's immemorial wood, Rooted where once the Adrian wave flow'd o'er,
 To where the last Caesarean fortress¹
 stood,
 Evergreen forest! which Boccaccio's lore
 And Dryden's lay² made haunted ground
 to me, How have I loved the twilight hour and
 thee!
- 106 The shrill cicadas,³ people of the pine, Making their summer lives one ceaseless
 song,
 Were the sole echoes, save my steed's and
 mine,
 And vesper bell's that rose the boughs along;
 The spectre huntsman of Onesti's line,⁴ His hell-dogs, and their chase, and the fair throng Which learn'd from this example not to fly
- From a true lover,—shadow'd my mind's
 eye.
- Oh, Hesperus! thou bringest all good things—
 Home to the weary, to the hungry cheer, To the young bird the parent's brooding
 wings,
 The welcome stall to the o'erlabor'd steer;
 Whate'er of peace about our hearthstone clings, Whate'er our household gods protect of
 dear,
 Are gather'd round us by thy look of rest; Thou bring'st the child, too, to the mother's breast
- Soft hour! which wakes the wish and melts the heart
 Of those who sail the seas, on the first
 day
 When they from their sweet friends are torn apart;
 Or fills with love the pilgrim on his way
 As the far bell of vesper makes him start, Seeming to weep the dying day's decay;
 Is this a fancy which our reason scorns?
 Ah! surely nothing dies but something mourns!
- 109 When Nero perish'd by the justest doom Which ever the destroyer yet destroy'd, Amidst the roar of liberated Rome,
 Of nations freed, and the world overjoy'd,
 Some hands unseen strew'd flowers upon his tomb.
 Perhaps the weakness of a heart not void
 Of feeling for some kindness done, when
 power
 Had left the wretch an uncorrupted hour.
- 110 But I'm digressing, what on earth has Nero,
 Or any such like sovereign buffoons
 To do with the transactions of my hero, More than such madmen's fellow man—the moon's?
 Sure my invention must be down at zero,
 And I grown one of many "wooden spoons"
 Of verse (the name with which we Cantabs⁵ please
 To dub the last of honors in degrees).

The specter merely appeared to Onesti; it was not of his line⁵ Cantabrigians—I.e., those associated with the University of Cambridge.

111 I feel this tediousness will never do—

'Tis being too epic, and I must cut down (In copying) this long canto unto two;

They'll never find it out, unless I own,
The fact, excepting some experienced few;
And then as an improvement 'twill be shown:

I'll prove that such the opinion of the

From CANTO IV
1819-20 1821

1 Nothing so difficult as a beginning

In poesy, unless perhaps the end, For oftentimes when Pegasus seems winning

The race, he sprains a wing, and down we tend,

Like Lucifer when hurl'd from heaven for sinning,²

Our sin the same, and hard as his to mend,

Being pride, which leads the mind to soar too far,

Till our own weakness shows us what we
are.

2 But Time, which brings all beings to their level,

And sharp Adversity, will teach at last Man,—and, as we would hope,—perhaps the devil,

That neither of their intellects are vast—While youth's hot wishes in our red veins revel,

We know not this—the blood flows on too fast—

But as the torrent widens toward the ocean,

We ponder deeply on each past emotion

3 As boy, I thought myself a clever fellow.

And wish'd that others held the same opinion;

They took it up when my days grew more mellow,

And other minds acknowledged my dominion:

Now my sere fancy "falls into the yellow Leaf,"³ and Imagination droops her pinion,

And the sad truth which hovers o'er my desk

Turns what was once romantic to burlesque.

4 And if I laugh at any mortal thing,

'Tis that I may not weep; and if I weep,
'Tis that our nature cannot always bring Itself to apathy, for we must steep

Our hearts first in the depths of Lethe's
spring,

Ere what we least wish to behold will
sleep.

Thetis baptized her mortal son in Styx;

A mortal mother would on Lethe fix ¹

5 Some have accused me of a strange design Against the creed and morals of the land,

And trace it in this poem every line;

I don't pretend that I quite understand My own meaning when I would be very fine,

But the fact is that I have nothing plann'd,

Unless it were to be a moment merry,

A novel word in my vocabulary.

6 To the kind reader of our sober clime

This way of writing will appear exotic, Pulci was sire of the half-serious rhyme,

Who sang when chivalry was more Quix-otic,

And revell'd in the fancies of the time,

True knights, chaste dames, huge giants, kings despotic

But all these, save the last, being obsolete,
I chose a modern subject as more meet.

7 How I have treated it, I do not know,

Perhaps no better than they have treated me,

Who have imputed such designs as show Not what they saw, but what they wish'd to see;

But if it gives them pleasure, be it so,

This is a liberal age, and thoughts are
free:

Meantime Apollo plucks me by the ear,

And tells me to resume my story here

8 Young Juan and his lady-love were left

To their own hearts' most sweet society,

Even Time the pitiless in sorrow cleft

With his rude scythe such gentle bosoms—
he

Sigh'd to behold them of their hours bereft,

Though fœ to love; and yet they could not be

Meant to grow old, but die in happy spring, Before one charm or hope had taken wing

- 9 Their faces were not made for wrinkles, their Pure blood to stagnate, their great hearts to fail!
 The blank gray was not made to blast their hair,
 But like the climes that know nor snow nor hail,
 They were all summer; lightning might assail
 And shiver them to ashes, but to trail
 A long and snake-like life of dull decay
 Was not for them—they had too little clay.
- 10 They were alone once more; for them to be Thus was another Eden; they were never Weary, unless when separate the tree Cut from its forest root of years—the river Damm'd from its fountain—the child from the knee And breast maternal wean'd at once forever,— Would wither less than these two torn apart;
 Alas! there is no instinct like the heart—
- 11 The heart—which may be broken happy they!
 Thrice fortunate! who of that fragile mould,
 The precious porcelain of human clay, Break with the first fall they can ne'er behold
 The long year link'd with heavy day on
 day,
 And all which must be borne, and never told;
 While life's strange principle will often lie Deepest in those who long the most to die.
- 12 "Whom the gods love die young" was said of yore,¹
 And many deaths do they escape by this
 The death of friends, and that which slays even more—
 The death of friendship, love, youth, all that is,
 Except mere breath, and since the silent
 shore
 Awaits at last even those who longest miss
 The old archer's shafts, perhaps the early grave
- 13 Haidée and Juan thought not of the dead—
 The heavens, and earth, and air seem'd made for them:
 They found no fault with Time, save that he fled;
 They saw not in themselves ought to condemn;
 Each was the other's mirror, and but read Joy sparkling in their dark eyes like a gem,
 And knew such brightness was but the reflection
 Of their exchanging glances of affection
- 14 The gentle pressure, and the thrilling touch,
 The least glance better understood than
 words,
 Which still said all, and ne'er could say too much,
 A language, too, but like to that of birds, Known but to them, at least appearing such
 As, but to lovers a true sense affords; Sweet playful phrases, which would seem absurd
 To those who have ceased to hear such, or ne'er heard,—
- 15 All these were theirs, for they were children still,
 And children still they should have ever
 been,
 They were not made in the real world to fill A busy character in the dull scene,
 But like two beings born from out a rill,
 A nymph and her beloved, all unseen To pass their lives in fountains and on flowers,
 And never know the weight of human hours.
- 16 Moons changing had roll'd on, and changeless found Those their bright rise had lighted to such joys
 As rarely they beheld throughout their round;
 And these were not of the vain kind which cloy,
 For theirs were buoyant spirits, never bound By the mere senses; and that which destroys
 Most love, possession, unto them appear'd
 A thing which each endearment more en-dear'd.

 timent, see the story of Cleobis and Biton, in Herodotus's Historia, I, 81.

- 17 Oh beautiful! and rare as beautiful!
 But theirs was love in which the mind delights
 To lose itself, when the old world grows
 dull,
 And we are sick of its hack sounds and sights, Intrigues, adventures of the common school,
 Its petty passions, marriages, and flights, Where Hymen's torch but brands one strumpet more,
 Whose husband only knows her not a whore.
- 18 Hard words, harsh truth; a truth which many know Enough—The faithful and the fairy
 pair,
 Who never found a single hour too slow, What was it made them thus exempt from care?
 Young innate feelings all have felt below,
 Which perish in the rest, but in them were Inherent—what we mortals call romantic,
 And always envy, though we deem it frantic.
- 19 This is in others a factitious state, An opium dream¹ of too much youth and reading,
 But was in them their nature or their fate:
 No novels e'er had set their young hearts bleeding,
 For Haidée's knowledge was by no means great,
 And Juan was a boy of saintly breeding,
 So that there was no reason for their loves More than for those of nightingales or doves.
- 20 They gazed upon the sunset. 'tis an hour
 Dear unto all, but dearest to their eyes.
 For it had made them what they were the
 power
 Of love had first o'erwhelm'd them from such skies,
 When happiness had been their only dower,
 And twilight saw them link'd in pas-sion's ties;
 Charm'd with each other, all things charm'd that brought The past still welcome as the present
 thought.
- 21 I know not why, but in that hour tonight, Even as they gazed, a sudden tremor
 came,
- 22 That large black prophet eye seem'd to dilate
 And follow far the disappearing sun,
 As if their last day of a happy date With his broad, bright, and dropping orb were gone;
 Juan gazed on her as to ask his fate—He felt a grief, but knowing cause for
 none,
 His glance inquired of hers for some excuse
 For feelings causeless, or at least abstruse
- 23 She turn'd to him, and smiled, but in that sort
 Which makes not others smile, then turn'd aside:
 Whatever feeling shook her, it seem'd short,
 And master'd by her wisdom or her
 pride,
 When Juan spoke, too—it might be in sport—
 Of this their mutual feeling, she re-phed—
 "If it should be so,—but—it cannot be—Or I at least shall not survive to see."
- 24 Juan would question further, but she
 press'd
 His lips to hers, and silenced him with
 this,
 And then dismiss'd the omen from her
 breast,
 Defying augury with that fond kiss,
 And no doubt of all methods 'tis the best—
 Some people prefer wine—'tis not amiss;
 I have tried both, so those who would a part take May choose between the headache and the heartache
- 25 One of the two according to your choice.
 Woman or wine, you'll have to undergo;
 Both maladies are taxes on our joys:

¹ Possibly Byron refers to Coleridge's Kubla Khan (p 358)

- But which to choose, I really hardly
know;
And if I had to give a casting voice,
For both sides I could many reasons show,
And then decide, without great wrong to either,
It were much better to have both than neither.
- 26 Juan and Haidée gazed upon each other With swimming looks of speechless tenderness,
Which mix'd all feelings—friend, child, lover, brother—,
All that the best can mingle and express When two pure hearts are pour'd in one another,
And love too much, and yet cannot love
less;
But almost sanctify the sweet excess
By the immortal wish and power to bless
- 27 Mix'd in each other's arms, and heart in
heart,
Why did they not then die!—they had lived too long Should an hour come to bid them breathe
apart;
Years could but bring them cruel things
or wrong,
The world was not for them, nor the world's art
For beings passionate as Sappho's song.
Love was born with them, in them, so intense,
It was their very spirit—not a sense
- 28 They should have lived together deep in
woods,
Unseen as sings the nightingale,¹ they were Unfit to mix in these thick solitudes Call'd social, haunts of Hate, and Vice, and Care;
How lonely every freeborn creature broods!
The sweetest song-birds nestle in a pair.
The eagle soars alone; the gull and crow Flock o'er their carrion, just like men below
- 29 Now pillow'd cheek to cheek, in loving
sleep,
Haidée and Juan their siesta took,
A gentle slumber, but it was not deep,
For ever and anon a something shook
- Juan, and shuddering o'er his frame would creep;
And Haidée's sweet lips murmur'd like a brook
A worldless music, and her face so fair Stirr'd with her dream, as rose-leaves with
the air,
- 30 Or as the stirring of a deep clear stream Within an Alpine hollow, when the wind Walks o'er it, was she shaken by the dream,
The mystical usurper of the mind—O'erpowering us to be whate'er may seem Good to the soul which we no more can
bind:
Strange state of being! (for 'tis still to be), Senseless to feel, and with seal'd eyes to
see.
- 31 She dream'd of being alone on the sea-
shore,
Cham'd to a rock, she knew not how,
but stir
She could not from the spot, and the loud
roar
Grew, and each wave rose roughly.
threatening her;
And o'er her upper lip they seem'd to pour,
Until she sobb'd for breath, and soon
they were Foaming o'er her lone head, so fierce and high—
Each broke to drown her, yet she could not die
- 32 Anon—she was released, and then she stray'd
O'er the sharp shingles with her bleeding
feet,
And stumbled almost every step she made And something roll'd before her in a sheet,
Which she must still pursue howe'er afraid:
'Twas white and indistinct, nor stopp'd to meet
Her glance nor grasp, for still she gazed and grasp'd,
And ran, but it escaped her as she clasp'd
- 33 The dream changed:—in a cave she stood,¹ its walls
Were hung with marble icicles; the work Of ages on its water-fretted halls, Where waves might wash, and seals might breed and lurk;

¹ See The Two Gentlemen of Verona, V 4 26¹ See the description of the cave in Byron's
The Island 4 121 ff

Her hair was dripping, and the very balls
Of her black eyes seem'd turn'd to tears, and murk
The sharp rocks look'd below each drop they caught,
Which froze to marble as it fell,—she
thought

34 And wet, and cold, and lifeless at her feet, Pale as the foam that froth'd on his dead
brow,
Which she assay'd in vain to clear (how sweet
Were once her cares, how idle seem'd they now!),
Lay Juan, nor could aught renew the beat Of his quench'd heart, and the sea dirges low Rang in her sad ears like a mermaid's
song,
And that brief dream appear'd a life too long.

35 And gazing on the dead, she thought his face
Faded, or alter'd into something new—
Like to her father's features, till each trace More like and like to Lambro's aspect
grew—
With all his keen worn look and Grecian grace;
And starting, she awoke, and what to view?
Oh! Powers of Heaven! what dark eye meets she there
'Tis—'tis her father's—fixed upon the
pair!

36 Then shrieking, she arose, and shrieking fell,
With joy and sorrow, hope and fear, to
see Him whom she deem'd a habitant where dwell
The ocean-buried, risen from death, to be Perchance the death of one she loved too
well;
Dear as her father had been to Haidée.
It was a moment of that awful kind—I have seen such—but must not call to mind

37 Up Juan sprang to Haidée's bitter shriek, And caught her falling, and from off the wall Snatch'd down his sabre, in hot haste to wreak

Vengeance on him who was the cause of
all:
Then Lambro who till now forebore to
speak, Smiled scornfully, and said, "Within my call,
A thousand scimitars await the word, Put up, young man, put up your silly sword!"

38 And Haidée clung around him, "Juan,
'tis—
'Tis Lambro—'tis my father! Kneel with me—
He will forgive us—yes—it must be—yes—
Oh! dearest father, in this agony Of pleasure and of pain—even while I kiss Thy garment's hem! with transport, can it be That doubt should mingle with my filial
joy?
Deal with me as thou wilt, but spare this boy!"

39 High and inscrutable the old man stood, Calm in his voice, and calm within his eye—
Not always signs with him of calmest mood
He look'd upon her, but gave no reply.
Then turn'd to Juan, in whose cheek the blood
Off came and went, as there resolved to
die;
In arms, at least, he stood, in act to spring On the first foe whom Lambro's call might bring

40 "Young man, your sword," so Lambro once more said Juan replied, "Not while this arm is
free!"
The old man's cheek grew pale, but not with dread,
And drawing from his belt a pistol, he Replied, "Your blood be then on your own
head!"
Then look'd close at the flint, as if to see
'Twas fresh—for he had lately used the lock—
And next proceeded quietly to cock

41 It has a strange quick jar upon the ear,
That cocking of a pistol, when you know A moment more will bring the sight to bear

¹ To kiss the garments was a means of expressing veneration for the person who wore them See Matthew 14:36

- Upon your person, twelve yards off, or so;
A gentlemanly distance, not too near,
If you have got a former friend for foe, 46 The father paused a moment, then with-
But after being fired at once or twice, drew The ear becomes more Irish, and less nice His weapon, and replaced it; but stood
still,
And looking on her, as to look her through,
"Not I," he said, "have sought this stranger's ill,
Not I have made this desolation: few Would bear such outrage, and forbear to kill,
But I must do my duty—how thou hast Done thine, the present vouches for the
past
- 42 Lambro presented, and one instant more Had stopp'd this Canto, and Don Juan's
breath,
When Haridee threw herself her boy before,
Stern as her sire "On me," she cried,
"let death
Descend—the fault is mine, this fatal shoe
He found—but sought not I have pledged my faith,
I love him—I will die with him I knew Your nature's firmness—know your daughter's too."
- 43 A minute past, and she had been all tears,
And tenderness, and infancy, but now She stood as one who champion'd human fears—Pale, statue-like, and stern, she woo'd the blow,
And tall beyond her sex, and then com-peers,
She drew up to her height, as if to show A fauer mark, and with a fix'd eye seann'd
Her father's face—but never stopp'd his
hand
- 44 He gazed on her, and she on him, 'twas strange How like they look'd! the expression was the same;
Serenely savage, with a little change In the large dark eye's mutual-darted
flame,
For she, too, was as one who could avenge, If cause should be—a lioness, though tame,
Her father's blood before her father's face Boil'd up, and proved her truly of his race
- 45 I said they were alike, their features and Their stature, differing but in sex and
years.
Even to the delicacy of their hand
There was resemblance, such as true blood wears;
And now to see them, thus divided, stand In fix'd ferocity, when joyous tears, And sweet sensations, should have welcomed both,
- 47 "Let him disarm, or, by my father's head, His own shall roll before you like a ball!"
He raised his whistle as the word he said,
And blew, another answer'd to the call.
And rushing in disorderly, though led,
And arm'd from boot to turban, one and
all,
Some twenty of his train came, rank on rank.
He gave the word, "Arrest or slay the Frank"
- 48 Then, with a sudden movement, he withdrew
His daughter, while compress'd within his clasp,
'Twixt her and Juan interposed the crew.
In vain she struggled in her father's grasp—
His arms were like a serpent's coil: then flew
Upon their prey, as darts an angry asp,
The file of pirates save the foremost, who Had fallen, with his right shoulder half cut through
- 49 The second had his cheek laid open, but The third, a wary, cool old swordsman, took The blows upon his cutlass, and then put His own well in, so well, ere you could look,
His man was floor'd, and helpless at his foot,
With the blood running like a little brook From two smart sabre gashes, deep and red—
One on the arm, the other on the head
- 50 And then they bound him where he fell, and bore
Juan from the apartment with a sign

Old Lambro bade them take him to the shore, Where lay some ships which were to sail at nine.
 They laid him in a boat, and plied the oar Until they reach'd some galliots,¹ placed in line;
 On board of one of these, and under hatches,
 They stow'd him, with strict orders to the watches.

51 The world is full of strange vicissitudes,
 And here was one exceedingly unpleasant:

A gentleman so rich in the world's goods, Handsome and young, enjoying all the present,
 Just at the very time when he least broods
 On such a thing, is suddenly to sea sent, Wounded and chain'd, so that he cannot
 move,
 And all because a lady fell in love

52 Here I must leave him, for I grow pathetic, Moved by the Chinese nymph of tears, green tea¹

Than whom Cassandra was not more prophetic;

For if my pure libations exceed three,
 I feel my heart become so sympathetic,
 That I must have recourse to black Bohea.²

'Tis pity wine should be so deleterious, For tea and coffee leave us much more serious,

53 Unless when qualified with thee, Cognac!³
 Sweet Naiad of the Phlegethontic rill!⁴
 Ah! why the liver wilt thou thus attack,
 And make, like other nymphs, thy lovers ill?

I would take refuge in weak punch, but rack

(In each sense⁵ of the word), whene'er I fill

My mild and midnight beakers to the brim.
 Wakes me next morning with its synonym.⁶

54 I leave Don Juan for the present, safe—Not sound, poor fellow, but severely wounded,

¹ A small, swift galley moved by sails and oars

² An inferior kind of black tea

³ A kind of French brandy

⁴ Phlegethon, the river of fire in Hades

⁵ That is, punch and disorder.

⁶ That is, a headache.

Yet could his corporal pangs amount to half

Of those with which his Haidée's bosom bounded!

She was not one to weep, and rave, and chafe,

And then gave way, subdued because surrounded;

Her mother was a Moorish maid from Fez, Where all is Eden, or a wilderness

55 There the large olive rains its amber store In marble founts; there grain, and flour, and fruit,

Gush from the earth until the land runs
 o'er;

But there, too, many a poison-tree has root,

And midnight listens to the lion's roar.

And long, long deserts scorch the camel's
 foot,

Or heaving whelm the helpless caravan,
 And as the soil is, so the heart of man

56 Afric is all the sun's, and as her earth Her human clay is kindled, full of
 power

For good or evil, burning from its birth.
 The Moorish blood partakes the planet's hour.

And like the soil beneath it will bring forth

Beauty and love were Haidée's mother's dower;

But her large dark eye show'd deep Pas-sion's force,

Though sleeping like a lion near a source

57 Her daughter, temper'd with a milder ray, Like summer clouds all silvery, smooth,
 and fair,

Till slowly charged with thunder they display

Terror to earth, and tempest to the air,
 Had held till now her soft and milky way.

But overwrought with passion and des-
 pair,

The fire burst forth from her Numidian veins,

Even as the Simoom sweeps the blasted plains

58 The last sight which she saw was Juan's gore,

And he himself o'ermaster'd and cut
 down;

His blood was running on the very floor

Where late he trod, her beautiful, her
 own;

- Thus much she view'd an instant and no more,—
 Her struggles ceased with one convulsive groan;
 On her sire's arm, which until now scarce held Her writhing, fell she like a cedar fell'd
- 59 A vein had burst, and her sweet lips' pure dyes
 Were dabbled with the deep blood which ran o'er,
 And her head droop'd, as when the hly lies O'ercharged with iam her summon'd handmaids bore Their lady to her couch with gushing eyes,
 Of herbs and cordials they produced their store,
 But she defied all means they could employ,
 Like one life could not hold, nor death destroy.
- 60 Days lay she in that state unchanged, though chill—
 With nothing livid, still her lips were red,
 She had no pulse, but death seem'd absent still,
 No hideous sign proclaim'd her surely dead, Corruption came not in each mind to kill All hope, to look upon her sweet face bred New thoughts of life, for it seem'd full of soul—
 She had so much, earth could not claim the whole
- 61 The ruling passion, such as marble shows
 When exquisitely chisell'd, still lay there,
 But fix'd as marble's unchanged aspect throws O'er the fair Venus, but forever fair, O'er the Laocoon's all eternal throes,
 And ever-dying Gladiator's air,¹ Their energy like life forms all their fame, Yet looks not life, for they are still the same
- 62 She woke at length, but not as sleepers wake, Rather the dead, for life seem'd something new,
 A strange sensation which she must partake Perforce, since whatsoever met her view Struck not on memory, though a heavy ache
- Lay at her heart, whose earliest beat still true Brought back the sense of pain without the cause, For, for a while, the furies made a pause.
- 63 She look'd on many a face with vacant eye,
 On many a token without knowing what,
 She saw them watch her without asking why,
 And reck'd not who around her pillow sat;
 Not speechless, though she spoke not; not a sigh Relieved her thoughts, dull silence and quick chat Were tried in vain by those who served, she gave No sign, save breath, of having left the grave.
- 64 Her handmaids tended, but she heeded not,
 Her father watch'd, she turn'd her eyes away,
 She recognized no being, and no spot,
 However dear or cherish'd in their day,
 They changed from room to room—but all forgot—Gentle, but without memory she lay,
 At length those eyes, which they would fain be weaning Back to old thoughts, wax'd full of fearful meaning
- 65 And then a slave bethought her of a harp,
 The harper came, and tuned his instrument,
 At the first notes, irregular and sharp,
 On him her flashing eyes a moment bent,
 Then to the wall she turn'd as if to warp Her thoughts from sorrow through her heart re-sent,
 And he began a long low island song Of ancient days, ere tyranny grew strong.¹
- 66 Anon her thin wan fingers beat the wall
 In time to his old tune, he changed the theme,
 And sung of love, the fierce name struck through all Her recollection, on her flash'd the dream Of what she was, and is, if ye could call To be so being, in a gushing stream
 The tears rush'd forth from her o'erclouded brain, Like mountain mists at length dissolved in rain.

¹ See Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, 4. 140 (p. 548).¹ Cf. David's playing before Saul, 1 Samuel, 16. 16-23. See also Browning's Saul.

- 67 Short solace, vain relief!—thought came too quick,
And whirled her brain to madness; she arose
As one who ne'er had dwelt among the sick,
And flew at all she met, as on her toes,
But no one ever heard her speak or shriek, Although her paroxysm drew towards its close,— Hers was a frenzy which disdain'd to save, Even when they smote her, in the hope to save.
- 68 Yet she betray'd at times a gleam of sense; Nothing could make her meet her father's face, Though on all other things with looks intense She gazed, but none she ever could retrace;
Food she refused, and raiment, no pretence Avail'd for either, neither change of place, Nor time, nor skill, nor remedy, could give her Senses to sleep—the power seem'd gone forever.
- 69 Twelve days and nights she wither'd thus; at last,
Without a groan, or sigh, or glance, to show
A parting pang, the spirit from her passed:
And they who watch'd her nearest could not know
The very instant, till the change that cast
Her sweet face into shadow, dull and slow, Glazed o'er her eyes—the beautiful, the black—Oh! to possess such lustre—and then lack!
- 70 She died, but not alone; she held within A second principle of life, which might Have dawn'd a fair and sinless child of sin;
But closed its little being without light,
And went down to the grave unborn, wherein Blossom and bough he wither'd with one blight;
In vain the dews of Heaven descend above
The bleeding flower and blasted fruit of love
- 71 Thus lived—thus died she; never more on her Shall sorrow light, or shame She was not made
- Through years or moons the inner weight to bear, Which colder hearts endure till they are laid By age in earth. her days and pleasures were Brief, but delightful—such as had not staid Long with her destiny; but she sleeps well¹
By the sea-shore, whereon she loved to dwell
- 72 That isle is now all desolate and bare,
Its dwellings down, its tenants pass'd away;
None but her own and father's grave is there,
And nothing outward tells of human clay,
Ye could not know where lies a thing so fair,
No stone is there to show, no tongue to say,
What was; no dirge, except the hollow sea's, Mourns o'er the beauty of the Cyclades.
- 73 But many a Greek maid in a loving song Sighs o'er her name; and many an islander
With her sire's story makes the night less long;
Valor was his, and beauty dwelt with her:
If she loved rashly, her life paid for wrong—
A heavy price must all pay who thus err,
In some shape, let none think to fly the danger,
For soon or late Love is his own avenger.
- From CANTO XI
1822-23 1823
- 53 Juan knew several languages—as well
He might—and brought them up with skill, in time To save his fame with each accomplish'd belle,
Who still regretted that he did not rhyme
There wanted but this requisite to swell
His qualities (with them) into sublime:
Lady Fitz-Frisky, and Miss Mævia Mannish,
Both long'd extremely to be sung in Spanish.

¹ See Macbeth, III, 2, 23

- 54 However, he did pretty well, and was Admitted as an aspirant to all The coteries, and, as in Banquo's glass,¹ At great assemblies or in parties small,
He saw ten thousand living authors pass,
That being about their average numeral,
Also the eighty "greatest living poets," As every paltry magazine can show its.
- 55 In twice five years the "greatest living poet," Like to the champion in the fifty ring, Is call'd on to support his claim, or show
it,
Although 'tis an imaginary thing.
Even I—albeit I'm sure I did not know it.
Nor sought of foolscap subjects to be king—
Was reckon'd, a considerable time, The grand Napoleon of the realms of rhyme
- 56 But Juan was my Moscow, and Faliero My Leipsic, and my Mont Saint Jean seems Cain.²

But I will fall at least as fell my hero;
Nor reign at all, or as a monarch reign,
Or to some lonely isle of gaolers go,
With turncoat Southey for my turnkey Lowe.
- 57 Sir Walter reign'd before me; Moore and Campbell
Before and after: but now grown more holy,
The Muses upon Sion's hill must ramble With poets almost clergymen, or wholly.
And Pegasus has a psalmodic amble Beneath the very Reverend Rowley

Who shoes the glorious animal with stilts,
A modern Ancient Pistol—by the hilts!⁴

- Yields him but vinegar for his reward,— That neutralized dull Dorus of the Nine;
That swarthy Sporus, neither man nor Cambyzes' roaring Romans² beat at least The howling Hebrews of Cybele's priest.—

- 59 Then there's my gentle Euphues,³ who,
they say,
Sets up for being a sort of moral me;
He'll find at rather difficult some day To turn out both, or either, it may be.
Some persons think that Coleridge hath the sway;
And Wordsworth has supporters, two or three;
And that deep-mouth'd Boetian⁴ "Savage Landor"
Has taken for a swan rogue Southey's gander critique,⁵

Just as he really promised something
great,
If not intelligible, without Greek Contrived to talk about the gods of Much as they might have been supposed to speak.

Poor fellow! His was an untoward
fate;
'Tis strange the mind, that fiery particle,⁶ Should let itself be snuff'd out by an article.

Left it before he had been treated very ill,
And henceforth found himself more gaily class'd

Amongst the higher spirits of the day,
The sun's true son, no vapor, but a ray

65 His morns he pass'd in business—which dissected,

Was like all business, a laborious noth-

world!

Then glare the lamps, then whirl the wheels, then roar

Through street and square fast flashing chamots hail'd

Like harness'd meteors, then along the floor

Chalk mimes painting, then festoons are twirl'd,

Then roll the brazen thunders of the door,

Which opens to the thousand happy few An earthly Paradise of "Or Mou."²

² Gilded Bronze

- Makes one in love even with its very faults.
Saloon, room, hall, o'erflow beyond their brink,
And long the latest of arrivals halts,
'Midst royal dukes and dames condemn'd to climb,
And gain an inch of staircase at a time.
- 69 Thrice happy he who, after a survey Of the good company, can win a corner,
A door that's in or boudoir out of the way,
Where he may fix himself like small "Jack Horner,"
And let the Babel round run as it may,
And look on as a mourner, or a scorner,
Or an approver, or a mere spectator, Yawning a little as the night grows later.
- 70 But this won't do, save by and by; and he Who, like Don Juan, takes an active share, Must steer with care through all that glittering sea Of gems and plumes and pearls and silks, to where He deems it is his proper place to be;
Dissolving in the waltz to some soft air,
Or prouder prancing with mercurial skill,
Where Science marshals forth her own quadrille.
- 71 Or, if he dance not, but hath higher views Upon an heiress or his neighbor's bride.
Let him take care that that which he pursues
Is not at once too palpably desecrated Full many an eager gentleman oft rues
His haste; impatience is a blundering guide, Amongst a people famous for reflection,
Who like to play the fool with circumspection.

Or if forestall'd, get opposite and ogle:— Oh, ye ambrosial moments! always upper In mind, a sort of sentimental bogle,¹
Which sits for ever upon memory's crupper, The ghost of vanish'd pleasures once in vogue! Ill Can tender souls relate the rise and fall Of hopes and fears which shake a single ball.

WHEN A MAN HATH NO FREEDOM TO FIGHT FOR AT HOME
1820 1824

When a man hath no freedom to fight for at home,
Let him combat for that of his neighbors, Let him think of the glories of Greece and of Rome,
And get knock'd on his head for his labors

5 To do good to mankind is the chivalrous plan,
And is always as nobly requited;
Then battle for freedom wherever you can,
And, if not shot or hang'd, you'll get knighted

The world is a bundle of hay, Mankind are the asses who pull,
Each tugs it a different way.
And the greatest of all is John Bull

WHO KILL'D JOHN KEATS?¹
1821 1830

"Who kill'd John Keats?"
"I," says The Quarterly, So savage and Tantalously,
" 'Twas one of my feats."

5 "Who shot the arrow?"
"The poet-priest Milman (So ready to kill man), Or Southey, or Barrow."

(Certes, I should have more than those,

So, if you will, I shan't be sham'd,

THE VISION OF JUDGMENT²
1821 1822

1 Saint Peter sat by the celestial gate:
His keys were rusty, and the lock was
dull,
So little trouble had been given of late,
Not that the place by any means was full,
But since the Gallic era "eighty-eight"³
The devils had ta'en a longer, stronger pull,
And "a pull all together," as they say At sea—which drew most souls another way.

2 The angels all were singing out of tune,
And hoarse with having little else to do,
Excepting to wind up the sun and moon,
Or curb a runaway young star or two,
Or wild colt of a comet, which too soon Broke out of bounds o'er the ethereal
blue,

³ The French Revolution, which began in 1788

- Splitting some planet with its playful tail, As boats are sometimes by a wanton whale.
- 3 The guardian seraphs had retired on high,
Finding their charges past all care below;
Terrestrial business fill'd nought in the sky
Save the recording angel's black bureau,
Who found, indeed, the facts to multiply With such rapidity of vice and woe,
That he had stripp'd off both his wings in quills,
And yet was in arrears of human ill.
- 4 His business so augmented of late years,
That he was forced, against his will no doubt (Just like those cherubs, earthly ministers), For some resource to turn himself about,
And claim the help of his celestial peers,
To aid him ere he should be quite worn out By the increased demand for his remarks—Six angels and twelve saints were named his clerks.
- 5 This was a handsome board—at least for heaven;
And yet they had even then enough to do,
So many conquerors' cars were daily driven,
So many kingdoms fitted up anew,
Each day too slew its thousands six or seven,
Till at the crowning carnage, Waterloo,
They threw their pens down in divine disgust—
The page was so besmear'd with blood and dust
- 6 This by the way, 'tis not mine to record
What angels shrink from even the very devil
On this occasion his own work abhorr'd,
So surfeited with the infernal revel
Though he himself had sharpen'd every sword,
It almost quench'd his innate thirst of evil.
(Here Satan's sole good work deserves insertion—'Tis, that he has both generals¹ in reversion.)²
- 7 Let's skip a few short years of hollow peace,
Which peopled earth no better, hell as wont,
And heaven none—they form the tyrant's lease,
With nothing but new names subscribed upon 't;
'Twill one day finish: meantime they increase,
"With seven heads and ten horns," and all in front, Like Saint John's foretold beast,³ but ours are born Less formidable in the head than horn.
- 8 In the first year of freedom's second dawn² Died George the Third, although no tyrant, one Who shielded tyrants, till each sense withdrawn Left him nor mental nor external sun
A better farmer ne'er brush'd dew from lawn.
A worse king never left a realm undone!
He died—but left his subjects still behind,
One half as mad—and t'other no less blind.
- 9 He died!—his death made no great stir on earth
His burial made some pomp, there was profusion Of velvet, gilding, brass, and no great dearth Of aught but tears—save those shed by collusion.
For these things may be bought at their true worth;
Of elegy there was the due infusion—Bought also, and the torches, cloaks, and banners, Heralds, and relics of old Gothic manners,³
- 10 Form'd a sepulchral melodrama Of all The fools who flock'd to swell or see the show, Who cared about the corpse? The funeral Made the attraction, and the black the woe.
There throb'd not there a thought which pierced the pall;
And when the gorgeous coffin was laid low,

¹See Revelation, 13²The year 1820, in which the revolutionary spirit broke out all over southern Europe³That is, of the Age of Chivalry, which was noted for its display¹Wellington and Napoleon²That is, his by right of future possession

- It seem'd the mockery of hell to fold
The rottenness of eighty years in gold.
- 11 So mix his body with the dust! It might Return to what it must far sooner, were The natural compound left alone to fight Its way back into earth, and fire, and
air,
But the unnatural balsams merely blight
What nature made him at his birth, as bare As the mere million's base unmummied
clay—
Yet all his spices but prolong decay!
- 12 He's dead—and upper earth with him has
done;
He's buried; save the undertaker's bill,
Or lapidary scrawl,¹ the world is gone
For him, unless he left a German will.² But where's the proctor who will ask his son's?³
In whom his qualities are reigning still, Except that household virtue, most uncommon,
Of constancy to a bad, ugly woman
- 13 "God save the king!" It is a large economy
In God to save the like, but if he will Be saving, all the better, for not one am I Of those who think damnation better
still.
I hardly know too if not quite alone am I
In this small hope of bettering future ill By encumbersing, with some slight restriction,
The eternity of hell's hot jurisdiction.
- 14 I know this is unpopular, I know
'Tis blasphemous, I know one may be damn'd
For hoping no one else may e'er be so; I know my catechism, I know we're cramm'd
With the best doctrine till we quite o'er-
flow;
I know that all save England's church have shamm'd,
And that the other twice two hundred churches
And synagogues have made a damn'd bad purchase
- ¹ Inscription on a tombstone ² The Georges belonged to the German house of Hanover. Byron frequently sneered at the Germans.
³ A thrust at George IV, who was thought capable of following the example of George II in concealing his father's will. See Don Juan, XI, 78, 3. The proctor was a special officer of the court
- 15 God help us all! God help me too! I am, God knows, as helpless as the devil can wish,
And not a whit more difficult to damn,
Than is to bring to land a late-hook'd
fish,
Or to the butcher to purvey the lamb,
Not that I'm fit for such a noble dish,
As one day will be that immortal fry Of almost everybody born to die.
- 16 Saint Peter sat by the celestial gate,
And nodded o'er his keys, when, lo!
there came
A wondrous noise he had not heard of late—
A rushing sound of wind, and stream, and flame,
In short, a roar of things extremely great,
Which would have made aught save a saint exclaim;
But he, with first a start and then a wink, Said, "There's another star gone out, I think!"
- 17 But ere he could return to his repose, A cherub flapp'd his right wing o'er his
eyes—
At which St. Peter yawn'd, and rubb'd his nose:
"Saint porter," said the angel, "pruthee
rise!"
Waving a goodly wing, which glow'd, as glows
An earthly peacock's tail, with heavenly dyes:
To which the saint replied, "Well, what's the matter?"
"Is Lucifer come back with all this clatter?"
- 18 "No," quoth the cherub; "George the Third is dead."
"And who is George the Third?" replied the apostle
"What George? what Third?"—"The king of England," said The angel. "Well! he won't find kings to jostle
Him on his way; but does he wear his
head?
Because the last we saw here had a tussle,
And ne'er would have got into heaven's good graces,
Had he not flung his head in all our faces.

- 19 "He was, if I remember, king of France,¹ That head of his, which could not keep a crown
On earth, yet ventured in my face to advance
A claim to those of martyrs—like my
own:
If I had had my sword, as I had once
When I cut ears off, I had cut him down,
But having but my keys, and not my brand, I only knock'd his head from out his hand.
- 20 "And then he set up such a headless howl, That all the saints came out and took him in,
And there he sits by St. Paul, cheek by jowl;
That fellow Paul—the parvenu² The skin
Of St Bartholomew, which makes his cowl In heaven, and upon earth redeem'd his sin,
So as to make a martyr, never sped
Better than did this weak and wooden head.
- 21 "But had it come up here upon its shoulders,
There would have been a different tale to
tell:
The fellow-feeling in the saint's beholders Seems to have acted on them like a spell,
And so this very foolish head heaven solders
Back on its trunk: it may be very well,
And seems the custom here to overthrow Whatever has been wisely done below."
- 22 The angel answer'd, "Peter' do not pout
The king who comes has head and all entire,
And never knew much what it was about,
He did as doth the puppet—by its wire,
And will be judged like all the rest, no doubt.
My business and your own is not to inquire Into such matters, but to mind our cue—Which is to act as we are bid to do."
- 23 While thus they spake, the angelic caravan, Arriving like a rush of mighty wind, (leaving the fields of space, as doth the swan
Some silver stream (say Ganges, Nile, or Inde, Or Thames, or Tweed), and 'midst them an old man
- 24 But bringing up the rear of this bright host A Spirit of a different aspect waved His wings, like thunder-clouds above some coast
Whose barren beach with frequent wrecks is paved,
His brow was like the deep when tempest-toss'd, Fierce and unfathomable thoughts engraved
Eternal wrath on his immortal face,
And where he gazed a gloom pervaded space.
- 25 As he drew near, he gazed upon the gate Ne'er to be enter'd more by him or sin,
With such a glance of supernatural hate, As made Saint Peter wish himself within,
He patter'd with his keys at a great rate,
And sweated through his apostolic skin
Of course his perspiration was but ebor,¹ Or some such other spiritual liquor
- 26 The very cherubs huddled all together, Like birds when soars the falcon; and they felt
A tingling to the tip of every feather,
And form'd a circle like Orion's belt Around their poor old charge, who scarce knew whither His guards had led him, though they gently dealt With royal manes (for by many stories,
And true, we learn the angels are all Tories)
- 27 As things were in this posture, the gate
flew Asunder, and the flashing of its hinges Flung over space an universal hue
Of many-color'd flame, until its tinges Reach'd even our speck of earth, and made a new Aurora borealis spread its fringes O'er the North Pole, the same seen, when ice-bound,
By Captain Parry's crew, in "Melville's
Sound."
- 28 And from the gate thrown open issued beaming
A beautiful and mighty Thing of Light, ¹ ethereal fluid that flowed in the veins of the gods

29 'Twas the archangel Michael, all men
know

The make of angels and archangels, since There's scarce a scribbler has not one to show,

From the fiends' leader to the angels' prince;

There also are some altar-pieces, though I really can't say that they much evince One's inner notions of immortal spirits, But let the connoisseurs explain their merits

30 Michael flew forth in glory and in good,
A goodly work of him from whom all glory

And good arise, the portal past—he stood, Before him the young cherubs and saints hoary—

(I say young, begging to be understood By looks, not years, and should be very sorry

To state, they were not older than St. Peter, But merely that they seem'd a little sweeter).

31 The cherubs and the saints bow'd down
before

That arch-angelic hierarch, the first Of essences angelical, who wore The aspect of a god, but this ne'er mused

Pride in his heavenly bosom, in whose core No thought, save for his Maker's service, durst

Intrude, however glorified and high,
He knew him but the viceroy of the sky.

32 He and the sombre, silent Spirit met—They knew each other both for good and
ill;

Such was their power, that neither could forget

His former friend and future foe; but
still

There was a high, immortal, proud regret In either's eye, as if 'twere less their will Than destiny to make the eternal years Their date of war, and their "champ clos"² the spheres.

33 But here they were in neutral space: we
know

From Job, that Satan hath the power to pay

A heavenly visit thrice a year or so;
And that the "sons of God,"² like those of clay,

Must keep him company, and we might

From the same book, in how polite a way
The dialogue is held between the Powers Of Good and Evil—but 'twould take up house.

34 And this is not a theologic tract,
To prove with Hebrew and with Arabic,
If Job be allegory or a fact,
But a true narrative, and thus I pick From out the whole but such and such an act

As sets aside the slightest thought of trick

'Tis every tittle true, beyond suspicion,
And accurate as any other vision.

35 The spirits were in neutral space, before The gate of heaven, like eastern threshholds is

The place where Death's grand cause is argued o'er,

And souls despatch'd to that world or to
this,

And therefore Michael and the other wore A civil aspect, though they did not kiss,

Yet still between his Darkness and his Brightness

There pass'd a mutual glance of great politeness.

36 The Archangel bow'd, not like a modern beau,

But with a graceful Oriental bend, Pressing one radiant arm just where below

The heart in good men is supposed to tend;

He turn'd as to an equal, not too low,
But kindly; Satan met his ancient friend

With more hauteur, as might an old Castilian

Poor noble meet a mushroom rich civilian.

 An instant; and then raising it, he stood In act to assert his right or wrong, and could or should Make out a case to be exempt from woe Eternal, more than other kings, endued 42

- 38 Michael began: "What wouldst thou with this man,
 Now dead, and brought before the Lord?
 What ill
 Hath he wrought since his mortal race began,
 That thou canst claim him? Speak' and do thy will,
 If it be just if in this earthly span
 He hath been greatly failing to fulfil His duties as a king and mortal, say,
 And he is thine; if not, let him have way."
- 39 "Michael'" replied the Prince of Air.

 Before the gate of him thou servest, must I claim my subject and will make appear That as he was my worshipper in dust,
 So shall he be in spirit, although dear To thee and thine, because nor wine nor lust
 Were of his weaknesses; yet on the throne
 He reign'd o'er millions to serve me alone.
- 40 "Look to our earth, or rather mine; it was, Once, more thy master's. but I triumph
 not
 In this poor planet's conquest; nor, alas!
 Need he thou servest envy me my lot.
 With all the myriads of bright worlds which pass
 In worship round him, he may have forgot
 Yon weak creation of such paltry things:
 I think few worth damnation save their kings,—
- 41 "And these but as a kind of quit-rent,² to Assert my right as lord; and even had I such an inclination, 'twere (as you Well know) superfluous, they are grown so bad,
- That hell has nothing better left to do Than leave them to themselves: so much more mad
 And evil by their own internal curse, Heaven cannot make them better, nor I worse.
- 42 "Look to the earth, I said, and say again When this old, blind, mad, helpless, weak, poor worm Began in youth's first bloom and flush to reign,
 The world and he both wore a different
 form,
 And much of earth and all the watery plain Of ocean call'd him king through many a storm
 His isles had floated on the abyss of time, For the rough virtues chose them for their clime.
- 43 "He came to his sceptre young; he leaves it old:
 Look to the state in which he found his realm,
 And left it; and his annals too behold,
 How to a minion first he gave the helm,² How grew upon his heart a thirst for gold,
 The beggar's vice, which can but overwhelm
 The meanest hearts; and for the rest, but

- Found George the Third their first opponent. Whose History was ever stain'd as his will be With national and individual woes?
I grant his household abstinence, I grant His neutral virtues, which most monarchs want,
- 46 "I know he was a constant consort, own
He was a decent sire, and middling lord
All this is much, and most upon a throne,
As temperance, if at Apicius' board, Is more than at an anchorite's supper shown.
I grant him all the kindest can accord;
And this was well for him, but not for those Millions who found him what oppression chose
- 47 "The New World shook him off, the Old yet groans Beneath what he and his prepared, if not Completed; he leaves heirs on many thrones
To all his vices, without what begot Compassion for him—his tame virtues, drones
Who sleep, or despots who have now forgot
A lesson which shall be re-taught them, wake Upon the thrones of earth, but let them
quake!
- 48 "Five millions of the primitive, who hold The faith which makes ye great on earth,¹ implored
A part of that vast all they held of old,— Freedom to worship—not alone your Lord,
Michael, but you, and you, Saint Peter!
Cold
Must be your souls, if you have not abhorr'd
The foe to Catholic participation In all the license of a Christian nation
- 49 "True! he allow'd them to pray God, but as A consequence of prayer, refused the law Which would have placed them upon the same base
With those who did not hold the saints in awe."
But here Saint Peter started from his place,
- And cried, "You may the prisoner withdraw:
Ere heaven shall ope her portals to this Guelph,¹ While I am guard, may I be damn'd myself!
- 50 "Sooner will I with Cerberus exchange
My office (and his is no sinecure)
Than see this royal Bedlam bigot range The azure fields of heaven, of that he sure!"
— "Saint!" replied Satan, "you do well to avenge
The wrongs he made your satellites endure;
And if to this exchange you should be
given,
I'll try to coax our Cerberus up to
heaven!"
- 51 Here Michael interposed "Good saint!
and devil!
Pray, not so fast, you both outrun discretion
Saint Peter! you were wont to be more civil!
Satan! excuse this warmth of his expression,
And condescension to the vulgar's level Even saints sometimes forget themselves in session
Have you got more to say?"—"No."—
"If you please,
I'll trouble you to call your witnesses."
- 52 Then Satan turn'd and waved his swarthy
hand,
Which stirr'd with its electric qualities Clouds farther off than we can understand, Although we find him sometimes in our Infernal thunder shook both sea and land
skies;
In all the planets, and hell's batteries
Let off the artillery, which Milton mentions As one of Satan's most sublime inventions.²
- 53 This was a signal unto such damn'd souls
As have the privilege of their damnation Extended far beyond the mere controls

Is theirs particularly in the rolls

 Being clay myself Let not those spirits

 Offended with such base low likenesses;
 We know their posts are nobler far than

- 55 When the great signal ran from heaven to
 hell—
 About ten million times the distance reckon'd
 From our sun to its earth, as we can tell How much time it takes up, even to a second,
 For every ray that travels to dispel The fogs of London, through which, dimly beacon'd,
 The weathercocks are gilt some thrice a
 year,
 If that the summer is not too severe.
- 56 I say that I can tell—'twas half a minute, I know the solar beams take up more
 time Ere, pack'd up for their journey, they begin it,
 But then their telegraph is less sublime,
 And if they ran a race, they would not win it
 'Gainst Satan's couriers bound for their own clime
 The sun takes up some years for every ray
 To reach its goal—the devil not half a day.
- 57 Upon the verge of space, about the size Of half-a-crown, a little speck appear'd (I've seen a something like it in the skies In the Ægean, ere a squall); it near'd,
 And, growing bigger, took another guise;
 Like an aerial ship it tack'd, and steer'd, Or was steer'd (I am doubtful of the grammar
 Of the last phrase, which makes the stanza stammer;—
- 58 But take your choice); and then it grew a cloud;
 And so it was—a cloud of witnesses But such a cloud! No land e'er saw a crowd
 Of locusts numerous as the heavens saw these,
 They shadow'd with their myriads space, their loud
 And varied cries were like those of wild geese
 (If nations may be liken'd to a goose), And realized the phrase of "hell broke loose"¹
- 59 Here crash'd a sturdy oath of stout John Bull,
 Who damn'd away his eyes as heretofore.
 There Paddy brogued "By Jasus!"—
 "What's your wull?"
 The temperate Scot exclaim'd the French ghost swore
 In certain terms I shan't translate in full,
 As the first coachman will, and 'midst the war,
 The voice of Jonathan was heard to express,
 "Our president is going to war, I guess"
- 60 Besides there were the Spaniard, Dutch, and Dane,
 In short, an universal shoal of shades,
 From Otaheite's isle to Salisbury Plain,
 Of all climes and professions, years and trades,
 Ready to swear against the good king's reign,
 Bitter as clubs in cards are against spades
 All summon'd by this grand "subpœna," to Try if kings mayn't be damn'd like me or you.
- 61 When Michael saw this host, he first grew pale,
 As angels can, next, like Italian twi-
 light,
 He turn'd all colors—as a peacock's tail, Or sunset streaming through a Gothic skylight
 In some old abbey, or a trout not stale, Or distant lightning on the horizon by
 night,
 Or a fresh rainbow, or a grand review
 Of thirty regiments in red, green, and blue.

- 62 Then he address'd himself to Satan
 "Why—
 My good old friend, for such I deem you, though
 Our different parties make us fight so shy,
 I ne'er mistake you for a personal foe,
 Our difference is political, and I Trust that, whatever may occur below, You know my great respect for you and
 this Makes me regret whate'er you do amiss—
- 63 "Why, my dear Lucifer, would you abuse My call for witnesses? I did not mean That you should half of earth and hell produce;
 'Tis even superfluous, since two honest, clean,
 True testimonies are enough we lose Our time, nay, our eternity, between The accusation and defence if we Hear both, 'twill stretch our immortality "
- 64 Satan replied, "To me the matter is Indifferent, in a personal point of view
 I can have fifty better souls than this With far less trouble than we have gone through Already, and I merely argued his Late majesty of Britain's case with you Upon a point of form you may dispose Of him, I've kings enough below, God knows!"
- 65 Thus spoke the Demon (late call'd "multi-faced")¹
 By multo-scrubbling Southey) "Then we'll call
 One or two persons of the myriads placed Around our congress, and dispense with
 all
 The rest," quoth Michael "Who may be so graced
 As to speak first? there's choice enough —who shall It be?" Then Satan answer'd, "There are many;
 But you may choose Jack Wilkes as well as any "
- 66 A merry, cock-eyed, curious-looking sprite Upon the instant started from the throng,
 Dress'd in a fashion now forgotten quite,
 For all the fashions of the flesh stick long
 By people in the next world: where unite
- All the costumes since Adam's, right or wrong,
 From Eve's fig-leaf down to the petticoat, Almost as scanty, of days less remote
- 67 The spirit look'd around upon the crowds Assembled, and exclaim'd, "My friends of all The spheres, we shall catch cold amongst these clouds,
 So let's to business why this general
 call?
 If those are freeholders I see in shrouds,
 And 'tis for an election that they bawl, Behold a candidate with untorn'd coat!
 Saint Peter, may I count upon your vote?"
- 68 "Sir," replied Michael, "you mistake;
 these things
 Are of a former life, and what we do Above is more august, to judge of kings Is the tribunal met so now you know "
 "Then I presume those gentlemen with
 wings,"
 Said Wilkes, "are cherubs, and that soul below Looks much like George the Third, but to my mind
 A good deal older—Bless me! is he blind?"
- 69 "He is what you behold him, and his doom Depends upon his deeds," the Angel
 said;
 "If you have aught to arraign in him, the tomb Gives license to the humblest beggar's
 head
 To lift itself against the loftiest"—
 "Some,"
 Said Wilkes, "don't wait to see them laid in lead,
 For such a liberty—and I for one,
 Have told them what I thought beneath the
 sun."
- 70 "Above the sun repeat, then, what thou hast
 To urge against him," said the Archangel "Why," Replied the spirit, "since old scores are
 past,
 Must I turn evidence? In faith, not I.
 Besides, I beat him hollow at the last,"²

¹ Byron called Southey a turncoat and a renegade for transferring his allegiance to the Tory party. See at 67, also Don Juan, Dedication l. 1 p. 577.

² In 1772 Wilkes had been successful as a Member of Parliament in passing a motion to expunge from the records the resolution under which he had been expelled from the House in 1764.

- With all his Lords and Commons: in the sky
I don't like ripping up old stories, since His conduct was but natural in a prince.
- 71 "Foolish, no doubt, and wicked, to oppress A poor unlucky devil without a shilling, But then I blame the man himself much
less Than Bute and Grattan, and shall be unwilling
To see him punish'd here for their excess, Since they were both damn'd long ago, and still in Their place below: for me, I have forgiven,
And vote his 'habeas corpus' into heaven "
- 72 "Wilkes," said the Devil, "I understand all this;
You turn'd to half a countier ere you died,
And seem to think it would not be amiss
To grow a whole one on the other side Of Charon's ferry, you forget that his Reign is concluded, whatsoever betide, He won't be sovereign more you've lost your labor,
For at the best he will be but your neighbor.
- 73 "However, I knew what to think of it,
When I beheld you in your jesting way, Flitting and whispering round about the spit
Where Belial, upon duty for the day, With Fox's laird¹ was basting William Pitt,
His pupil, I knew what to think, I say That fellow even in hell breeds farther ill, I'll have him gagg'd—'twas one of his own bills.²
- 74 "Call Junius!" From the crowd a shadow stalk'd,
And at the name there was a general
squeeze,
So that the very ghosts no longer walk'd
In comfort, at their own aerial ease, But were all ram'm'd, and jam'm'd (but to be balk'd,
As we shall see), and jostled hands and knees,
Like wind compress'd and pent within a bladder,
Or like a human colic, which is sadder
- 75 The shadow came—a tall, thin, gray-hair'd figure,
That look'd as it had been a shade on
earth;
Quick in its motions, with an air of vigor, But nought to mark its breeding or its
birth;
Now it wax'd little, then again grew bigger,
With now an air of gloom, or savage mirth,
But as you gazed upon its features, they 'changed every instant—to what, none could say.
- 76 The more intently the ghosts gazed, the less Could they distinguish whose the features were:¹
The Devil himself seem'd puzzled even to
guess,
They varied like a dream—now here, now
there,
And several people swore from out the
press,
They knew him perfectly, and one could swear
He was his father, upon which another Was sure he was his mother's cousin's
brother
- 77 Another, that he was a duke, or knight,
An orator, a lawyer, or a priest,
A nabob,² a man-midwife, but the wight Mysterious changed his countenance at least
As oft as they their minds, though in full sight
He stood, the puzzle only was increased.
The man was a phantasmagoria in Himself—he was so volatile and thin.
- 78 The moment that you had pronounced him
one,
Presto! his face changed, and he was another,
And when that change was hardly well
put on,
It varied, till I don't think his own mother
(If he had a mother) would her son Have known, he shifted so from one to t'other,
Till guessing from a pleasure grew a task,
At this epistolary "Iron Mask "

- 79 For sometimes he like Cerberus would seem—“Three gentlemen at once”¹ (as sagely says Good Mrs Malaprop); then you might deem That he was not even one; now many rays Were flashing round him, and now a thick steam Hid him from sight—like fogs on London days:
 Now Burke, now Tooke, he grew to people’s fancies,
 And certes² often like Sir Philip Francis
- 80 I’ve an hypothesis—’tis quite my own,
 I never let it out till now, for fear Of doing people harm about the throne,
 And injuring some minister or peer.
 On whom the stigma might perhaps be blown,
 It is—my gentle public, lend thine ear!
 ’Tis, that what Junius we are wont to call Was really, truly, nobody at all.
- 81 I don’t see wherefore letters should not be Written without hands, since we duly view Them written without heads, and books, we see,
 Are fill’d as well without the latter too:
 And really till we fix on somebody For certain sure to claim them as his due,
 Their author, like the Niger’s mouth, will bother
 The world to say if there be mouth or author.
- 82 “And who and what art thou?” the Archangel said.
 “For that you may consult my title-page,”³ Replied this mighty shadow of a shade “If I have kept my secret half an age, I scarce shall tell it now.”—“Canst thou upbraid,” Continued Michael, “George Rex, or allege Aught further?” Junius answer’d, “You had better First ask him for his answer to my letter:
- 83 “My charges upon record will outlast
 The brass of both his epitaph and tomb.” “Repent’st thou not,” said Michael, “of some past Exaggeration? something which may doom Thyself if false, as him if true? Thou wast Too bitter—is it not so?—in thy gloom Of passion?”—“Passion!” cried the phantom dim, “I loved my country, and I hated him
- 84 “What I have written, I have written” let The rest be on his head or mine!” So spoke Old “Nominis Umbra,” and while speaking yet, Away he melted in celestial smoke Then Satan said to Michael, “Don’t forget To call George Washington, and John Horne Tooke, And Franklin,”—but at this time there was heard A cry for room, though not a phantom stirr’d.
- 85 At length with jostling, elbowing, and the aid Of cherubim appointed to that post,
 The devil Asmodeus to the circle made His way, and look’d as if his journey cost Some trouble. When his burden down he laid, “What’s this?” cried Michael; “why, ’tis not a ghost?” “I know it,” quoth the incubus;² “but he Shall be one, if you leave the affair to me.
- 86 “Confound the renegade! I have spram’d My left wing, he’s so heavy, one would think Some of his works about his neck were chain’d.
 But to the point: while hovering o’er the brink Of Skiddaw (where as usual it still rain’d),
 I saw a taper, far below me, wink,
 And stooping, caught this fellow at a libel—
 No less on history than the Holy Bible.
- 87 “The former is the devil’s scripture, and The latter yours, good Michael: so the affair Belongs to all of us, you understand

- I snatch'd him up just as you see him there,
And brought him off for sentence out of hand.
I've scarcely been ten minutes in the air—
At least a quarter it can hardly be.
I dare say that his wife is still at tea."
- 88 Here Satan said, "I know this man of old,
And have expected him for some time here;
A siller fellow you will scarce behold,
Or more conceited in his petty sphere.
But surely it was not worth while to fold Such trash below your wing, Asmodeus dear:
We had the poor wretch safe (without being bored With carriage) coming of his own accord
- 89 "But since he's here, let's see what he has done"
"Done!" cried Asmodeus, "he anticipates
The very business you are now upon,
And scribbles as if head clerk to the Fates
Who knows to what his ribaldry may run, When such an ass as this, like Balaam's, prates?"
"Let's hear," quoth Michael, "what he has to say You know we're bound to that in every way"
- 90 Now the bard, glad to get an audience, which By no means often was his case below,
Began to cough, and hawk, and hem, and pitch His voice into that awful note of woe
To all unhappy hearers within reach Of poets when the tide of rhyme 's in flow;
But stuck fast with his first hexameter.²
Not one of all whose gony feet would stir
- 91 But ere the spavin'd dactyls could be spur'd Into recitative, in great dismay Both cherubim and seraphim were heard To murmur loudly through their long array,
And Michael rose ere he could get a word
Of all his founder'd verses under way,
And cried, "For God's sake, stop, my friend!
'twere best—
- Non Di, non homines*¹—you know the rest."
- 92 A general bustle spread throughout the throng,
Which seem'd to hold all verse in detestation;
The angels had of course enough of song
When upon service; and the generation Of ghosts had heard too much in life, not long Before, to profit by a new occasion.
The monarch, mute till then, exclaim'd,
"What! what!
Pye come again? No more—no more of that!"
- 93 The tumult grew; an universal cough Convulsed the skies, as during a debate,
When Castlereagh has been up long enough (Before he was first minister of state, I mean—the slaves hear now), some cried
"Off! off!"
As at a farce, till, grown quite desperate,
The bard Saint Peter pray'd to interpose (Himself an author) only for his prose
- 94 The varlet was not an ill-favor'd knave,
A good deal like a vulture in the face,
With a hook nose and a hawk's eye, which gave A smart and sharper-looking sort of grace
To his whole aspect, which, though rather grave, Was by no means so ugly as his case,
But that, indeed, was hopeless as can be, Quite a poetic felony "de se"²
- 95 Then Michael blew his trumpet, and still'd the noise
With one still greater, as is yet the mode
On earth besides, except some grumbling voice, Which now and then will make a slight inroad Upon decorous silence, few will twice Lift up their lungs when fairly over-crow'd,
And now the bard could plead his own bad cause,
With all the attitudes of self-applause
- 96 He said (I only give the heads)—he said, He meant no harm in scribbling; 'twas his way Upon all topics; 'twas, besides, his bread,

 As it was once, but I would make you shine
 Like your own trumpet By the way, my
 own
 Has more of brass in it, and is as well blown.
- 101 "But talking about trumpets, here's my Vision"¹
 Now you shall judge all people, yes, you shall Judge with my judgment, and by my decision
 Be guided who shall enter heaven or fall.
 I settle all these things by intuition, Times present, past, to come, heaven, hell, and all,
 Like King Alphonso² When I thus see double,
 I save the Deity some worlds of trouble"
- 102 He ceased, and drew forth an MS; and no Persuasion on the part of devils, saints, Or angels, now could stop the torrent, so He read the first three lines of the contents,
 But at the fourth, the whole spiritual show
 Had vanish'd, with variety of scents, Ambrosial and sulphureous, as they sprang.
 Like lightning, off from his "melodious twang"³

 The angels stopp'd their ears and plied their pinions;

The devils ran howling, deafen'd, down to hell;

The ghosts fled, gibbering, for their own dominions

(For 'tis not yet decided where they dwell, And I leave every man to his opinions), Michael took refuge in his trump—but, lo!
His teeth were set on edge, he could not blow!

104 Saint Peter, who has hitherto been known For an impetuous saint, upraised his keys,

And at the fifth line knock'd the poet down,

Who fell like Phaeton, but more at ease,
Into his lake, for there he did not drown.

A different web being by the Destinies Woven for the Laureate's final wreath, whene'er

Reform shall happen either here or there

105 He first sank to the bottom—like his works, But soon rose to the surface—like himself;

For all corrupted things are buoy'd like corks,

By their own rottenness, light as an elf,
Or wisp that flits o'er a morass—he larks,
It may be, still, like dull books on a shelf,

In his own den, to scrawl some "Life" or "Vision,"

As Welborn says—"the devil turn'd precisian"

106 As for the rest, to come to the conclusion Of this true dream, the telescope is gone
Which kept my optics free from all delusion,

And show'd me what I in my turn have shown;

All I saw farther, in the last confusion,
Was, that King George shipp'd into heaven for one;

And when the tumult dwindled to a calm,
I left him practicing the hundredth psalm

STANZAS WRITTEN ON THE ROAD BETWEEN FLORENCE AND PISA
1821 1830

Oh, talk not to me of a name great in story;

The days of our youth are the days of our glory;

And the myrtle and ivy¹ of sweet two-and-twenty Are worth all your laurels, though ever so plenty.

5 What are garlands and crowns to the brow that is wrinkled?

'Tis but as a dead-flower with May-dew besprinkled

Then away with all such from the head that is hoary!

What care I for the wreaths that can only give glory!

Oh Fame!—if I e'er took delight in thy praises,

10 'Twas less for the sake of thy high-sounding phrases,

Than to see the bright eyes of the dear one discover,

She thought that I was not unworthy to love her.

There chiefly I sought thee, there only I found thee,

Her glance was the best of the rays that surround thee,

15 When it sparkled o'er aught that was bright in my story,

I knew it was love, and I felt it was glory

ON THIS DAY I COMPLETE MY THIRTY-SIXTH YEAR
1824 1824

'Tis time this heart should be unmoved, Since others it hath ceased to move Yet, though I cannot be beloved, Still let me love!

5 My days are in the yellow leaf,²
The flowers and fruits of love are gone;
The worm, the canker, and the grief
Are mine alone!

The fire that on my bosom preys 10 Is lone as some volcanic isle, No torch is kindled at its blaze—
A funeral pile.

The hope, the fear, the jealous care,
The exalted portion of the pain 15 And power of love, I cannot share, But wear the chain.

But 'tis not thus—and 'tis not here— Such thoughts should shake my soul, nor
now,

20 Where glory decks the hero's bier,
Or binds his brow.

The sword, the banner, and the field,
Glory and Greece, around me see!
The Spartan, borne upon his shield,¹
Was not more free.

25 Awake! (not Greece—she is awake!) Awake, my spirit! Think through whom Thy life-blood tracks its parent lake,²
And then strike home!

30 Tread those reviving passions down, Unworthy manhood!—unto thee Indifferent should the smile or frown Of beauty be.

If thou regrettest thy youth, why live?
The land of honorable death 35 Is here:—up to the field, and give Away thy breath!

Seek out—less often sought than found—A soldier's grave, for thee the best,
Then look around, and choose thy ground, 40 And take thy rest

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY (1792-1822)

QUEEN MAB
1812 1813

From SECTION II

If solitude hath ever led thy steps
To the wild ocean's echoing shore,
And thou hast lingered there, Until the sun's broad orb Seemed resting on the burnished wave, Thou must have marked the hues Of purple gold that motionless Hung o'er the sinking sphere.
Thou must have marked the billowy
clouds, 10 Edged with intolerable radiance, Towering like rocks of jet Crowned with a diamond wreath.
And yet there is a moment,
When the sun's highest point 15 Peeps like a star o'er ocean's western edge.
When those far clouds of feathery gold, Shaded with deepest purple, gleam Like islands on a dark blue sea;

¹ The killed or wounded Spartan was carried from the battle-field on his shield.

² Byron's mother was a descendant of James I; his father traced his ancestry to heroes of the time of the Norman Conquest

20 Then has thy fancy soared above the earth,
And furled its wearied wing Within the Fairy's fane.

Yet not the golden islands Gleaming in yon flood of light, Nor the feathery curtains 25 Stretching o'er the sun's bright couch, Nor the burnished ocean-waves Paving that gorgeous dome,
So fair, so wonderful a sight
As Mab's ethereal palace could afford 30 Yet likest evening's vault, that fairy Hall!
As Heaven, low resting on the wave, it spread

Its floors of flashing light,
Its vast and azure dome,
Its fertile golden islands 35 Floating on a silver sea, Whilst suns their mingling beamings darted Through clouds of circumambient darkness,
And pearly battlements around Looked o'er the immense of Heaven

40 The magic car no longer moved.
The Fairy and the Spirit
Entered the Hall of Spells Those golden clouds
That rolled in glittering billows 45 Beneath the azure canopy With the ethereal footsteps trembled not,
The light and crimson mists, Floating to strains of thrilling melody Through that unearthly dwelling.
50 Yielded to every movement of the will,
Upon their passive swell the Spirit leaned,
And, for the varied bliss that pressed around,

Used not the glorious privilege Of virtue and of wisdom

55 "Spirit!" the Fairy said,
And pointed to the gorgeous dome,
"This is a wondrous sight
And mocks all human grandeur,
But, were it virtue's only need to dwell 60 In a celestial palace, all resigned To pleasurable impulses, unmind Within the prison of itself, the will Of changeless Nature would be unfulfilled Learn to make others happy. Spirit, come!
65 This is thine high reward—the past shall
rise;

Thou shalt behold the present; I will teach The secrets of the future."

The Fairy and the Spirit Approached the overhanging battlement.— 70 Below lay stretched the universe!

There, far as the remotest line
 That bounds imagination's flight, Countless and unending orbs
 In mazy motion intermingled, 75 Yet still fulfilled immutably Eternal Nature's law
 Above, below, around,
 The circling systems formed A wilderness of harmony, 80 Each with undeviating aim, In eloquent silence, through the depths of space
 Pursued its wondrous way.

There was a little light That twinkled in the misty distance:
 None but a spirit's eye,
 Might ken that rolling orb;
 None but a spirit's eye
 And in no other place
 But that celestial dwelling, might behold 90 Each action of this earth's inhabitants But matter, space, and time
 In those aerial mansions cease to act,
 And all-prevailing wisdom, when it reaps
 The harvest of its excellence, o'erbounds 95 Those obstacles of which an earthly soul Fears to attempt the conquest

The Fairy pointed to the earth.
 The Spirit's intellectual eye
 Its kindred beings recognized.
 100 The thronging thousands, to a passing view,
 Seemed like an ant-hill's citizens How wonderful! that even The passions, prejudices, interests, That sway the meanest being—the weak
 105 That moves the finest nerve,
 And in one human brain Causes the faintest thought, becomes a link
 In the great chain of Nature!

"Spirit! ten thousand years Have scarcely passed away.
 Since, in the waste where now the savage drinks 185 His enemy's blood, and, aping Europe's sons,
 Wakes the unholy song of war,
 Arose a stately city,
 Metropolis of the western continent
 There, now, the mossy column-stone, 190 Indented by Time's unrelaxing grasp,
 Which once appeared to brave

All, save its country's ruin,— There the wide forest scene, Rude in the uncultivated loveliness 195 Of gardens long run wild,— Seems, to the unwilling sojourner, whose steps
 Chance in that desert has delayed, Thus to have stood since earth was what it is.
 Yet once it was the busiest haunt, 200 Whither, as to a common centre, flocked Strangers, and ships, and merchant-dise
 Once peace and freedom blessed
 The cultivated plain:
 But wealth, that curse of man, 205 Blighted the bud of its prosperity.
 Virtue and wisdom, truth and liberty, Fleed, to return not, until man shall know That they alone can give the bliss Worthy a soul that claims 210 Its kindred with eternity

"There's not one atom of yon earth
 But once was living man,
 Nor the minutest drop of rain,
 That hangeth in its thinnest cloud,
 But flowed in human veins,
 And from the burning plains Where Libyan monsters yell, From the most gloomy glens Of Greenland's sunless clime,
 To where the golden fields Of fertile England spread Their harvest to the day, Thou canst not find one spot Whereon no city stood

"How strange is human pride!
 225 I tell thee that those living things,
 To whom the fragile blade of grass,
 That springeth in the morn
 And perisheth ere noon,
 Is an unbounded world;
 I tell thee that those viewless beings,
 Whose mansion is the smallest particle
 Of the impassive atmosphere, Think, feel, and live like man; 235 That their affections and antipathies, Like his, produce the laws Ruling their moral state;
 And the minutest throb 240 That through their frame diffuses
 The slightest, faintest motion, Is fixed and indispensable
 As the majestic laws That rule yon rolling orbs."

From SECTION V

"Hence commerce springs, the venal interchange
 Of all that human art or Nature yield, 40 Which wealth should purchase not, but want demand,
 And natural kindness hasten to supply
 From the full fountain of its boundless
 love,
 Forever stifled, drained, and tainted now.
 'Commerce' beneath whose poison-breathing shade 45 No solitary virtue dares to spring,
 But poverty and wealth with equal hand Scatter then withering curses, and unfold
 The doors of premature and violent death
 To prung famine and full-fed disease, 50 To all that shares the lot of human life, Which, poisoned body and soul, scarce drags the chain
 That lengthens as it goes and clanks behind
 "Commerce has set the mark of selfishness,
 The signet of its all-enslaving power 55 Upon a shining ore, and called it gold Before whose image bow the vulgar
 great,
 The vainly rich, the miserable proud, The mob of peasants, nobles, priests, and
 kings,
 And with blind feelings reverence the
 power
 60 That grinds them to the dust of misery
 But in the temple of their hining hearts
 Gold is a living god, and rules in scorn
 All earthly things but virtue
 "Since tyrants, by the sale of human life, 65 Heap luxuries to their sensualism, and fame
 To their wide-wasting and insatiate pride, Success has sanctioned to a credulous world
 The ruin, the disgrace, the woe of war
 His hosts of blind and unresisting dupes 70 The despot numbers, from his cabinet These puppets of his schemes he moves at will,
 Even as the slaves by force or famine driven,
 Beneath a vulgar master, to perform A task of cold and brutal drudgery;— 75 Hardened to hope, insensible to fear, Scarce living pulleys of a dead machine,
 Mere wheels of work and articles of trade, That grace the proud and noisy pomp of wealth!

"The harmony and happiness of man 80 Yields to the wealth of nations, that which lifts
 His nature to the heaven of its pride,
 Is bartered for the poison of his soul,
 The weight that drags to earth his towering hopes,
 Blighting all prospect but of selfish gain, 85 Withering all passion but of slavish fear, Extinguishing all free and generous love Of enterprise and daring, even the pulse That fancy kindles in the beating heart To mingle with sensation, it despoils,— 90 Leaves nothing but the sordid lust of self,
 The grovelling hope of interest and gold, Unqualified, unmingled, unredeemed
 Even by hypocrisy.
 And statesmen boast Of wealth! The wordy eloquence, that lives
 95 After the ruin of their hearts, can gild
 The bitter poison of a nation's woe,
 Can turn the worship of the servile mob
 To their corrupt and glaring idol, fame.
 From virtue, trampled by its iron tread, 100 Although its dazzling pedestal be raised Amid the horrors of a limb-strewn field,
 With desolated dwellings smoking round
 The man of ease, who, by his warm fire-side,
 To deeds of charitable intercourse,
 And bare fulfilment of the common laws 105 Of decency and prejudice, confines
 The struggling nature of his human heart,
 Is duped by their cold sophistry, he sheds
 A passing tear perchance upon the wreck 110 Of earthly peace, when near his dwelling's
 door
 The frightful waves are driven,—when his son
 Is murdered by the tyrant, or religion Drives his wife raving mad But the poor
 man,
 Whose life is misery, and fear, and care; 115 Whom the morn wakens but to fruitless
 toil,
 Who ever hears his famished offspring's scream,
 Whom their pale mother's uncomplaining gaze Forever meets, and the proud rich man's eye
 Flashing command, and the heart-breaking
 scene
 120 Of thousands like himself;—he little heeds
 The rhetoric of tyranny, his hate Is quenchless as his wrongs, he laughs to scorn
 The vain and bitter mockery of words,

Feeling the horror of the tyrant's deeds, 125 And unrestrained but by the arm of power,
 That knows and dreads his enmity.

"The iron rod of penury still compels Her wretched slaves to bow the knee to 170
 wealth,

And poison, with unprofitable toil, 130 A life too void of solace to confirm The very chains that bind him to his doom Nature, impartial in munificence, Has gifted man with all-subduing will Matter, with all its transitory shapes, 135 Lies subjected and plastic at his feet, That, weak from bondage, tremble as they tread.

How many a rustic Milton has passed by.
 Stifling the speechless longings of his
 heart,

In unremitting drudgery and care!
 140 How many a vulgar Cato has compelled His energies, no longer tameless then.
 To mould a pin, or fabricate a nail!
 How many a Newton, to whose passive ken Those mighty spheres that gem infinity 145 Were only specks of dust, fixed in Heaven To light the midnights of his native town!

"Yet every heart contains perfection's germ."

The wisest of the sages of the earth,
 That e'er from the stores of reason drew 150 Science and truth, and virtue's dreadless tone,

Were but a weak and inexperienced boy,
 Proud, sensual, unimpassioned, unimbu'd With pure desire and universal love.
 Compared to that high being, of cloudless
 brain,

155 Untainted passion, elevated will, Which Death (who even would linger long
 in awe

Within his noble presence, and beneath His changeless eyebeam) might alone subdue

Him, every slave now dragging through the filth

160 Of some corrupted city his sad life.
 Pining with famine, swoln with luxury.
 Blunting the keenness of his spiritual
 sense

With narrow schemings and unworthy
 cares,

Or madly rushing through all violent crime,

165 To move the deep stagnation of his soul.—
 Might imitate and equal.

But mean lust Has bound its chains so tight about the
 earth,

That all within it but the virtuous man
 Is venal: gold or fame will surely reach
 The price prefixed by Selfishness, to all But him of resolute and unchanging
 will;

Whom, not the plaudits of a servile crowd,
 Nor the vile joys of tainting luxury,
 Can bribe to yield his elevated soul

175 To Tyranny or Falsehood, though they wield

With blood-red hand the sceptre of the world.

"There is a nobler glory, which survives 215 Until our being fades, and, solacing
 All human care, accompanies its change, Deserts not virtue in the dungeon's gloom,
 And, in the precincts of the palace, guides Its footsteps through that labyrinth of crime;

220 Imbues his lineaments with dauntlessness, Even when, from Power's avenging hand, he takes

Its sweetest, last, and noblest title—death, —The consciousness of good, which neither
 gold,

Nor sordid fame, nor hope of heavenly
 bliss

225 Can purchase, but a life of resolute good, Unalterable will, quenchless desire Of universal happiness, the heart That beats with it in unison, the brain Whose ever wakeful wisdom toils to change

Reason's rich stores for its eternal weal

"But hoary-headed Selfishness has felt 250 Its death-blow, and is tottering to the grave:

A brighter morn awaits the human day, When every transfer of earth's natural gifts

Shall be a commerce of good words and works;

When poverty and wealth, the thirst of fame,

275 The fear of infamy, disease and woe, War with its million horrors, and fierce
 hell

Shall live but in the memory of Time,
 Who, like a penitent libertine, shall start, Look back, and shudder at his younger
 years"

SECTION VIII

"The present and the past thou hast beheld:

It was a desolate sight. Now, Spirit, learn

The secrets of the future.—Time!

Unfold the brooding pinion of thy gloom.
5 Render thou up thy half-devoured babe,
And from the cradles of eternity,
Where millions he lulled to their portioned sleep

By the deep murmuring stream of passing things,

Tear thou that gloomy shroud—Spirit, behold

10 Thy glorious destiny!"

Joy to the Spirit came Through the wide rent in Time's eternal veil,

Hope was seen beaming through the mists of fear

Earth was no longer Hell, 15 Love, freedom, health, had given Their ripeness to the manhood of its prime,
And all its pulses beat Symphonious to the planetary spheres:¹

Then dulcet music swelled 20 Concordant with the life-strings of the soul;

It throbbed in sweet and languid beatings there,

Catching new life from transitory death,— Like the vague sighings of a wind at even,
That wakes the wavelets of the slumbering sea

25 And dies on the creation of its breath,
And sinks and rises, falls and swells by fits

Was the pure stream of feeling

That sprung from these sweet notes,

And o'er the Spirit's human sympathies 30 With mild and gentle motion calmly flowed

Joy to the Spirit came,—

Such joy as when a lover sees

The chosen of his soul in happiness,

And witnesses her peace

35 Whose woe to him were bitterer than death, Sees her unfaded cheek

Glow mantling in first luxury of health, Thrills with her lovely eyes,

Which like two stars amid the heaving main 40 Sparkle through liquid bliss.

¹ The ancients believed that the movement of the celestial spheres produced music

Then in her triumph spoke the Faery Queen:

"I will not call the ghost of ages gone To unfold the frightful secrets of its lore;
The present now is past,

45 And those events that desolate the earth
Have faded from the memory of Time, Who dares not give reality to that Whose being I annul. To me is given The wonders of the human world to keep,

50 Space, matter, time, and mind. Futurity Exposes now its treasure; let the sight Renew and strengthen all thy failing hope.
O human Spirit! spur thee to the goal Where virtue fixes universal peace,

55 And 'midst the ebb and flow of human things,

Show somewhat stable, somewhat certain still,

A lighthouse o'er the wild of dreary waves.

"The habitable earth is full of bliss,
Those wastes of frozen billows that were hurled

60 By everlasting snowstorms round the poles,

Where matter dared not vegetate or live,
But ceaseless frost round the vast solitude Bound its broad zone of stillness, are un-loosed,

And fragrant zephyrs there from spicy

65 Ruffle the placid ocean-deep, that rolls
Its broad, bright surges to the sloping sand,

Whose roar is wakened into echoes sweet
To murmur through the Heaven-breathing groves

And melodize with man's blest nature there.

70 "Those deserts of immeasurable sand, Whose age-collected fervors scarce allowed A bird to live, a blade of grass to spring, Where the shrill chirp of the green lizard's love

Broke on the sully silentness alone,

75 Now teem with countless rills and shady woods, Cornfields and pastures, and white cottages,

And where the startled wilderness beheld
A savage conqueror stained in kindred blood,

A tigress sat with the flesh of lambs

80 The unnatural famine of her toothless cubs,

Whilst shouts and howlings through the desert rang,

- Sloping and smooth the daisy-spangled ¹²⁰ lawn, Offering sweet incense to the sunrise, smiles
To see a babe before his mother's door, ⁸⁵ Sharing his morning's meal
With the green and golden basilisk¹ That comes to lick his feet.
- "Those trackless deeps, where many a weary sail
Has seen above the illimitable plain, ⁹⁰ Morning on night, and night on morning
rise,
Whilst still no land to greet the wanderer
spread
Its shadowy mountains on the sun-bright
sea,
Where the loud roarings of the tempest-waves
So long have mingled with the gusty wind ⁹⁵ In melancholy loneliness, and swept The desert of those ocean solitudes But vocal to the sea-bird's harrowing shriek,
The bellowing monster, and the rushing
storm,
Now to the sweet and many-mingling sounds ¹⁰⁰ Of kindest human impulses respond Those lonely realms bright garden-isles begem,
With lightsome clouds and shining seas
between,
And fertile valleys, resonant with bliss,
Whilst green woods overcanopy the wave, ¹⁰⁵ Which like a toil-worn laborer leaps to
shore,
To meet the kisses of the flow'rets there
- "All things are recreated, and the flame
Of simultaneous² love inspires all life
The fertile bosom of the earth gives suck ¹¹⁰ To myriads, who still grow beneath her
care,
Rewarding her with their pure perfectness
The balmy breathings of the wind inhale Her virtues, and diffuse them all abroad Health floats amid the gentle atmosphere.
¹¹⁵ Glows in the fruits, and mantles on the
stream.
No storms deform the beaming brow of
Heaven,
Nor scatter in the freshness of its pride
The foliage of the ever-verdant trees;
But fruits are ever ripe, flowers ever fair,
- And Autumn proudly bears her matron
grace,
Kindling a flush on the fair cheek of Spring,
Whose virgin bloom beneath the ruddy fruit
Reflects its tint, and blushes into love.
- "The lion now forgets to thirst for blood.
¹²⁵ There might you see him sporting in the
sun
Beside the dreadless kid,¹ his claws are sheathed,
His teeth are harmless, custom's force has
made
His nature as the nature of a lamb Like passion's fruit, the nightshade's tempting bane ¹³⁰ Poisons no more the pleasure it bestows.
All bitterness is past, the cup of joy Unmingled mantles to the goblet's brim,²
And courts the thirsty lips it fled before.
- "But chief, ambiguous man, he that can
know ¹³⁵ More misery, and dream more joy than all; Whose keen sensations thrill within his
breast
To mingle with a loftier instinct there, Lending their power to pleasure and to
pain,
Yet raising, sharpening, and refining each;
¹⁴⁰ Who stands amid the ever-varying world,
The burthen or the glory of the earth;
He chief perceives the change, his being notes
The gradual renovation, and defines Each movement of its progress on his mind.
- "Man, where the gloom of the long polar
night ¹⁴⁵ Lowers o'er the snow-clad rocks and frozen soil,
Where scarce the hardiest herb that braves the frost
Basks in the moonlight's ineffectual glow, Shrank with the plants, and darkened with the night, ¹⁵⁰ His chilled and narrow energies, his heart, Insensible to courage, truth, or love,
His stunted stature and imbecile frame, Marked him for some abortion of the earth, Fit compeer of the bears that roamed
around,
¹⁵⁵ Whose habits and enjoyments were his
own:

¹ A fabulous serpent, or lizard, whose breath or look was fatal

² harmonious

² See Psalms, 23 :5.

- His life a feverish dream of stagnant woe, Whose meagre wants, but scantily fulfilled, Apprised him ever of the joyless length Which his short being's wretchedness had reached, 160 His death a pang which famine, cold and toil
 Long on the mind, whilst yet the vital spark Clung to the body stubbornly, had brought All was inflicted here that Earth's revenge Could wreak on the infringers of her law; 165 One curse alone was spared—the name of God.
- "Nor where the tropics bound the realms of day
 With a broad belt of mingling cloud and
 flame,
 Where blue mists through the unmoving atmosphere
 Scattered the seeds of pestilence, and fed 170 Unnatural vegetation, where the land Teemed with all earthquake, tempest and disease,
 Was man a nobler being, slavery Had crushed him to his country's blood-stained dust,
 Or he was bartered for the fame of power, 175 Which, all internal impulses destroying, Makes human will an article of trade, Or he was changed with Christians for their gold,
 And dragged to distant isles, where to the sound
 Of the flesh-mangling scourge, he does the work 180 Of all-polluting luxury and wealth, Which doubly visits on the tyrants' heads
 The long-protracted fulness of their woe,
 Or he was led to legal butchery, To turn to worms beneath that burning
 sun,
 185 Where kings first leagued against the rights of men,
 And priests first traded with the name of God.¹
- "Even where the milder zone afforded
 man
 A seeming shelter, yet contagion there, Blighting his being with unnumbered ills, 190 Spread like a quenchless fire; nor truth till late Availed to arrest its progress, or create That peace which first in bloodless victory waved
- Her snowy standard o'er this favored
 clime:
 There man was long the train-bearer of slaves,
 195 The mimic of surrounding misery,
 The jackal of ambition's hon-rage,
 The bloodhound of religion's hungry zeal.
- "Here now the human being stands adorn-
 ing
 This loveliest earth with taintless body and mind, 200 Blessed from his birth with all bland impulses,
 Which gently in his noble bosom wake All kindly passions and all pure desires Him, still from hope to hope the bliss pursuing Which from the exhaustless lore of human weal 205 Dawns on the virtuous mind, the thoughts that rise
 In time-destroying infiniteness, gift
 With self-enshrined eternity, that mocks
 The unprevailing hoariness of age;
 And man, once fleeting o'er the transient
 scene
 210 Swift as an unremembered vision, stands Immortal upon earth no longer now He slays the lamb that looks him in the
 face,
 And horribly devours his mangled flesh, Which, still avenging Nature's broken
 law, 215 Kindled all putrid humors in his frame,
 All evil passions, and all vain belief, Hatred, despair, and loathing in his mind,
 The germs of misery, death, disease, and crime
 No longer now the winged habitants, 220 That in the woods their sweet lives sing
 away.
 Flee from the form of man, but gather
 round,
 And prime then sunny feathers on the
 hands
 Which little children stretch in friendly sport Towards these dreadless partners of their
 play 225 All things are void of terror Man has lost
 His terrible prerogative, and stands
 An equal amidst equals' happiness And science dawn, though late, upon the
 earth,
 Peace cheers the mind, health renovates
 the frame;
 230 Disease and pleasure cease to mingle here,

¹ In Africa, the source of the British slave trade

Reason and passion cease to combat there, Whilst each unfettered o'er the earth extend Their all-subduing energies, and wield
 The sceptre of a vast dominion there; 235 Whilst every shape and mode of matter lends
 Its force to the omnipotence of mind, Which from its dark mine drags the gem of truth
 To decorate its paradise of peace "

MUTABILITY
 1815 1816

We are as clouds that veil the midnight
 moon,
 How restlessly they speed, and gleam,
 and quiver,
 Streaking the darkness radiantly!—yet soon
 Night closes round, and they are lost forever

5 Or like forgotten lyres, whose dissonant strings Give various response to each varying
 blast,
 To whose frail frame no second motion brings
 One mood or modulation like the last

We rest—a dream has power to poison
 sleep,
 10 We rise—one wandering thought pollutes the day.
 We feel, conceive or reason, laugh or weep,
 Embrace fond woe, or cast our cares
 away

It is the same!—For, be it joy or sorrow,
 The path of its departure still is free 15 Man's yesterday may ne'er be like his morrow;
 Nought may endure but Mutability

TO _____ 1816 1816

Oh! there are spirits of the air,
 And genii of the evening breeze,
 And gentle ghosts, with eyes as fair
 As star-beams among twilight trees—5 Such lovely ministers to meet Oft hast thou turned from men thy lonely
 feet.

¹ This poem is thought to be addressed to Shelley's own spirit, although Mrs. Shelley states that it is addressed to Coleridge

With mountain winds, and babbling
 springs,
 And moonlight seas, that are the voice
 Of these inexplicable things, 10 Thou didst hold commune, and rejoice When they did answer thee; but they Cast, like a worthless boon, thy love away.

And thou hast sought in starry eyes Beams that were never meant for thine.
 15 Another's wealth:—fame sacrifice
 To a fond faith! still dost thou pine?
 Still dost thou hope that greeting hands, Voice, looks, or lips, may answer thy demands?

Ah! wherefore didst thou build thine hope 20 On the false earth's inconstancy?
 Did thine own mind afford no scope Of love, or moving thoughts to thee,
 That natural scenes or human smiles Could steal the power to wind thee in their wiles?

25 Yes, all the faithless smiles are fled Whose falsehood left thee broken-hearted;
 The glory of the moon is dead, Night's ghosts and dreams have now departed,
 Thine own soul still is true to thee, 30 But changed to a foul fiend through misery

This fiend, whose ghastly presence ever Beside thee like thy shadow hangs, Dream not to chase,—the mad endeavor Would scourge thee to severer pangs 35 Be as thou art Thy settled fate, Dark as it is, all change would aggravate

TO WORDSWORTH
 1815 1816

Poet of Nature, thou hast wept to know That things depart which never may return:
 Childhood and youth, friendship and love's first glow.
 Have fled like sweet dreams, leaving thee to mourn 5 These common woes I feel One loss is mine
 Which thou too feel'st, yet I alone deplore Thou wert as a lone star, whose light did
 shine
 On some frail bark in winter's midnight
 roar:
 Thou hast like to a rock-built refuge stood 10 Above the blind and battling multitude In honored poverty thy voice did weave

Songs consecrate to truth and liberty,— Deserting these, thou leavest me to grieve.
Thus having been, that thou shouldst cease
to be

FEELINGS OF A REPUBLICAN ON THE FALL OF BONAPARTE
1815 1816

I hated thee, fallen tyrant! I did groan
To think that a most unambitious slave, Like thou, shouldst dance and revel on the grave
Of Liberty Thou mightst have built thy
throne
5 Where it had stood even now thou didst prefer A frail and bloody pomp which Time has swept
In fragments towards oblivion Massacre For this I prayed, would on thy sleep have erept, Treason and Slavery, Rapine, Fear, and Lust,
10 And stifled thee, their minister I know Too late, since thou and France are in the dust,
That Virtue owns a more eternal foe Than Force or Fraud old Custom, legal Crime,
And bloody Faith the foulest birth of Time

ALASTOR¹

OR

THE SPIRIT OF SOLITUDE
1815 1816

Earth, Ocean, Air, beloved brotherhood!
If our great Mother² has imbued my soul With aught of natural piety to feel Your love, and recompense the boon with
mine, 5 If dewy morn, and odorous noon, and even,
With sunset and its gorgeous ministers,
And solemn midnight's tingling silentness,
If Autumn's hollow sighs in the sere wood,
And Winter robing with pure snow and crowns
10 Of starry ice the gray grass and bare boughs,
If Spring's voluptuous pantings when she breathes
Her first sweet kisses, have been dear to
me;
If no bright bird, insect, or gentle beast
I consciously have injured, but still loved

It is here made synonymous with the spirit of solitude

² Nature

15 And cherished these my kindred, then forgive
This boast, beloved brethren, and withdraw No portion of your wonted favor now!

Mother of this unfathomable world!
Favor my solemn song, for I have loved 20 Thee ever, and thee only, I have watched Thy shadow, and the darkness of thy steps,
And my heart ever gazes on the depth Of thy deep mysteries. I have made my bed
In charnels and on coffins,¹ where black
death 25 Keeps record of the trophies won from
thee,
Hoping to still these obstinate question-ings
Of thee and thine, by forcing some lone ghost,
Thy messenger, to render up the tale
Of what we are In lone and silent hours, 30 When night makes a weird sound of its own stillness,
Like an inspired and desperate alchemist Staking his very life on some dark hope, Have I mixed awful talk and asking looks With my most innocent love, until strange
tears
35 Unting with those breathless kisses, made Such magic as compels the charmed night To render up thy charge and, though ne'er yet
Thou hast unveiled thy inmost sanctuary, Enough from incommunicable dream, 40 And twilight phantasms, and deep noonday thought,
Has shone within me, that serenely now
And moveless, as a long-forgotten lyre Suspended in the solitary dome
Of some mysterious and deserted faun, 45 I wait thy breath, Great Parent, that my strain
May modulate with murmurs of the air,
And motions of the forests and the sea,
And voice of living beings, and woven hymns
Of night and day, and the deep heart of
man

50 There was a Poet whose untimely tomb No human hands with pious reverence reared,
But the charmed eddies of autumnal winds Built o'er his mouldering bones a pyramid Of mouldering leaves in the waste wilderness.—

¹ Shelley is said to have done this

- 55 A lovely youth,—no mourning, maiden decked
With weeping flowers, or votive cypress wreath,¹
The lone couch of his everlasting sleep — Gentle, and brave, and generous,—no lorn bard
Breathed o'er his dark fate one melodious sigh.
- 60 He lived, he died, he sung, in solitude Strangers have wept to hear his passionate notes,
And virgins, as unknown he passed, have pined
And wasted for fond love of his wild
eyes
The fire of those soft orbs has ceased to burn,
- 65 And Silence, too enamored of that voice.
Locks its mute music in her rugged cell

By solemn vision, and bright silver
dream,
His infancy was nurtured Every sight And sound from the vast earth and ambient air,
- 70 Sent to his heart its choicest impulses
The fountains of divine philosophy Fled not his thirsting lips, and all of great,
Or good, or lovely, which the sacred past In truth or fable consecrates, he felt
- 75 And knew When early youth had passed, he left His cold fireside and alienated home To seek strange truths in undiscovered lands
Many a wide waste and tangled wilderness Has lured his fearless steps; and he has bought
- 80 With his sweet voice and eyes, from savage
men,
His rest and food Nature's most secret steps
He like her shadow has pursued, where'er
The red volcano overcanopies Its fields of snow and pinnacles of ice
- 85 With burning smoke, or where bitumen lakes
On black bare pointed islets ever beat With sluggish surge, or where the secret caves Rugged and dark, winding among the
springs
Of fire and poison, inaccessible
- 90 To avarice or pride, their starry domes
Of diamond and of gold expand above Numberless and immeasurable halls,
- 100 Frequent¹ with crystal column, and clear shrines
Of pearl, and thrones radiant with chryso-lite.
Nor had that scene of ampler majesty Than gems or gold, the varying roof of
heaven
And the green earth, lost in his heart its claims To love and wonder, he would linger long In lonesome vales, making the wild his
home,
Until the doves and squirrels would partake
From his innocuous hand his bloodless
food,
Lured by the gentle meaning of his looks.
And the wild antelope, that starts whene'er
The dry leaf rustles in the brake,² suspend
Her timid steps to gaze upon a form More graceful than her own
- 105 His wandering step Obedient to high thoughts, has visited The awful ruins of the days of old Athens, and Tyre, and Balbec, and the waste
Where stood Jerusalem, the fallen towers
Of Babylon, the eternal pyramids, Memphis and Thebes, and whatsoever of
strange,
Sculptured on alabaster obelisk,
Or jasper tomb, or mutilated sphinx,
- 110 Dark Æthiopia in her desert hills Conceals Among the ruined temples
there,
Stupendous columns, and wild images Of more than man, where marble dæ-mons³ watch
The Zodiac's brazen mystery,⁴ and dead
men
- 115 Hang their mute thoughts on the mute walls around,
He lingered, poring on memorials Of the world's youth, through the long burning day Gazed on those speechless shapes, not, when the moon
Filled the mysterious halls with floating shades
- 120 Suspended he that task, but ever gazed
- 125 crowded, thronged thicket Supernatural beings of Greek mythology conceived as holding a position between gods and
men.
Mythological figures arranged in the fashion of the zodiac, on the walls, columns, etc. of the temple of Denderah, a city in Upper Egypt.

¹ The cypress is an emblem of mourning, it is a common tree in graveyards

- And gazed, till meaning on his vacant
mind Flashed like strong inspiration, and he saw
The thrilling secrets of the birth of time.
- Meanwhile an Arab maiden brought his food, 130 Her daily portion, from her father's tent,
And spread her matting for his couch, and stole
From duties and repose to tend his steps—
Enamored, yet not daring for deep awe To speak her love—and watched his nightly
sleep,
135 Sleepless herself, to gaze upon his lips Parted in slumber, whence the regular
breath
Of innocent dreams arose; then, when red morn
Made paler the pale moon, to her cold
home
Wildered, and wan, and panting, she returned
- 140 The Poet, wandering on, through Arabia And Persia, and the wild Carmanian
waste,
And o'er the aerial mountains which pour
down
Indus and Oxus from their icy caves,
In joy and exultation held his way, 145 Till in the vale of Cashmere, far within Its loneliest dell, where odorous plants entwine
Beneath the hollow rocks a natural bower, Beside a sparkling rivulet he stretched His languid limbs. A vision on his sleep 150 There came, a dream of hopes that never yet Had flushed his cheek. He dreamed a veiled maid Sat near him, talking in low solemn tones.
Her voice was like the voice of his own
soul
Heard in the calm of thought, its music
long, 155 Like woven sounds of streams and breezes, held
His inmost sense suspended in its web
Of many-colored woof and shifting hues.
Knowledge and truth and virtue were her theme,
And lofty hopes of divine liberty, 160 Thoughts the most dear to him, and poesy, Herself a poet. Soon the solemn mood
- Of her pure mind kindled through all her frame
A permeating fire. wild numbers then She raised, with voice stifled in tremulous sobs
165 Subdued by its own pathos her fan hands Were bare alone, sweeping from some strange harp
Strange symphony, and in their branching veins
The eloquent blood told an ineffable tale The beating of her heart was heard to fill 170 The pauses of her music, and her breath Tumultuously accorded with those fits Of intermitted song. Sudden she rose,
As if her heart impatiently endured Its bursting burthen at the sound he turned,
175 And saw by the warm light of their own life
Her glowing limbs beneath the sinuous veil
Of woven wind, her outspread arms now bare,
Her dark locks floating in the breath of
night,
Her beamy bending eyes, her parted lips 180 Outstretched, and pale, and quivering eagerly His strong heart sunk and sickened with excess
Of love. He reared his shuddering limbs and quelled
His gasping breath, and spread his arms
to meet
Her panting bosom she drew back awhile, 185 Then, yielding to the irresistible joy, With frantic gesture and short breathless
cry
Folded his frame in her dissolving arms Now blackness veiled his dizzy eyes, and
night
Involved and swallowed up the vision;
sleep,
190 Like a dark flood suspended in its course, Rolled back its impulse on his vacant
brain
- Roused by the shock he started from his trance—
The cold white light of morning, the blue
moon
Low in the west, the clear and garish hills, 195 The distinct valley and the vacant woods, Spread round him where he stood Whither have fled
The hues of heaven that canopied his bower

- Of yesternight? The sounds that soothed ²³⁵ his sleep,
 The mystery and the majesty of Earth, ²⁰⁰ The joy, the exultation? His wan eyes Gaze on the empty scene as vacantly As ocean's moon looks on the moon in
 heaven
 The spirit of sweet human love has sent A vision of the sleep of him who spurned ²⁰⁵ Her choicest gifts He eagerly pursues Beyond the realms of dream that fleeting shade,
 He overleaps the bounds Alas! Alas!
 Were limbs, and breath, and being intertwined
 Thus treacherously? Lost, lost, forever
 lost,
²¹⁰ In the wide pathless desert of dim sleep, That beautiful shape! Does the dark gate of death
 Conduct to thy mysterious paradise, O Sleep? Does the bright arch of rainbow clouds
 And pendent mountains seen in the calm lake ²¹⁵ Lead only to a black and watery depth, While death's blue vault, with loathliest vapors hung,
 Where every shade which the foul grave exhales
 Hides its dead eye from the detested day, Conducts, O Sleep, to thy delightful
 realms?
²²⁰ This doubt with sudden tide flowed on his
 heart;
 The insatiate hope which it awakened, stung
 His brain even like despair
- While daylight held
 The sky, the Poet kept mute conference With his still soul At night the passion
 came, ²²⁵ Like the fierce fiend of a daimonized
 dream,
 And shook him from his rest, and led him
 forth
 Into the darkness.—As an eagle grasped In folds of the green serpent, feels her
 breast
 Burn with the poison, and precipitates ²³⁰ Through night and day, tempest, and calm, and cloud, Frantic with dizzying anguish, her blind flight
 O'er the wide aery wilderness, thus driven By the bright shadow of that lovely dream, Beneath the cold glare of the desolate
 night,
- Through tangled swamps and deep precipitous dells, Startling with careless step the moonlight
 snake,
 He fled, Red morning dawned upon his flight,
 Shedding the mockery of its vital hues Upon his cheek of death He wandered on ²⁴⁰ Till vast Aornos seen from Petra's steep Hung o'er the low horizon like a cloud, Through Balk, and where the desolated tombs
 Of Parthian kings scatter to every wind Their wasting dust,¹ wildly he wandered
 on,
²⁴⁵ Day after day a weary waste of hours, Bearing within his life the brooding care
 That ever fed on its decaying flame.
 And now his limbs were lean; his scattered hair,
 Sere by the autumn of strange suffering, ²⁵⁰ Sung diges in the wind, his listless hand Hung like dead bone within its withered
 skin,
 Life, and the lustre that consumed it,
 shone,
 As in a furnace burning secretly,
 From his dark eyes alone The cottagers, ²⁵⁵ Who ministered with human charity His human wants, beheld with wondering awe
 Their fleeting visitant The mountaineer, Encountering on some dizzy precipice That spectral form, deemed that the Spirit of Wind ²⁶⁰ With lightning eyes, and eager breath, and feet Disturbing not the drifted snow had paused
 In its career the infant would conceal His troubled visage in his mother's robe
 In terror at the glare of those wild eyes, ²⁶⁵ To remember their strange light in many a dream
 Of aftertimes; but youthful maidens, taught
 By nature, would interpret half the woe That wasted him, would call him with false names
 Brother, and friend, would press his pallid
 hand
²⁷⁰ At parting, and watch, dim through tears, the path
 Of his departure from their father's door
- At length upon the lone Chorasmian
 shore
 He paused, a wide and melancholy waste ¹ At Arhela a city in Assyria

- Of putrid marshes. A strong impulse urged 375 His steps to the sea-shore. A swan was
there,
Beside a sluggish stream among the reeds.
It rose as he approached, and, with strong
wings
Scaling the upward sky, bent its bright
course
High over the immeasurable main 280 His eyes pursued its flight—"Thou hast a home,
Beautiful bird; thou voyagest to thine
home,
Where thy sweet mate will twine her downy neck
With thine, and welcome thy return with
eyes
Bright in the lustre of their own fond joy.
285 And what am I that I should linger here, With voice far sweeter than thy dying notes,¹ Spirit more vast than thine, frame more attuned To beauty, wasting these surpassing powers
In the deaf air, to the blind earth, and
heaven
290 That echoes not my thoughts?" A gloomy smile
(Of desperate hope wrinkled his quivering lips
For sleep, he knew, kept most relentlessly Its precious charge, and silent death exposed, Faithless perhaps as sleep, a shadowy lure.
295 With doubtful smile mocking its own strange chains
- Startled by his own thoughts, he looked around.
There was no fair fiend near him, not a
sight
Or sound of awe but in his own deep mind.
A little shallop floating near the shore 300 Caught the impatient wandering of his gaze.
It had been long abandoned, for its sides Gaped wide with many a rift, and its frail joints
Swayed with the undulations of the tide
A restless impulse urged him to embark 305 And meet lone Death on the drear ocean's waste.
For well he knew that mighty Shadow loves
The slimy caverns of the populous deep
- The day was fair and sunny, sea and sky Drank its inspiring radiance, and the wind 310 Swept strongly from the shore, blackening the waves.
Following his eager soul, the wanderer Leaped in the boat; he spread his cloak aloft
On the bare mast, and took his lonely seat,
And felt the boat speed o'er the tranquil
sea
315 Like a torn cloud before the hurricane
- As one that in a silver vision floats Obedient to the sweep of odorous winds Upon resplendent clouds, so rapidly Along the dark and ruffled waters fled 320 The straining boat. A whirlwind swept it on,
With fierce gusts and precipitating force.
Through the white ridges of the chafed sea
The waves arose Higher and higher still Their fierce necks writhed beneath the tempest's scourge 325 Like serpents struggling in a vulture's grasp
Calm and rejoicing in the fearful war Of wave running on wave, and blast on blast
Descending, and black flood on whirlpool driven
With dark obliterating course, he saw 330 As if their genn were the ministers Appointed to conduct him to the light Of those beloved eyes, the Poet safe, Holding the steady helm Evening came on,
The beams of sunset hung then rainbow hues
335 High 'mid the shifting domes of sheeted spray
That canopied his path o'er the waste
deep,
Twilight, ascending slowly from the east, Entwined in dusker wreaths her braided locks
O'er the fair front and radiant eyes of
Day; 340 Night followed, clad with stars On every side
More horribly the multitudinous streams Of ocean's mountainous waste to mutual war Rushed in dark tumult thundering, as to mock
The calm and spangled sky The little boat 345 Still fled before the storm; still fled, like foam
Down the steep cataract of a wintry river;

¹ The swan was said to sing melodiously when about to die

- Now pausing on the edge of the riven
wave;
Now leaving far behind the bursting mass
That fell, convulsing ocean: safely fled—350 As if that frail and wasted human form, Had been an elemental god
- At midnight
- The moon arose: and lo! the ethereal cliffs
Of Caucasus, whose icy summits shone Among the stars like sunlight, and around 355 Whose caverned base the whirlpools and
the waves
Bursting and eddying irresistibly Rage and resound forever—Who shall save?— The boat fled on,—the boiling torrent drove,—
The crags closed round with black and jagged arms, 360 The shattered mountain overhung the sea,
And faster still, beyond all human speed, Suspended on the sweep of the smooth
wave,
The little boat was driven A cavern there Yawned, and amid its slant and winding depths 365 Ingulfed the rushing sea The boat fled
on
With unrelaxing speed—"Vision and
Love!"
The Poet cried aloud, "I have beheld The path of thy departure Sleep and
death
Shall not divide us long!"
- The boat pursued
- 370 The windings of the cavern. Daylight
shone
At length upon that gloomy river's flow, Now, where the fiercest war among the waves
Is calm, on the unfathomable stream The boat moved slowly. Where the mountain, riven, 375 Exposed those black depths to the azure
sky,
Ere yet the flood's enormous volume fell Even to the base of Caucasus, with sound That shook the everlasting rocks, the mass Filled with one whirlpool all that ample chasm;
380 Stair above stair the eddying waters rose, Circling immeasurably fast, and laved
With alternating dash the gnarled roots Of mighty trees, that stretched their giant arms
In darkness over it. I' the midst was left, 385 Reflecting, yet distorting every cloud,
- A pool of treacherous and tremendous calm.
Seized by the sway of the ascending
stream,
With dizzy swiftness, round, and round,
and round,
Ridge after ridge the straining boat arose, 390 Till on the verge of the extreme curve, Where, through an opening of the rocky bank,
The waters overflow, and a smooth spot
Of glassy quiet mid those battling tides Is left, the boat paused shuddering—Shall it sink 395 Down the abyss? Shall the reverting stress
Of that restless gulf embosom it?
Now shall it fall?—A wandering stream of wind,
Breathed from the west, has caught the expanded sail,
And, lo! with gentle motion, between banks 400 Of mossy slope, and on a placid stream, Beneath a woven grove it sails, and, hark!
The ghastly torrent mingles its far roar,
With the breeze murmuring in the musical woods.
Where the embowering trees recede, and
leave 405 A little space of green expanse, the cove Is closed by meeting banks, whose yellow
flowers
Forever gaze on their own drooping eyes, Reflected in the crystal calm. The wave Of the boat's motion marred their pensive task, 410 Which nought but vagrant bird, or wanton
wind,
Or falling spear-grass, or their own decay Had e'er disturbed before. The Poet longed To deck with their bright hues his withered
hair,
But on his heart its solitude returned, 415 And he forbore. Not the strong impulse hid
In those flushed cheeks, bent eyes, and shadowy frame
Had yet performed its ministry: it hung Upon his life, as lightning in a cloud Gleams, hovering ere it vanish, ere the floods
420 Of night close over it.
- The noonday sun
- Now shone upon the forest, one vast mass Of mingling shade, whose brown magnificence

- A narrow vale embosoms. There, huge ⁴⁶⁰ And each depending leaf, and every speck

 And dark the shades accumulate Their own wan light through the reflected Embraces the light beech The pyramids Of that still fountain, as the human heart, Of the tall cedar overarching, frame Gazing in dreams over the gloomy grave,

⁴⁵⁵ Silence and Twilight here, twin-sisters, Obedient to the light keep That shone within his soul, he went, pur-Their noonday watch, and sail among the suing shades, The windings of the dell.—The rivulet Like vaporous shapes half-seen; beyond, a ⁴⁹⁵ Wanton and wild, through many a green well, ravine Dark, gleaming, and of most translucent Beneath the forest flowed. Sometimes it wave, fell Images all the woven boughs above, Among the moss with hollow harmony Dark and profound Now on the polished ¹ interwoven stones

- It danced, like childhood laughing as it
went:
500 Then, through the plain in tranquil wanderings crept,
Reflecting every herd and drooping bud
That overhung its quietness.—“O stream!
Whose source is inaccessible profound, Whither do thy mysterious waters tend?
505 Thou imagest my life Thy darksome still-
ness,
Thy dazzling waves, thy loud and hollow
gulfs,
Thy searchless fountain, and invisible
course
Have each their type in me: and the wide
sky,
And measureless ocean may declare as soon 510 What oozy cavern or what wandering cloud Contains thy waters, as the universe Tell where these living thoughts reside, when stretched Upon thy flowers my bloodless limbs shall waste
I’ the passing wind!”
- Beside the grassy shore 515 Of the small stream he went, he did impress
On the green moss his tremulous step, that caught
Strong shuddering from his burning limbs
As one Roused by some joyous madness from the couch
Of fever, he did move; yet, not like
him, 520 Forgetful of the grave, where, when the flame
Of his frail exultation shall be spent, He must descend With rapid steps he
went Beneath the shade of trees, beside the flow Of the wild babbling rivulet; and now 525 The forest’s solemn canopies were changed For the uniform and lightsome evening
sky
Gray rocks did peep from the spare moss, and stemmed
The struggling brook tall spires of windlestrae¹
Threw their thin shadows down the rugged slope,
530 And nought but gnarled roots of ancient pines Branchless and blasted, clenched with grasping roots
The unwilling soil. A gradual change was
here,
- Yet ghastly For, as fast years flow away,
The smooth brow gathers, and the hair grows thin 535 And white, and where irradiate dewy eyes Had shone, gleam stony orbs—so from his steps Bright flowers departed, and the beautiful
shade
Of the green groves, with all their odorous winds
And musical motions. Calm, he still pursued 540 The stream, that with a larger volume
now Rolled through the labyrinthine dell; and
there Fretted a path through its descending curves
With its wintry speed. On every side now
rose
Rocks, which, in unimaginable forms, 545 Lifted their black and barren pinnacles
In the light of evening, and, its precipice Obscuring the ravine, disclosed above, Mid toppling stones, black gulfs and yawning caves,
Whose windings gave ten thousand various tongues 550 To the loud stream Lo’ where the pass expands
Its stony jaws, the abrupt mountain breaks,
And seems, with its accumulated crags,
To overhang the world for wide expand Beneath the wan stars and descending
moon
555 Islanded seas, blue mountains, mighty streams,
Dim tracts and vast, robed in the lustrous gloom
Of leaden-colored even, and fiery hills Mingling their flames with twilight, on the verge
Of the remote horizon The near scene, 560 In naked and severe simplicity, Made contrast with the universe A pine Rock-rooted, stretched athwart the vacancy Its swinging boughs, to each inconstant blast
Yielding one only response, at each pause 565 In most familiar cadence, with the howl
The thunder and the hiss of homeless
streams
Mingling its solemn song, whilst the broad river,
Foaming and hurrying o’er its rugged path,
Fell into that immeasurable void 570 Scattering its waters to the passing winds.

¹ A grass stalk used for making ropes

- Yet the gray precipice and solemn pine And torrent were not all;—one silent nook Was there. Even on the edge of that vast mountain,
Upheld by knotty roots and fallen rocks, 575 It overlooked in its serenity The dark earth, and the bending vault of stars
It was a tranquil spot, that seemed to smile Even in the lap of horror. Ivy clasped
The fissured stones with its entwining arms, 580 And did embower with leaves forever green, And berries dark, the smooth and even space
Of its inviolated floor; and here
The children of the autumnal whirlwind
bore,
In wanton sport, those bright leaves whose decay,
585 Red, yellow, or ethereally pale, Rivals the pride of summer. 'Tis the haunt Of every gentle wind, whose breath can teach
The wilds to love tranquillity One step,
One human step alone, has ever broken 590 The stillness of its solitude—one voice Alone inspired its echoes,—even that voice Which hither came, floating among the
winds,
And led the loveliest among human forms
To make their wild haunts the depository 595 Of all the grace and beauty that endured Its motions, render up its majesty.
Scatter its music on the unfeeling storm,
And to the damp leaves and blue cavern
mould,
Nurses of rainbow flowers, and branching moss,
600 Commit the colors of that varving cheek.
That snowy breast, those dark and drooping eyes
- The dun and horned moon hung low, and poured
A sea of lustre on the horizon's verge That overflowed its mountains. Yellow mist 605 Filled the unbounded atmosphere, and drank
Wan moonlight even to fulness: not a star Shone, not a sound was heard, the very
winds,
Danger's grim playmates, on that precipice Slept, clasped in his embrace.—O, storm of
death!
610 Whose sightless speed divides this sullen
night
And thou, colossal Skeleton,¹ that, still ¹ Death
- Guiding its irresistible career
In thy devastating omnipotence, Art king of this frail world, from the red field 615 Of slaughter, from the reeking hospital,
The patriot's sacred couch, the snowy bed
Of innocence, the scaffold and the throne,
A mighty voice invokes thee. Ruin calls His brother Death. A rare and regal prey 620 He hath prepared, prowling around the world;
Glutted with which thou mayst repose, and
men
Go to their graves like flowers or creeping worms,
Nor ever more offer at thy dark shrine
The unheeded tribute of a broken heart.
- 625 When on the threshold of the green recess
The wanderer's footsteps fell, he knew that death
Was on him. Yet a little, ere it fled, Did he resign his high and holy soul
To images of the majestic past, 630 That paused within his passive being now, Like winds that bear sweet music, when they breathe Through some dim latticed chamber. He did place
His pale lean hand upon the rugged trunk
Of the old pine. Upon an ivied stone 635 Reclined his languid head; his limbs did rest,
Diffused and motionless, on the smooth
brink
Of that obscurest chasm,—and thus he lay, Surrendering to their final impulses The hovering powers of life Hope and Despair,
640 The torturers, slept; no mortal pain or fear
Maired his repose, the influxes of sense,
And his own being unalloyed by pain,
Yet feeble and more feeble, calmly fed The stream of thought, till he lay breathing
there 645 At peace, and faintly smiling His last sight
Was the great moon, which o'er the western line
Of the wide world her mighty horn suspended,
With whose dun beams inwoven darkness seemed
To mingle Now upon the jagged hills 650 It rests, and still as the divided frame Of the vast meteor sunk, the Poet's blood, That ever beat in mystic sympathy

- With Nature's ebb and flow, grew feebler still:
And when two lessening points of light alone 655 Gleamed through the darkness, the alternate gasp
Of his faint respiration scarce did stir
The stagnate night—fill the minutest ray Was quenched, the pulse yet lingered in his heart.
It paused—it fluttered But when heaven remained 660 Utterly black, the murky shades involved An image, silent, cold, and motionless,
As their own voiceless earth and vacant air Even as a vapor fed with golden beams That ministered on sunlight, ere the west 665 Eclipses it, was now that wondrous frame—
No sense, no motion, no divinity—
A fragile lute, on whose harmonious strings
The breath of heaven did wander—a bright stream Once fed with many-voiced waves—a dream 670 Of youth, which night and time have quenched forever—Still, dark, and dry, and unremembered now.
- Oh, for Medea's wondrous alchemy, Which wheresoe'er it fell made the earth gleam With bright flowers, and the wintry boughs exhale 675 From vernal blooms fresh fragrance! Oh, that God, Profuse of poisons, would concede the chalice¹
Which but one living man has drained,² who now, Vessel of deathless wrath,³ a slave that feels No proud exemption in the blighting curse 680 He bears, over the world wanders forever, Lone as incarnate death! Oh, that the dream⁴
Of dark magician in his visioned cave, Raking the cinders of a crucible
For life and power, even when his feeble hand 685 Shakes in its last decay, were the true law Of this so lovely world! But thou art fled Like some frail exhalation, which the dawn
- Robes in its golden beams,—ah! thou hast fled!
The brave, the gentle, and the beautiful, 690 The child of grace and genius. Heartless things Are done and said i' the world, and many worms
And beasts and men live on, and mighty Earth From sea and mountain, city and wilderness,
In vesper low or joyous orison, 695 Lifts still its solemn voice:—but thou art fled—Thou canst no longer know or love the shapes
Of this phantasmal scene, who have to thee
Been purest ministers, who are, alas!
Now thou art not. Upon those pallid lips 700 So sweet even in their silence, on those eyes, That image sleep in death, upon that form Yet safe from the worm's outrage, let no tear Be shed—not even in thought. Nor, when those hues Are gone, and those divinest lineaments, 705 Worn by the senseless wind, shall live alone In the frail pauses of this simple strain, Let not high verse, mourning the memory Of that which is no more, or painting's woe Or sculpture, speak in feeble imagery 710 Their own cold powers Art and eloquence,
And all the shows o' the world, are frail and vain
To weep a loss that turns their lights to shade
It is a woe too "deep for tears,"⁵ when all Is reft at once, when some surpassing Spirit, 715 Whose light adorned the world around it, leaves
Those who remain behind, not sob or groans,
The passionate tumult of a clinging hope;
But pale despair and cold tranquillity,
Nature's vast frame, the web of human things, 720 Birth and the grave, that are not as they were.

HYMN TO INTELLECTUAL BEAUTY 1816 1817

The awful shadow of some unseen Power Floats though unseen among us, visiting This various world with as inconstant wing

¹ That is, of immortality

² A Jew who refused to allow Christ to rest at his house on the way to Calvary, and was therefore condemned to wander upon earth until Christ's second coming For a full account of the widespread legend of the Wandering Jew, see The Encyclopedia Britannica (11th ed.).

⁴ Of immortal youth

⁵ Wordsworth Ode; Intimations of Immortality, 204 (p. 307)

As summer winds that creep from flower to flower;

- 5 Like moonbeams that behind some piny mountain shower,
It visits with inconstant glance
Each human heart and countenance, Like hues and harmonies of evening,— Like clouds in starlight widely spread,— 10 Like memory of music fled,— Like aught that for its grace may be Dear, and yet dearer for its mystery.

Spirit of Beauty, that dost consecrate With thine own hues all thou dost shine upon

- 15 Of human thought or form, where art thou gone?
Why dost thou pass away and leave our state,
This dim vast vale of tears, vacant and desolate?
Ask why the sunlight not forever Weaves rainbows o'er yon mountain-river; 20 Why aught should fail and fade that once is shown;
Why fear and dream and death and birth Cast on the daylight of this earth
Such gloom, why man has such a scope For love and hate, despondency and hope?

- 25 No voice from some sublimer world hath ever To sage or poet these responses¹ given; Therefore the names of Demon,² Ghost,
and Heaven,
Remain the records of their vain endeavor—Frail spells, whose uttered charm might not avail to sever, 30 From all we hear and all we see,
Doubt, chance, and mutability Thy light alone, like mist o'er mountains driven,
Or music by the night wind sent Through strings of some still instrument, 35 Or moonlight on a midnight stream, Gives grace and truth to life's unquiet dream.

Love, Hope, and Self-esteem, like clouds depart

² A supernatural being of Greek mythology conceived as holding a position between gods and men

And come, for some uncertain moments lent

- Man were immortal, and omnipotent, 40 Didst thou, unknown and awful as thou art, Keep with thy glorious tram firm state within his heart Thou messenger of sympathies That wax and wane in lovers' eyes—Thou, that to human thought art nourishment, 45 Like darkness to a dying flame, Depart not as thy shadow came!
Depart not, lest the grave should be,
Like life and fear, a dark reality.

While yet a boy I sought for ghosts, and sped

- 50 Through many a listening chamber, cave and ruin,
And starlight wood, with fearful steps pursuing Hopes of high talk with the departed dead
I called on poisonous names with which our youth is fed,
I was not heard—I saw them not—55 When, musing deeply on the lot Of life, at that sweet time when winds are wooing
All vital things that wake to bring News of birds and blossoming,— Sudden, thy shadow fell on me, 60 I shrieked, and clasped my hands in ecstasy!

I vowed that I would dedicate my powers To thee and thine—have I not kept the vow?

With beating heart and streaming eyes,
even now

I call the phantoms of a thousand hours

- 65 Each from his voiceless grave: they have in visioned bowers
Of studious zeal or love's delight Outwatched with me the envious night—
They know that never joy illumed my brow Unlinked with hope that thou wouldst free

- 70 This world from its dark slavery,— That thou, O awful Loveliness, Wouldst give whatever these words cannot express.

The day becomes more solemn and serene When noon is past; there is a harmony 75 In autumn, and a lustre in its sky,
Which through the summer is not heard or seen,

As if it could not be, as if it had not been!
Thus let thy power, which like the truth

Of nature on my passive youth 80 Descended, to my onward life supply Its calm—to one who worships thee,
And every form containing thee,
Whom, Spirit fair, thy spells did bind
To fear himself, and love all human kind

MONT BLANC

LINES WRITTEN IN THE VALE OF CHAMOUNI
1816 1817

The everlasting universe of things
Flows through the mind, and rolls its rapid waves, Now dark—now glittering—now reflecting gloom—
Now lending splendor, where from secret springs 5 The source of human thought its tribute brings Of waters,—with a sound but half its own, Such as a feeble brook will oft assume In the wild woods, among the mountains lone,
Where waterfalls around it leap forever, 10 Where woods and winds contend, and a vast river Over its rocks ceaselessly bursts and raves

Thus thou, Ravine of Aïve—dark, deep Ravine—Thou many-colored, many-voiced vale,
Over whose pines, and crags, and caverns sail 15 Fast cloud-shadows and sunbeams awful scene.
Where Power in likeness of the Aïve comes down From the ice-gulfs that gird his secret throne, Bursting through these dark mountains like the flame
Of lightning through the tempest! thou dost lie,— 20 Thy giant brood of pines around thee clinging, Children of elder time, in whose devotion
The chainless winds still come and ever came To drink their odors, and their mighty swinging
To hear—an old and solemn harmony; 25 Thine earthly rainbows stretched across the sweep Of the ethereal waterfall, whose veil

Robes some unsculptured image; the strange sleep
Which when the voices of the desert fail Wraps all in its own deep eternity,— 30 Thy caverns echoing to the Arve's commotion, A loud, lone sound no other sound can tame;
Thou art pervaded with that ceaseless motion, Thou art the path of that unresting sound, Dizzy Ravine! and when I gaze on thee 35 I seem as in a trance sublime and strange To muse on my own separate fantasy,
My own, my human mind, which passively
Now renders and receives fast influencings, Holding an unremitting interchange 40 With the clear universe of things around,
One legion of wild thoughts, whose wandering wings
Now float above thy darkness, and now rest Where that or thou art no unbidden guest,
In the still cave of the witch Poesy, 45 Seeking among the shadows that pass by—Ghosts of all things that are—some shade of thee,
Some phantom, some faint image, till the breast
From which they fled recalls them, thou art there!

Some say that gleams of a remoter world 50 Visit the soul in sleep,—that death is slumber,
And that its shapes the busy thoughts outnumber
Of those who wake and live.—I look on high,
Has some unknown Omnipotence unfurled
The veil of life and death? or do I lie 55 In dream, and does the mightier world of sleep Spread far around and inaccessible Its circles? For the very spirit fails, Driven like a homeless cloud from steep to steep
That vanishes among the viewless gales!
60 Far, far above, piercing the infinite sky, Mont Blanc appears,—still, snowy, and serene—Its subject mountains then underneath forms Pile around it, ice and rock; broad vales between Of frozen floods, unfathomable deeps, 65 Blue as the overhanging heaven, that spread And wind among the accumulated steeps, A desert peopled by the storms alone

- Save when the eagle brings some hunter's bone,
And the wolf tracks her there. How hideously 70 Its shapes are heaped around! rude, bare, and high,
Ghastly, and scared, and riven.—Is this the scene
Where the old Earthquake-dæmon taught her young Rum? Were these then toys? or did a sea Of fire envelop once this silent snow?
75 None can reply—all seems eternal now
The wilderness has a mysterious tongue Which teaches awful doubt, or faith so mild,
So solemn, so serene, that man may be,
But for such faith, with nature reconciled, 80 Thou hast a voice, great Mountain, to repeal Large codes of fraud and woe; not understood
By all, but which the wise, and great, and good Interpret, or make felt, or deeply feel.
- The fields, the lakes, the forests, and the
streams,
85 Ocean, and all the living things that dwell Within the dædal' earth, lightning, and
rain,
Earthquake, and fiery flood, and hurricane,
The torpor of the year when feeble dreams Visit the hidden buds, or dreamless sleep 90 Holds every future leaf and flower, the
bound
With which from that detested trance they leap;
The works and ways of men, their death and birth,
And that of him and all that his may be;— All things that move and breathe with toil and sound 95 Are born and die, revolve, subside, and swell
Power dwells apart in its tranquillity, Remote, serene, and inaccessible.
And this, the naked countenance of earth,
On which I gaze, even these primeval
mountains
100 Teach the adverting mind The glaciers creep
Like snakes that watch their prey, from their far fountains, Slow rolling on; there, many a precipice, Frost and the Sun in scorn of mortal power Have piled—dome, pyramid, and pinnacle, 105 A city of death, distinct with many a tower marvellously formed
- And wall impregnable of beaming ice.
Yet not a city, but a flood of ruin Is there, that from the boundaries of the
sky
Rolls its perpetual stream, vast pines are strewing
110 Its destined path, or in the mangled soil Branchless and shattered stand, the rocks, drawn down
From yon remotest waste, have overthrown
The limits of the dead and living world, Never to be reclaimed. The dwelling-place 115 Of insects, beasts, and birds, becomes its spoil,
Their food and their retreat forever gone;
So much of life and joy is lost. The race Of man flies far in dread, his work and dwelling Vanish, like smoke before the tempest's
stream, 120 And their place is not known. Below, vast caves
Shine in the rushing torrents' restless gleam,
Which from those secret chasms in tumult welling
Meet in the vale, and one majestic river, The breath and blood of distant lands, forever 125 Rolls its loud waters to the ocean waves Breathes its swift vapors to the circling air
- Mont Blanc yet gleams on high:—the power is there,
The still and solemn power of many sights,
And many sounds, and much of life and
death
130 In the calm darkness of the moonless nights,
In the lone glare of day, the snows descend Upon that mountain, none beholds them
there,
Nor when the flakes burn in the sinking
sun,
Or the star-beams dart through them, winds contend 135 Silently there, and heap the snow, with breath
Rapid and strong, but silently! Its home
The voiceless lightning in these solitudes Keeps innocently, and like vapor broods Over the snow. The secret strength of things 140 Which governs thought, and to the infinite dome
Of Heaven is as a law, inhabits thee!
And what were thou, and earth, and stars,
and sea,
If to the human mind's imaginings Silence and solitude were vacancy?

LINES¹

1816 1823

The cold earth slept below;
 Above the cold sky shone;
 And all around, with a chilling sound,
 From caves of ice and fields of snow, 5 The breath of night like death did flow Beneath the sinking moon.

The wintry hedge was black;
 The green grass was not seen;
 The birds did rest on the bare thorn's
 breast,
 10 Whose roots, beside the pathway track,
 Had bound their folds o'er many a crack Which the frost had made between.

Thine eyes glowed in the glare
 Of the moon's dying light, 15 As a fen-fire's beam on a sluggish stream Gleams dimly—so the moon shone there,
 And it yellowed the strings of thy tangled hair,
 That shook in the wind of night

The moon made thy lips pale, beloved; 20 The wind made thy bosom chill,
 The night did shed on thy dear head Its frozen dew, and thou didst lie Where the bitter breath of the naked
 sky
 Might visit thee at will.

TO MARY² ———

DEDICATION TO THE REVOLT OF ISLAM

1817 1818

So now my summer task is ended, Mary,
 And I return to thee, mine own heart's
 home;
 As to his Queen some victor Knight of Faëry,
 Earning bright spoils for her enchanted
 dome,
 5 Nor thou disdain, that ere my fame become A star among the stars of mortal night,
 If it indeed may cleave its natal gloom,
 Its doubtful promise thus I would unite With thy beloved name, thou child of love and light.

10 The toil which stole from thee so many an hour,
 Is ended,—and the fruit is at thy feet!
 No longer where the woods to frame a bower

¹ This poem is thought to refer to the death of Shelley's first wife Harriet, who drowned herself in November 1816

² Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, Shelley's second wife

With interlaced branches mix and meet, Or where with sound like many voices
 sweet,
 15 Waterfalls leap among wild islands green, Which framed for my lone boat a lone retreat
 Of moss-grown trees and weeds, shall I be
 seen:
 But beside thee, where still my heart has ever been.

Thoughts of great deeds were mine, dear friend, when first 20 The clouds which wrap this world from youth did pass
 I do remember well the hour which burst My spirit's sleep. A fresh May-dawn it
 was,
 When I walked forth upon the glittering grass,
 And wept, I knew not why, until there rose 25 From the near schoolroom, voices, that, alas!
 Were but one echo from a world of woes—
 The harsh and grating strife of tyrants and of foes.

And then I clasped my hands and looked
 around,
 But none was near to mock my streaming
 eyes, 30 Which poured their warm drops on the sunny ground—
 So, without shame, I spake:—"I will be wise,
 And just, and free, and mild, if in me lies Such power, for I grow weary to behold
 The selfish and the strong still tyrannize 35 Without reproach or check" I then controlled
 My tears, my heart grew calm, and I was meek and bold.

And from that hour did I with earnest
 thought Heap knowledge from forbidden mines of
 lore;
 Yet nothing that my tyrants knew or taught 40 I cared to learn, but from that secret store Wrought linked armor for my soul, before It might walk forth to war among mankind;
 Thus power and hope were strengthened more and more Within me, till there came upon my mind 45 A sense of loneliness, a thirst with which I pined

Alas, that love should be a blight and snare
 To those who seek all sympathies in one!¹ Such once I sought in vain; then black
 despair,
 The shadow of a starless night, was thrown 50 Over the world in which I moved alone.¹—Yet never found I one not false to me, Hard hearts, and cold, like weights of icy
 stone
 Which crushed and withered mine, that could not be Aught but a lifeless clod, until revived by
 thee.

55 Thou friend, whose presence on my wintry
 heart
 Fell, like bright spring upon some herb-less plain,
 How beautiful and calm and free thou wert
 In thy young wisdom, when the mortal chain
 Of Custom thou didst burst and rend in twain,² 60 And walked as free as light the clouds among,
 Which many an envious slave then breathed in vain
 From his dim dungeon, and my spirit sprung
 To meet thee from the woes which had begirt it long!

No more alone through the world's wilderness,

65 Although I trod the paths of high intent,
 I journeyed now no more companionless, Where solitude is like despair, I went.
 There is the wisdom of a stern content When Poverty can blight the just and
 good,
 70 When Infamy dares mock the innocent, And cherished friends turn with the multitude
 To trample this was ours, and we unshaken stood!

Now has descended a serener hour,
 And with inconstant fortune, friends return;

75 Though suffering leaves the knowledge and the power Which says—Let scorn be not repaid with scorn.
 And from thy side two gentle babes are born

To fill our homes with smiles, and thus are we Most fortunate beneath life's beaming morn; 80 And these delights, and thou, have been
 to me
 The parents of the song I consecrate to
 thee.

Is it that now my inexperienced fingers
 But strike the prelude of a loftier strain?
 Or must the lyre on which my spirit lingers 85 Soon pause in silence, ne'er to sound again, Though it might shake the Anarch Custom's reign,¹
 And charm the minds of men to Truth's own sway Holier than was Amphiion's? I would fain Reply in hope—but I am worn away, 90 And Death and Love are yet contending for their prey.

And what art thou? I know, but dare not
 speak:

Time may interpret to his silent years Yet in the paleness of thy thoughtful cheek,
 And in the light thine ample forehead wears,

95 And in thy sweetest smiles, and in thy
 tears,
 And in thy gentle speech, a prophecy
 Is whispered, to subdue my fondest fears:
 And through thine eyes, even in thy soul
 I see

A lamp of vestal fire burning internally

100 They say that thou wert lovely from thy
 birth,
 Of glorious parents,² thou aspiring child
 I wonder not—for one then left this earth Whose life was like a setting planet mild, Which clothed thee in the radiance unde-filed

105 Of its departing glory; still her fame Shines on thee, through the tempests dark and wild

Which shake these latter days; and thou canst claim

The shelter, from thy sire, of an immortal name

One voice³ came forth from many a mighty spirit,

110 Which was the echo of three thousand years; .

¹ A reference to the year before he met Mary.

² She and Shelley eloped on July 28, 1814 disregarding Shelley's marriage to Harriet West brook.

³ Custom is here conceived as the destroyer of true relations between men.

² William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft each the author of political and social writings of importance.

³ The voice of Truth

And the tumultuous world stood mute to hear it,

- As some lone man who in a desert hears
The music of his home:—unwonted fears Fell on the pale oppressors of our race, 115 And Faith, and Custom, and low-thoughted
cares,
Like thunder-stricken dragons, for a space Left the torn human heart, their food and dwelling-place

Truth's deathless voice pauses among mankind!

- If there must be no response to my cry—120 If men must rise and stamp with fury blind
On his pure name who loves them,—thou
and I,
Sweet friend! can look from our tranquillity
Like lamps into the world's tempestuous
night,—
Two tranquil stars, while clouds are passing by 125 Which wrap them from the foundering seaman's sight,
That burn from year to year with unextinguished light.

1817 1824

They die—the dead return not. Misery Sits near an open grave and calls them
over,

A Youth with hoary hair and haggard
eye.

They are the names of kindred, friend, and lover,

- 5 Which he so feebly calls; they all are
gone—

Fond wretch, all dead! those vacant names
alone,

This most familiar scene, my pain,
These tombs,—alone remain

Misery, my sweetest friend, oh, weep no
more!

- 10 Thou wilt not be consoled—I wonder
not!

For I have seen thee from thy dwelling's
door

Watch the calm sunset with them, and this spot

Was even as bright and calm, but transitory,—

And now thy hopes are gone, thy hair is hoary;

- 15 This most familiar scene, my pain,
These tombs,—alone remain.

LINES TO A CRITIC

1817 1823

Honey from silkworms who can gather,
Or sulk from the yellow bee?
The grass may grow in winter weather
As soon as hate in me.

- 5 Hate men who cant, and men who pray,
And men who rail like thee,
An equal passion to repay
They are not coy like me

- Or seek some slave of power and gold, 10 To be thy dear heart's mate; Thy love will move that bigot cold Sooner than me, thy hate

A passion like the one I prove Cannot divided be;

- 15 I hate thy want of truth and love—
How should I then hate thee?

OZYMANDIAS

1817 1818

I met a traveller from an antique land Who said: "Two vast and trunkless legs of stone

Stand in the desert Near them, on the sand,

Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,

- 5 And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command,
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read

Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,

The hand! that mocked them, and the heart! that fed!

And on the pedestal these words appear:

- 10 "My name is Ozymandias, king of kings: Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!"

Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare The lone and level sands stretch far away "

THE PAST

1818 1824

Wilt thou forget the happy hours

Which we buried in Love's sweet bowers, Heaping over their corpses cold

Blossoms and leaves, instead of mould?

- 5 Blossoms which were the joys that fell.
And leaves, the hopes that yet remain

Forget the dead, the past? Oh, yet

There are ghosts that may take revenge for it;

1 Of the sculptor

2 Of Ozymandias.

Memories that make the heart a tomb, 10 Regrets which glide through the spirit's
 gloom,
 And with ghastly whispers tell That joy, once lost, is pain

ON A FADED VIOLET
 1818 1821

The odor from the flower is gone,
 Which like thy kisses breathed on me
 The color from the flower is flown,
 Which glowed of thee, and only thee!

5 A shrivelled, lifeless, vacant form,
 It lies on my abandoned breast.
 And mocks the heart, which yet is warm,
 With cold and silent rest.

I weep, — my tears revive it not!
 10 I sigh, — it breathes no more on me.
 Its mute and uncomplaining lot Is such as mine should be

LINES WRITTEN AMONG THE EUGANEAN HILLS
 1818 1819

Many a green isle needs must be In the deep, wide sea of misery,
 Or the mariner, worn and wan, Never thus could voyage on 5 Day and night, and night and day, Drifting on his dreary way,
 With the solid darkness black Closing round his vessel's track, Whilst above, the sunless sky, 10 Big with clouds, hangs heavily,
 And behind, the tempest fleet Hurries on with lightning feet.
 Riving sail, and cord, and plank, Till the ship has almost drank 15 Death from the o'er-brimming deep,
 And sinks down, down, like that sleep When the dreamer seems to be Weltering through eternity.
 And the dim low line before 20 Of a dark and distant shore Still recedes, as ever still Longing with divided will But no power to seek or shun, He is ever drifted on 25 O'er the unreposing wave
 To the haven of the grave.
 What, if there no friends will greet?
 What, if there no heart will meet His with love's impatient beat?
 30 Wander wheresoe'er he may,
 Can he dream before that day
 To find refuge from distress
 In friendship's smile, in love's caress?

Then 'twill wreak him little woe 25 Whether such there be or no;
 Senseless is the breast, and cold,
 Which relenting love would fold;
 Bloodless are the veins, and chill,
 Which the pulse of pain did fill, 40 Every little living nerve That from bitter words did swerve Round the tortured lips and brow,
 Are like sapless leaflets now Frozen upon December's bough

15 On the beach of a northern sea Which tempests shake eternally,
 As once the wretch there lay to sleep,
 Lies a solitary heap,
 One white skull and seven dry bones, 50 On the margin of the stones,
 Where a few gray rushes stand, Boundaries of the sea and land Not is heard one voice of wail
 But the sea-mews, as they sail 55 O'er the billows of the gale,
 Or the whirlwind up and down Howling, like a slaughtered town,
 When a king in glory rides
 Through the pomp of fratricides 60 Those unburied bones around There is many a mournful sound,
 There is no lament for him,
 Like a sunless vapor, dim,
 Who once clothed with life and thought 65 What now moves nor murmurs not

•
 Ay, many flowering islands he
 In the waters of wide agony To such a one this morn was led My bark by soft winds piloted 70 'Mid the mountains Euganean
 I stood listening to the pæan With which the legioned rooks did hail
 The sun's uprise majestic, Gathering round with wings all hoar, 75 Through the dewy mist they soar Like gray shades, till the eastern heaven Bursts, and then, as clouds of even, Flecked with fire and azure, he
 In the unfathomable sky, 80 So then plumes of purple gram,¹ Starred with drops of golden rain, Gleam above the sunlight woods,
 As in silent multitudes
 On the morning's fitful gale 85 Through the broken mist they sail,
 And the vapors cloven and gleaming Follow, down the dark steep streaming, Till all is bright, and clear, and still,
 Round the solitary hill

¹ color

- 90 Beneath is spread like a green sea
The waveless plain of Lombardy, Bounded by the vaporous air, Islanded by cities fair, Underneath Day's azure eyes 95 Ocean's nursing, Venice lies,
A peopled labyrinth of walls, Amphitrite's destined halls
Which her hoary sire¹ now paves
With his blue and beaming waves 100 Lo! the sun upsprings behind, Broad, red, radiant, half-reclined
On the level quivering line Of the waters crystalline,
And before that chasm of light, 105 As within a furnace bright, Column, tower, and dome, and spire, Shine like obelisks of fire, Pointing with inconstant motion
From the altar of dark ocean 110 To the sapphire-tinted skies, As the flames of sacrifice
From the marble shrines did rise,
As to pierce the dome of gold Where Apollo spoke of old 115 Sun-girt City, thou hast been Ocean's child, and then his queen;²
Now is come a darker day,
And thou soon must be his prey,
If the power that raised thee here 120 Hallow so thy watery bier
A less drear ruin than than now,
With thy conquest-braided brow Stooping to the slave of slaves
From thy throne among the waves, 125 Wilt thou be, when the sea-mew Flies, as once before it flew,³ O'er thine isles depopulate,
And all is in its ancient state, Save where many a palace gate 130 With green sea-flowers overgrown Like a rock of Ocean's own, Topples o'er the abandoned sea
As the tides change sullenly
The fisher on his watery way, 135 Wandering at the close of day,
Will spread his sail and seize his oar Till he pass the gloomy shore, Lest thy dead should, from their sleep Bursting o'er the starlight deep, 140 Lead a rapid masque of death

¹ Oceanus

² A reference to the old annual custom of throwing a ring into the ocean in representation of the marriage of Venice and the Sea. See Wordsworth's On the Extinction of the Venetian Republic (p. 288)

³ At this time, 1818, the greater part of northern Italy, including the old free cities, was under the oppressive domination of Austria, the "Celtic Anarch" of l. 132

⁴ Before the founding of the city

- O'er the waters of his path.
Those who alone thy towers behold Quivering through aerial gold,
As I now behold them here, 145 Would imagine not they were Sepulchres, where human forms, Like pollution-nourished worms,
To the corpse of greatness cling, Murdered, and now mouldering 150 But if Freedom should awake In her omnipotence, and shake From the Celtic¹ Anarch's hold
All the keys of dungeons cold, Where a hundred cities lie 155 Chained like thee, ingloriously, Thou and all thy sister band Might adorn this sunny land, Twining memories of old time
With new virtues more sublime, 160 If not, perish thou and they!— Clouds which stain truth's rising day
By her sun consumed away—Earth can spare ye while like flowers,
In the waste of years and hours, 165 From your dust new nations spring With more kindly blossoming

- Perish! let there only be Floating o'er thy heartless sea,
As the garment of thy sky 170 Clothes the world immortally.
One remembrance, more sublime
Than the tattered pall of time, Which scarce hides thy visage wan;—
That a tempest-cleaving swan² 175 Of the songs of Albion, Driven from his ancestral streams
By the might of evil dreams, Found a nest in thee, and Ocean Welcomed him with such emotion 180 That its joy grew his, and sprung From his lips like music flung O'er a mighty thunder-fit, Chastening terror. What though yet Poetry's unfailing river, 185 Which through Albion winds forever Lashing with melodious wave Many a sacred poet's grave, Mourn its latest nursing fled?
What though thou with all thy dead 190 Scarce can for this fame repay Aught thine own? oh, rather say Though thy sins and slaveries foul Overcloud a sunlike soul?
As the ghost of Homer clings 195 Round Seamander's wasting springs; As divinest Shakespeare's might

² A reference to Byron

Fills Avon and the world with light Like omniscient power which he Imaged 'mid mortality;
 200 As the love from Petrarch's urn, Yet amid yon hills doth burn,
 A quenchless lamp, by which the heart Sees things unearthly, —so thou art, Mighty spirit! so shall be 205 The city that did refuge thee.

Lo, the sun floats up the sky Like thought-winged Liberty, Till the universal light Seems to level plain and height, 210 From the sea a mist has spread,
 And the beams of morn lie dead
 On the towers of Venice now, Like its glory long ago.
 By the skirts of that gray cloud 215 Many-domed Padua proud Stands, a peopled solitude,
 'Mid the harvest-shining plain,
 Where the peasant heaps his grain
 In the garner of his foe, 220 And the milk-white oven slow
 With the purple vintage stram, Heaped upon the creaking wain,¹
 That the brutal Celt may swill Drunken sleep with savage will, 225 And the sickle to the sword Lies unchanged, though many a lord
 Like a weed whose shade is poison, Overgrows this region's poison,² Sheaves of whom are ripe to come 230 To destruction's harvest-home Men must reap the things they sow, Force from force must ever flow,
 Or worse, but 'tis a bitter woe That love or reason cannot change 235 The despot's rage, the slave's revenge Padua, thou within whose walls
 Those mute guests at festivals, Son and mother, Death and Sin, Played at dice for Ezzelin, 240 Till Death cried, "I win, I win!"³
 And Sin cursed to lose the wager, But Death promised, to assuage her,
 That he would petition for Her to be made vice-emperor.
 245 When the destined years were o'er,
 Over all between the Po
 And the eastern Alpine snow, Under the mighty Austrian⁴ Sin smiled so as Sin only can, 250 And since that time, ay, long before,

¹ wagon² plenty; rich harvest³ See Galatians, c. 7.⁴ See Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, 197 (p. 338)⁵ Francis I, Emperor of Austria (1804-15)

Both have ruled from shore to shore,— That incestuous pair, who follow Tyrants as the sun the swallow, As Repentance follows Crime, 255 And as changes follow Time.

In thine halls the lamp of learning, Padua, now no more is burning,
 Like a meteor, whose wild way
 Is lost over the grave of day, 260 It gleams betrayed and to betray Once remotest nations came To adore that sacred flame,
 When it lit not many a hearth
 On this cold and gloomy earth.
 265 Now new fires from antique light Spring beneath the wide world's might But then spark lies dead in thee, Trampled out by Tyranny.
 As the Norway woodman quells, 270 In the depth of piny dells,
 One light flame among the brakes,¹ While the boundless forest shakes,
 And its mighty trunks are torn
 By the fire thus lowly born.
 275 The spark beneath his feet is dead,
 He starts to see the flames it fed Howling through the darkened sky
 With a myriad tongues victoriously,
 And sinks down in fear so thou, 280 O Tyranny, beholdest now Light around thee, and thou hearest
 The loud flames ascend, and fearest Grovel on the earth, ay, hide
 In the dust thy purple pride!

285 Noon descends around me now:
 'Tis the noon of autumn's glow,
 When a soft and purple mist
 Like a vaporous amethyst, Or an air-dissolved star 290 Mingling light and fragrance, far From the curved horizon's bound To the point of heaven's profound,² Fills the overflowing sky,
 And the plains that silent lie 295 Underneath, the leaves unsodden Where the infant Frost has trodden With his morning-winged feet, Whose bright print is gleaming yet,
 And the red and golden vines, 300 Piercing with their trellised lines
 The rough, dark-skirted wilderness;
 The dun and bladed grass no less,
 Pointing from this hoary tower
 In the windless air; the flower 305 Glimmering at my feet; the line

¹ thickets² That is to the zenith.

Of the olive-sandalled¹ Apennine
 In the south dimly islanded;
 And the Alps, whose snows are spread High between the clouds and sun, 310 And of living things each one,
 And my spirit, which so long Darkened this swift stream of song,— Interpenetrated lie
 By the glory of the sky.
 315 Be it love, light, harmony, Odor, or the soul of all Which from heaven like dew doth fall,
 Or the mind which feeds this verse Peopling the lone universe

320 Noon descends, and after noon Autumn's evening meets me soon, Leading the infantine moon,
 And that one star, which to her Almost seems to minister 325 Half the crimson light she brings From the sunset's radiant springs.
 And the soft dreams of the morn (Which like winged winds had borne To that silent isle, which lies 330 Mid remembered agonies, The frail bark of this lone being) Pass, to other sufferers fleeing,
 And its ancient pilot, Pain, Sits beside the helm again

335 Other flowering isles must be In the sea of life and agony
 Other spirits float and flee O'er that gulf even now, perhaps,
 On some rock the wild wave wraps, 340 With folded wings they waiting sit For my bark, to pilot it To some calm and blooming cove, Where for me, and those I love,
 May a windless bower be built, 345 Far from passion, pain, and guilt,
 In a dell mid lawny hills,
 Which the wild sea-murmur fills,
 And soft sunshine, and the sound Of old forests echoing round, 350 And the light and smell divine Of all flowers that breathe and shine
 We may live so happy there,
 That the spirits of the air, Envyng us, may even entice 355 To our healing paradise
 The polluting multitude;
 But their rage would be subdued
 By that clime divine and calm,
 And the winds whose wings rain balm 360 On the uplifted soul, and leaves Under which the bright sea heaves;

¹ covered with olive trees at the base

While each breathless interval In their whisperings musical
 The inspired soul supplies 365 With its own deep melodies,
 And the love which heals all strife, Circling, like the breath of life,
 All things in that sweet abode
 With its own mild brotherhood, 370 They, not it, would change, and soon Every sprite beneath the moon Would repent its envy vain,
 And the earth grow young again

STANZAS

WRITTEN IN DEJECTION, NEAR NAPLES
 1818 1824

The sun is warm, the sky is clear,
 The waves are dancing fast and
 bright;
 Blue isles and snowy mountains wear
 The purple noon's transparent might.
 5 The breath of the moist earth is light Around its unexpanded buds,
 Like many a voice of one delight,
 The winds, the birds, the ocean floods,
 The City's voice itself, is soft like Soli-tude's

10 I see the Deep's untrampled floor With green and purple seaweeds strown;
 I see the waves upon the shore,
 Like light dissolved in star-showers, thrown.
 I sit upon the sands alone,— 15 The lightning of the noontide ocean Is flashing round me, and a tone Arises from its measured motion, How sweet! did any heart now share in my emotion

Alas! I have nor hope nor health.
 20 Nor peace within nor calm around, Nor that content surpassing wealth
 The sage in meditation found,¹ And walked with inward glory crowned—Nor fame, nor power, nor love, nor leisure

25 Others I see whom these surround—Smiling they live, and call life pleasure,—
 To me that cup has been dealt in another measure.

¹ Numerous poets and philosophers have found consolation in solitude. See Cowper's The Task, 2 (p. 147), Byron's Child Harold's Pilgrimage, 4, 177-4 (p. 548), Keats's Sonnet to Solitude (p. 754), also, De Quincey's The Affliction of Childhood (p. 1089)

Yet now despair itself is mild, Even as the winds and waters are;
30 I could lie down like a tired child,
And weep away the life of care Which I have borne and yet must
bear,
Till death like sleep might steal on me,
And I might feel in the warm air 35 My cheek grow cold, and hear the sea Breathe o'er my dying brain its last monotony.

Some might lament that I were cold,
As I, when this sweet day is gone, Which my lost heart, too soon grown old, 40 Insults with this untimely moan, They might lament—for I am one Whom men love not,—and yet regret, Unlike this day, which, when the sun Shall on its stainless glory set, 45 Will linger, though enjoyed, like joy in memory yet.

'ASTLEREAGH ADMINIS-TRATION

1819 1832

Corpses are cold in the tomb—Stones on the pavement are dumb Abortions are dead in the womb, And then mothers look pale, like the death-white shone
5 Of Albion, free no more.

Her sons are as stones in the way—
They are masses of senseless clay—
They are trodden, and move not away—
The abortion with which she travailed 10 Is Liberty, smitten to death.

Then trample and dance, thou Oppressor!
For thy victim is no redresser—Thou art sole lord and possessor Of her corpses, and clods, and abortions—they pave 15 Thy path to the grave.

Hearst thou the festival din
Of Death and Destruction and Sin, And Wealth crying Havoc! within?
'Tis the Bacchanal triumph that makes Truth dumb,— 20 Thine Epithalamium.

Av, marry thy ghastly wife!
Let Fear and Disquiet and Strife Spread thy couch in the chamber of Life;

Marry Ruin, thou Tyrant! and Hell be thy guide 25 To the bed of the bride!

THE MASK OF ANARCHY

WRITTEN ON THE OCCASION OF THE MASSACRE AT MANCHESTER¹
1819 1832

As I lay asleep in Italy,
There came a voice from over the sea,
And with great power it forth led me To walk in the visions of Poesy.

5 I met Murder on the way—
He had a mask like Castlereagh, Very smooth he looked, yet grim;
Seven bloodhounds followed him.

All were fat, and well they might 10 Be in admirable plight,
For one by one, and two by two,
He tossed them human hearts to chew,
Which from his wide cloak he drew.

Next came Fraud, and he had on, 15 Like Eldon, an ermined gown;
His big tears, for he wept well, Turned to mill-stones as they fell;

And the little children, who Round his feet played to and fro, 20 Thinking every tear a gem, Had their brains knocked out by them

Clothed with the Bible as with light,
And the shadows of the night,
Like Sidmouth, next Hypocrites 25 On a crocodile rode by

And many more Destructions played In this ghastly masquerade,
All disguised, even to the eyes,
Like bishops, lawyers, peers, or spies.

30 Last came Anarchy; he rode On a white horse splashed with blood;
He was pale even to the lips,
Like Death in the Apocalypse.²

And he wore a kingly crown; 35 In his hand a sceptre shone, (On his brow this mark I saw—
"I AM GOD, AND KING, AND LAW!"

With a pace stately and fast,
Over English land he passed, 40 Trampling to a mire of blood
The adoring multitude.

¹ A mass-meeting of citizens who were eager for parliamentary reforms was attacked by soldiers in St Peter's Field, on Aug. 16, 1819
² A few persons were killed and several hundred injured.

² See Revelation, 6 8

And a mighty troop around With their trampling shook the ground, Waving each a bloody sword 45 For the service of their Lord.

And, with glorious triumph, they Rode through England, proud and gay, Drunk as with intoxication
 Of the wine of desolation.

50 O'er fields and towns, from sea to sea, Passed that pageant swift and free, Tearing up, and trampling down, Till they came to London town

And each dweller, panic-stricken, 55 Felt his heart with terror sicken, Hearing the tempestuous cry
 Of the triumph of Anarchy

For with pomp to meet him came,
 Clothed in arms like blood and flame, 60 The hired murderers, who did sing
 "Thou art God, and Law, and King

"We have waited, weak and lone For thy coming, Mighty One!
 Our purses are empty, our swords are cold, 65 Give us glory, and blood, and gold."

Lawyers and priests, a motley crowd,
 To the earth then pale brows bowed,
 Like a bad prayer not over loud, Whispering—"Thou art Law and God!"

70 Then all cried with one accord,
 "Thou art King, and God, and Lord, Anarchy, to thee we bow,
 Be thy name made holy now!"

And Anarchy, the Skeleton, 75 Bowed and grinned to every one,
 As well as if his education
 Had cost ten millions to the nation.

For he knew the palaces
 Of our kings were rightly his, 80 His the sceptre, crown, and globe,
 And the gold-inwoven robe

So he sent his slaves before To seize upon the Bank and Tower,
 And was proceeding with intent 85 To meet his pensioned Parliament,

When one fled past, a maniac maid,
 And her name was Hope, she said;
 But she looked more like Despair,
 And she cried out in the air:

90 "My father Time is weak and gray With waiting for a better day;
 See how idiot-like he stands, Fumbling with his palsied hands!

"He has had child after child, 95 And the dust of death is piled Over every one but me Misery, oh, Misery!"

Then she lay down in the street,
 Right before the horses' feet, 100 Expecting, with a patient eye, Murder, Fraud, and Anarchy;

When between her and her foes
 A mist, a light, an image rose,— Small at first, and weak, and frail 105 Like the vapor of a vale,

Till as clouds grow on the blast,
 Like tower-crowned giants striding fast,
 And glare with lightnings as they fly,
 And speak in thunder to the sky

110 It grew—a Shape arrayed in mail Brighter than the viper's scale,
 And upborne on wings whose gleam¹
 Was as the light of sunny rain

On its helm, seen far away, 115 A planet, like the Morning's, lay,
 And those plumes its light rained through,
 Like a shower of crimson dew

With step as soft as wind it passed O'er the heads of men—so fast 120 That they knew the presence there,
 And looked—but all was empty air.

As flowers beneath May's footstep waken,
 As stars from Night's loose hair are shaken,
 As waves arise when loud winds call, 125 Thoughts sprung wher'er that step did fall.

And the prostrate multitude Looked—and ankle-deep in blood.
 Hope, that maiden most serene,
 Was walking with a quiet men;

130 And Anarchy, the ghastly birth, Lay dead earth upon the earth,
 The Horse of Death, tameless as wind, Fleed, and with his hoofs did grind
 To dust the murderers thronged behind.

135 A rushing light of clouds and splendor,
 A sense, awakening and yet tender,
¹ color

Was heard and felt, and at its close These words of joy and fear arose,

As if their own indignant Earth, 140 Which gave the sons of England birth, Had felt their blood upon her brow,
And, shuddering with a mother's throes

Had turned every drop of blood,
By which her face had been bedewed.
145 To an accent unwithstood, As if her heart had cried aloud

"Men of England, heirs of glory, Heroes of unwritten story, 150 Nurslings of one mighty Mother, Hopes of her, and one another

"Rise like lions after slumber, In unvanquishable number,
Shake your chains to earth like dew Which in sleep had fallen on you—155 Ye are many, they are few.

"What is Freedom?—Ye can tell That which Slavery is too well,
For its very name has grown To an echo of your own

160 "'Tis to work, and have such pay As just keeps life from day to day
In your limbs, as in a cell,
For the tyrants' use to dwell,—

"So that ye for them are made 165 Loom, and plough, and sword, and spade With or without your own will, bent
To their defence and nourishment.

" 'Tis to see your children weak
With their mothers pine and peak,¹ 170 When the winter winds are bleak—
They are dying whilst I speak

" 'Tis to hunger for such diet
As the rich man in his riot Casts to the fat dogs that he 175 Surfeiting beneath his eye.

" 'Tis to let the Ghost of Gold Take from toil a thousandfold More than e'er its substance could In the tyrannies of old;

180 "Paper coin²—that forgery
Of the title-deeds which ye

Hold to something from the worth Of the inheritance of Earth.

" 'Tis to be a slave in soul, 185 And to hold no strong control Over your own wills, but be All that others make of ye

"And at length when ye complain With a murmur weak and vain, 190 'Tis to see the Tyrant's crew Ride over you wives and you—Blood is on the grass like dew!

"Then it is to feel revenge, Fiercely thirsting to exchange 195 Blood for blood—and wrong for wrong—
Do not thus when ye are strong!

"Birds find rest in narrow nest,
When weary of their winged quest;
Beasts find fare in woody lair, 200 When storm and snow are in the air.

"Horses, oxen, have a home,
When from daily toil they come.
Household dogs, when the wind roars,
Find a home within warm doors 205 "Asses, swine, have litter spread,

And with fitting food are fed.
All things have a home but one—Thou, O Englishman, hast none!

"This is Slavery; savage men, 210 Or wild beasts within a den, Would endure not as ye do—
But such ills they never knew.

"What art thou, Freedom? Oh, could slaves
Answer from their living graves 215 This demand, tyrants would flee Like a dream's dim imagery.

"Thou art not, as impostors say,
A shadow soon to pass away,
A superstition, and a name 220 Echoing from the cave of Fame

"For the laborer thou art bread And a comely table spread,
From his daily labor come In a neat and happy home

225 "Thou art clothes, and fire, and food For the trampled multitude:
No—in countries that are free Such starvation cannot be As in England now we see

¹ See Macbeth, I, 3, 23

² Paper currency in England was worth considerably less than gold, but was declared to be of equal value by the House of Commons in 1810. See Cobbett's Rural Rides, Kensington, Jan. 4, 1822 (p. 1002)

230 "To the rich thou art a cheek, When his foot is on the neck
Of his victim, thou dost make That he treads upon a snake.

"Thou art Justice—ne'er for gold 235 May thy righteous laws be sold.
As laws are in England, thou Shield'st alike the high and low

"Thou art Wisdom—freemen never Dream that God will damn forever 240 All who think those things untrue
Of which priests make such ado

"Thou art Peace—never by thee Would blood and treasure wasted be.
As tyrants wasted them, when all 245 Leagued to quench thy flame in Gaul¹

"What if English toil and blood Was poured forth, even as a flood?
It availed, O Liberty!
To dim, but not extinguish thee

250 "Thou art Love—the rich have kissed Thy feet, and like him² following Christ.
Give their substance to the free
And through the rough world follow thee,

"Or turn their wealth to arms, and make 255 War for thy beloved sake On wealth and war and fraud, whence they Drew the power which is their prey

"Science, Poetry, and Thought Are thy lamps, they make the lot 260 Of the dwellers in a cot Such they curse thee! Make not

"Spirit, Patience, Gentleness,
All that can adorn and bless Art thou—let deeds, not words, express 265 Thine exceeding loveliness

"Let a great Assembly be Of the fearless and the free.
On some spot of English ground
Where the plains stretch wide around.

270 "Let the blue sky overhead,
The green earth on which ye tread,
All that must eternal be,
Witness the solemnity.

"From the corners uttermost 275 Of the bounds of English coast:

From every hut, village, and town,
Where those, who live and suffer, moan
For others' misery or their own;

"From the workhouse and the prison, 280 Where, pale as corpses newly risen, Women, children, young and old,
Groan for pain, and weep for cold,

"From the haunts of daily life, Where is waged the daily strife 285 With common wants and common cares, Which sows the human heart with tares;

"Lastly, from the palaces,
Where the murmur of distress Echoes, like the distant sound 290 Of a wind alive, around

"Those prison-halls of wealth and fashion, Where some few feel such compassion.
For those who groan, and toil, and wail,
As must make their brethren pale,— 295 "Ye who suffer woes untold,

Or to feel or to behold
Your lost country bought and sold With a price of blood and gold.

"Let a vast Assembly be, 300 And with great solemnity Declare with measured words that ye Are, as God has made ye, free!

"Be your strong and simple words Keen to wound as sharpened swords; 305 And wide as targets³ let them be,
With their shade to cover ye

"Let the tyrants pour around With a quick and startling sound, Like the loosening of a sea, 310 Troops of armed emblazonry²

"Let the charged artillery drive, Till the dead air seems alive
With the clash of clanging wheels
And the tramp of horses' heels

315 "Let the fixed bayonet Gleam with sharp desire to wet Its bright point in English blood, Looking keen as one for food

"Let the horsemen's scimitars 320 Wheel and flash, like sphereless stars

Will point at them as they stand.
They will hardly dare to greet Then acquaintance in the street

Who have hugged Danger in wars,

Ye are many, they are few!"

SONG TO THE MEN OF ENGLAND
1819 1839

Men of England, wherefore plough
For the lords who lay ye low?
Wherefore weave with toil and care
The rich robes your tyrants wear?

5 Wherefore feed, and clothe, and save,
From the cradle to the grave, Those ungrateful drones who would Drain your sweat—nay, drink your blood?

10 Wherefore, bees of England, forge
Many a weapon, chain, and scourge,
That these stingless drones may spoil
The forced produce of your toil

15 Have ye leisure, comfort, calm, Shelter, food, love's gentle balm?
Oh what is it ye buy so dear
With your pain and with your tear?

20 The seed ye sow, another reaps,
The wealth ye find, another keeps,
The robes ye weave, another wears,
The arms ye forge, another bears

Sow seed,—but let no tyrant reap, Find wealth,—let no impostor heap;
Weave robes,—let not the idle wear, Forge arms,—in your defence to bear

25 Shrink to your cellars, holes, and cells, In halls ye deck, another dwells Why shake the chains ye wrought? Ye see The steel ye tempered glance on ye 30 With plough and spade, and hoe and loom, Trace your grave, and build your tomb,

And weave your winding-sheet, till fair England be your sepulchre

ENGLAND IN 1819
1819 1839

An old, mad, blind, despised, and dying king,¹ Princes, the dregs of that dull race, who

Through public scorn—mud from a muddy
 spring;
 Rulers who neither see, nor feel, nor know, 5 But leech-like to their fainting country cling,
 Till they drop, blind in blood, without a blow;
 A people starved and stabbed in the untilled field;
 An army, which liberticide and prey Makes as a two-edged sword to all who wield;
 10 Golden and sanguine laws which tempt and slay;
 Religion Christless, Godless — a book sealed.
 A Senate—Time's worst statute unrepealed,—
 Are graves, from which a glorious Phantom may Burst to illumine our tempestuous day.

ODE TO THE WEST WIND

1819

1820

O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being,
 Thou, from whose unseen presence the leaves dead
 Are driven, like ghosts from an enchanter fleeing,
 Yellow, and black, and pale, and hectic
 red,
 5 Pestilence-stricken multitudes. O thou, Who chariotest to their dark wintry bed
 The wingèd seeds, where they lie cold and low,
 Each like a corpse within its grave, until Thine azure sister of the Spring shall blow
 10 Her clarion o'er the dreaming earth, and fill (Driving sweet buds like flocks to feed in
 air)
 With living hues and odors plain and hill.
 Wild Spirit, which art moving everywhere;
 Destroyer and preserver, hear! oh, hear!

II

15 Thou on whose stream, mid the steep sky's commotion, Loose clouds like earth's decaying leaves are shed,

Shook from the tangled boughs of Heaven and Ocean,

Angels of rain and lightning. there are spread
 On the blue surface of thine airy surge, 20 Like the bright hair uplifted from the
 head

Of some fierce Maenad, even from the dim verge

Of the horizon to the zenith's height, The locks of the approaching storm. Thou dirge

Of the dying year, to which this closing night¹

25 Will be the dome of a vast sepulchre, Vaulted with all thy congregated might

Of vapors, from whose solid atmosphere Black rain, and fire, and hail will burst:
 oh, hear!

III

Thou who didst waken from his summer dreams
 30 The blue Mediterranean, where he lay, Lulled by the coil of his crystalline
 streams,

Beside a pumice² isle in Baia's bay,
 And saw in sleep old palaces and towers Quivering within the wave's intenser day,

35 All overgrown with azure moss and flowers
 So sweet, the sense faints picturing them!
 thou
 For whose path the Atlantic's level
 powers

Cleave themselves into chasms, while far below

The sea-blooms and the oozy woods which wear

40 The sapless foliage of the ocean, know

Thy voice, and suddenly grow gray with
 fear,
 And tremble and despoil themselves: oh, hear!

IV

If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear;
 If I were a swift cloud to fly with thee, 45 A wave to pant beneath thy power, and share

¹ night sky closing down over the earth

² A light, porous, volcanic substance

The impulse of thy strength, only less
free
Than thou, O uncontrollable! If even I were as in my boyhood, and could be

The comrade of thy wanderings over
heaven,
50 As then, when to outstrip thy skyey speed Scarce seemed a vision; I would ne'er have striven

As thus with thee in prayer in my sore need
Oh, lift me as a wave, a leaf, a cloud!
I fall upon the thorns of life! I bleed!

55 A heavy weight of hours has chained and bowed
One too like thee, fameless, and swift, and proud.

Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is What if my leaves are falling like its
own!
The tumult of thy mighty harmonies

60 Will take from both a deep, autumnal
tone,
Sweet though in sadness. Be thou, Spirit
here,
My spirit! Be thou me, impetuous one!

Drive my dead thoughts over the universe Like withered leaves to quicken a new birth!

65 And, by the incantation of this verse,

Scatter, as from an unextinguished hearth Ashes and sparks, my words among mankind!

Be through my lips to unawakened earth

The trumpet of a prophecy! O Wind,

70 If Winter comes, can Spring be far behind?

THE INDIAN SERENADE

1819 1822

I arise from dreams of thee
In the first sweet sleep of night,
When the winds are breathing low,
And the stars are shining bright.

5 I arise from dreams of thee,
And a spirit in my feet Hath led me—who knows how?
To thy chamber window, sweet!

The wandering airs, they faint
On the dark, the silent stream;
The champak¹ odors fail Like sweet thoughts in a dream,
The nightingale's complaint,
It dies upon her heart,
As I must die on thine, Oh, beloved as thou art!

Oh, lift me from the grass!
I die! I faint! I fail!
Let thy love in kisses rain
On my lips and eyelids pale My cheek is cold and white, alas!
My heart beats loud and fast,— Oh! press it close to thine again,
Where it will break at last.

LOVE'S PHILOSOPHY

1819 1810

The fountains mingle with the river And the rivers with the ocean,
The winds of heaven mix forever
With a sweet emotion, 5 Nothing in the world is single,
All things by a law divine In one spirit meet and mingle
Why not I with thine?

See the mountains kiss high heaven,
And the waves clasp one another;
No sister-flower would be forgiven
If it disdained its brother,
And the sunlight clasps the earth,
And the moonbeams kiss the sea:
15 What are all these kissings worth
If thou kiss not me?

THE POET'S LOVER

1819 1862

I am as a spirit who has dwelt Within his heart of hearts, and I have felt His feelings, and have thought his thoughts, and known

The inmost converse of his soul, the tone 5 Unheard but in the silence of his blood, When all the pulses in their multitude Image the trembling calm of summer seas.
I have unlocked the golden melodies
Of his deep soul, as with a master-key, 10 And loosened them and bathed myself therein—
Even as an eagle in a thunder-mist Clothing his wings with lightning.

SCENE — A Ravine of Icy Rocks in the Indian Caucasus PROMETHEUS is discovered bound to the Precipice PANTHEA and IONE are seated at his feet Time, night. During the scene, morning slowly breaks.

Prometheus Monarch of Gods and Demons,¹ and all Spirits

But One,² who throng those bright and rolling worlds

Which Thou and I alone of living things Behold with sleepless eyes! regard this Earth

5 Made multitudinous with thy slaves, whom thou

Requiest for knee-worship, prayer, and praise,

And toil, and hecatombs of broken hearts, With fear and self-contempt and barren hope

Whilst me, who am thy foe, eyeless in hate,

10 Hast thou made reign and triumph, to thy scorn,

O'er mine own misery and thy vain revenge

Three thousand years of sleep-unsheltered hours,

And moments ave divided by keen pangs Till they seemed years, torture and solitude,

15 Scorn and despan,—these are mine empire —

More glorious far than that which thou surveyest

From thine unenvied throne, O Mighty God!

Almighty, had I deigned to share the shame

Of thine ill tyranny, and hung not here

20 Nailed to this wall of eagle-baffling mountain,

¹ Supernatural beings of Greek mythology conceived as holding a position between gods and men

² Prometheus himself See l 265.

³ sacrifices of great numbers

Black, wintry, dead, unmeasured; without herb,

Insect, or beast, or shape or sound of life. Ah me! alas, pain, pain ever, forever!

No change, no pause, no hope! Yet I endure

25 I ask the Earth, have not the mountains felt?

I ask von Heaven, the all-beholding Sun, Has it not seen? The Sea, in storm or calm,

Heaven's ever-changing shadow, spread below,

Have its deaf waves not heard my agony? 30 Ah me! alas, pain, pain ever, forever!

The crawling glaciers pierce me with the spears

Of their moon-freezing crystals, the bright chains

Eat with their burning cold into my bones Heaven's winged hound,¹ polluting from thy lips

35 His beak in poison not his own, tears up My heart, and shapeless sights come wandering by,

The ghastly people of the realm of dream, Mocking me and the Earthquake-fiends are charged

To wrench the rivets from my quivering wounds,

40 When the rocks split and close again behind

While from their loud abysses howling throng

The genii of the storm, urging the rage Of whirlwind, and afflict me with keen hail

And yet to me welcome is day and night.

45 Whether one breaks the hoar-frost of the morn,

Or starry, dim, and slow, the other climbs The leaden-colored east, for then they lead

The wingless, crawling hours, one among whom—

As some dark priest hales the reluctant victim—

50 Shall drag thee, cruel King, to kiss the blood

From these pale feet, which then might trample thee

If they disdained not such a prostrate slave.

Disdain! Ah, no! I pity thee. What ruin

¹ The vulture, which, according to ancient story, daily tore the entrails of Prometheus

Will hunt thee undefended through the wide Heaven!

55 How will thy soul, cloven to its depth with terror,

Gape like a hell within! I speak in grief,
Not exultation, for I hate no more,

As then ere misery made me wise. The curse

Once breathed on thee I would recall. Ye Mountains,

60 Whose many-voiced Echoes, through the mist

Of cataracts, flung the thunder of that spell!

Ye icy Springs, stagnant with wrinkling frost,

Which vibrated to hear me, and then crept Shuddering through India! Thou serene

Air,

65 Through which the Sun walks burning without beams!

And ye swift Whirlwinds, who on poised
wings

Hung mute and moveless o'er you hushed abyss,

As thunder, louder than your own, made rock

The orb'd world! If then my words had
power,

70 Though I am changed so that aught evil

Is dead within; although no memory be
Of what is hate, let them not lose it now!

What was that curse? for ye all heard me
speak.

First Voice (from the Mountains)

Thrice three hundred thousand years

75 O'er the Earthquake's couch we stood

Oft, as men convulsed with fears,

We trembled in our multitude

Second Voice (from the Springs)

Thunderbolts had parched our water,

We had been stained with bitter blood,

80 And had run mute, 'mid shrieks of slaughter,

Thro' a city and a solitude.

Third Voice (from the Air)

I had clothed, since Earth uprose,

Its wastes in colors not their own,

And oft had my serene repose

85 Been cloven by many a rending groan.

Fourth Voice (from the Whirlwinds)

We had soared beneath these mountains

Unresting ages; nor had thunder,

Nor yon volcano's flaming fountains,

Nor any power above or under 90 Ever made us mute with wonder.

First Voice

But never bowed our snowy crest

As at the voice of thine unrest.

Second Voice

Never such a sound before

To the Indian waves we bore

95 A pilot asleep on the howling sea

Leaped up from the deck in agony,

And heard, and cried, "Ah, woe is me!"

And died as mad as the wild waves be

Third Voice

By such dread words from Earth to Heaven

100 My still realm was never riven:

When its wound was closed, there stood

Darkness o'er the day like blood

Fourth Voice

And we shrank back for dreams of ruin

To frozen caves our flight pursuing 105 Made us keep silence—thus—and thus—

Though silence is as hell to us

The Earth. The tongueless 'Averns of the craggy hills

Cried "Miser!" then, the hollow Heaven replied

"Miser!" And the Ocean's purple waves, 110 Climbing the land, howled to the lashing
winds,

And the pale nations heard it, "Miser!"

Prometheus I heard a sound of voices not the voice

Which I gave forth. Mother, thy sons and thou

Scorn him, without whose all-enduring will 115 Beneath the fierce omnipotence of Jove,

Both they and thou had vanished, like thin mist

Unrolled on the morning wind Know ye not me,

The Titan? He who made his agony

The barrier to your else all-conquering foe?

120 O rock-embosomed lawns, and snow-fed
streams,

Now seen athwart froze¹ vapors, deep below,

Through whose o'ershadowing woods I wandered once

With Asia, drinking life from her loved eyes;

¹ frozen

- Why scorns the spirit which informs! ye,
now 125 To commune with me? me alone, who checked,
As one who checks a fiend-drawn charioteer,
The falsehood and the force of him who reigns Supreme, and with the groans of pining
slaves
Fills your dim glens and liquid wildernesses:
- 130 Why answer ye not, still? Brethren!
The Earth. They dare not Prometheus. Who dares? for I would hear that curse again.
Ha, what an awful whisper rises up!
'Tis scarce like sound: it tingles through the frame
As lightning tingles, hovering ere it strike 135 Speak, Spirit! from thine inorganic voice I only know that thou art moving near And love. How cursed I him?
The Earth. How canst thou hear Who knowest not the language of the dead?
Prometheus. Thou art a living spirit, speak as they.
- 140 The Earth. I dare not speak like life, lest Heaven's fell King Should hear, and link me to some wheel of
pain
More torturing than the one whereon I roll.
Subtle thou art and good, and though the Gods
Hear not this voice, yet thou art more than God, 145 Being wise and kind: earnestly hearken
now.
Prometheus. Obscurely through my brain, like shadows dim, Sweep awful thoughts, rapid and thick I feel
Faint, like one mingled in entwining love, Yet 'tis not pleasure.
The Earth. No, thou canst not hear 150 Thou art immortal, and this tongue is
known
Only to those who die.
Prometheus. And what art thou, O melancholy Voice?
The Earth. I am the Earth, Thy mother; she within whose stony veins,
To the last fibre of the loftiest tree 155 Whose thin leaves trembled in the frozen
air,
Joy ran, as blood within a living frame, When thou didst from her bosom, like a cloud
Of glory, arise, a spirit of keen joy!
animates
- And at thy voice her pining sons uplifted 160 Their prostrate brows from the polluting dust,
And our almighty Tyrant with fierce dread Grew pale, until his thunder chained thee
here.
Then—see those million worlds which burn and roll Around us—their inhabitants beheld 165 My spherèd light wane in wide Heaven,
the sea
Was lifted by strange tempest, and new fire
From earthquake-rifted mountains of bright snow
Shook its portentous hair beneath Heaven's frown,
Lightning and Inundation vexed the plains, 170 Blue thistles bloomed in cities; foodless toads Within voluptuous chambers panting crawled:
When Plague had fallen on man and beast and worn,
And Famine; and black blight on herb and tree;
And in the corn, and vines, and meadow-
grass,
175 Teemed ineradicable poisonous weeds Draming their growth; for my wan breast was dry
With grief; and the thin air, my breath, was stained
With the contagion of a mother's hate Breathed on her child's destroyer; ay, I heard 180 Thy curse, the which, if thou rememberest
not,
Yet my innumerable seas and streams, Mountains, and caves, and winds, and yon wide air,
And the inarticulate people of the dead, Preserve, a treasured spell. We meditate 185 In secret joy and hope those dreadful words,
But dare not speak them Prometheus. Venerable mother!
All else who live and suffer take from
thee
Some comfort; flowers, and fruits, and happy sounds,
And love, though fleeting; these may not be mine.
190 But mine own words, I pray, deny me not.
The Earth. They shall be told. Ere Babylon was dust,
The Magnus Zoroaster, my dead child,
Met his own image walking in the garden.
That apparition, sole of men, he saw.

- 195 For know there are two worlds of life and death:
 One that which thou beholdest; but the other Is underneath the grave, where do inhabit
 The shadows of all forms that think and live, Till death unite them and they part no more;
 200 Dreams and the light imaginings of men,
 And all that faith creates or love desires, Terrible, strange, sublime, and beauteous shapes.
 There thou art, and dost hang, a writhing shade,
 'Mid whirlwind-peopled mountains; all the gods 205 Are there, and all the powers of nameless worlds, Vast, sceptred phantoms; heroes, men, and beasts;
 And Demogorgon, a tremendous gloom,
 And he, the supreme Tyrant, on his throne Of burning gold. Son, one of these shall utter 210 The curse which all remember Call at will Thine own ghost, or the ghost of Jupiter, Hades or Typhon, or what mightier Gods
 From all-prolific Evil, since thy ruin
 Have sprung, and trampled on my prostrate sons.
 215 Ask, and they must reply: so the revenge
 Of the Supreme may sweep through vacant shades, As rainy wind through the abandoned gate
 Of a fallen palace.
Prometheus. Mother, let not aught
 Of that which may be evil, pass again 220 My lips, or those of aught resembling me Phantasm of Jupiter, arise, appear!
- Ione*
- My wings are folded o'er mine ears
 My wings are crossed o'er mine eyes Yet through their silver shade appears.
 225 And through their lulling plumes arise,
 A Shape, a throng of sounds;
 May it be no ill to thee
 O thou of many wounds!
 Near whom, for our sweet sister's sake, 230 Ever thus we watch and wake
- Panthea*
- The sound is of whirlwind underground, Earthquake, and fire, and mountains 235 cloven;
 The shape is awful like the sound, Clothed in dark purple, star-inwoven.
- A sceptre of pale gold To stay steps proud, o'er the slow cloud
 His venèd hand doth hold.
 Cruel he looks, but calm and strong,
 Like one who does, not suffers wrong.
- 240 Phantasm of Jupiter. Why have the secret powers of this strange world Driven me, a frail and empty phantom, hither
 On direst storms? What unaccustomed sounds
 Are hovering on my lips, unlike the voice
 With which our pallid race hold ghastly
 talk 245 In darkness? And, proud sufferer, who art thou?
Prometheus. Tremendous Image, as thou art must be He whom thou shadowest forth. I am his foe,
 The Titan. Speak the words which I would
 hear,
 Although no thought inform thine empty
 voice.
 250 The Earth. Listen! And though your echoes must be mute, Gray mountains, and old woods, and haunted springs, Prophetic caves, and isle-surrounding
 streams,
 Rejoice to hear what yet ye cannot speak.
Phantasm A spirit seizes me and speaks within 255 It tears me as fire tears a thunder-cloud Panthea See how he lifts his mighty looks! the Heaven Darkens above.
Ione. He speaks! O shelter me!
Prometheus I see the curse on gestures proud and cold,
 And looks of firm defiance, and calm hate, 260 And such despair as mocks itself with smiles,
 Written as on a scroll: yet speak: Oh,
 speak!
- Phantasm*
- Friend, I defy thee! with a calm, fixed
 mind.
 All that thou canst inflict I bid thee
 do;
 Foul Tyrant both of Gods and human-
 kind,
 One only being shalt thou not subdue.
 Rain then thy plagues upon me here,
 Ghastly disease, and frenzying fear;
 And let alternate frost and fire

Eat into me, and be thine ire 270 Lightning, and cutting hail, and legioned forms
 Of furies, driving by upon the wounding storms.
 Ay, do thy worst. Thou art omnipotent O'er all things but thyself I gave thee
 power,
 And my own will. Be thy swift mis-chiefs sent 275 To blast mankind, from yon ethereal tower.
 Let thy malignant spirit move In darkness over those I love
 On me and mine I imprecate
 The utmost torture of thy hate, 280 And thus devote to sleepless agony, This undeclining head while thou must reign on high.
 But thou, who art the God and Lord
 O thou Who fillest with thy soul this world of
 woe,
 To whom all things of Earth and Heaven do bow 285 In fear and worship—all-prevailing foe!
 I curse thee! let a sufferer's curse Clasp thee, his torturer, like remorse, Till thine Infinity shall be A robe of envenomed agony;¹
 290 And thine Omnipotence a crown of pain.
 To cling like burning gold round thy dissolving brain.
 Heap on thy soul, by virtue of this Curse, Ill deeds, then be thou damned, beholding good,
 Both infinite as is the universe, 295 And thou, and thy self-torturing solitude
 An awful image of calm power
 Though now thou sittest, let the hour Come, when thou must appear to be That which thou art internally;
 300 And after many a false and fruitless crime Scorn track thy lagging fall through boundless space and time.

Prometheus. Were these my words, O Parent?
The Earth. They were thine.
Prometheus. It doth repent me: words are quick and vain;
 Grief for awhile is blind, and so was mine 305 I wish no living thing to suffer pain.

¹ A reference to the shirt of Nessus which poisoned Hercules

The Earth

Misery, Oh, misery to me, That Jove at length should vanquish
 thee.
 Wail, howl aloud, Land and Sea,
 The Earth's rent heart shall answer ye 310 Howl, Spirits of the living and the dead, Your refuge, your defence lies fallen and vanquished!

First Echo

Lies fallen and vanquished!

Second Echo

Fallen and vanquished!

Ione

Fear not 'tis but some passing spasm,
 The Titan is unvanquished still.
 But see, where through the azure chasm
 Of yon forked and snowy hill Trampling the slant winds on high With golden-sandalled feet, that glow Under plumes of purple dye, Like rose-ensanguined ivory, 320 A Shape comes now, Stretching on high from his right hand
 A serpent-cinctured wand.

Panthea

'Tis Jove's world-wandering herald, Mercury

Ione

And who are those with hydra tresses
 And iron wings that climb the wind.
 Whom the frowning God represses,— Like vapors steaming up behind, 330 Clanging loud, an endless crowd?

Panthea

These are Jove's tempest-walking hounds, Whom he gluts with groans and blood, When charioted on sulphurous cloud
 He bursts Heaven's bounds

Ione

Are they now led from the thin dead
 On new pangs to be fed?

Panthea

The Titan looks as ever, firm, not proud

First Fury. Ha! I scent life!

Second Fury. Let me but look into his eyes!

¹ The rod entwined with two serpents and carried by Mercury

Third Fury. The hope of torturing him smells like a heap 340 Of corpses, to a death-bird after battle.

First Fury. Darest thou delay, O Herald! aid! take cheer, Hounds

Of Hell: what if the Son of Maia¹ soon Should make us food and sport—who can please long
The Omnipotent?

Mercury. Back to your towers of iron.
345 And gnash, beside the streams of fire, and wail,

Your foodless teeth Geryon, arise! and Gorgon, Chimæra, and thou Sphinx, subtlest of fiends

Who ministered to Thebes Heaven's poisoned wine,² Unnatural love, and more unnatural hate.

350 These shall perform your task Fust Fury Oh, mercy! mercy!

We die with our desire drive us not back!
Mercury Crouch then in silence

Awful Sufferer!
To thee unwilling, most unwillingly
I come, by the great Father's will driven
down,

355 To execute a doom of new revenge Alas! I pity thee, and hate myself

That I can do no more aye from thy sight

Returning, for a season, Heaven seems
Hell,

So thy worn form pursues me night and
day,

360 Smiling reproach. Wise art thou, firm and good,

But vainly wouldst stand forth alone in strife

Against the Omnipotent; as yon clear lamps

That measure and divide the weary years From which there is no refuge, long have taught

365 And long must teach. Even now thy Torturer arms

With the strange might of unimagined pains

The powers who scheme slow agonies in Hell,

And my commission is to lead them
here,

Or what more subtle, foul, or savage fiends 370 People the abyss, and leave them to their task.

¹ Mercury.
² The Sphinx propounded a riddle to the Thebans, and killed all passers-by who could not solve it. See DeQuincey's The Sphinx's Riddle.

Be it not so! there is a secret known To thee, and to none else of living things,¹
Which may transfer the sceptre of wide
Heaven,

The fear of which perplexes the Supreme 375 Clothe it in words, and bid it clasp his throne

In intercession, bend thy soul in prayer,
And like a suppliant in some gorgeous fane,

Let the will kneel within thy haughty
heart:

For benefits and meek submission tame 380 The fiercest and the mightiest.

Prometheus Evil minds Change good to their own nature. I gave
all

He has, and in return he chains me here Years, ages, night and day: whether the
Sun

Spht my parched skin, or in the moony
night

385 The crystal-winged snow cling round my hair.

Whilst my beloved race is trampled down
By his thought-executing ministers:

Such is the tyrant's recompense "Tis just.
He who is evil can receive no good,

390 And for a world bestowed, on a friend lost, He can feel hate, fear, shame, not gratitude:

He but requites me for his own misdeed.
Kindness to such is keen reproach, which breaks

With bitter stings the light sleep of Revenge.

395 Submission, thou dost know I cannot try:
For what submission but that fatal word,
The death-seal of mankind's captivity,

Like the Sicilian's han-suspended sword,³ Which trembles o'er his crown, would he accept,

400 Or could I yield? Which yet I will not yield.

Let others flatter Crime where it sits throned

In brief Omnipotence. secure are they For Justice, when triumphant, will weep
down

Pity, not punishment, on her own wrongs, 405 Too much avenged by those who err. I wait,

thrown. See Byron's Prometheus, 30-31 (p 322).

³ The sword which was suspended on a single hair over the head of Damocles while he was seated at a royal banquet, to rebuke him for his constant praises of the happiness of kings

- Enduring thus, the retributive hour
Which since we spake is even nearer now.
But hark, the hell-hounds clamor: fear delay: Behold! Heaven lowers under thy Father's frown.
- 410 Mercury. Oh, that we might be spared.
I to inflict
And thou to suffer! Once more answer me Thou knowest not the period of Jove's
power?
Prometheus. I know but this, that it must come.
Mercury. Alas!
Thou canst not count thy years to come of
pain!
- 415 Prometheus. They last while Jove must reign: nor more, nor less Do I desire or fear.
Mercury. Yet pause, and plunge Into Eternity, where recorded time, Even all that we imagine, age on age,
Seems but a point, and the reluctant mind
- 420 Flags wearily in its unending flight, Till it sink, dizzy, blind, lost, shelterless; Perchance it has not numbered the slow
years
Which thou must spend in torture, un-reprieved?
Prometheus. Perchance no thought can count them, yet they pass.
- 425 Mercury. If thou might'st dwell among the Gods the while Lapped in voluptuous joy?
Prometheus. I would not quit
This bleak ravine, these unrepentant pains.
Mercury. Alas! I wonder at, yet pity
thee
Prometheus. Pity the self-despising slaves of Heaven,
- 430 Not me, within whose mind sits peace
serene,
As light in the sun, throned. How vain is talk!
'Call up the fiends.
Ione. Oh, sister, look! White fire Has cloven to the roots yon huge snow-loaded cedar,
How fearfully God's thunder howls behind!
- 435 Mercury. I must obey his words and thine. Alas!
Most heavily remorse hangs at my heart!
Panthea. See where the child of Heaven, with winged feet, Runs down the slanted sunlight of the dawn.
- Ione.* Dear sister, close thy plumes over thine eyes.
- 440 Lest thou behold and die: they come—they
come—Blackening the birth of day with countless
wings,
And hollow underneath, like death.
First Fury. Prometheus!
Second Fury. Immortal Titan!
Third Fury. Champion of Heaven's slaves!
Prometheus. He whom some dreadful voice invokes is here,
- 445 Prometheus, the chained Titan. Horrible
forms,
What and who are ye? Never yet there came Phantasms so foul through monster-teeming Hell
From the all-miscreative brain of Jove, Whilst I behold such execrable shapes,
- 450 Methinks I grow like what I contemplate, And laugh and stare in loathsome sympathy.
First Fury. We are the ministers of pain, and fear,
And disappointment, and mistrust, and
hate,
And clinging crime, and as lean dogs pursue
- 455 Through wood and lake some struck and sobbing fawn,
We track all things that weep, and bleed, and live,
When the great King betrays them to our
will Prometheus. O many fearful natures in one name,
I know ye, and these lakes and echoes
know
- 460 The darkness and the clangor of your
wings
But why more hideous than your loathed
selves
Gather ye up in legions from the deep?
Second Fury. We knew not that Sisters, rejoice, rejoice!
- Prometheus.* Can aught exult in its de-formity?
- 465 Second Fury. The beauty of delight makes lovers glad,
Gazing on one another: so are we As from the rose which the pale priestess kneels
To gather for her festal crown of flowers
The aerial crimson falls, flushing her
cheek,
- 470 So from our victim's destined agony The shade which is our form invests us
round;
Else we are shapeless as our mother Night

Prometheus. I laugh your power, and his who sent you here, To lowest scorn.¹ Pour forth the cup of
pain.

475 First Fury. Thou thinkest we will rend 510 thee from bone,
And nerve from nerve, working like fire within?

Prometheus. Pain is my element, as hate is thine; 515

Ye rend me now I care not.

Second Fury. Dost imagine
We will but laugh into thy lidless eyes?

480 Prometheus I weigh not what ye do, but what ye suffer, Being evil Cruel was the power which 520 called

You, or aught else so wretched, into light

Third Fury Thou think'st we will live through thee, one by one,

Like animal life, and though we can obscure not

485 The soul which burns within, that we will dwell

Beside it, like a vain loud multitude Vexing the self-content of wisest men That we will be dread thought beneath thy
brain, 525

And foul desire round thine astonished
heart,

490 And blood within thy labyrinthine veins Crawling like agony?

Prometheus Why, ye are thus now.
Yet am I king over myself, and rule
The torturing and conflicting throngs
within,

As Jove rules you when Hell grows mutinous

Chorus of Furies

495 From the ends of the earth, from the ends of the earth,

Where the night has its grave and the morning its birth,

Come, come, come!

Oh, ye who shake hills with the scream of your mirth,

When cities sink howling in ruin, and ye 500 Who with wingless footsteps trample the 535
sea,

And close upon Shipwreck and Famine's track,

Sit chattering with joy on the foodless wreck;

Come, come, come!

505 Leave the bed, low, cold, and red, Strewed beneath a nation dead,

¹ See Macbeth, IV, 1, 79-80

Leave the hatred, as in ashes Fire is left for future burning.
It will burst in bloodier flashes

When ye stir it, soon returning:
Leave the self-contempt implanted In young spirits, sense-enchanted, Misery's yet unkindled fuel:
Leave Hell's secrets half unchanted
To the maniac dreamer; cruel
More than ye can be with hate Is he with fear

Come, come, come!

We are steaming up from Hell's wide gate And we burthen the blasts of the atmosphere,

520 But vainly we toil till ye come here

Ione. Sister, I hear the thunder of new
wings.

Panthea These solid mountains quiver with the sound

Even as the tremulous air then shadows
make

The space within my plumes more black than night.

First Fury

Your call was as a winged car Driven on whirlwinds fast and far;
It rapped us from red gulfs of war.

Second Fury

From wide cities, famine-wasted;

Third Fury

Groans half heard, and blood untasted;

Fourth Fury

530 Kingly conclaves stern and cold, Where blood with gold is bought and sold,

Fifth Fury

From the furnace, white and hot,
In which—

A Fury

Speak not whisper not:
I know all that ye would tell,
But to speak might break the spell Which must bend the Invincible,
The stern of thought;
He yet defies the deepest power of Hell.

A Fury

Tear the veil!

Another Fury

It is torn.

Chorus

The pale stars of the morn Shine on a misery, dire to be borne.
 Dost thou faint, mighty Titan? We laugh thee to scorn.
 Dost thou boast the clear knowledge thou waken'dst for man?
 Then was kindled within him a thirst which outran
 Those perishing waters, a thirst of fierce fever, 545 Hope, love, doubt, desire, which consume him forever.
 One came forth of gentle worth¹
 Smiling on the sanguine earth;
 His words outlived him, like swift poison Withering up truth, peace, and pity 550 Look! where round the wide horizon
 Many a million-peopled city Vomits smoke in the bright air.
 Mark that outcry of despair!
 'Tis his mild and gentle ghost 555 Wailing for the faith he kindled Look again! the flames almost To a glow-worm's lamp have dwindled.
 The survivors round the embers Gather in dread 560 Joy, joy, joy!
 Past ages crowd on thee, but each one remembers,
 And the future is dark, and the present is
 spread
 Like a pillow of thorns for thy slumberless
 head

Semichorus I

Drops of bloody agony flow 565 From his white and quivering brow Grant a little respite now:
 See! a disenchanted nation Springs like day from desolation,
 To Truth its state is dedicate, 570 And Freedom leads it forth, her mate.
 A legion'd band of link'd brothers Whom Love calls children—

Semichorus II

'Tis another's.
 See how kindred murder kin!
 'Tis the vintage-time for Death and Sin 575 Blood, like new wine, bubbles within Till Despair smothers
 The struggling world, which slaves and tyrants win.
 [All the FURIES vanish, except one

¹ A reference to Christ

Ione. Hark, sister! what a low yet dreadful groan

Quite unsuppressed is tearing up the heart 580 Of the good Titan, as storms tear the deep,
 And beasts hear the sea moan in inland caves.

Darest thou observe how the fiends torture
 him?

Panthea. Alas! I looked forth twice, but will no more.

Ione. What didst thou see?

Panthea. A woful sight: a youth 585 With patient looks nailed to a crucifix.

Ione. What next?

Panthea. The heaven around, the earth below,
 Was peopled with thick shapes of human
 death,
 All horrible, and wrought by human hands,
 And some appeared the work of human hearts,

590 For men were slowly killed by frowns and
 smiles:

And other sights too foul to speak and live Were wandering by. Let us not tempt worse fear

By looking forth: those groans are grief enough.

Fury. Behold an emblem: those who do endure

595 Deep wrongs for man, and scorn, and chains, but heap Thousandfold torment on themselves and
 him.

Prometheus. Remit the anguish of that lighted stare;

Close those wan lips; let that thorn-wounded brow

Stream not with blood; it mingles with thy tears!

600 Fix, fix those tortured orbs in peace and
 death,

So thy sick throes shake not that crucifix, So those pale fingers play not with thy gore.

Oh, horrible! Thy name I will not speak—
 It hath become a curse. I see, I see 605 The wise, the mild, the lofty, and the just,

Whom thy slaves hate for being like to
 thee,

Some hunted by foul lies from their heart's
 home,

An early-chosen, late-lamented home,
 As hooded ounces cling to the driven hind;¹

¹ The ounce is the cheetah, or leopard, which is used in Southern Asia for hunting deer. It is kept hooded, or blindfolded, until the game is sighted

- 610 Some linked to corpses in unwholesome cells:
 Some—hear I not the multitude laugh loud?—
 Impaled in lingering fire and mighty realms Float by my feet, like sea-uprooted isles, Whose sons are kneaded down in common blood
- 615 By the red light of their own burning homes.
Fury. Blood thou canst see, and fire, and canst hear groans,
 Worse things, unheard, unseen, remain behind.
Prometheus Worse?
Fury In each human heart terror survives
 The ruin it has gorged, the loftiest fear
- 620 All that they would disdain to think were true.
 Hypocrisy and custom make their minds
 The fanes of many a worship, now outworn
 They dare not devise good for man's estate,
 And yet they know not that they do not dare
- 625 The good want power, but to weep barren tears
 The powerful goodness want, worse need for them
 The wise want love, and those who love want wisdom,
 And all best things are thus confused to ill Many are strong and rich, and would be just,
- 630 But live among their suffering fellow-men
 As if none felt: they know not what they do Prometheus Thy words are like a cloud of winged snakes,
 And yet I pity those they torture not Fury Thou pitiest them? I speak no more! [Vanishes] Prometheus Ah woe!
- 635 Ah woe! Alas! pain, pain ever, forever!
 I close my tearless eyes, but see more clear Thy works within my woe-illumed mind.
 Thou subtle tyrant! Peace is in the grave
 The grave hides all things beautiful and good:
- 640 I am a God and cannot find it there, Nor would I seek it: for, though dread revenge,
 This is defeat, fierce King, not victory
 The sights with which thou torturest and my soul
- 645 When they shall be no types of things which are.
Panthea. Alas! what sawest thou?
Prometheus. There are two woes—
 To speak, and to behold, thou spare me one.
 Names are there, Nature's sacred watch-words, they Were borne aloft in bright emblazonry,
 The nations, thronged around, and cried aloud,
 As with one voice, Truth, Liberty, and Love!
 Suddenly fierce confusion fell from heaven
 Among them: there was strife, deceit, and fear Tyrants rushed in, and did divide the spoil
- 650 This was the shadow of the truth I saw The Earth. I felt thy torture, son, with such mixed joy As pain and virtue give. To cheer thy state
 I bid ascend those subtle and fair spirits, Whose homes are the dim caves of human thought,
 And who inhabit, as birds wing the wind,
 Its world-surrounding ether: they behold Beyond that twilight realm, as in a glass,
 The future: may they speak comfort to thee!
- Panthea* Look, sister, where a troop of spirits gather,
 Like flocks of clouds in spring's delightful weather, Thronging in the blue air!
Ione. And see! more come,
 Like fountain-vapors when the winds are dumb,
 That climb up the ravine in scattered lines
 And hark! is it the music of the pines?
 Is it the lake? Is it the water fall?
- 670 Panthea. 'Tis something sadder, sweeter far than all
- Chorus of Spirits*
- From unremembered ages we Gentle guides and guardians be Of heaven-oppressed mortality;
 And we breathe, and sicken not,
 The atmosphere of human thought.
 Be it dim, and dank, and gray,
 Like a storm-extinguished day,
 Travell'd o'er by dying gleams, Be it bright as all between Cloudless skies and windless streams, Silent, liquid, and serene;
 As the birds within the wind,
 As the fish within the wave,
 As the thoughts of man's own mind Float through all above the grave;

We make there our liquid lan, Voyaging cloudlike and unpent Through the boundless element :
 Thence we bear the prophecy
 Which begins and ends in thee !

Ione. More yet come, one by one the air around them
 Looks radiant as the air around a star.

First Spirit

On a battle-trumpet's blast
 I fled hither, fast, fast, fast,
 'Mid the darkness upward cast From the dust of creeds outworn,
 From the tyrant's banner torn,
 Gathering 'round me, onward borne,
 There was mingled many a cry—Freedom ! Hope ! Death ! Victory !
 Till they faded through the sky .
 And one sound, above, around,
 One sound beneath, around, above,
 Was moving ; 'twas the soul of love ,
 'Twas the hope, the prophecy,
 Which begins and ends in thee

Second Spirit

A rainbow's arch stood on the sea,
 Which rocked beneath, immovably .
 And the triumphant storm did flee,
 Like a conqueror, swift and proud, Between,¹ with many a captive cloud,
 A shapeless, dark and rapid crowd,
 Each by lightning riven in half I heard the thunder hoarsely laugh Mighty fleets were strewn like chaff
 And spread beneath a hell of death O'er the white waters. I alit
 On a great ship lightning-split,
 And speeded hither on the sigh
 Of one who gave an enemy
 His plank, then plunged aside to die.

Third Spirit

I sate beside a sage's bed,
 And the lamp was burning red Near the book where he had fed,
 When a Dream with plumes of flame,
 To his pillow hovering came,
 And I knew it was the same Which had kindled long ago Pity, eloquence, and woe ;
 And the world awhile below Wore the shade, its lustre made.
 It has borne me here as fleet
 As Desire's lightning feet :

I must ride it back ere morrow,
 Or the sage will wake in sorrow.

Fourth Spirit

On a poet's lips I slept Dreaming like a love-adept In the sound his breathing kept ;
 Nor seeks nor finds he mortal blisses,
 But feeds on the aerial kisses Of shapes that haunt thought's wildernesses.
 He will watch from dawn to gloom
 The lake-reflected sun illumine
 The yellow bees in the ivy-bloom, Nor heed nor see, what things they be,
 But from these create he can Forms more real than living man, Nurslings of immortality !
 One of these awakened me,
 And I sped to succor thee.

Ione

Behold'st thou not two shapes from the east and west
 Come, as two doves to one beloved nest, Twin nurslings of the all-sustaining air On swift still wings glide down the atmosphere ?
 And, hark ! their sweet, sad voices ! 'tis
 despair
 Mingled with love and then dissolved in
 sound.
Panthea. Canst thou speak, sister ? all my words are drowned Ione Their beauty gives me voice See how they float
 On their sustaining wings of skyey gram,² Orange and azure deepening into gold .
 Their soft smiles light the air like a star's fire

Chorus of Spirits

Hast thou beheld the form of Love ?

Fifth Spirit

As over wide dominions
 I sped, like some swift cloud that wings the wide air's wildernesses, That planet-crested Shape swept by on lightning-braided pinions, Scattering the liquid joy of life from his ambrosial³ tresses .
 His footsteps paved the world with light ;
 but as I passed 'twas fading, And hollow Ruin yawned behind : great sages bound in madness,

³ divinely beautiful

And headless patriots, and pale youths who perished, unupbraiding, 770 Gleamed in the night. I wandered o'er, till thou, O King of sadness, Turned by thy smile the worst I saw to recollected gladness

Sixth Spirit

Ah, sister! Desolation is a delicate thing It walks not on the earth, it floats not on
 the air,
 But treads with lulling footstep, and fans with silent wing 775 The tender hopes which in their hearts the best and gentlest bear.
 Who, soothed to false repose by the fanning plumes above
 And the music-stirring motion of its soft and busy feet, Dream visions of aerial joy, and call the monster, Love,
 And wake, and find the shadow Pain, as he whom now we greet

Chorus

780 Though Ruin now Love's shadow be, Following him, destroyingly,
 On Death's white and winged steed,¹
 Which the fleetest cannot flee, Trampling down both flower and weed, 785 Man and beast, and foul and fair,
 Like a tempest through the air,
 Thou shalt quell² this horseman grim, Woundless though in heart or limb.

Prometheus Spirits! how know ye this shall be?

Chorus

790 In the atmosphere we breathe, As buds grow red when the snow-storms
 flee,
 From Spring gathering up beneath, Whose mild winds shake the elder-brake,³
 And the wandering herdsmen know 795 That the white-thorn soon will blow:
 Wisdom, Justice, Love, and Peace,
 When they struggle to increase,
 Are to us as soft winds be To shepherd boys, the prophecy
 800 Which begins and ends in thee

Ione Where are the Spirits fled?

Panthea Only a sense Remains of them, like the omnipotence
 Of music, when the inspired voice and lute

Prometheus. How fair these anborn shapes! and yet I feel Most vain all hope but love, and thou art
 far,

Asia! who, when my being overflowed, 810 Wert like a golden chalice to bright wine Which else had sunk into the thirsty dust.
 All things are still. Alas! how heavily This quiet morning weighs upon my heart, Though I should dream I could even sleep with grief

815 If slumber were denied not. I would fain Be what it is my destiny to be,
 The savior and the strength of suffering
 man,

Or sink into the original gulf of things
 There is no agony, and no solace left, 820 Earth can console, Heaven can torment no
 more.

Panthea Hast thou forgotten one who watches thee
 The cold dark night, and never sleeps but when

The shadow of thy spirit falls on her?

Prometheus. I said all hope was vain but love thou lovest.

825 Panthea. Deeply in truth; but the eastern star looks white,
 And Asia waits in that far Indian vale,
 The scene of her sad exile, rugged once
 And desolate and frozen, like this ravine; But now invested with fair flowers and herbs,

830 And haunted by sweet airs and sounds, which flow

Among the woods and waters, from the ether
 Of her transforming presence, which would fade
 If it were mingled not with thine Farewell!

ACT II

SCENE I—Morning A lovely Vale in the Indian Caucasus ASIA alone

Asia From all the blasts of heaven thou hast descended

Yes, like a spirit, like a thought, which makes

Unwonted tears throng to the horny eyes,
 And beatings haunt the desolated heart,

5 Which should have learnt repose: thou hast descended

- Cradled in tempests, thou dost wake, O
Spring!
O child of many winds! As suddenly Thou comest as the memory of a dream, Which now is sad because it hath been
sweet;
- 10 Like genius, or like joy which riseth up As from the earth, clothing with golden clouds
The desert of our life
This is the season, this the day, the hour,
At sunrise thou shouldst come, sweet sister mine,¹
- 15 Too long desired, too long delaying, come!
How like death-worms the wingless moments crawl!
The point of one white star is quivering
still
Deep in the orange light of widening morn Beyond the purple mountains through a chasm
- 20 Of wind-divided mist the darker lake Reflects it now it wanes it gleams again
As the waves fade, and as the burning threads
Of woven cloud unravel in pale air
'Tis lost! and through yon peaks of cloud-like snow
- 25 The roseate sunlight quivers hear I not The Æolian music of her sea-green plumes Winnowing the crimson dawn?
- [PANTHEA enters
I feel, I see
- Those eyes which burn through smiles that fade in tears,
Like stars half-quenched in mists of silver
dew.
- 30 Belovèd and most beautiful, who wearest The shadow of that soul² by which I
live,
How late thou art! the spherèd sun had climbed
The sea; my heart was sick with hope,
before
The printless air felt thy belated plumes
- 35 Panthea Pardon, great sister! but my wings were faint
With the delight of a remembered dream, As are the noontide plumes of summer
winds Sate with sweet flowers. I was wont to sleep
Peacefully, and awake refreshed and calm Before the sacred Titan's fall and thy 40 Unhappy love had made, through use and pity,
Both love and woe familiar to my heart
- As they had grown to thine erewhile I slept
Under the glaucous³ caverns of old Ocean 45 Within dim bowers of green and purple
moss,
Our young Ione's soft and milky aims Locked then, as now, behind my dark, moist
hair,
While my shut eyes and cheek were pressed within
The folded depth of her life-breathing bosom:
- 50 But not as now, since I am made the wind Which fails beneath the music that I bear Of thy most wordless converse, since dissolved
Into the sense with which love talks, my rest
Was troubled and yet sweet; my waking
hours
- 55 Too full of care and pain Asia. Lift up thine eyes,
And let me read thy dream.
Panthea As I have said
With our sea-sister at his feet I slept The mountain mists, condensing at our voice
Under the moon, had spread their snowy flakes, 60 From the keen ice shielding our linkèd
sleep
Then two dreams came One, I remember
not
But in the other his pale wound-worn limbs Fell from Prometheus, and the azure night Glew radiant with the glory of that form 65 Which lives unchanged within, and his voice fell Like music which makes giddy the dim
brain,
Faint with intoxication of keen joy.
"Sister of her whose footsteps pave the
world
With loveliness—more fair than aught but
her, 70 Whose shadow thou art—lift thine eyes on
me"
I lifted them: the overpowering light
Of that immortal shape was shadowed
o'er
By love; which, from his soft and flowing limbs,
And passion-parted lips, and keen, faint
eyes, 75 Steamed forth like vaporous fire, an atmosphere

¹ Panthea² The soul of Prometheus³ bluish green (Glaucus was a sea god, originally a fisherman, who became immortal by tasting magic grass)

- Which wrapp'd me in its all-dissolving power;
 As the warm ether of the morning sun Wraps ere it drinks some cloud of wandering dew.
- I saw not, heard not, moved not, only felt 80 His presence flow and mingle through my blood
 Till it became his life, and his grew mine.
 And I was thus absorbed, until it passed,
 And like the vapours when the sun sinks
 down,
 Gathering again in drops upon the pines, 85 And tremulous as they, in the deep night
 My being was condensed, and as the rays Of thought were slowly gathered, I could hear
 His voice, whose accents lingered ere they died
 Like footsteps of weak melody thy name 90 Among the many sounds alone I heard Of what might be articulate, though still I listened through the night when sound was none.
 I one wakened then, and said to me
 "Canst thou divine what troubles me tonight?"
- 95 I always knew what I desired before, Nor ever found delight to wish in vain
 But now I cannot tell thee what I seek, I know not; something sweet, since it is
 sweet
 Even to desire; it is thy sport, false sister, 100 Thou hast discovered some enchantment
 old, Whose spells have stolen my spirit as I slept
 And mingled it with thine for when just
 now
 We kissed, I felt within thy parted lips The sweet air that sustained me, and the warmth 105 Of the life-blood, for loss of which I faint, Quivered between our intertwining arms"
 I answered not, for the Eastern star grew pale,
 But fled to thee Asia "Thou speakest, but thy words Are as the air: I feel them not. Oh, lift 110 Thine eyes, that I may read his written soul!
Panthea. I lift them though they droop beneath the load
 Of that they would express; what canst thou see But thine own fairest shadow imaged
 there?
Asia. Thine eyes are like the deep, blue, boundless heaven
- 115 Contracted to two circles underneath Their long, fine lashes, dark, far, measure-
 less,
 Orb within orb, and line through line inwoven.
Panthea. Why lookest thou as if a spirit passed?
Asia. There is a change, beyond their inmost depth 120 I see a shade, a shape 'tis he, arrayed In the soft light of his own smiles, which spread Like radiance from the cloud-surrounded
 moon.
 Prometheus, it is thine! depart not yet!
 Say not those smiles that we shall meet
 again 125 Within that bright pavilion which then beams Shall build on the waste world? The dream is told.
 What shape is that between us? Its rude
 hair
 Roughens the wind that lifts it, its regard¹
 Is wild and quick, yet 'tis a thing of air, 130 For through its gray robe gleams the golden dew
 Whose stars the noon has quenched not.
Dream. . . Follow! Follow!
Panthea. It is mine other dream Asia. . . It disappears.
Panthea. It passes now into my mind.
 Methought
 As we sat here, the flower-unfolding buds 135 Burst on you lightning-blasted almond-tree,
 When swift from the white Scythian wilderness
 A wind swept forth wrinkling the Earth with frost.
 I looked, and all the blossoms were blown
 down;
 But on each leaf was stamped, as the blue bells
 140 Of Hyacinth tell Apollo's written grief,² OH, FOLLOW, FOLLOW!
Asia. As you speak, your words Fill, pause by pause, my own forgotten
 sleep
 With shapes Methought among these lawns together
 We wandered, underneath the young gray
 dawn,
 145 And multitudes of dense white fleecy clouds
- ¹ look; aspect
² The interjection Al (woe), thought to be visible on the petals of the hyacinth, which sprang from the blood of Hyacinthus, accidentally killed by Apollo

Were wandering in thick flocks along the mountains
Shepherded by the slow, unwilling wind,
And the white dew on the new-bladed
grass,
Just piercing the dark earth, hung silently, 150 And there was more which I remember
not:
But on the shadows of the morning clouds, Athwart the purple mountain slope, was written FOLLOW, OH, FOLLOW! as they vanished
by;
And on each herb, from which Heaven's dew had fallen, 155 The like was stamped, as with a withering
fire,
A wind arose among the pines, it shook The clinging music from their boughs, and
then
Low, sweet, faint sounds, like the farewell of ghosts,
Were heard OH, FOLLOW, FOLLOW, FOL-LOW ME!
160 And then I said: "Panthea, look on me"
But in the depth of those beloved eyes Still I saw, FOLLOW, FOLLOW!
Echo. Follow, follow!
Panthea. The crags, this clear spring morning, mock our voices
As they were spirit-tongued Asa It is some being 165 Around the crags What fine clear sounds!
Oh list!

Echoes (unseen)

Echoes we listen!
We cannot stay.
As dew-stars glisten
Then fade away—
170 Child of Ocean!

Asa. Hark! Spirits speak. The liquid responses
Of their aerial tongues yet sound.
Panthea I hear.

Echoes

Oh, follow, follow,
As our voice recedeth 175 Through the caverns hollow,
Where the forest spreadeth;

(More distant)

Oh, follow, follow!
Through the caverns hollow,
180 As the song floats thou pursue,
Where the wild bee never flew,

Through the noontide darkness deep,
By the odor-breathing sleep
Of faint night-flowers, and the waves
At the fountain-lighted caves, 185 While our music, wild and sweet, Mocks thy gently falling feet,
Child of Ocean!

Asia. Shall we pursue the sound? It grows more faint and distant.

Panthea. List! the strain floats nearer now.

Echoes

In the world unknown
Sleeps a voice unspoken, By thy step alone
Can its rest be broken.
Child of Ocean!

Asia. How the notes sink upon the ebbing wind!

Echoes

Oh, follow, follow!
Through the caverns hollow,
As the song floats thou pursue,
By the woodland noontide dew,
By the forest, lakes, and fountains,
Through the many-folded mountains, 200 To the rents, and gulfs, and chasms, Where the Earth reposed from spasms,
On the day when he and thou Parted, to commingle now, 205 Child of Ocean!

Asia. Come, sweet Panthea, link thy hand in mine,
And follow, ere the voices fade away

SCENE II.—A Forest, intermingled with Rocks and Caverns. ASIA and PANTHEA pass into it. Two young Fauns are sitting on a Rock listening

Semichorus I of Spirits

The path through which that lovely twain
Have passed, by cedar, pine, and yew,
And each dark tree that ever grew,
Is curtained out from Heaven's wide
blue;
5 Nor sun, nor moon, nor wind, nor rain,
Can pierce its interwoven bowers, Nor aught, save where some cloud of
dew,
Drifted along the earth-creeping breeze,
Between the trunks of the hoar trees,

10 Hangs each a pearl in the pale flowers
 Of the green laurel, blown anew,
 And bends, and then fades silently,
 One frail and fair anemone:
 Or when some star of many a one 15 That climbs and wanders through steep
 night,
 Has found the cleft through which alone Beams fall from high those depths upon Ere it is borne away, away,
 By the swift Heavens that cannot stay, 20 It scatters drops of golden light, Like lines of rain that ne'er unite.
 And the gloom divine is all around,
 And underneath is the mossy ground.

Semichorus II

There the voluptuous nightingales, 25 Are awake through all the broad noon-
 day.
 When one with bliss or sadness fails,
 And through the windless my-
 boughs,
 Sick with sweet love, droops dying
 away
 On its mate's music-panting bosom; 30 Another from the swinging blossom, Watching to catch the languid close (Of the last strain, then lifts on high The wings of the weak melody Till some new strain of feeling bear 35 The song, and all the woods are mute, When there is heard through the dim
 air
 The rush of wings, and rising there Like many a lake-surrounded flute, Sounds overflow the listener's brain 40 So sweet, that joy is almost pain.

Semichorus I

There those enchanted eddies play
 Of echoes, music-tongued, which draw,
 By Demogorgon's mighty law,
 With melting rapture, or sweet awe, 45 All spirits on that secret way,
 As inland boats are driven to Ocean Down streams made strong with mountain-thaw:
 And first there comes a gentle sound
 To those in talk or slumber bound.
 50 And wakes the destined soft emotion,— Attracts, impels them; those who saw Say from the breathing earth behind There steams a plume-uplifting wind Which drives them on their path, while they

Believe their own swift wings and feet
 The sweet desires within obey:
 And so they float upon their way,
 Until, still sweet, but loud and strong,
 The storm of sound is driven along, 60 Sucked up and hurrying: as they fleet Behind, its gathering billows meet
 And to the fatal mountain¹ bear Like clouds amid the yielding air.

First Faun. Canst thou imagine where those spirits live

65 Which make such delicate music in the woods?
 We haunt within the least frequented caves And closest coverts, and we know these wilds,
 Yet never meet them, though we hear them oft:

Where may they hide themselves?

Second Faun. 'Tis hard to tell:

70 I have heard those more skilled in spirits
 say,

The bubbles, which the enchantment of the
 sun

Sucks from the pale faint water-flowers that pave

The oozy bottom of clear lakes and pools, Are the pavilions where such dwell and float

75 Under the green and golden atmosphere Which noontide kindles through the woven
 leaves;

And when these burst, and the thin fiery
 air,

The which they breathed within those lucent domes,

Ascends to flow like meteors through the
 night,

80 They ride on them, and rein their headlong speed,

And bow their burning crests, and glide in
 fire

Under the waters of the earth again.

First Faun. If such live thus, have others other lives,

Under pink blossoms or within the bells 85 Of meadow flowers, or folded violets deep,
 Or on their dying odors, when they die,

Or in the sunlight of the spherèd dew?

Second Faun. Ay, many more which we may well divine

But, should we stay to speak, noontide would come,

90 And thwart² Silenus find his goats un-drawn,

 rise in the next scene

² perverse; stubborn

And grudge to sing those wise and lovely songs
 Of Fate, and Chance, and God, and Chaos old,
 And Love, and the chained Titan's woful doom,
 And how he shall be loosed, and make the earth 95 One brotherhood: delightful strains which cheer
 Our solitary twilights, and which charm
 To silence the unenvying nightingales.

SCENE III.—A Pinnacle of Rock among Mountains. ASIA and PANTHEA

Panthea. Hither the sound has borne us—to the realm Of Demogorgon, and the mighty portal,
 Like a volcano's meteor-breathing chasm, Whence the oracular vapor is hurled up 5 Which lonely men drink wandering in their youth,
 And call truth, virtue, love, genius, or joy.
 That maddening wine of life, whose dregs they drain
 To deep intoxication; and uplift, Like Mænads who cry loud, Evoe! Evoe!
 10 The voice which is contagion to the world Asia. Fit throne for such a Power!
 Magnificent!
 How glorious art thou, Earth! And if thou be The shadow of some spirit lovelier still, Though evil stain its work, and it should be 15 Like its creation, weak yet beautiful,
 I could fall down and worship that and thee.
 Even now my heart adareth. Wonderful!
 Look, sister, ere the vapor dim thy brain Beneath is a wide plain of billowy mist, 20 As a lake, paving in the morning sky,
 With azure waves which burst in silver light, Some Indian vale. Behold it, rolling on Under the curdling winds, and islanding
 The peak whereon we stand, midway around, 25 Encinctured by the dark and blooming forests, Dim twilight-lawns, and stream-illuminated caves,
 And wind-enchanted shapes of wandering mist;
 And far on high the keen sky-cleaving
 30 mountains
 From icy spires of sun-like radiance fling

30 The dawn, as lifted Ocean's dazzling spray,
 From some Atlantic islet scattered up, Spangles the wind with lamp-like water-drops
 The vale is girdled with their walls, a howl
 Of cataracts from their thaw-cloven ravines, 35 Satiates the listening wind, continuous, vast,
 Awful as silence Hark! the rushing snow!
 The sun-awakened avalanche! whose mass,
 Thrice sifted by the storm, had gathered there Flake after flake, in heaven-defying minds 40 As thought by thought is piled, till some great truth Is loosened, and the nations echo round, Shaken to their roots, as do the mountains now Panthea. Look how the gusty sea of mist is breaking In crimson foam, even at our feet! it rises 45 As Ocean at the enchantment of the moon Round foodless men wrecked on some oozy isle Asia. The fragments of the cloud are scattered up,
 The wind that lifts them disentwines my hair;
 Its billows now sweep o'er mine eyes: my brain 50 Grows dizzy; I see shapes within the mist Panthea. A countenance with beckoning smiles, there burns An azure fire within its golden locks!
 Another and another hark! they speak!

Song of Spirits

To the deep, to the deep,
 55 Down, down!
 Through the shade of sleep,
 Through the cloudy strife
 Of Death and of Life;
 Through the veil and the bar 60 Of things which seem and are Even to the steps of the remotest throne,
 Down, down!
 While the sound whirls around,
 Down, down!
 As the fawn draws the hound,
 As the lightning the vapor,
 As the weak moth the taper,
 Death, despair; love, sorrow;

Time both ; today, tomorrow ;
 70 As steel obeys the spirit of the stone,
 Down, down !

Through the gray, void abysm,
 Down, down !

Where the air is no prism, 75 And the moon and stars are not,
 And the cavern-crag wears not The radiance of Heaven,
 Nor the gloom to Earth given,
 Where there is one pervading, one
 alone,
 80 Down, down !

In the depth of the deep,
 Down, down !
 Like veiled lightning asleep,
 Like the spark nursed in embers, 85 The last look Love remembers, Like a diamond, which shines
 On the dark wealth of mines,
 A spell is treasured but for thee alone.
 Down, down !

We have bound thee, we guide thee ;
 Down, down !
 With the bright form beside thee, Resist not the weakness,
 Such strength is in meekness 90 That the Eternal, the Immortal, Must unloose through life's portal
 The snake-like Doom coiled underneath his throne
 By that alone.

SCENE IV — The Cave of Demogorgon.
ASIA and PANTHEA.

Panthea What veiled form sits on that ebony throne ?

Asia The veil has fallen

Panthea I see a mighty darkness Filling the seat of power, and rays of gloom
 Dart round, as light from the meridian
 sun

5 Ungazed upon and shapeless, neither limb, Nor form, nor outline, yet we feel it is A living Spirit.

Demogorgon Ask what thou wouldst
 know

Asia. What canst thou tell ?

Demogorgon. All things thou dar'st demand.

Asia. Who made the living world ?

Demogorgon. God.

Asia. Who made all

10 That it contains ? thought, passion, reason,
 will.

Imagination ?

Demogorgon. God : Almighty God.

Asia. Who made that sense which, when the winds of spring

In rarest visitation, or the voice

Of one beloved heard in youth alone,

15 Fills the faint eyes with falling tears which dim

The radiant looks of unbewailing flowers,
 And leaves this peopled earth a solitude

When it returns no more ?

Demogorgon. Merciful God

Asia. And who made terror, madness, crime, remorse,

20 Which form the links of the great chain of things,

To every thought within the mind of man Sway and drag heavily, and each one reels

Under the load towards the pit of death Abandoned hope, and love that turns to hate ;

25 And self-contempt, bitterer to drink than
 blood,

Pain, whose unheeded and familiar speech Is howling, and keen shrieks, day after
 day ;

And Hell, or the sharp fear of Hell ?

Demogorgon. He reigns.

Asia Utter his name ; a world pinning in pain

30 Asks but his name ; curses shall drag him
 down.

Demogorgon He reigns.

Asia. I feel, I know it : who ?

Demogorgon He reigns

Asia Who reigns ? There was the Heaven and Earth at first,

And Light and Love ; then Saturn, from whose throne

Time fell, an envious shadow : such the state

35 Of the earth's primal spirits beneath his sway,

As the calm joy of flowers and living
 leaves

Before the wind or sun has withered them
 And scurvy worms, but he refused

The birthright of their being, knowledge,
 power,

40 The skill which wields the elements, the
 thought

Which pierces this dim universe like light, Self-empire, and the majesty of love ;

For thirst of which they fainted Then Prometheus

Gave wisdom, which is strength, to Jupiter,

45 And with this law alone, "Let man be free,"

- Clothed him with the dominion of wide
Heaven.
To know nor faith, nor love, nor law; to be Omnipotent but friendless, is to reign;
And Jove now reigned, for on the race of man
- 50 First famine, and then toil, and then disease,
Strife, wounds, and ghastly death unseen
before,
Fell; and the unseasonable seasons drove With alternating shafts of frost and
fire,
Their shelterless, pale tribes to mountain caves.
- 55 And in their desert hearts fierce wants he sent,
And mad disquietudes, and shadows idle
Of unreal good, which levied mutual war,
So ruining the lair wherein they raged Prometheus saw, and waked the legioned hopes
- 60 Which sleep within folded Elysian flowers.
Nepenthe, Moly, Amaranth,¹ fadeless blooms,
That they might hide with thim and rainbow wings
The shape of Death; and Love he sent to bind
The disunited tendrils of that vine
- 65 Which bears the wine of life, the human
heart;
And he tamed fire which, like some beast of prey,
Most terrible, but lovely, played beneath The frown of man; and tortured to his
will Iron and gold, the slaves and signs of
power,
- 70 And gems and poisons, and all subtlest
forms Hidden beneath the mountains and the waves.
He gave man speech, and speech created
thought,
Which is the measure of the universe;
And Science struck the thrones of earth
and heaven.
- 75 Which shook, but fell not, and the harmonious mind
Poured itself forth in all-prophetic song,
And music lifted up the listening spirit Until it walked, exempt from mortal care,
- Godlike, o'er the clear billows of sweet
sound;
80 And human hands first mimicked and then mocked,
With moulded limbs more lovely than its
own,
The human form, till marble grew divine;
And mothers, gazing, drank the love men
see Reflected in their race, behold, and perish.
- 85 He told the hidden power of herbs and
springs,
And Disease drank and slept. Death grew like sleep.
He taught the implicated¹ orbits woven Of the wide-wandering stars; and how
the sun
Changes his lair, and by what secret spell
- 90 The pale moon is transformed, when her broad eye
Gazes not on the interlunar² sea
He taught to rule, as life directs the limbs,
The tempest-winged chariots of the Ocean,
And the Celt knew the Indian Cities then
- 95 Were built, and through their snow-like columns flowed
The warm winds, and the azure ether
shone,
And the blue sea and shadowy hills were
seen.
Such, the alleviations of his state, Prometheus gave to man, for which he hangs
- 100 Withering in destined pain but who rains
down
Evil, the immedicable plague, which, while Man looks on his creation like a God And sees that it is glorious, drives him on,
The wreck of his own will, the scorn of
earth,
- 105 The outcast, the abandoned, the alone?
Not Jove while yet his frown shook heaven, ay, when His adversary from adamant chains Cursed him, he trembled like a slave Declare
Who is his master? Is he too a slave?
- 110 Demogorgon. All spirits are enslaved which serve things evil:
Thou knowest if Juniter be such or no Asia. Whom calledst thou God?
Demogorgon. I spoke but as ye speak.
For Jove is the supreme of living things Ana Who is the master of the slave?
Demogorgon If the abyss
115 Could vomit forth its secrets—but a voice

¹ Nepenthe was a magic drug which caused forgetfulness of sorrow (Odyssey, 4, 221). Moly was the herb given by Hermes to Odysseus to counteract the spells of Circe (Odyssey, 10, 302 ff). Amaranth was an imaginary flower supposed never to fade (Paradise Lost, 2, 353 ff).

¹ Interwoven

² That is, in the interval between the old moon and the new

- Is wanting, the deep truth is imageless;
 For what would it avail to bid thee gaze On the revolving world? What to bid
 speak
 Fate, Time, Occasion, Chance, and Change?
 To these
- 120 All things are subject but eternal Love Asia. So much I asked before, and my heart gave
 The response thou hast given; and of such truths
 Each to himself must be the oracle
 One more demand, and do thou answer
 me
- 125 As mine own soul would answer, did it
 know
 That which I ask Prometheus shall arise Henceforth the sun of this rejoicing world:
 When shall the destined hour arrive?
Demogorgon Behold!
Asia. The rocks are cloven, and through the purple night
- 130 I see cars drawn by rainbow-winged steeds
 Which trample the dim winds; in each there stands
 A wild-eyed charioteer urging their flight Some look behind, as fiends pursued them
 there,
 And yet I see no shapes but the keen
 stars
- 135 Others, with burning eyes, lean forth, and drink
 With eager lips the wind of their own
 speed,
 As if the thing they loved fled on before,
 And now, even now, they clasped it.
 Their bright locks Stream like a comet's flashing hair, they
 all Sweep onward
- 140 Demogorgon These are the immortal
 Hours,
 Of whom thou didst demand. One waits for thee.
Asia A spirit with a dreadful countenance
 Checks its dark chariot by the craggy gulf
 Unlike thy brethren, ghastly charioteer, 145 Who art thou? Whither wouldst thou bear me? Speak!
- Spirit.* I am the Shadow of a destiny More dread than is my aspect; ere yon planet
 Has set, the darkness which ascends with
 me
 Shall wrap in lasting night heaven's kingless throne
- 150 Asia. What meanest thou?
Panthea. That terrible Shadow floats Up from its throne, as may the lurid smoke
 Of earthquake-ruined cities o'er the sea.
 Lo! it ascends the car, the coursers fly Terrified, watch its path among the stars Blackening the night!
- 155 Asia Thus I am answered strange!
Panthea See, near the verge, another chariot stays;
 An ivory shell inlaid with crimson fire, Which comes and goes within its sculptured rim
 Of delicate strange tracery; the young
 Spirit
 160 That guides it has the dove-like eyes of hope,
 How its soft smiles attract the soul! as
 light
 Lures winged insects through the lampless
 air.
- Spirit*
- My coursers are fed with the lightning,
 They drink of the whirlwind's stream, 165 And when the red morning is bright-
 'ning
 They bathe in the fresh sunbeam, They have strength for their swiftness I deem,
 Then ascend with me, daughter of Ocean.
- I desire—and their speed makes night kindle,
 I fear—they outstrip the typhoon; Ere the cloud piled on Atlas can dwindle,
 We encircle the earth and the moon.
 We shall rest from long labors at noon:
 Then ascend with me, daughter of Ocean.
- SCENE V — The Car pauses within a Cloud on the top of a snowy Mountain. ASIA, PANTHEA, and the SPIRIT OF THE HOUR.
- Spirit*
- On the brink of the night and the morning
 My coursers are wont to respire, But the Earth has just whispered a warning
 That their flight must be swifter than
 fire:
 5 They shall drink the hot speed of desire!

Asia. Thou breathest on their nostrils, but my breath
Would give them swifter speed.

Spirit. Alas! it could not.

Panthea. O Spirit! pause, and tell whence is the light Which fills this cloud? the sun is yet unrisen.

10 Spirit. The sun will rise not until noon. Apollo

Is held in heaven by wonder; and the light Which fills this vapor, as the aerial hue
Of fountain-gazing roses fills the water, Flows from thy mighty sister.

Panthea. Yes, I feel—

15 Asia. What is it with thee, sister?
Thou art pale.

Panthea. How thou art changed! I dare not look on thee,

I feel but see thee not. I scarce endure
The radiance of thy beauty Some good
change

Is working in the elements, which suffer 20 Thy presence thus unveiled. The Nereids
tell

That on the day when the clear hyaline¹ Was cloven at thine uprise, and thou didst stand

Within a veined shell, which floated on Over the calm floor of the crystal sea;

25 Among the Ægean isles, and by the shores Which bear thy name,—love, like the atmosphere

Of the sun's fire filling the living world, Burst from thee, and illumined earth and
heaven

And the deep ocean and the sunless caves

30 And all that dwells within them, till grief
cast

Eclipse upon the soul from which it came.

Such art thou now; nor is it I alone, Thy sister, thy companion, thine own chosen one,

But the whole world which seeks thy sympathy.

35 Hearest thou not sounds i' the air which speak the love

Of all articulate beings? Feelest thou not The inanimate winds enamoured of thee?

Like the wide heaven, the all-sustaining
air,

It makes the reptile equal to the God.
They who inspire it most are fortunate, 45 As I am now; but those who feel it most Are happier still, after long sufferings, As I shall soon become.

Panthea Last! Spirits speak

Voice in the Air, singing

Life of Life! thy lips enkindle

With their love the breath between
them;

50 And thy smiles before they dwindle Make the cold air fire; then screen
them

In those looks, where whose gazes Faints, entangled in their mazes

Child of Light! thy limbs are burning 55 Through the vest which seems to hide
them,

As the radiant lines of morning Through the clouds ere they divide
them;

And this atmosphere divinest Shrouds thee wheresoe'er thou shinest

60 Fair are others, none beholds thee,
But thy voice sounds low and tender Like the fairest, for it folds thee

From the sight, that liquid splendor.
And all feel, yet see thee never, 65 As I feel now, lost forever!

Lamp of Earth! where'er thou movest Its dim shapes are clad with bright-
ness,

And the souls of whom thou lovest 70 Walk upon the winds with lightness, Till they fail, as I am failing, Dizzy, lost, yet unbewailing!

Asia

My soul is an enchanted boat,
Which, like a sleeping swan, doth float
Upon the silver waves of thy sweet singing:

75 And thine doth like an angel sit Beside a helm conducting it Whilst all the winds with melody are ringing.

It seems to float ever, forever,
Upon that many-winding river, 80 Between mountains, woods, abysses,
A paradise of wildernesses!

Till, like one in slumber bound, Borne to the ocean, I float down, around,
Into a sea profound, of ever-spreading
sound

85 Meanwhile thy spirit lifts its pinions
 In music's most serene dominions, Catching the winds that fan that happy
 heaven.
 And we sail on, away, afar,
 Without a course, without a star, 90 But, by the instinct of sweet music driven, Till through Elysian garden islets
 By thee, most beautiful of pilots, Where never mortal pinnacle glided,
 The boat of my desire is guided 95 Realms where the air we breathe is love, Which in the winds and on the waves doth
 move,
 Harmonizing this earth with what we feel
 above.

We have passed Age's icy caves,
 And Manhood's dark and tossing waves, 100 And Youth's smooth ocean, smiling to betray.
 Beyond the glassy gulfs we flee
 Of shadow-peopled Infancy, Through Death and Birth, to a diviner
 day;
 A paradise of vaulted bowers, 105 Lit by downward-gazing flowers, And watery paths that wind between Wildernesses calm and green, Peopled by shapes too bright to see,
 And rest, having beheld; somewhat like
 thee;
 110 Which walk upon the sea, and chant melodiously!

SCENE I—Heaven JUPITER on his Throne; THETIS and the other Deities assembled.

Jupiter. Ye congregated powers of heaven, who share
 The glory and the strength of him ye serve,
 Rejoice! henceforth I am omnipotent
 All else had been subdued to me, alone 5 The soul of man, like unextinguished fire, Yet burns towards heaven with fierce reproach and doubt,
 And lamentation, and reluctant prayer, Hurling up insurrection, which might
 make
 Our antique empire insecure, though built 10 On eldest faith, and hell's coeval, fear;
 And though my curses through the pendulous air,
 Like snow on herbless peaks, fall flake by flake,

And cling to it, though under my wrath's
 night
 It climb the crags of life, step after step,
 15 Which wound it, as ice wounds unsan-dalled feet,
 It yet remains supreme o'er misery,
 Aspiring, unrepressed, yet soon to fall.
 Even now have I begotten a strange wonder,
 That fatal child, the terror of the earth, 20 Who waits but till the destined hour arrive,
 Bearing from Demogorgon's vacant throne
 The dreadful might of ever-living limbs
 Which clothed that awful spirit unbeheld, To redescend, and trample out the spark.
 25 Pour forth heaven's wine, Idæan Ganymede,
 And let it fill the dædal¹ cups like fire,
 And from the flower-inwoven soil divine, Ye all-triumphant harmonies, arise,
 As dew from earth under the twilight
 stars
 30 Drink! be the nectar circling through your veins
 The soul of joy, ye ever-living Gods, Till exultation burst in one wide voice Like music from Elysian winds.
 And thou
 Ascend beside me, veiled in the light 35 Of the desire which makes thee one with
 me,
 Thetis, bright image of eternity!
 When thou didst cry, "Insufferable might!
 God! Spare me! I sustain not the quick flames,
 The penetrating presence, all my being.
 40 Like him whom the Numidian seps did thaw
 Into a dew with poison,² is dissolved, Sinking through its foundations," even
 then
 Two mighty spirits, mingling, made a third Mightier than either, which, unbodied
 now,
 45 Between us floats, felt, although unbeheld, Waiting the incarnation, which ascends.
 (Hear ye the thunder of the fiery wheel-(hiding³ the winds⁴) from Demogorgon's throne.

 world,

[*The Car of the HOUR arrives.
DEMOGORGON descends, and moves towards the Throne of JUPITER*

Awful shape, what art thou? Speak!
Demogorgon. Eternity Demand no drier name.

Descend, and follow me down the abyss.
I am thy child, as thou wert Saturn's
child;

- 55 Mightier than thee and we must dwell together Henceforth in darkness. Lift thy lightnings not.

The tyranny of heaven none may retain,
Or reassume, or hold, succeeding thee:
Yet if thou wilt, as 'tis the destiny

- 60 Of trodden worms to writhe till they are
dead,
Put forth thy might.

Jupiter. Detested prodigy!
Even thus beneath the deep Titanian prisons¹
I trample thee! Thou lingerest?

- Mercy! mercy!
No pity, no release, no respite! Oh, 65 That thou wouldst make mine enemy my judge,
Even where he hangs, seared by my long
revenge,
On Caucasus! he would not doom me thus Gentle, and just, and dreadful, is he not The monarch of the world? What then art thou?
No refuge! no appeal!

- 70 Sink with me then,
We two will sink on the wide waves of ruin,
Even as a vulture and a snake outspent Drop, twisted in inextricable fight, Into a shoreless sea Let hell unlock 75 Its mounded oceans of tempestuous fire, And whelm on them into the bottomless void
This desolated world, and thee, and me,
The conqueror and the conquered, and the wreck
Of that for which they combated.

Ai! Ai!²

- 80 The elements obey me not I sink Dizzily down, ever, forever, down.
And, like a cloud, mine enemy above Darkens my fall with victory! Ai, Ai!

they were imprisoned in an abyss below Tartarus, the lowest portion of Hades.

SCENE II.—The Mouth of a great River covered reclining near the shore; APOLLO stands beside him.

Ocean He fell, thou sayest, beneath his conqueror's frown?

Apollo. Ay, when the strife was ended which made dim

- The orb I rule, and shook the solid stars,
The terrors of his eye illumined heaven 5 With sanguine light, through the thick ragged skirts

Of the victorious darkness, as he fell.
Like the last glare of day's red agony,
Which, from a rent among the fiery
clouds,
Burns far along the tempest-wrinkled
deep.

- 10 Ocean. He sunk to the abyss! To the dark void?

Apollo An eagle so caught in some bursting cloud

On Caucasus, his thunder-baffled wings Entangled in the whirlwind, and his eyes derous hail

round

Fortunate isles, and from their glassy thrones

The floating bark of the light-laden moon
With that white star, its sightless pilot's
crest,

Borne down the rapid sunset's ebbing sea; Tracking their path no more by blood and groans,

Of slavery and command; but by the
light

Of wave-reflected flowers, and floating odors,

 voices,
 And sweetest music, such as spirits love.
- 35 Apollo. And I shall gaze not on the deeds which make My mind obscure with sorrow, as eclipse Darkens the sphere I guide; but list, I
 hear
 The small, clear, silver lute of the young Spirit
 That sits i' the morning star.
Ocean Thou must away,
- 40 Thy steeds will pause at even, till when farewell
 The loud deep calls me home even now to feed it
 With azure calm out of the emerald urns
 Which stand forever full beside my throne Behold the Nereids under the green sea, 15 Their wavering limbs borne on the wind-like stream,
 Their white arms lifted o'er their streaming hair
 With garlands pied and starry sea-flower
 crowns,
 Hastening to grace their mighty sister's cave,

 All overgrown with trailing odorous plants,

 flowers,
- And paved with veined emerald, and a fountain Leaps in the midst with an awakening
 sound.
- 15 From its curved roof the mountain's frozen tears
 Like snow, or silver, or long diamond spires, Hang downward, raining forth a doubtful
 light,
 And there is heard the ever-moving air, Whispering without from tree to tree, and birds,
- 20 And bees, and all around are mossy seats,
 And the rough walls are clothed with long soft grass;
 A simple dwelling, which shall be our own, Where we will sit and talk of time and
 change,
 As the world ebbs and flows, ourselves unchanged.
- 25 What can hide man from mutability?
 And if ye sigh, then I will smile, and thou, Ione, shalt chant fragments of sea-music,
 Until I weep, when ye shall smile away
 The tears she brought, which yet were sweet to shed.
- 30 We will entangle buds and flowers and beams
 Which twinkle on the fountain's brim, and
 make Strange combinations out of common
 things,
 Like human babes in their brief innocence;
 And we will search, with looks and words
 of love,
- 35 For hidden thoughts, each lovelier than the
 last,
 Our unexhausted spirits; and like lutes Touched by the skill of the enamored wind, Weave harmonies divine, yet ever new,
 From difference sweet where discord cannot be;
- 40 And hither come, sped on the charmed
 winds,
 Which meet from all the points of heaven, as bees
 From every flower aerial Enna feed,
 At their known island-homes in Himera,
 The echoes of the human world, which tell 45 Of the low voice of love, almost unheard.
 And dove-eyed pity's murmured pain, and music,
 Itself the echo of the heart, and all That tempers or improves man's life, now
 free;
 And lovely apparitions—dim at first, 50 Then radiant, as the mind arising bright From the embrace of beauty (whence the
 forms

- Of which these are the phantoms) casts on them
 The gathered rays which are reality—Shall visit us, the progeny immortal 55 Of Painting, Sculpture, and rapt Poesy,
 And arts, though unimagined, yet to be.
 The wandering voices and the shadows these Of all that man becomes, the mediators Of that best worship love, by him and us 60 Given and returned, swift shapes and sounds, which grow More fair and soft as man grows wise and
 kind,
 And, veil by veil, evil and error fall
 Such virtue has the cave and place around [Turning to the SPIRIT OF THE HOUR.
 For thee, fair Spirit, one toil remains
 Ione,
 65 Give her that curvèd shell,¹ which Proteus old
 Made Asia's nuptial boon, breathing within it
 A voice to be accomplished, and which thou Didst hide in grass under the hollow rock Ione Thou most desired Hour, more loved and lovely 70 Than all thy sisters, this is the mystic shell.
 See the pale azure fading into silver Lining it with a soft yet glowing light Looks it not like lulled music sleeping
 there?
Spirit. It seems in truth the fairest shell of Ocean 75 Its sound must be at once both sweet and strange Prometheus Go, borne over the cities of mankind
 On whirlwind-footed couriers, once again
 Outspeed the sun around the orbèd world,
 And as thy chariot cleaves the kindling
 air, 80 Thou breathe into the many-folded shell, Loosening its mighty music; it shall be As thunder mingled with clear echoes: then Return; and thou shalt dwell beside our cave.
 And thou, O Mother Earth!—
The Earth. I hear, I feel.
 85 Thy lips are on me, and their touch runs
 down
 Even to the adamant central gloom Along these marble nerves; 'tis life, 'tis
 joy,
 And through my withered, old, and icy frame
 The warmth of an immortal youth shoots
 down
¹ trumpet
- 90 Circling. Henceforth the many children fan
 Folded in my sustaining arms, all plants,
 And creeping forms, and insects rainbow-winged,
 And birds, and beasts, and fish, and human shapes,
 Which drew disease and pain from my wan
 bosom,
 95 Draining the poison of despair, shall take And interchange sweet nutriment, to me Shall they become like sister-antelopes By one fair dam, snow-white and swift as
 wind,
 Nursed among lilies near a brimming
 stream 100 The dew-mists of my sunless sleep shall float
 Under the stars like balm, night-folded
 flowers
 Shall suck unwithering hues in their repose,
 And men and beasts in happy dreams shall gather Strength for the coming day, and all its
 joy, 105 And death shall be the last embrace of
 her
 Who takes the life she gave, even as a mother Folding her child, says, "Leave me not again"
Isa. Oh, mother! wherefore speak the name of death?
 'Cease they to love, and move, and breathe, and speak, 110 Who die?
The Earth. It would avail not to reply;
 Thou art immortal, and this tongue is
 known
 But to the uncommunicating dead Death is the veil which those who live call
 life,
 They sleep, and it is lifted and meanwhile 115 In mild variety the seasons mild With rainbow-skirted showers, and odorous
 winds,
 And long blue meteors cleansing the dull
 night,
 And the life-kindling shafts of the keen sun's 120 All-piercing bow, and the dew-mingled rain Of the calm moonbeams, a soft influence
 mild,
 Shall clothe the forests and the fields, ay,
 even
 The crag-built deserts of the barren deep, With ever-living leaves, and fruits, and
 flowers

And thou! there is a cavern where my spirit 125 Was panted forth in anguish whilst thy pain Made my heart mad, and those who did inhale it Became mad too, and built a temple there,
 And spoke, and were oracular, and lured
 The erring nations round to mutual war, 130 And faithless faith, such as Jove kept with thee;
 Which breath now rises, as amongst tall weeds
 A violet's exhalation, and it fills With a serener light and crimson air Intense, yet soft, the rocks and woods around; 135 It feeds the quick growth of the serpent vine,
 And the dark linked ivy tangling wild,
 And budding, blown, or odor-faded blooms
 Which stain the winds with points of colored light,
 As they rain through them, and bright golden globes 140 Of fruit, suspended in their own green heaven,
 And through then veined leaves and amber stems
 The flowers whose purple and translucent bowls Stand ever mantling with aerial dew,
 The drink of spirits; and it circles round, 145 Like the soft waving wings of noonday dreams, Inspiring calm and happy thoughts, like mine, Now thou art thus restored. This cave is thine.
 Arise! Appear!

[A SPIRIT rises in the likeness of a winged child.

This is my torch-bearer,
 Who let his lamp out in old time with gazing 150 On eyes from which he kindled it anew
 With love, which is as fire, sweet daughter mine,
 For such is that within thine own. Run, wayward,
 And guide this company beyond the peak Of Bacchic Nysa, Mænad-haunted mountain, 155 And beyond Indus and its tribute rivers, Trampling the torrent streams and glassy lakes
 With feet unwet, unwearied, undelaying,
 And up the green ravine, across the vale,

Beside the windless and crystalline pool, 160 Where ever lies, on unceasing waves,
 The image of a temple, built above,
 Distinct with column, arch, and architrave,
 And palm-like capital, and over-wrought,
 And populous most with living imagery, 165 Praxitelean shapes,¹ whose marble smiles Fill the hushed air with everlasting love
 It is deserted now, but once it bore Thy name, Prometheus; there the emulous youths Bore to thy honor through the divine gloom 170 The lamp which was thine emblem; even as those Who bear the untransmitted torch of hope Into the grave, across the night of life,
 As thou hast borne it most triumphantly To this far goal of Time. Depart, farewell.

175 Beside that temple is the destined cave.

SCENE IV.—A Forest. In the Background a Cave. PROMETHEUS, ASIA, PANTHEA, IONE, and the SPIRIT OF THE EARTH.

Ione. Sister, if it is not earthly, how it glides Under the leaves! how on its head there burns
 A light, like a green star, whose emerald beams Are twined with its fair hair! how, as it moves, 5 The splendor drops in flakes upon the grass!
 Knowest thou it?
 Panthea. It is the delicate spirit That guides the earth through heaven.
 From afar
 The populous constellations call that light
 The loveliest of the planets, and sometimes

10 It floats along the spray of the salt sea,
 Or makes its chariot of a foggy cloud,
 Or walks through fields or cities while men sleep,
 Or o'er the mountain tops, or down the rivers,
 Or through the green waste wilderness, as now, 15 Wondering at all it sees. Before Jove reigned

It loved our sister Asia, and it came Each leisure hour to drink the liquid light
 Out of her eyes, for which it said it thirsted
 As one bit by a dipsas,² and with her

¹ That is, shapes as perfect as the statues of Praxiteles, the famous Greek sculptor (5th cent B.C.)

² A kind of serpent. Its bite caused intense thirst. See Lucan's Pharsalia, 9, 610

- 20 It made a childish confidence, and told her All it had known or seen, for it saw much, Yet idly reasoned what it saw; and called
 her —
For whence it sprung it knew not, nor do I — Mother, dear mother
 The Spirit of the Earth (running to Asia). Mother, dearest mother; 25 May I then talk with thee as I was wont?
May I then hide my eyes in thy soft arms, After thy looks have made them tired of joy?
May I then play beside thee the long noons,
When work is none in the bright silent air?
30 Asia. I love thee, gentlest being, and henceforth
Can cherish thee unenvied Speak, I pray, Thy simple talk once solaced, now delights.
 Spirit of the Earth. Mother, I am grown wiser, though a child Cannot be wise like thee, within this day; 35 And happier too; happier and wiser both Thou knowest that toads, and snakes, and loathly worms,
And venomous and malicious beasts, and
boughs
That bore ill berries in the woods, were ever An hindrance to my walks o'er the green
world;
40 And that, among the haunts of humankind.
Hard-featured men, or with proud, angry looks,
Or cold, staid gait, or false and hollow
smiles,
Or the dull sneer of self-loved ignorance,
Or other such foul masks, with which ill
thoughts
45 Hide that fair being whom we spirits call
man;
And women too, ugliest of all things evil (Though fair, even in a world where thou art fair,
When good and kind, free and sincere like
thee),
When false or frowning made me sick at
heart
50 To pass them, though they slept, and I
unseen.
Well, my path lately lay through a great city
Into the woody hills surrounding it;
A sentinel was sleeping at the gate;
When there was heard a sound,¹ so loud, it shook 55 The towers amid the moonlight, yet more
sweet
- Than any voice but thine, sweetest of all;
A long, long sound, as it would never end;
And all the inhabitants leaped suddenly Out of their rest, and gathered in the streets, 60 Looking in wonder up to Heaven, while yet
The music pealed along. I hid myself Within a fountain in the public square Where I lay like the reflex of the moon Séan in a wave under green leaves; and soon
65 Those ugly human shapes and visages Of which I spoke as having wrought me
pain,
Passed floating through the air, and fading
still
Into the winds that scattered them; and those From whom they passed seemed mild and lovely forms 70 After some foul disguise had fallen, and
all Were somewhat changed, and after brief surprise
And greetings of delighted wonder, all Went to their sleep again. and when the dawn Came, wouldst thou think that toads, and snakes, and efts,¹ 75 Could e'er be beautiful? yet so they were,
And that with little change of shape or hue.
All things had put their evil nature off.
I cannot tell my joy, when o'er a lake, I'pon a drooping bough with nightshade
twined, 80 I saw two azure halcyons² clinging downward And thinning one bright bunch of amber berries,
With quick long beaks, and in the deep there lay
Those lovely forms imaged as in a sky;
So, with my thoughts full of these happy changes, 85 We meet agam, the happiest change of all Asia. And never will we part, till thy chaste sister,³
Who guides the frozen and inconstant
moon,
Will look on thy more warm and equal
light
Till her heart thaw like flakes of April snow
90 And love thee.
 Spirit of the Earth. What! as Asia loves Prometheus?

¹ lizards

² kingfishers

³ Diana (Artemis), goddess of the moon.

Asia. Peace, wanton, thou art yet not old enough.

Think ye by gazing on each other's eyes
To multiply your lovely selves, and fill With sphered fire the interlunar air?

95 Spirit of the Earth. Nay, mother, while my sister trims her lamp

'Tis hard I should go darkling.¹

Asia. Listen; look!

[The SPIRIT OF THE HOUR enters.

Prometheus We feel what thou hast heard and seen: yet speak

Spirit of the Hour. Soon as the sound had ceased whose thunder filled

The abysses of the sky and the wide earth,

100 There was a change; the impalpable thin
air

And the all-circling sunlight were transformed,

As if the sense of love dissolved in them
Had folded itself round the spherèd world

My vision then grew clear, and I could see 105 Into the mysteries of the universe;²

Dizzy as with delight I floated down; Winnowing the lightsome air with languid plumes,

My couriers sought their birthplace in the
sun,

Where they henceforth will live exempt from toil,

110 Pasturing flowers of vegetable fire;
And where my moonlike car will stand within

A temple, gazed upon by Phidian forms Of thee, and Asia, and the Earth, and me,

And you fair nymphs looking the love we feel,—

115 In memory of the tidings it has borne,— Beneath a dome fretted with graven
flowers,

Poised on twelve columns of resplendent
stone,

And open to the bright and liquid sky Yoked to it by an amphisbænic³ snake

120 The likeness of those winged steeds will mock

The flight from which they find repose.
Alas,

Whither has wandered now my partial
tongue

When all remains untold which ye would
hear?

As I have said, I floated to the earth;

125 It was, as it is still, the pain of bliss

² See Wordsworth's Lines Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey, 35 ff (p. 233)

³ having a head at each end and capable of moving forward and backward

To move, to breathe, to be; I wandering
went

Among the haunts and dwellings of mankind,

And first was disappointed not to see Such mighty change as I had felt within 130 Expressed in outward things; but soon I looked,

And beheld, thrones were kingless, and men walked

One with the other even as spirits do—None fawned, none trampled, hate, dis-dam, or fear.

Self-love or self-contempt, on human brows 135 No more inscribed, as o'er the gate of hell,

"All hope abandon ye who enter here."⁴

None frowned, none trembled, none with eager fear

Gazed on another's eye of cold command, Until the subject of a tyrant's will 140 Became, worse fate, the abject of his own, Which spurred him, like an outspent horse, to death.

None wrought his lips in truth-entangling lines

Which smiled the lie his tongue disdained
to speak,

None, with firm sneer, trod out in his own
heart

145 The sparks of love and hope till there remained

Those bitter ashes, a soul self-consumed,
And the wretch crept a vampire among

men,
Infecting all with his own hideous ill;

None talked that common, false, cold, hollow talk

150 Which makes the heart deny the yes it breathes,

Yet question that unmeant hypocrisy
With such a self-mistrust as has no name

And women, too, frank, beautiful, and kind
As the free heaven which rains fresh light and dew

155 Oh the wide earth, passed; gentle, radiant
forms,

From custom's evil taint exempt and pure.
Speaking the wisdom once they could not think,

Looking emotions once they feared to feel,

And changed to all which once they dared
not be,

160 Yet being now, made earth like heaven;
nor pride,

Nor jealousy, nor envy, nor ill shame,
The bitterest of those drops of treasured gall,

⁴ The inscription on the gate of Hell, in Dante's Inferno i, 9

Spoiled the sweet taste of the nepenthe,
love

Thrones, altars, judgment-seats, and prisons, wherein,

165 And beside which, by wretched men were borne

Sceptres, tiaras, swords, and chains, and tones

Of reasoned wrong, glozed on by ignorance,

Were like those monstrous and barbaric shapes,

The ghosts of a no-more-remembered fame,

170 Which, from their unworn obelisks, look forth

In triumph o'er the palaces and tombs Of those who were their conquerors, mouldering round.

These unaged to the pride of kings and priests

A dark yet mighty faith, a power as wide

175 As is the world it wasted, and are now

But an astonishment, even so the tools
And emblems of its last captivity,

Amid the dwellings of the peopled earth,
Stand, not o'erthrown, but unregarded now.

180 And those foul shapes, abhorred by god and man,—

Which, under many a name and many a form

Strange, savage, ghastly, dark, and execrable,

Were Jupiter, the tyrant of the world,
And which the nations, panic-stricken,

185 With blood, and hearts broken by long hope, and love

Dragged to his altars soiled and garlandless,

And slam amid men's unreclaiming tears, Flattering the thing they feared, which fear was hate,—

Frown, mouldering fast, o'er their abandoned shrines.

190 The painted veil, by those who were, called life,

Which mimicked, as with colors idly spread,
All men believed or hoped, is torn aside;

The loathsome mask has fallen, the man remains

Sceptreless, free, unencumbered, but man

195 Equal, unclassed, tribeless, and nationless, Exempt from awe, worship, degree, the king

Over himself; just, gentle, wise; but man

Passionless—no, yet free from guilt or pain,

Which were, for his will made or suffered them;

200 Nor yet exempt, though ruling them like slaves,

From chance, and death, and mutability,
The clogs of that which else might oversoar

The loftiest star of unascended heaven, Pinnacled dim in the intense mane

ACT IV

SCENE — A Part of the Forest near the Cave of PROMETHEUS PANTHEA and IONE are sleeping: they awaken gradually during the first Song

Voice of unseen Spirits

The pale stars are gone!

For the sun, their swift shepherd,

To then folds them compelling.

In the depths of the dawn,

5 Hastes, in meteor-eclipsing array, and they flee

Beyond his blue dwelling.

As fawns flee the leopard

But where are ye?

1 A Train of dark Forms and Shadows passes by confusedly, singing

Here, oh here!

We bear the bier

10 Of the Father of many a cancelled year!
Spectres we

Of the dead Hours be,

We bear Time to his tomb in Eternity

15 Strew, oh, strew

Hair, not yew!

Wet the dusty pall with tears, not dew!

Be the faded flowers

Of Death's bare bowers

20 Spread on the corpse of the King of Hours!

Haste, oh, haste!

As shades are chased,

Trembling, by day, from heaven's blue waste

We melt away,

Like dissolving spray.

25 From the children of a diviner day,

With the lullaby

Of winds that die

On the bosom of their own harmony!

Ions

30 What dark forms were they?

¹ The yew is an emblem of mourning, it is a common tree in graveyards.

Panthea

The past Hours weak and gray,
With the spoil which their toil Raked together
From the conquest but One¹ could foil

Ione

35 Have they passed?

Panthea

They have passed,
They outspeeded the blast,
While 'tis said, they are fled

Ione

Whither, oh, whither?

Panthea

To the dark, to the past, to the dead

Voice of unseen Spirits

40 Bright clouds float in heaven, Dew-stars gleam on earth,
Waves assemble on ocean,
They are gathered and driven By the storm of delight, by the panic of glee!
45 They shake with emotion, They dance in their mirth
But where are ye?

The pine boughs are singing Old songs with new gladness, 50 The billows and fountains Fresh music are flinging, Like the notes of a spirit from land and from sea,
The storms mock the mountains
With the thunder of gladness 55 But where are ye?

Ione What charioteers are these?

Panthea. Where are their chariots?

Semichorus of Hours

The voice of the Spirits of Air and of
Earth
Have drawn back the figured curtain of
sleep
Which covered our being and darkened our birth
60 In the deep.

A Voice

In the deep?

¹ Prometheus

Semichorus II

Oh! below the deep

Semichorus I

An hundred ages we had been kept Cradled in visions of hate and care,
And each one who waked as his brother
slept,
Found the truth—

Semichorus II

Worse than his visions were!

Semichorus I

65 We have heard the lute of Hope in sleep.
We have known the voice of Love in dreams;
We have felt the wand of Power, and leap—

Semichorus II

As the billows leap in the morning beams!

Chorus

Weave the dance on the floor of the breeze, 70 Pierce with song heaven's silent light, Enchant the Day that too swiftly flees,
To check its flight ere the cave of Night

Once the hungry Hours were hounds Which chased the Day like a bleeding deer,

75 And it limped and stumbled with many wounds
Through the nightly dells of the desert
year.

But now, oh, weave the mystic measure Of music, and dance, and shapes of light.
Let the Hours, and the Spirits of night and pleasure,

80 Like the clouds and sunbeams, unite—

A Voice

Unite!

Panthea See, where the Spirits of the human mind,
Wrapped in sweet sounds, as in bright veils, approach

Chorus of Spirits

We join the throng
Of the dance and the song, 85 By the whirlwind of gladness borne along;
As the flying-fish leap From the Indian deep.
And mix with the sea-birds, half asleep

Chorus of Hours

Whence come ye, so wild and so fleet, 90 For sandals of lightning are on your feet, And your wings are soft and swift as
 thought,
 And your eyes are as love which is veiled
 not!

Chorus of Spirits

We come from the mind
 Of human kind, 95 Which was late so dusk, and obscene, and blind;
 Now 'tis an ocean
 Of clear emotion,
 A heaven of serene and mighty motion.

From that deep abyss 100 Of wonder and bliss, Whose caverns are crystal palaces;
 From those skyey towers Where Thought's crowned powers Sit watching your dance, ye happy Hours!

From the dim recesses 105 Of woven caresses, Where lovers catch ye by your loose tresses,
 From the azure isles,
 Where sweet Wisdom smiles, 110 Delaying your ships with her siren wiles

From the temples high
 Of Man's ear and eye, Roofed over Sculpture and Poesy;
 From the murmurings 115 Of the unsealed springs Where Science bedews her dædal wings

Years after years,
 Through blood and tears,
 And a thick hell of hatreds, and hopes, and
 fears;

120 We waded and flew,
 And the islets were few Where the bud-blighted flowers of happiness grew.

Our feet now, every palm,
 Are sandalled with calm, 125 And the dew of our wings is a rain of balm,
 And, beyond our eyes,
 The human love lies,
 Which makes all it gazes on, Paradise.

Chorus of Spirits and Hours

Then weave the web of the mystic measure;
 130 From the depths of the sky and the ends
 of the earth,

Come, swift Spirits of might and of
 pleasure,
 Fill the dance and the music of mirth,
 As the waves of a thousand streams rush
 by
 To an ocean of splendor and harmony!

Chorus of Spirits

135 Our spoil is won,
 Our task is done,
 We are free to dive, or soar, or run;
 Beyond and around,
 Or within the bound 140 Which clips¹ the world with darkness
 round.

We'll pass the eyes
 Of the starry skies
 Into the hoar deep to colonize:
 Death, Chaos, and Night, 145 From the sound of our flight, Shall flee, like mist from a tempest's might

And Earth, Air, and Light, And the Spirit of Might,
 Which drives round the stars in their fiery
 flight;
 150 And Love, Thought, and Breath,
 The powers that quell Death, Wherever we soar shall assemble beneath

And our singing shall build In the void's loose field 155 A world for the Spirit of Wisdom to wield, We will take our plan
 From the new world of man.
 And our work shall be called the Promethean

Chorus of Hours

Break the dance, and scatter the song;
 160 Let some depart, and some remain.

Semichorus I

We, beyond heaven, are driven along:

Semichorus II

'Tis the enchantments of earth retain:

Semichorus I

Ceaseless, and rapid, and fierce, and free,
 With the Spirits which build a new earth
 and sea,
 165 And a heaven where yet heaven could never
 be;

¹ embraces; encompasses

Semichorus II

Solemn, and slow, and serene, and bright, Leading the Day and outspeeding the
Night,
With the powers of a world of perfect
light;

Semichorus I

We whirl, singing loud, round the gathering sphere, 170 Till the trees, and the beasts, and the clouds appear
From its chaos made calm by love, not fear.

Semichorus II

We encircle the ocean and mountains of
earth,
And the happy forms of its death and birth Change to the music of our sweet mirth

Chorus of Hours and Spirits

175 Break the dance, and scatter the song;
Let some depart, and some remain;
Wherever we fly we lead along In leashes, like starbeams, soft yet strong,
The clouds that are heavy with love's sweet rain.

180 Panthea. Ha! they are gone!
Ione. Yet feel you no delight From the past sweetness?

Panthea. As the bare green hill
When some soft cloud vanishes into rain, Laughs with a thousand drops of sunny water

To the unparhoned sky!

Ione. Even whilst we speak 185 New notes arise. What is that awful sound?

Panthea. 'Tis the deep music of the rolling world!

Kindling within the strings of the waved
air

Æolian modulations.

Ione. Listen too,
How every pause is filled with under-notes, 190 Clear, silver, icy, keen awakening tones, Which pierce the sense, and live within the
soul,

As the sharp stars pierce winter's crystal
air

And gaze upon themselves within the sea Panthea. But see where, through two openings in the forest

195 Which hanging branches overcanopy,

¹ The ancients believed that the movement of the celestial spheres produced music

And where two runnels of a rivulet, Between the close moss violet-inwoven,
Have made their path of melody, like sisters

Who part with sighs that they may meet in
smiles,

200 Turning their dear disunion to, an isle Of lovely grief, a wood of sweet sad
thoughts;

Two visions of strange radiance float upon The ocean-like enchantment of strong
sound,

Which flows intenser, keener, deeper yet, 205 Under the ground and through the windless air.

Ione. I see a chariot like that thinnest
boat,
In which the Mother of the Months¹ is borne

By ebbing light into her western cave, When she upsprings from interlunar
dreams;

210 O'er which is curved an orblike canopy
Of gentle darkness, and the hills and woods, Distinctly seen through that dusk æry veil, Regard² like shapes in an enchanter's glass;

Its wheels are solid clouds, azure and gold, 215 Such as the germ of the thunderstorm Pile on the floor of the illumined sea
When the sun rushes under it; they roll

And move and grow as with an inward
wind;

220 Within it sits a wingèd infant, white Its countenance, like the whiteness of bright snow,

Its plumes are as feathers of sunny frost,
Its limbs gleam white, through the wind-flowing folds

Of its white robe, woof of ethereal pearl Its hair is white, the brightness of white
light

225 Scattered in strings, yet its two eyes are heavens

Of liquid darkness, which the Deity Within seems pouring, as a storm is poured From jagged clouds, out of their arrowy lashes,

230 Tempering the cold and radiant air around,
With fire that is not brightness; in its
hand

It sways a quivering moonbeam, from whose point

A guiding power directs the chariot's prow Over its wheelèd clouds, which as they roll Over the grass, and flowers, and waves, wake sounds,

235 Sweet as a singing rain of silver dew.

Rushes, with loud and whirlwind harmony,
A sphere,¹ which is as many thousand spheres,
Solid as crystal, yet through all its mass ²⁸⁰ Flow, as through empty space, music and
light,
Ten thousand orbs involving and involved,
Purple and azure, white, green, and golden, Sphere within sphere; and every space between Peopled with unimaginable shapes, ²⁸⁵ Such as ghosts dream dwell in the lampless
deep,
Yet each inter-transparent,² and they whirl
Over each other with a thousand motions,
Upon a thousand sightless axes spinning,
And with the force of self-destroying swiftness, ²⁹⁰ Intensely, slowly, solemnly roll on, Kindling with mingled sounds, and many tones,
Intelligible words and music wild.
With mighty whirl the multitudinous orb Grinds the bright brook into an azure
mist
²⁹⁵ Of elemental subtlety, like light;
And the wild odor of the forest flowers,
The music of the living grass and air,
The emerald light of leaf-entangled beams Round its intense yet self-conflicting speed, ³⁰⁰ Seem kneaded into one aerial mass Which drowns the sense. Within the orb itself,
Pillowed upon its alabaster arms,
Like to a child o'erwearied with sweet toil,
On its own folded wings, and wavy hair, ³⁰⁵ The Spirit of the Earth is laid asleep,
And you can see its little lips are moving, Amid the changing light of their own
smiles,
Like one who talks of what he loves in
dream.
Ione. 'Tis only mocking the orb's harmony.
³¹⁰ Panthea And from a star upon its fore-

With tyrant-quelling myrtle³ overtwned, Emblemng heaven and earth united now, Vast beams like spokes of some invisible

Valueless¹ stones, and unimagined gems,
And caverns on crystalline columns poised With vegetable silver overspread; Wells of unfathomed fire, and water-springs

fed,
Whose vapors clothe earth's monarch mountain-tops
With kingly, ermine snow. The beams

And make appear the melancholy ruins Of cancelled cycles; anchors, beaks of ships, ²⁹⁰ Planks turned to marble, quivers, helms, and spears,
And gorgon-headed targets,² and the wheels Of scythed chariots, and the emblazonry Of trophies, standards, and armorial beasts,
Round which death laughed, sepulchred emblems ²⁹⁵ Of dead destruction, rum within rum!
The wrecks beside of many a city vast,
Whose population which the earth grew over
Was mortal, but not human; see, they lie, Their monstrous works, and uncouth skeletons, ³⁰⁰ Their statues, homes, and fane; prodigious shapes
Huddled in gray annihilation, split, Jammed in the hard, black deep; and over these,
The anatomies of unknown winged things,
And fishes which were isles of living scale, ³⁰⁵ And serpents, bony chains, twisted around The iron crags, or within heaps of dust To which the tortuous strength of their last pangs
Had crushed the iron crags; and over these The jagged alligator, and the might ³¹⁰ Of earth-convulsing behemoth,³ which once Were monarch beasts, and on the slimy shores,

 Till hate, and fear, and pain, light-vanquished shadows, fleeing,

Leave Man, who was a many-sided mirror,
 Which could distort to many a shape of

 This true fair world of things, a sea re- 415 flecting love, 385 Which over all his kind, as the sun's
 heaven
 Gliding o'er ocean, smooth, serene, and
 even,
 Darting from starry depths radiance and life, doth move:

Leave Man, even as a leprous child is healing springs is poured, Then when it wanders home with rosy

Man, oh, not men! a chain of linked 425
 thought,
 395 Of love and might to be divided not, Compelling the elements with adamant

 The quiet republic of the maze Of planets, struggling fierce towards heaven's free wilderness.

400 Man, one harmonious soul of many a

 Whose nature is its own divine control, Where all things flow to all, as rivers to
 the sea;
 Familiar acts are beautiful through love, Labor, and pain, and grief, in life's green grove 405 Sport like tame beasts; none knew how gentle they could be!

His will, with all mean passions, had delights,
 And selfish cares, its trembling satellites,
 A spirit ill to guide, but mighty to obey, Is as a tempest-winged ship, whose helm 410 Love rules, through waves which dare not overwhelm, Forcing life's wildest shores to own its sovereign sway.

All things confess his strength. Through the cold mass
 Of marble and of color his dreams
 pass—Bright threads whence mothers weave the robes their children wear, 415 Language is a perpetual Orphic¹ song, Which rules with dædal harmony a throng
 Of thoughts and forms, which else sense-

 Gives up her stars, and like a flock of sheep
 420 They pass before his eye, are numbered, and roll on!
 The tempest is his steed, he strides the

 And the abyss shouts from her depth

So when thy shadow falls on me, Then am I mute and still, by thee 455 Covered; of thy love, Orb most beautiful, Full, oh, too full!

Thou art speeding round the sun Brightest world of many a one,
Green and azure sphere which shinest 460 With a light which is divinest Among all the lamps of Heaven
To whom life and light is given;
I, thy crystal paramour Borne beside thee by a power 465 Like the polar Paradise,

Gazing, an insatiate bride,
On thy form from every side Like a Mænad, round the cup Which Agave lifted up 475 In the weird Cadmean forest.
Brother, wheresoe'er thou soarest
I must hurry, whirl, and follow

Through the heavens wide and hollow, Sheltered by the warm embrace Of thy soul from hungry space, Drinking from thy sense and sight Beauty, majesty, and might,
As a lover or a chameleon Grows like what it looks upon, 485 As a violet's gentle eye Gazes on the azure sky Until its hue grows like what it beholds, As a gray and watery mist Glowes like solid amethyst

The Earth

And the weak day weeps
That it should be so.
495 O gentle Moon, the voice of thy delight Falls on me like thy clear and tender light Soothing the seaman, borne the summer
night,

This is the day which down the void abysm 555 At the Earth-born's spell² yawns for Heaven's despotism,
 And Conquest is dragged captive through the deep Love, from its awful throne of patient

 In the wise heart, from the last giddy hour Of dread endurance, from the slippery,
 steep,
 560 And narrow verge of crag-like agony,
 springs
 And folds over the world its healing wings Gentleness, Virtue, Wisdom, and Endurance,—
 These are the seals of that most firm assurance Which bars the pit over Destruction's
 strength;
 565 And if, with infirm hand, Eternity, Mother of many acts and hours, should
 free
 The serpent that would clasp her with his length,
 These are the spells by which to reassume
 An empire o'er the disentangled doom.

THE SENSITIVE PLANT 1820 1820

PART FIRST

A Sensitive Plant in a garden grew,
 And the young winds fed it with silver dew.
 And it opened its fan-like leaves to the
 light,
 And closed them beneath the kisses of
 Night
 5 And the Spring arose on the garden fan, Like the Spirit of Love felt everywhere,
 And each flower and herb on Earth's dark
 breast
 Rose from the dreams of its winty rest.
 But none ever trembled and panted with
 bliss
 10 In the garden, the field, on the wilderness, Like a doe in the noon-tide with love's sweet want,
 As the companionless Sensitive Plant
 The snowdrop, and then the violet, Arose from the ground with warm rain wet, 15 And then breath was mixed with fresh odor, sent From the turf, like the voice and the instrument.
 Then the pied wind-flowers¹ and the tulip tall,
 And narcissi, the fairest among them all,
 Who gaze on their eyes in the stream's
 recess,
 20 Till they die of their own dear loveliness,
 And the Naid-like hily of the vale, Whom youth makes so fair, and passion so pale,

That the light of its tremulous bells is seen
 Through their pavilions of tender green, 25 And the hyacinth purple, and white, and
 blue,
 Which flung from its bells a sweet peal
 anew
 Of music so delicate, soft, and intense,
 It was felt like an odor within the sense,
 And the rose like a nymph to the bath addressed, 30 Which unveiled the depth of her glowing
 breast,
 Till, fold after fold, to the fainting air
 The soul of her beauty and love lay bare,
 And the wand-like hily, which lifted up,
 As a Mænad, its moonlight-colored cup, 35 Till the fiery star, which is its eye, Gazed through clear dew on the tender sky.
 And the jessamine faint, and the sweet tuberose,
 The sweetest flower for scent that blows,
 And all rare blossoms from every clime 40 Grew in that garden in perfect prime And on the stream whose inconstant bosom Was pranked, under boughs of embower-ing blossom,
 With golden and green light, slanting
 through
 Their heaven of many a tangled hue, 45 Broad water-lilies lay tremulously, And starry river-buds glimmered by.
 And around them the soft stream did glide and dance
 With a motion of sweet sound and radiance
 And the sinuous paths of lawn and of
 moss, 50 Which led through the garden along and across,
 Some open at once to the sun and the breeze,
 Some lost among bowers of blossoming
 trees,
 Were all paved with daisies and delicate bells,
 As fair as the fabulous asphodels,¹ 55 And flow'rets which, drooping as day drooped too,

¹ Asphodels (daffodils) were said to cover the fields of Elysium the abode of the blessed after death

Fell into pavilions, white, purple, and
blue,
To roof the glow-worm from the evening
dew.

And from this undefiled Paradise The flowers (as an infant's awakening
eyes

⁶⁰ Smile on its mother, whose singing sweet Can first lull, and at last must awaken it),

When Heaven's blithe winds had unfolded
them,

As mine-lamps enkindle a hidden gem.

⁶⁵ Shone smiling to Heaven, and every one Shared joy in the light of the gentle sun,

For each one was interpenetrated With the light and the odor its neighbor
shed,

Like young lovers whom youth and love make dear

Wrapped and filled by their mutual atmosphere.

⁷⁰ But the Sensitive Plant which could give small fruit

Of the love which it felt from the leaf to the root,

Received more than all, it loved more than ever,

Where none wanted but it, could belong to the giver,—

For the Sensitive Plant has no bright flower;

⁷⁵ Radiance and odor are not its dower, It loves, even like Love, its deep heart is full,

It desires what it has not, the beautiful!

The light winds which from unsustaining
wings

Shed the music of many murmurings;

⁸⁰ The beams which dart from many a star Of the flowers whose hues they bear afar.

The plumed insects swift and free,

Like golden boats on a sunny sea,

Laden with light and odor, which pass

⁸⁵ Over the gleam of the living grass;

The unseen clouds of the dew, which lie Like fire in the flowers till the sun rides
high,

Then wander like spirits among the spheres,

Each cloud faint with the fragrance it bears;

⁹⁰ The quivering vapors of dim noontide,
Which like a sea o'er the warm earth glide,
In which every sound, and odor, and beam, Move, as reeds in a single stream;

Each and all like ministering angels were ⁹⁵ For the Sensitive Plant sweet joy to bear, Whilst the lagging hours of the day went
by Like windless clouds o'er a tender sky.

And when evening descended from Heaven
above,

And the Earth was all rest, and the air was all love,

¹⁰⁰ And delight, though less bright, was far more deep,

And the day's veil fell from the world of
sleep,

And the beasts, and the birds, and the insects were drowned

In an ocean of dreams without a sound, Whose waves never mark, though they ever impress

¹⁰⁵ The light sand which paves it, conscious-
ness,

(Only overhead the sweet nightingale Ever sang more sweet as the day might fall,

And snatches of its Elysian chant Were mixed with the dreams of the Sensitive Plant),—

¹¹⁰ The Sensitive Plant was the earliest Uppgathered into the bosom of rest;
A sweet child weary of its delight,
The feeblest and yet the favorite, Cradled within the embrace of Night.

PART SECOND

There was a Power in this sweet place, An Eve in this Eden, a ruling Grace Which to the flowers, did they waken or
dream,

Was as God is to the starry scheme

⁵ A lady, the wonder of her kind, Whose form was upborne by a lovely mind

Which, dilating, had moulded her men and motion

Like a sea-flower unfolded beneath the ocean,

Tended the garden from morn to even ¹⁰ And the meteors of that sublunar Heaven,

Like the lamps of the air when Night walks forth, Laughed round her footsteps up from the Earth!

She had no companion of mortal race,
But her tremulous breath and her flushing
face 15 Told, whilst the morn kissed the sleep from her eyes,
That her dreams were less slumber than Paradise.

As if some bright Spirit for her sweet sake Had deserted Heaven while the stars were awake,
As if yet around her he lingering were, 20 Though the veil of daylight concealed him from her.

Her steps seemed to pity the grass it pressed,
You might hear, by the heaving of her
breast,
That the coming and going of the wind Brought pleasure there and left passion
behind

25 And wherever her airy footstep trod, Her trailing hair from the grassy sod Erased its light vestige, with shadowy sweep,
Like a sunny storm o'er the dark green
deep.

I doubt not the flowers of that garden sweet 30 Rejoiced in the sound of her gentle feet, I doubt not they felt the spirit that came From her glowing fingers through all their frame.

She sprinkled bright water from the
stream
On those that were faint with the sunny
beam;
35 And out of the cups of the heavy flowers She emptied the rain of the thundershowers.

She lifted their heads with her tender
hands,
And sustained them with rods and osierbands;¹
If the flowers had been her own infants,
she 40 Could never have nursed them more tenderly.

And all killing insects and gnawing worms,
And things of obscene and unlovely forms,
She bore in a basket of Indian woof,
Into the rough woods far aloof,—

45 In a basket, of grasses and wild-flowers
full,
The freshest her gentle hands could pull For the poor banished insects, whose intent,
Although they did ill, was innocent

But the bee, and the beamlike ephemera,¹ 50 Whose path is the lightning's, and soft moths that kiss
The sweet lips of the flowers, and harm not, did she Make her attendant angels be.

And many an antenatal tomb, Where butterflies dream of the life to
come, 55 She left clinging round the smooth and dark
Edge of the odorous cedar bark.

This fairest creature from earliest spring Thus moved through the garden minister-
ing
All the sweet season of summertide.
60 And ere the first leaf looked brown—she died!

PART THIRD

Three days the flowers of the garden fan, Like stars when the moon is awakened,
were,
Or the waves of Baiae, ere luminous She floats up through the smoke of Vesu-vius

5 And on the fourth, the Sensitive Plant Felt the sound of the funeral chant, And the steps of the bearers, heavy and slow,
And the sighs of the mourners, deep and
low,

The weary sound and the heavy breath, 10 And the silent motions of passing death,
And the smell, cold, oppressive, and dank,
Sent through the pores of the coffin plank;

The dark grass, and the flowers among the
grass,
Were bright with tears as the crowd did
pass,

¹ A delicate insect with net-veined wings

- 15 From their sighs the wind caught a mournful tone,
 And sate in the pines, and gave groan for groan.
 The garden, once fair, became cold and foul,
 Like the corpse of her who had been its
 soul,
 Which at first was lovely as if in sleep, 20 Then slowly changed, till it grew a heap
 To make men tremble who never weep Swift summer into the autumn flowed, And frost in the must of the morning rode,
 Though the noonday sun looked clear and
 bright,
 25 Mocking the spoil of the secret night
 The rose-leaves, like flakes of crimson
 snow,
 Paved the turf and the moss below
 The lilies were drooping, and white, and wan,
 Like the head and the skin of a dying man 30 And Indian plants, of scent and hue
 The sweetest that ever were fed on dew, Leaf by leaf, day after day,
 Were massed into the common clay And the leaves, brown, yellow, and gray, and red, 35 And white with the whiteness of what is
 dead,
 Like troops of ghosts on the dry wind
 passed;
 Their whistling noise made the birds aghast.
 And the gusty winds waked the winged seeds,
 Out of their birthplace of ugly weeds, 40 Till they clung round many a sweet flower's stem,
 Which rotted into the earth with them
 The water-blooms under the rivulet Fell from the stalks on which they were set;
 And the eddies drove them here and there, 45 As the winds did those of the upper air.
 Then the rain came down, and the broken stalks
 Were bent and tangled across the walks;
 And the leafless network of parasite bowers Massed into ruin, and all sweet flowers.
- 50 Between the time of the wind and the snow
 All loathliest weeds began to grow, Whose coarse leaves were splashed with many a speck,
 Like the water-snake's belly and the toad's
 back.
 And thistles, and nettles, and darnels'
 rank, 55 And the dock, and henbane, and hemlock dank,
 Stretched out its long and hollow shank,
 And stifled the air till the dead wind stank.
 And plants, at whose names the verse feels loath,
 Filled the place with a monstrous undergrowth, 60 Prickly, and pulpy, and blistering, and
 blue,
 Livid, and starred with a lurid dew And agarics,² and fungi, with mildew and mould,
 Started like mist from the wet ground
 cold,
 Pale, fleshy, as if the decaying dead 65 With a spirit of growth had been animated!
 Their moss rotted off them, flake by flake, Till the thick stalk stuck like a murderer's stake,
 Where rags of loose flesh yet tremble on high,
 Infecting the winds that wander by 70 Spawn, weeds, and filth, a leprous scum, Made the running rivulet thick and dumb,
 And at its outlet flags huge as stakes Dammed it up with roots knotted like water-snakes.
 And hour by hour, when the air was still, 75 The vapors arose which have strength to kill,
 At morn they were seen, at noon they were felt,
 At night they were darkness no star could melt.
 And unctuous meteors from spray to spray Crept and flitted in broad noonday 80 Unseen; every branch on which they alit
 By a venomous blight was burned and bit.
¹ A kind of grass weed
² A kind of fungus

The Sensitive Plant, like one forbid,¹ Wept, and the tears within each lid
 Of its folded leaves, which together grew, 85 Were changed to a blight of frozen glue

For the leaves soon fell, and the branches
 soon
 By the heavy axe of the blast were hewn, The sap shrank to the root through every pore
 As blood to a heart that will beat no more

90 For Winter came the wind was his whip
 One choppy finger was on his lip²
 He had torn the cataracts from the hills
 And they clanked at his girdle like manacles;

His breath was a chain which without a
 sound
 95 The earth, and the air, and the water
 bound,
 He came, fiercely driven, in his chariot-
 throne
 By the tenfold blasts of the Arctic zone

Then the weeds which were forms of living
 death
 Fled from the frost to the earth beneath 100 Their decay and sudden flight from frost Was but like the vanishing of a ghost³

And under the roots of the Sensitive Plant
 The moles and the dormice died for want
 The birds dropped stiff from the frozen air 105 And were caught in the branches naked
 and bare

First there came down a thawing rain
 And its dull drops froze on the boughs
 again,
 Then there steamed up a freezing dew
 Which to the drops of the thaw-rain grew.

110 And a northern whirlwind, wandering about,
 Like a wolf that had smelt a dead child
 out,
 Shook the boughs thus laden, and heavy,
 and stiff,
 And snapped them off with his rigid guff⁴

When Winter had gone and Spring came back, 115 The Sensitive Plant was a leafless wreck;

¹ accursed (See Macbeth I, 3, 21)

² See Macbeth, I, 3, 44-45.

³ claw

But the mandrakes, and toadstools, and docks, and darnels, Rose like the dead from their ruined charnels.

CONCLUSION

Whether the Sensitive Plant, or that Which within its boughs like a spirit sat, Ere its outward form had known decay,
 Now felt this change, I cannot say.

5 Whether that lady's gentle mind,
 No longer with the form combined Which scattered love, as stars do light, Found sadness, where it left delight,

10 I dare not guess, but in this life
 Of error, ignorance, and strife, Where nothing is, but all things seem,
 And we the shadows of the dream,

15 It is a modest creed, and yet Pleasant if one considers it,
 To own that death itself must be,
 Like all the rest, a mockery

That garden sweet, that lady fair,
 And all sweet shapes and odors there.
 In truth have never passed away 20 'Tis we, 'tis ours, are changed, not they

For love, and beauty, and delight, There is no death nor change: their might Exceeds our organs, which endure
 No light, being themselves obscure

THE CLOUD

1820

1820

I bring fresh showers for the thirsting
 flowers,

From the seas and the streams;
 I bear light shade for the leaves when laid In their noonday dreams.

5 From my wings are shaken the dews that waken

The sweet buds every one,
 When rocked to rest on their mother's
 breast,

As she dances about the sun.

I wield the flail of the lashing hail, 10 And whiten the green plains under,
 And then again I dissolve it in rain,
 And laugh as I pass in thunder

I sift the snow on the mountains below,
 And their great pines groan aghast;
 15 And all the night 'tis my pillow white; While I sleep in the arms of the blast

Sublime on the towers of my skyey bowers, Lightning my pilot sits;
 In a cavern under is fettered the thunder, 20 It struggles and howls at fits;
 Over earth and ocean, with gentle motion,
 This pilot is guiding me,
 Lured by the love of the geni that move
 In the depths of the purple sea, 25 Over the rills, and the crags, and the hills,
 Over the lakes and the plains, Wherever he dream, under mountain or
 stream,
 The Spirit he loves remains,
 And I all the while bask in heaven's blue
 smile,
 30 Whilst he is dissolving in rains.

The sanguine sunrise, with his meteor
 eyes,
 And his burning plumes outspread, Leaps on the back of my sailing rack,¹
 When the morning star shines dead; 35 As on the jag of a mountain crag,
 Which an earthquake rocks and swings,
 An eagle alit one moment may sit In the light of its golden wings And when sunset may breathe, from the lit sea beneath, 40 Its ardors of rest and of love,
 And the crimson pall of eve may fall
 From the depth of heaven above, With wings folded I rest, on mine airy nest,
 As still as a brooding dove.

45 That orbèd maiden with white fire laden, Whom mortals call the Moon, Glides glimmering o'er my fleece-like
 floor,
 By the midnight breezes strewn;
 And wherever the beat of her unseen feet, 50 Which only the angels hear, May have broken the woof of my tent's thin roof,
 The stars peep behind her and peer.
 And I laugh to see them whirl and flee,
 Like a swarm of golden bees, 55 When I widen the rent in my wind-built
 tent,
 Till the calm rivers, lakes, and seas, Like strips of the sky fallen through me on high,
 Are each paved with the moon and these.²

I bind the sun's throne with a burning zone,³ 60 And the moon's with a girdle of pearl;

¹ flying broken cloud² girdle³ The stars.

The volcanoes are dim, and the stars reel and swim,
 When the whirlwinds my banner unfurl.
 From cape to cape, with a bridge-like shape,
 Over a torrent sea, 65 Sunbeam-proof, I hang like a roof,—
 The mountains its columns be.
 The triumphal arch through which I march
 With hurricane, fire, and snow, When the powers of the air are chained to my chair, 70 Is the million-colored bow;
 The sphere-fire above its soft colors wove, While the moist earth was laughing below.

I am the daughter of earth and water,
 And the nursing of the sky, 75 I pass through the pores of the ocean and shores;
 I change, but I cannot die
 For after the rain when with never a stain
 The pavilion of heaven is bare,
 And the winds and sunbeams with their convex gleams 80 Build up the blue dome of air, I silently laugh at my own cenotaph,¹
 And out of the caverns of rain, Like a child from the womb, like a ghost from the tomb,
 I arise and unbuild it again.

TO A SKYLARK
 1820 1820

Hail to thee, blithe spirit!
 Bird thou never wert,
 That from heaven, or near it, Pourest thy full heart 5 In profuse strains of unpremeditated art.
 Higher still and higher
 From the earth thou springest
 Like a cloud of fire,
 The blue deep thou wingest, 10 And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest.

In the golden lightning
 Of the sunken sun,
 O'er which clouds are bright 'ning,
 Thou dost float and run; 15 Like an unbodied joy² whose race is just begun.

¹ empty tomb (the blue dome of air)² See Byron's Manfred, I, 2, 55 (p. 553).

The pale purple even Melts around thy flight;
 Like a star of heaven,
 In the broad daylight 20 Thou art unseend, but yet I hear thy shrill delight,

Keen as are the arrows
 Of that silver sphere,
 Whose intense lamp narrows
 In the white dawn clear 25 Until we hardly see—we feel that it is
 there.

All the earth and air
 With thy voice is loud,
 As, when night is bare,
 From one lonely cloud 30 The moon rains out her beams, and heaven is overflowed

What thou art we know not;
 What is most like thee?
 From rainbow clouds there flow not Drops so bright to see 35 As from thy presence showers a rain of melody

Like a poet hidden
 In the light of thought,
 Singing hymns unbidden,
 Till the world is wrought 40 To sympathy with hopes and fears it heeded not:

Like a high-born maiden
 In a palace tower,
 Soothing her love-laden Soul in secret hour 45 With music sweet as love, which overflows her bower:

Like a glow-worm golden
 In a dell of dew, Scattering unbeholden
 Its aerial hue
 50 Among the flowers and grass, which screen it from the view!

Like a rose embowered
 In its own green leaves,
 By warm winds deflowered, Till the scent it gives 55 Makes faint with too much sweet those heavy-winged thieves:

Sound of vernal showers
 On the twinkling grass,

Rain-awakened flowers,
 All that ever was 60 Joyous, and clear, and fresh, thy music doth surpass:

Teach us, sprite or bird,
 What sweet thoughts are thine.
 I have never heard Praise of love or wine 65 That panted forth a flood of rapture so divine.

Chorus hymeneal,
 Or triumphal chant,
 Matched with thine would be all
 But an empty vaunt, 70 A thing wherein we feel there is some hidden want.

What objects are the fountains
 Of thy happy strain?
 What fields, or waves, or mountains?
 What shapes of sky or plain?
 75 What love of thine own kind? what ignorance of pain?

With thy clear keen joyance Languor cannot be.
 Shadow of annoyance
 Never came near thee.
 80 Thou lovest—but ne'er knew love's sad satiety.

Waking or asleep, Thou of death must deem Things more true and deep Than we mortals dream, 85 Or how could thy notes flow in such a crystal stream?

We look before and after,
 And pine for what is not.
 Our sincerest laughter
 With some pain is fraught; 90 Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought

Yet if we could scorn Hate, and pride, and fear;
 If we were things born
 Not to shed a tear, 95 I know not how thy joy we ever should come near.

Better than all measures Of delightful sound,
 Better than all treasures

That in books are found, 100 Thy skill to poet were, thou scorner of the ground!

Teach me half the gladness
That thy brain must know, Such harmonious madness
From my lips would flow 105 The world should listen then—as I am listening now.

1820 1824

I fear thy kisses, gentle maiden,
Thou needest not fear mine,
My spirit is too deeply laden Ever to burthen thine

5 I fear thy mien, thy tones, thy motion,
Thou needest not fear mine,
Innocent is the heart's devotion
With which I worship thine.

ARETHUSA
1820 1824

Arethusa arose
From her couch of snows
In the Acroceraunian mountains,
From cloud and from crag, 5 With many a jag, Shepherding her bright fountains
She leapt down the rocks,
With her rainbow locks Streaming among the streams,— 10 Her steps paved with green
The downward ravine
Which slopes to the western gleams;
And gliding and springing She went, ever singing 15 In murmurs as soft as sleep;
The Earth seemed to love her,
And Heaven smiled above her,
As she lingered towards the deep.

Then Alpheus bold, 20 On his glacier cold,
With his trident the mountains strook;
And opened a chasm
In the rocks—with the spasm
All Erymanthus shook.
25 And the black south wind
It unsealed behind
The urns of the silent snow,
And earthquake and thunder Did rend in sunder 30 The bars of the springs below.
And the beard and the hair Of the River-god were Seen through the torrent's sweep,

As he followed the light 35 Of the fleet nymph's flight To the brink of the Dorian deep.
"Oh, save me! Oh, guide me!
And bid the deep hide me,
For he grasps me now by the hair!"
40 The loud Ocean heard,
To its blue depth stirred,
And divided at her prayer;
And under the water
The Earth's white daughter 45 Fled like a sunny beam; Behind her descended
Her billows, unblended
With the brackish Dorian stream—Like a gloomy stain 50 On the emerald main Alpheus rushed behind,—
As an eagle pursuing A dove to its ruin
Down the streams of the cloudy wind.

55 Under the bowers
Where the Ocean Powers Sit on their pearly thrones;
Through the coral woods
Of the weltering floods, 60 Over heaps of unvalued stones;
Through the dim beams
Which amid the streams
Weave a network of colored light;
And under the caves, 65 Where the shadowy waves Are as green as the forest's night — Outspeeding the shark.
And the swordfish dark,
Under the ocean foam, 70 And up through the rifts
Of the mountain clefts
They passed to their Dorian home

And now from their fountains
In Enna's mountains, 75 Down one vale where the morning backs, Like friends once parted Grown single-hearted,
They ply their watery tasks.
At sunrise they leap 80 From their cradles steep
In the cave of the shelving hill;
At noontide they flow Through the woods below
And the meadows of asphodel;¹ 85 And at night they sleep In the rocking deep Beneath the Ortygian shore,— Like spirits that lie
In the azure sky 90 When they love but live no more.

HYMN OF APOLLO
1820 1824

The sleepless Hours who watch me as I lie, Curtained with star-inwoven tapestries
From the broad moonlight of the sky, Fanning the busy dreams from my dun
eyes,

5 Waken me when their mother, the gray
Dawn,
Tells them that dreams and that the moon is gone.

Then I arise, and climbing Heaven's blue
dome,

I walk over the mountains and the waves, Leaving my robe upon the ocean foam,

10 My footsteps pave the clouds with fire,
the caves

Are filled with my bright presence, and the
air

Leaves the green Earth to my embraces bare

The sunbeams are my shafts, with which I kill

Deceit, that loves the night and fears the
day,

15 All men who do or even imagine ill Fly me, and from the glory of my ray Good minds and open actions take new might,
Until diminished by the reign of Night

I feed the clouds, the rainbows, and the flowers

20 With their ethereal colors, the moon's globe

And the pure stars in their eternal bowers Are circled with my power as with a robe,

Whatever lamps on Earth or Heaven may shine

Are portions of one power, which is mine

25 I stand at noon upon the peak of Heaven, Then with unwilling steps I wander
down

Into the clouds of the Atlantic even.
For grief that I depart they weep and
frown

What look is more delightful than the smile

30 With which I soothe them from the western isle?

I am the eye with which the Universe Beholds itself and knows itself divine.
All harmony of instrument or verse,
All prophecy, all medicine are mine.

35 All light of Art or Nature;—to my song Victory and praise in its own right belong.

HYMN OF PAN
1820 1824

From the forests and highlands
We come, we come;

From the river-girt islands,
Where loud waves are dumb

5 Listening to my sweet pipings.
The wind in the reeds and the rushes,

The bees on the bells of thyme,
The birds on the myrtle bushes,

10 The cicada¹ above in the lime,
And the lizards below in the grass, Were as silent as ever old Tmolus was,

Listening to my sweet pipings.

Liquid Peneus was flowing,
And all dark Tempe lay

15 In Pelion's shadow, outgrowing
The light of the dying day, SPEEDED BY MY SWEET PIPINGS.

The Sileni, and Sylvans, and Fauns, And the Nymphs of the woods and the
waves,

20 To the edge of the moist river-lawns,
And the brink of the dewy caves,
And all that did then attend and follow,
Were silent with love, as you now, Apollo,

With envy of my sweet pipings.

25 I sang of the dancing stars,
I sang of the dædal² Earth,
And of Heaven—and the giant wars,
And Love, and Death, and Birth,—

And then I changed my pipings,—

30 Singing how down the vale of Mænalus
I pursued a maiden and clasped a reed³ Gods and men, we are all deluded thus!

It breaks in our bosom and then we bleed.
All wept, as I think both ye now would,

75 If envy or age had not frozen your blood,
At the sorrow of my sweet pipings

THE QUESTION
1820 1822

I dreamed that, as I wandered by the way, Bare winter suddenly was changed to
spring,

And gentle odors led my steps astray, Mixed with a sound of waters murmur-
ing

5 Along a shelving bank of turf, which lay

³ As Pan was about to embrace the nymph Nyrinx, who was fleeing from him, she was transformed into reeds. Pan named his flute after her. See Ovid's Metamorphoses, I, 691 ff.

Under a copse, and hardly dared to fling
 Its green arms round the bosom of the
 stream,
 But kissed it and then fled, as thou might-est in dream.

There grew pied wind-flowers¹ and violets, 10 Daisies, those pearly Arcturi of the
 earth,
 The constellated flower that never sets; Faint oxslips, tender bluebells, at whose
 birth
 The sod scarce heaved; and that tall flower² that wets—
 Like a child, half in tenderness and mirth—
 15 Its mother's face with heaven-collected
 tears,
 When the low wind, its playmate's voice, it hears.

And in the warm hedge grew lush eglan-tine,
 Green cowbind³ and the moonlight-colored may,⁴
 And cherry-blossoms, and white cups, whose wine 20 Was the bright dew, yet drained not by the day;
 And wild roses, and ivy serpentine,
 With its dark buds and leaves, wandering astray;
 And flowers, azure, black, and streaked with gold,
 Fairer than any wakened eyes behold.

25 And nearer to the river's trembling edge There grew broad flag-flowers, purple pranked with white;
 And starry river buds among the sedge;
 And floating water-lilies, broad and
 bright,
 Which lit the oak that overhung the hedge 30 With moonlight beams of their own watery light;
 And bulrushes and reeds of such deep
 green
 As soothed the dazzled eye with sober sheen.

Methought that of these visionary flowers
 I made a nosegay, bound in such a way 35 That the same hues, which in their natural
 bowers
 Were mingled or opposed, the like array

Kept these imprisoned children of the Hours Within my hand,—and then, elate and gay,
 I hastened to the spot whence I had come, 40 That I might there present it!—Oh, to whom?

THE TWO SPIRITS: AN ALLEGORY 1820 1824

First Spirit

O thou, who plumed with strong desire Wouldst float above the earth, beware!
 A Shadow tracks thy flight of fire—
 Night is coming!
 5 Bright are the regions of the air,
 And among the winds and beams
 It were delight to wander there—
 Night is coming!

Second Spirit

The deathless stars are bright above; 10 If I would cross the shade of night, Within my heart is the lamp of love,
 And that is day!
 And the moon will smile with gentle light
 On my golden plumes where'er they move, 15 The meteors will linger round my flight,
 And make night day.

First Spirit

But if the whirlwinds of darkness waken Hail, and lightning, and stormy rain!
 See, the bounds of the air are shaken—20 Night is coming!
 The red swift clouds of the hurricane Yon declining sun have overtaken, The clash of the hail sweeps over the plain—
 Night is coming!

Second Spirit

25 I see the light, and I hear the sound; I'll sail on the flood of the tempest dark,
 With the calm within and the light around Which makes night day;
 And thou, when the gloom is deep and stark,
 30 Look from thy dull earth, slumber-bound, My moon-like flight thou then mayst mark
 On high, far away.

Some say there is a precipice

Where one vast pine is frozen to ruin 35 O'er piles of snow and chasms of ice

² Probably, the tulip. See Shelley's The Sensi- tive Plant, 1, 17 (p. 699)

³ bryony ⁴ hawthorn

Mid Alpine mountains;
And that the languid storm pursuing That winged shape, forever flies Round those hoar branches, aye renew-
ing

40 Its aery fountains.
Some say when nights are dry and clear,
And the death-dews sleep on the morass,
Sweet whispers are heard by the traveller,
Which make night day;
45 And a silver shape like his early love doth pass,
Upborne by her wild and glittering hair,
And, when he awakes on the fragrant
grass,
He finds night day.

AUTUMN. A DIRGE
1820 1824

The warm sun is failing, the bleak wind is wailing,
The bare boughs are sighing, the pale flowers are dying,
And the Year
On the earth, her death-bed, in a shroud of leaves dead,
5 Is lying.
Come, Months, come away,
From November to May,
In your saddest array;
Follow the bier
10 Of the dead cold Year,
And like dim shadows watch by her sepulchre

The chill rain is falling, the nipped worm is crawling,
The rivers are swelling, the thunder is knelling
For the Year, 15 The blithe swallows are flown, and the lizards each gone
To his dwelling;
Come, Months, come away;
Put on white, black, and gray;
Let your light sisters play—20 Ye, follow the bier
Of the dead cold Year,
And make her grave green with tear on tear.

THE WANING MOON
1820 1824

And like a dying lady, lean and pale,
Who totters forth, wrapped in a gauzy
veil,
Out of her chamber, led by the insane
And feeble wanderings of her fading brain,

5 The moon arose up in the murky East,
A white and shapeless mass.
• • • • •

TO THE MOON
1820 1824

Art thou pale for weariness Of climbing heaven and gazing on the
earth,
Wandering companionless
Among the stars that have a different
birth,—
5 And ever changing, like a joyless eye That finds no object worth its constancy?

Thou chosen sister of the spirit,
That gazes on thee till in thee it pities
• • • • •

DEATH
1820 1824

Death is here, and death is there,
Death is busy everywhere,
All around, within, beneath,
Above, is death—and we are death.

5 Death has set his mark and seal
On all we are and all we feel,
On all we know and all we fear,
• • • • •

First our pleasures die—and then 10 Our hopes, and then our fears—and when These are dead, the debt is due, Dust claims dust—and we die too

All things that we love and cherish, Like ourselves must fade and perish;
15 Such is our rude mortal lot—Love itself would, did they not.

THE WORLD'S WANDERERS
1820 1824

Tell me, thou star, whose wings of light Speed thee in thy fiery flight,
In what cavern of the night
Will thy pinions close now?

5 Tell me, moon, thou pale and gray Pilgrim of heaven's homeless way,
In what depth of night or day Seekest thou repose now?

Weary wind, who wanderest 10 Like the world's rejected guest, Hast thou still some secret nest
On the tree or billow?

TIME LONG PAST
1880 1870

Like the ghost of a dear friend dead
Is Time long past.

A tone which is now forever fled,
A hope which is now forever past,

A love so sweet it could not last,
Was Time long past.

There were sweet dreams in the night
Of Time long past

And, was it sadness or delight,
Each day a shadow onward cast Which made us wish it yet might last—
That Time long past

There is regret, almost remorse,
For Time long past

'Tis like a child's beloved corse
A father watches, till at last Beauty is like remembrance, cast From Time long past

AN ALLEGORY
1880 1824

A portal as of shadowy adamant Stands yawning on the highway of the life

Which we all tread, a cavern huge and gaunt,

Around it rages an unceasing strife

Of shadows, like the restless clouds that haunt

The gap of some cleft mountain, lifted high

Into the whirlwinds of the upper sky

And many pass it by with careless tread,
Not knowing that a shadowy []

Tracks every traveler even to where the dead

Wait peacefully for their companion
new;

But others, by more curious humor led,
Pause to examine,—these are very few,

And they learn little there, except to know That shadows follow them where'er they go.

THE WITCH OF ATLAS
1880 1824

To Mary¹

ON HER OBJECTING TO THE FOLLOWING POEM, UPON THE SCORE OF ITS CONTAIN-ING NO HUMAN INTEREST

How, my dear Mary, are you critic-bitten (For vipers kill, though dead) by some review,

That you condemn these verses I have written,

Because they tell no story, false or true!
What, though no mice are caught by a young kitten,

May it not leap and play as grown cats do, Till its claws come? Prithce, for this one
time,

Content thee with a visionary rhyme.

What hand would crush the silken-winged fly,
The youngest of inconstant April's minions,

Because it cannot climb the purest sky,
Where the swan sings, amid the sun's dominions?

Not thine Thou knowest 'tis its doom to
die,

When Day shall hide within her twilight pinions

The lucent eyes, and the eternal smile, Serene as thine, which lent it life awhile

To thy fair feet a winged Vision came, Whose date should have been longer than a day,

And o'er thy head did beat its wings for fame,

And in thy sight its fading plumes display;

The watery bow burned in the evening flame,
But the shower fell, the swift Sun went his way—

And that is dead. Oh, let me not believe That anything of mine is fit to live!

Wordsworth informs us he was nineteen years considering and retouching Peter Bell.

Watering his laurels with the killing tears Of slow, dull care, so that their roots to Hell

Might pierce, and their wide branches blot the spheres

Of heaven with dewy leaves and flowers, this well

May be, for Heaven and Earth conspire to foil

The over-busy gardener's blundering toil

My Witch indeed is not so sweet a creature As Ruth or Lucy,² whom his graceful
praise

Clothes for our grandsons—but she matches Peter,

Though he took nineteen years, and she three days

In dressing. Light the vest of flowing metre She wears; he, proud as dandy with his stays,

Has hung upon his wiry limbs a dress

Like King Lear's "looped and windowed raggedness"

¹ The Revolt of Islam, which also was dedicated to Shelley's wife

² See Wordsworth's Ruth and Lucy Gray (p.
241)

³ King Lear, III, 4, 31

If you strip Peter, you will see a fellow Scorched by Hell's hyperequatorial climate Into a kind of sulphureous yellow:

A lean mark, hardly fit to fling a rhyme at, 45 In shape a Scaramouch, in hue Othello If you unveil my Witch, no priest nor primate

Can shrieve you of that sin,—if sin there be In love, when it becomes idolatry.

1 Before those cruel Twins, whom at one birth

Incestuous (h)ange bore to her father
Time,

Error and Truth, had hunted from the Earth

All those bright natures which adorned its prime,

And left us nothing to believe in, worth The pains of putting into learned

rhyme,

A Lady-Witch there lived on Atlas' mountain

Within a cavern, by a secret fountain

2 Her mother was one of the Atlantides The all-beholding Sun had ne'er beholden

In his wide voyage o'er continents and seas
So fair a creature, as she lay enfolden

In the warm shadow of her loveliness, He kissed her with his beams, and made all golden

The chamber of gray rock in which she lay—

She, in that dream of joy, dissolved away.

3 'Tis said, she first was changed into a vapor,

And then into a cloud, such clouds as flit,
Like splendor-winged moths about a taper,

Round the red west when the sun dies
in it:

And then into a meteor, such as caper

On hill-tops when the moon is in a fit:

Then, into one of those mysterious stars

Which hide themselves between the Earth and Mars.

4 Ten times the Mother of the Months¹ had bent

Her bow beside the folding-star,² and bidden

With that bright sign the billows to indent
The sea-deserted sand—like children

cludden,

At her command they ever came and
went—

¹ Diana (Artemis), goddess of the moon.

² An evening star which appears about folding time.

Since in that cave a dewy splendor hidden

Took shape and motion: with the living
form

Of this embodied Power, the cave grew warm.

5 A lovely lady garmented in light From her own beauty; deep her eyes as
are

Two openings of unfathomable night Seen through a temple's cloven roof,

her hair
Dark; the dim brain whirls dizzy with de-
light,

Picturing her form; her soft smiles shone afar,

And her low voice was heard like love, and drew

All living things towards this wonder new.

6 And first the spotted camelopard¹ came And then the wise and fearless elephant;

Then the sly serpent, in the golden flame Of his own volumes interwolved. All gaunt

And sanguine beasts her gentle looks made
tame,

They drank before her at her sacred fount,

And every beast of beating heart grew bold,

Such gentleness and power even to behold.

7 The brinded lioness led forth her young,
That she might teach them how they should forego

Their inborn thirst of death, the paid² unstrung

His anews at her feet, and sought to
know

With looks whose motions spoke without a tongue

How he might be as gentle as the doe.
The magic circle of her voice and eyes

All savage natures did unparadise.

8 And old Silenus, shaking a green stick Of lilies, and the wood-gods in a crew

Came, blithe, as in the olive copses thick Cicadæ³ are, drunk with the noonday
dew;

And Dryope and Faunus followed quick, Teasing the god to sing them something
new;

Till in this cave they found the Lady lone,
Sitting upon a seat of emerald stone.

- 9 And universal Pan, 'tis said, was there,
And, though none saw him, through the adamant
Of the deep mountains, through the trackless air,
And through those living spirits, like a want,
He passed out of his everlasting lair
Where the quick heart of the great world doth pant,
And felt that wondrous Lady all alone,—
And she felt him, upon her emerald throne.
- 10 And every nymph of stream and spreading tree,
And every shepherdess of Ocean's flocks, Who drives her white waves over the green sea,
And Ocean with the brine on his gray locks,
And quaint Priapus with his company,
All came, much wondering how the enwombed rocks Could have brought forth so beautiful a birth;
Her love subdued their wonder and their mirth.
- 11 The herdsmen and the mountain maidens came,
And the rude kings of pastoral Garamant;
Their spirits shook within them, as a flame Stirred by the air under a cavern gaunt.
Pigmies and Polyphemes, by many a name, Centaur, and Satyr, and such shapes as haunt Wet clefts, and lumps neither alive nor dead, Dog-headed, bosom-eyed, and bird-footed.
- 12 For she was beautiful; her beauty made The bright world dim, and everything beside Seemed like the fleeting image of a shade;
No thought of living spirit could abide,
Which to her looks had ever been betrayed,
On any object in the world so wide,
On any hope within the circling skies,
But on her form, and in her inmost eyes.
- 13 Which when the Lady knew, she took her spindle And twined three threads of fleecy mist, and three Long lines of light, such as the dawn may kindle
- The clouds and waves and mountains with;
and she
As many star-beams, ere their lamps could dwindle
In the belated moon, wound skilfully;
And with these threads a subtle veil she wove—
A shadow for the splendor of her love.
- 14 The deep recesses of her odorous dwelling Were stored with magic treasures—sounds of air,
Which had the power all spirits of compelling, Folded in cells of crystal silence there;
Such as we hear in youth, and think the feeling Will never die—yet ere we are aware,
The feeling and the sound are fled and gone,
And the regret they leave remains alone.
- 15 And there lay Visions swift, and sweet, and quaint,
Each in its thin sheath, like a chrysalis,
Some eager to burst forth, some weak and faint
With the soft burden of intensest bliss
It is its work to bear to many a saint Whose heart adores the shrine which holiest is, Even Love's; and others white, green, gray, and black,
And of all shapes—and each was at her beck.
- 16 And odors in a kind of aviary Of ever-blooming Eden-trees she kept, Clipped in a floating net, a love-sick Fairy Had woven from dew-beams while the moon yet slept;
As bats at the wired window of a dairy,
They beat their vans; and each was an adept,
When loosed and missioned, making wings of winds,
To stir sweet thoughts or sad, in destined minds.
- 17 And liquors clear and sweet, whose healthful might Could medicine the sick soul to happy sleep,
And change eternal death into a night
Of glorious dreams,—or, if eyes needs must weep, Could make their tears all wonder and delight,— She in her crystal vials did closely keep:

If men could drink of those clear vials,
 'tis said,
 The living were not envied of the dead.

18 Her cave was stored with scrolls of strange device,
 The works of some Saturnian Archimage,¹
 Which taught the expiations at whose price Men from the gods might win that happy age Too lightly lost, redeeming native vice,
 And which might quench the earth-consuming rage
 Of gold and blood, till men should live and move Harmonious as the sacred stars above;

19 And how all things that seem untamable, Not to be checked and not to be confined,
 Obey the spells of Wisdom's wizard skill.
 Time, earth, and fire, the ocean and the
 wind,
 And all their shapes, and man's imperial
 will;
 And other scrolls whose writings did unbind
 The inmost lore of Love—let the profane Tremble to ask what secrets they contain.

20 And wondrous works of substances unknown,
 To which the enchantment of her father's power
 Had changed those ragged blocks of savage stone,
 Were heaped in the recesses of her bower;
 Carved lamps and chalices, and vials which shone
 In their own golden beams—each like a flower
 Out of whose depth a fire-fly shakes his
 light
 Under a cypress² in a starless night.

21 At first she lived alone in this wild home,
 And her own thoughts were each a minister, Clothing themselves, or with the ocean
 foam,
 Or with the wind, or with the speed of
 fire,
 To work whatever purposes might come

Into her mind; such power her mighty sire
 Had girt them with, whether to fly or run, Through all the regions which he shines
 upon.

22 The Ocean-nymphs and Hamadryades, Oreads and Naiads with long weedy
 locks,
 Offered to do her bidding through the seas, Under the earth, and in the hollow rocks,
 And far beneath the matted roots of trees,
 And in the gnarled heart of stubborn oaks,
 So they might live forever in the light
 Of her sweet presence—each a satellite

23 "This may not be," the Wizard Maid re-
 phed,
 "The fountains where the Naiades be-
 dew
 Their shining hair, at length are drained and dried,
 The solid oaks forget their strength, and strew
 Their latest leaf upon the mountains wide,
 The boundless ocean, like a drop of dew,
 Will be consumed—the stubborn centre must
 Be scattered, like a cloud of summer dust.

24 "And ye with them will perish, one by one,—
 If I must sigh to think that this shall be,
 If I must weep when the surviving Sun Shall smile on your decay—oh, ask not
 me
 To love you till your little race is run;
 I cannot die as ye must—over me Your leaves shall glance—the streams in which ye dwell Shall be my paths henceforth, and so—
 farewell!"

25 She spoke and wept; the dark and azure
 well Sparkled beneath the shower of her bright tears,
 And every little circle where they fell Flung to the cavern-roof inconstant
 spheres
 And intertangled lines of light; a knell
 Of sobbing voices came upon her ears From those departing Forms, o'er the serene
 Of the white streams and of the forest
 green.

Queene, I, 1, 29 ff.)

² The cypress is a common tree in graveyards

- 26 All day the Wizard Lady sate aloof, Spelling out scrolls of dread antiquity,
 Under the cavern's fountain-lighted roof,
 Or brodering the pictured poesy
 Of some high tale upon her growing woof, Which the sweet splendor of her smiles could dye
 In hues outshining Heaven—and ever she Added some grace to the wrought poesy
- 27 While on her hearth lay blazing many a piece
 Of sandal wood, rare gums, and cinnamon,
 Men scarcely know how beautiful fire is,
 Each flame of it is as a precious stone Dissolved in ever-moving light, and this Belongs to each and all who gaze upon.
 The Witch beheld it not, for in her hand She held a woof that dimmed the burning brand.
- 28 This Lady never slept, but lay in trance All night within the fountain, as in
 sleep.
 Its emerald crags glowed in her beauty's
 glance;
 Through the green splendor of the water deep
 She saw the constellations reel and dance Like fire-flies, and withal did ever keep The tenor of her contemplations calm, With open eyes, closed feet, and folded palm.
- 29 And when the whirlwinds and the clouds descended From the white pinnacles of that cold
 hill,
 She passed at dewfall to a space extended,
 Where, in a lawn of flowering asphodel¹
 Amid a wood of pines and cedars blended,
 There yawned an inextinguishable well
 Of crimson fire, full even to the brim,
 And overflowing all the margin trim;
- 30 Within the which she lay when the fierce war
 Of wintry winds shook that innocuous liquor
 In many a mimic moon and bearded star O'er woods and lawns; the serpent heard it flicker
 In sleep, and, dreaming still, he crept afar;
 And when the windless snow descended thicker Than autumn leaves, she watched it as it came Melt on the surface of the level flame.
- 31 She had a boat which some say Vulcan
 wrought
 For Venus as the chariot of her star;
 But it was found too feeble to be fraught With all the ardors in that sphere which are,
 And so she sold it, and Apollo bought And gave it to this daughter; from a car Changed to the fairest and the lightest boat Which ever upon mortal stream did float
- 32 And others say that, when but three hours
 old,
 The first-born Love out of his cradle leapt,
 And clove dun Chaos with his wings of
 gold,
 And like a horticultural adept, Stole a strange seed, and wrapped it up in
 mould,
 And sowed it in his mother's star, and kept
 Watering it all the summer with sweet dew,
 And with his wings fanning it as it grew
- 33 The plant grew strong and green; the snowy flower Fell, and the long and gourd-like fruit began
 To turn the light and dew by inward power To its own substance, woven tracery ran
 Of light firm texture, ribbed and branching, o'er
 The solid rind, like a leaf's veined fan, Of which Love scooped this boat, and with soft motion
 Piloted it round the circumfluous ocean.
- 34 This boat she moored upon her fount, and lit
 A living spirit within all its frame, Breathing the soul of swiftness into it Couched on the fountain, like a panther
 tame,—
 One of the twain at Evan's feet that sit—
 Or as on Vesta's sceptre a swift flame, Or on blind Homer's heart a winged
 thought,—
 In joyous expectation lay the boat.
- 35 Then by strange art she kneaded fire and
 snow
 Together, tempering the repugnant mass With liquid love—all things together
 grew Through which the harmony of love can pass;

¹ daffodils

- And a fair Shape out of her hands did
 flow,
 A living Image, which did far surpass
 In beauty that bright shape of vital stone.
 Which drew the heart out of Pygmalion.¹
- 36 A sexless thing it was, and in its growth
 It seemed to have developed no defect
 Of either sex, yet all the grace of both,
 In gentleness and strength its limbs were decked,
 The bosom swelled lightly with its full
 youth,
 The countenance was such as might select Some artist that his skill should never die, Imaging forth such perfect purity
- 37 From its smooth shoulders hung two rapid
 wings,
 Fit to have borne it to the seventh sphere,
 Tipped with the speed of liquid lightening, Dyed in the ardors of the atmosphere
 She led her creature to the boiling springs Where the light boat was moored, and said, "Sit here!"
 And pointed to the prow, and took her seat
 Beside the rudder, with opposing feet
- 38 And down the streams which clove those mountains vast,
 Around their inland islets, and amid The panther-peopled forests, whose shade east
 Darkness and odors, and a pleasure hid In melancholy gloom, the pinnace passed,
 By many a star-surrounded pyramid
 Of icy crag cleaving the purple sky,
 And caverns yawning round unfathomably.
- 39 The silver noon into that winding dell,
 With slanted gleam athwart the forest
 tops,
 Tempered like golden evening, feebly fell.
 A green and glowing light, like that which drops
 From folded lilies in which glow-worms
 dwell,
 When Earth over her face Night's mantle wraps,
- 40 And ever as she went, the Image lay With folded wings and unawakened
 eyes,
 And o'er its gentle countenance did play
 The busy dreams, as thick as summer flies,
 Chasing the rapid smiles that would not stay,
 And drinking the warm tears, and the sweet sighs
 Inhaling, which, with busy murmur vain, They had aroused from that full heart and brain.
- 41 And ever down the prone vale, like a cloud Upon a stream of wind, the pinnace
 went.
 Now lingering on the pools, in which abode
 The calm and darkness of the deep content
 In which they paused, now o'er the shallow road
 Of white and dancing waters, all besprent
 With sand and polished pebbles mortal
 boat
 In such a shallow rapid could not float
- 42 And down the earthquaking cataracts, which shiver
 Their snow-like waters into golden air,
 Or under chasms unfathomable ever Sepulchre them, till in their rage they tear
 A subterranean portal for the river,
 It fled—the circling sunbows did upbear
 Its fall down the hoar precipice of spray, Lighting it far upon its lampless way.
- 43 And when the Wizard-Lady would ascend The labyrinth of some many-winding vale,
 Which to the inmost mountain upward
 tend,
 She called "Hermaphroditus!" and the pale
 And heavy hue which slumber could extend Over its lips and eyes, as on the gale
 A rapid shadow from a slope of grass,
 Into the darkness of the stream did pass.
- 44 And it unfurled its heaven-colored pinions, With stars of fire spotting the stream
 below;
- ¹Pygmalion fell in love with the statue of a woman which he had carved, and which came to life. See Morris's Pygmalion and the Image in The Earthly Paradise (1868-70) and Gilbert's Pygmalion and Galatea (1871).

- And from above into the Sun's dominions Flinging a glory, like the golden glow
 In which Spring clothes her emerald-winged minions, All interwoven with fine feathery snow
 And moonlight splendor of intensest rime,¹
 With which frost paints the pines in winter time.
- 45 And then it winnowed the Elysian air Which ever hung about that lady bright,
 With its ethereal vans; and speeding there,
 Like a star upon the torrent of the night.
 Or a swift eagle in the morning glare Breasting the whirlwind with impetuous flight,
 The pinnace, oared by those enchanted wings, Clove the fierce streams towards their upper springs.
- 46 The water flashed, like sunlight by the prow
 Of a noon-wandering meteor flung to Heaven,
 The still air seemed as if its waves did flow
 In tempest down the mountains; loosely driven
 The Lady's radiant hair streamed to and fro; Beneath, the billows having vainly striven Indignant and impetuous, roared to feel The swift and steady motion of the keel.
- 47 Or, when the weary moon was in the wane,
 Or in the noon of interlunar² night,
 The Lady-Witch in visions could not chain Her spirit; but sailed forth under the light Of shooting stars, and bade extend again
 Its storm-outsPEEDING wings, the Her-maphrodite, She to the Austral waters took her way, Beyond the fabulous Thamondocana,
- 48 Where, like a meadow which no scythe has shaven,
 Which rain could never bend, or whirlblast shake,
 With the Antarctic constellations paven, Canopus and his crew, lay the Austral lake;
 There she would build herself a windless haven Out of the clouds whose moving turrets make
- 1 hearfrost
 2 That is, in the interval between the old moon and the new.
- The bastions of the storm, when through the sky
 The spirits of the tempest thundered by;
- 49 A haven, beneath whose translucent floor
 The tremulous stars sparkled unfathomably,
 And around which the solid vapors hoar, Based on the level waters, to the sky Lifted their dreadful crags, and, like a shore Of wintry mountains, inaccessibly Hemmed in, with rifts and precipices gray And hanging crags, many a cove and bay.
- 50 And whilst the outer lake beneath the lash
 Of the wind's scourge, foamed like a wounded thing,
 And the incessant hail with stony clash Ploughed up the waters, and the flagging wing Of the roused cormorant in the lightning flash Looked like the wreck of some wind-wandering Fragment of inky thunder-smoke—this haven Was as a gem to copy Heaven engraven,
- 51 On which that Lady played her many pranks, Circling the image of a shooting star,
 Even as a tiger on Hydaspes' banks Outspeeds the antelopes which speediest are,
 In her light boat; and many quips and cranks;¹
 She played upon the water, till the ear
 Of the late moon, like a sick matron wan,
 To journey from the misty east began.
- 52 And then she called out of the hollow turrets
 Of those high clouds, white, golden, and vermilion,
 The armies of her ministering spirits;
 In mighty legions, million after million,
 They came, each troop emblazoning its merits
 On meteor flags; and many a proud pavilion
 Of the intertexture of the atmosphere
 They pitched upon the plain of the calm mere.
- 53 They framed the imperial tent of their great Queen Of woven exhalations, underlaid
- ¹ See L'Atterno, 27

- With lambent lightning-fire, as may be seen A dome of thin and open ivory inlaid
 With crimson silk; cressets¹ from the serene Hung there, and on the water for her tread
 A tapestry of fleece-like mist was strewn, Dyed in the beams of the ascending moon.
- 54 And on a throne o'erlaid with starlight,
 caught
 Upon those wandering isles of aery dew, Which highest shoals of mountain shipwreck not,
 She sate, and heard all that had happened new Between the earth and moon, since they had brought
 The last intelligence; and now she grew Pale as that moon lost in the watery night,
 And now she wept, and now she laughed outright.
- 55 These were tame pleasures. She would often climb
 The steepest ladder of the crudded rack:²
 Up to some beaked cape of cloud sublime,
 And like Arion on the dolphin's back Ride singing through the shoreless air, oft-time
 Following the serpent lightning's winding track,
 She ran upon the platforms of the wind,
 And laughed to hear the fire-balls roar
 behind.
- 56 And sometimes to those streams of upper
 air,
 Which whirl the earth in its diurnal
 round,
 She would ascend, and win the spirits there To let her join their chorus. Mortals
 found
 That on those days the sky was calm and fair,
 And mystic snatches of harmonious
 sound Wandered upon the earth where'er she passed,
 And happy thoughts of hope, too sweet to last.
- 57 But her choice sport was, in the hours of
 sleep,
 To glide adown old Nilus, where he threads
- Egypt and Æthiopia, from the steep
 Of utmost Axumé, until he spreads, Like a calm flock of silver-fleeced sheep, His waters on the plain,—and crested heads
 Of cities and proud temples gleam amid,
 And many a vapor-belted pyramid.
- 58 By Mœris and the Mareotid lakes, Strewn with faint blooms, like bridal chamber floors,
 Where naked boys bridling tame water-snakes,
 Or charioteering ghastly alligators,
 Had left on the sweet waters mighty wakes
 Of those huge forms—within the brazen doors
 Of the great Labyrinth slept both boy and beast,
 Tired with the pomp of their Osirian feast.
- 59 And where within the surface of the river
 The shadows of the massy temples lie,
 And never are erased—but tremble ever Like things which every cloud can doom
 to die;
 Through lotus-paven canals, and whereso-ever
 The works of man pierced that serenest
 sky
 With tombs, and towers, and fanes,—'twas her delight
 To wander in the shadow of the night.
- 60 With motion like the spirit of that wind Whose soft step deepens slumber, her light feet Passed through the peopled haunts of humankind, Scattering sweet visions from her presence sweet;
 Through fane and palace-court, and labyrinth mined
 With many a dark and subterranean street
 Under the Nile, through chambers high and
 deep She passed, observing mortals in their
 sleep.
- 61 A pleasure sweet doubtless it was to see Mortals subdued in all the shapes of
 sleep.
 Here lay two sister-twins in infancy;
 There, a lone youth who in his dreams did weep;
 Within, two lovers linked innocently
 In their loose locks which over both did creep

¹ Iron baskets for holding burning oil, etc., and carried as torches

² thickened clouds

- Like ivy from one stem; and there lay calm
Old age with snow-bright hair and folded palm.
- 62 But other troubled forms of sleep she saw,
Not to be mirrored in a holy song;
Distortions foul of supernatural awe,
And pale imagings of visioned wrong;
And all the code of Custom's lawless law Written upon the brows of old and young:
"This," said the Wizard-Maiden, "is the
strife
Which stirs the liquid surface of man's life."
- 63 And little did the sight disturb her soul.
We, the weak mariners of that wide lake, Where'er its shores extend or billows roll, Our course unpiloted and starless make O'er its wild surface to an unknown goal, But she in the calm depths her way could
take,
Where in bright bowers immortal forms abide Beneath the weltering of the restless tide
- 64 And she saw princes couched under the
glow
Of sunlike gems, and round each temple-court
In dormitories ranged, now after now, She saw the priests asleep—all of one sort—
For all were educated to be so.— The peasants in their huts, and in the port
The sailors she saw cradled on the waves,
And the dead lulled within their dreamless graves.
- 65 And all the forms in which those spirits lay Were to her sight like the diaphanous Veils, in which those sweet ladies oft array Their delicate limbs, who would conceal from us
Only their scorn of all concealment, they Move in the light of their own beauty
thus.
But these and all now lay with sleep upon
them,
And little thought a witch was looking on
them.
- 66 She all those human figures breathing there Beheld as living spirits, to her eyes
The naked beauty of the soul lay bare,
And often through a rude and worn disguise
She saw the inner form most bright and
fair;
And then she had a charm of strange device,
Which, murmured on mute lips with tender
tone,
Could make that spirit mingle with her
own.
- 67 Alas, Aurora! what wouldst thou have given
For such a charm when Tithon became gray?
Or how much, Venus, of thy silver Heaven Wouldst thou have yielded, ere Pioneipina
Had half (oh! why not all?) the debt forgiven Which dear Adonis had been doomed to
pay,
To any witch who would have taught you
it?
The Helad doth not know its value yet
- 68 'Tis said in after times her spirit free Knew what love was, and felt itself
alone,
But holy Dian could not chaster be Before she stooped to kiss Endymion, Than now this lady—like a sexless bee Tasting all blossoms, and confined to
none;
Among those mortal forms, the Wizard-Maiden
Passed with an eye serene and heart un-laden.
- 69 To those she saw most beautiful, she gave Strange panacea in a crystal bowl, They drank in their deep sleep of that sweet wave,
And lived thenceforward as if some control, Mightier than life, were in them; and the grave
Of such, when death oppressed the weary soul,
Was as a green and overarching bower Lit by the gems of many a starry flower
- 70 For on the night when they were buried,
she Restored the embalmers' running, and shook
The light out of the funeral lamps, to be A mimic day within that deathly nook,
And she unwound the woven imagery

- Of second childhood's swaddling bands, and took The coffin, its last cradle, from its niche,
And threw it with contempt into a ditch.
- 71 And there the body lay, age after age, Mute, breathing, beating, warm, and undecaying,
Like one asleep in a green hermitage,
With gentle smiles about its eyelids playing,
And living in its dreams beyond the rage
Of death or life, while they were still arraying
In liveries ever new, the rapid, blind,
And fleeting generations of mankind.
- 72 And she would write strange dreams upon the brain
Of those who were less beautiful, and make All harsh and crooked purposes more vain
Than in the desert is the serpent's wake Which the sand covers; all his evil gain
The miser in such dreams would rise and shake Into a beggar's lap, the lying scribe Would his own lies betray without a bribe.
- 73 The priests would write an explanation full, Translating hieroglyphics into Greek,
How the god Apis really was a bull,
And nothing more; and bid the herald stick
The same against the temple doors, and pull
The old cant down; they licensed all to speak Whatever they thought of hawks, and cats, and geese, By pastoral letters to each diocese.¹
- 74 The king would dress an ape up in his crown
And robes, and seat him on his glorious seat,
And on the right hand of the sunlike throne Would place a gaudy mock-bird to repeat The chatterings of the monkey Every one Of the prone courtiers crawled to kiss the feet Of their great Emperor, when the morning came,
And kissed—alas, how many kiss the same.
- 75 The soldiers dreamed that they were blacksmiths, and Walked out of quarters in somnambulism;
Round the red anvils you might see them stand Like Cyclopes in Vulcan's sooty abyss, Beating their swords to ploughshares,¹ in a band
The gaolers sent those of the liberal schism Free through the streets of Memphis, much, I wis,²
To the annoyance of king Amasis.
- 76 And timid lovers who had been so coy They hardly knew whether they loved or not,
Would rise out of their rest, and take sweet joy,
To the fulfilment of their inmost thought;
And when next day the maiden and the boy Met one another, both, like sinners caught, Blushed at the thing which each believed was done Only in fancy—till the tenth moon shone,
- 77 And then the Witch would let them take no ill;
Of many thousand schemes which lovers find,
The Witch found one,—and so they took their fill Of happiness in marriage, warm and kind Friends who, by practice of some envious skill, Were torn apart—a wide wound, mind from mind—
She did unite again with visions clear Of deep affection and of truth sincere
- 78 These were the pranks she played among the cities Of mortal men, and what she did to sprites
And gods, entangling them in her sweet ditties
To do her will, and show their subtle sleights, I will declare another time; for it is A tale more fit for the weird winter nights³

EPIPSYCHIDION

VERSES ADDRESSED TO THE NOBLE AND UN-FORTUNATE LADY, EMILIA V——, NOW IM-PRISONED IN THE CONVENT OF ——— 1821 1821

Sweet Spirit! sister of that orphan one,¹ Whose empire is the name² thou weapest
on,
In my heart's temple I suspend to thee
These votive wreaths of withered memory

5 Poor captive bird! who, from thy narrow cage,
Pourest such music, that it might assuage
The rugged hearts of those who prisoned
thee,
Were they not deaf to all sweet melody,— This song shall be thy rose: its petals pale 10 Are dead, indeed, my adored nightingale!
But soft and fragrant is the faded blossom,
And it has no thorn left to wound thy bosom.

High, spirit-winged Heart! who dost
forever
Beat thine unfeeling bars with vain endeavor, 15 Till those bright plumes of thought, in which arrayed
It over-soared this low and worldly shade, Lie shattered, and thy panting, wounded
breast
Stains with dear blood its unmaternal nest!
I weep vain tears; blood would less bitter
be, 20 Yet poured forth gladlier, could it profit
thee.

Seraph of Heaven! too gentle to be human,
Veiling beneath that radiant form of Woman
All that is insupportable in thee
Of light, and love, and immortality!
25 Sweet Benediction in the eternal Curse!
Veiled Glory of this lampless Universe!
Thou Moon beyond the clouds! Thou living Form
Among the Dead! Thou Star above the Storm!

¹ Mary Shelley, whose mother died in giving birth to her.

² Shelley.

Thou Wonder, and thou Beauty, and thou Terror!
30 Thou Harmony of Nature's art! Thou
Mirror

In whom, as in the splendor of the Sun, All shapes look glorious which thou gazest
on!
Ay, even the dim words which obscure thee
now
Flash, lightning-like, with unaccustomed
glow;
35 I pray thee that thou blot from this sad
song
All of its much mortality and wrong, With those clear drops, which start like sacred dew
From the twin lights thy sweet soul darkens through,
Weeping, till sorrow becomes ecstasy—40 Then smile on it, so that it may not die.

I never thought before my death to see Youth's vision¹ thus made perfect Emily, I love thee; though the world by no thin
name
Will hide that love from its unvalued shame²
45 Would we two had been twins of the same
mother!
Or, that the name my heart lent to another Could be a sister's bond for her and thee, Blending two beams of one eternity!
Yet were one lawful³ and the other true,⁴ 50 These names,⁵ though dear, could paint not, as is due,
How beyond refuge I am thine Ah me!
I am not thine—I am a part of thee.

Sweet Lamp! my moth-like Muse has burned its wings,
Or, like a dying swan who soars and sings,⁶ 55 Young Love should teach Time, in his own gray style,
All that thou art. Art thou not void of guile,
A lovely soul formed to be blessed and bless?
A well of sealed and secret happiness, Whose waters like blithe light and music
are,
60 Vanquishing dissonance and gloom? a star

¹ The ideal which Shelley had formed in his youth. See Alastor, 203 ff (p. 638).

² The contempt to which Shelley is indifferent

³ That Emily and Mary should both be married to him.

⁴ That he and Emily were brother and sister.

⁵ Sister and wife.

⁶ The swan was said to sing melodiously when about to die.

- Which, moves not in the moving heavens, ¹⁰⁰ The crimson pulse of living morning
 alone?
 A smile amid dark frowns? a gentle tone Amid rude voices? a beloved light?
 A solitude, a refuge, a delight?
⁶⁵ A lute, which those whom Love has taught to play
 Make music on, to soothe the roughest day ¹⁰⁵ Warm fragrance seems to fall from her And lull fond Grief asleep? a buried light dress treasure?
 A cradle of young thoughts of wingless
 pleasure?
 A violet-shrouded grave of woe?—I measure ⁷⁰ The world of fancies, seeking one like thee,
 And find—alas! mine own infirmity.
- She met me, stranger, upon life's rough
 way,
 And lured me towards sweet death; as Night by Day,
 Winter by Spring, or Sorrow by swift
 Hope,
⁷⁵ Led into light, life, peace.¹ An antelope,
 In the suspended impulse of its lightness,
 Were less ethereally light, the brightness Of her divinest presence trembles through Her limbs, as underneath a cloud of
 dew
⁸⁰ Embodied in the windless heaven of June Amid the splendor-winged stars, the Moon Burns, extinguishably beautiful,
 And from her lips, as from a hyacinth full Of honey-dew, a liquid murmur drops, ⁸⁵ Killing the sense with passion, sweet as stops
 Of planetary music² heard in trance
 In her mild lights the stary spirits dance,
 The sunbeams of those wells which ever
 leap
 Under the lightnings of the soul—too deep ⁹⁰ For the brief fathom-line of thought or sense.
 The glory of her being, issuing thence, Stains the dead, blank, cold air with a warm shade
 Of unentangled intermixture, made By Love, of light and motion; one intense ¹³⁰ Spouse! Sister! Angel! Pilot of the Fate ⁹⁵ Diffusion, one serene Omnipresence, Whose flowing outlines mingle in their flowing, Around her cheeks and utmost fingers glowing,
 With the unintermitted blood, which there Quivers (as in a fleece of snow-like air
- The crimson pulse of living morning (quiver) Continuously prolonged, and ending never,
 Till they are lost, and in that Beauty furled Which penetrates and clasps and fills the
 world,
 Scarcely visible from extreme loveliness.
¹⁰⁵ Warm fragrance seems to fall from her light dress
 And her loose hair; and where some heavy tress
 The air of her own speed has disentrined, The sweetness seems to satiate the faint
 wind;
 And in the soul a wild odor is felt,
¹¹⁰ Beyond the sense, like fiery dews that melt Into the bosom of a frozen bud.— See where she stands! a mortal shape indued
 With love and life and light and deity, And motion which may change but cannot
 die, ¹¹⁵ An image of some bright Eternity; A shadow of some golden dream; a Splendor Leaving the third sphere¹ pilotless; a tender
 Reflection of the eternal Moon of Love Under whose motions life's dull billows
 move;
¹²⁰ A metaphor of Spring and Youth and Morning;
 A vision like incarnate April, warning,
 With smiles and tears, Frost the Anatomy Into his summer grave.
- Ah, woe is me!
 What have I dared? where am I lifted?
 how ¹²⁵ Shall I descend, and perish not? I know That Love makes all things equal, I have heard
 By mine own heart this joyous truth averred:
 The spirit of the worm beneath the sod In love and worship, blends itself with God.
- Spouse! Sister! Angel! Pilot of the Fate Whose course has been so starless! Oh, too late Belovèd! Oh, too soon adored, by me!
 For in the fields of immortality My spirit should at first have worshiped
 thine,
¹³⁵ A divine presence in a place divine;
 Or should have moved beside it on this
 earth,

¹ Light, life, peace, refer respectively to Day, Spring, Hope

² The ancients believed that the movement of the celestial spheres produced music

- A shadow of that substance,¹ from its birth;
 But not as now. I love thee; yes, I feel That on the fountain of my heart a seal 140 Is set, to keep its waters pure and bright For thee, since in those tears thou hast de-
 light.
 We—are we not formed, as notes of music
 are,
 For one another, though dissimilar, Such difference without discord as can
 make 145 Those sweetest sounds, in which all spirits shake
 As trembling leaves in a continuous air?
- Thy wisdom speaks in me, and bids me dare Beacon the rocks on which high hearts are wrecked.
 I never was attached to that great sect, 150 Whose doctrine is, that each one should select
 Out of the crowd a mistress or a friend,
 And all the rest, though fair and wise, commend
 To cold oblivion, though 'tis in the code Of modern morals, and the beaten road 155 Which those poor slaves with weary footsteps tread
 Who travel to their home among the dead
 By the broad highway of the world, and so With one chained friend, perhaps a jealous
 foe,
 The dreariest and the longest journey go.
- 160 True love in this differs from gold and
 clay,
 That to divide is not to take away Love is like understanding, that grows
 bright
 Gazing on many truths, 'tis like thy light, Imagination! which, from earth and sky, 165 And from the depths of human fantasy.
 As from a thousand prisms and mirrors, fills
 The Universe with glorious beams, and kills Error, the worm, with many a sun-like arrow
 Of its reverberated lightning Narrow 170 The heart that loves, the brain that contemplates,
 The life that wears, the spirit that creates One object, and one form, and builds thereby
 A sepulchre for its eternity.
- Mind from its object differs most in this;
 175 Evil from good; misery from happiness;
 The baser from the nobler; the impure And frail, from what is clear and must endure:
 If you divide suffering and dross, you may diminish till it is consumed away; 180 If you divide pleasure and love and
 thought,
 Each part exceeds the whole; and we know
 not How much, while any yet remains un-spared.
 Of pleasure may be gained, of sorrow
 spared:
 This truth is that deep well, whence sages draw 185 The unenvied light of hope, the eternal law
 By which those live, to whom this world of life
 Is as a garden ravaged, and whose strife Tills for the promise of a later birth
 The wilderness of this Elysian earth.
- 190 There was a Being¹ whom my spirit oft Met on its visioned wanderings, far aloft, In the clear golden prime of my youth's
 dawn,
 Upon the fairy isles of sunny lawn, Amid the enchanted mountains, and the caves
 195 Of divine sleep, and on the air-like waves Of wonder-level dream, whose tremulous
 floor
 Paved her light steps On an imagined
 shore,
 Under the gray beak of some promontory
 She met me, robed in such exceeding glory 200 That I beheld her not In solitudes Her voice came to me through the whispering woods,
 And from the fountains and the odors
 deep
 Of flowers, which, like lips murmuring in their sleep
 Of the sweet kisses which had lulled them
 there,
 205 Breathed but of her to the enamored air;
 And from the breezes whether low or loud.
 And from the rain of every passing cloud,
 And from the singing of the summer-birds, And from all sounds, all silence. In the words 210 Of antique verse and high romance, in form,

¹ Her spirit¹ The ideal described in Alastor, 150-80 (p. 637), and in Hymn to Intellectual Beauty (p. 644).

Sound, color, in whatever checks that storm Which with the shattered present chokes the past,¹
And in that best philosophy, whose taste Makes this cold common hell, our life, a doom
215 As glorious as a fiery martyrdom—
Her Spirit was the harmony of truth

Then from the caverns of my dreamy
youth
I spiang, as one sandalled with plumes of
fire,
And towards the lodestar of my one desire 220 I flitted, like a dizzy moth, whose flight Is as a dead leaf's in the owl's light.
When it would seek in Hesper's setting sphere
A radiant death, a fiery sepulchre,
As if it were a lamp of earthly flame 225 But She, whom prayers or tears then could not tame,
Passed, like a God throned on a winged planet,
Whose burning plumes to tenfold swiftness fan it,
Into the dreary cone of our life's shade.
And as a man with mighty loss dismayed, 230 I would have followed, though the grave between Yawned like a gulf whose spectres are
unseen.
When a voice said:—"O thou of hearts the weakest,
The phantom is beside thee whom thou seekest."
Then I—"Where?"—the world's echo answered "Where?"
235 And in that silence, and in my despair, I questioned every tongueless wind that flew Over my tower of mourning, if it knew Whither 'twas fled, this soul out of my
soul;
And murmured names and spells which have control 240 Over the sightless tyrants of our fate, But neither prayer nor verse could dissipate
The night which closed on her, nor un-create That world within this Chaos, mine and
me,
(Of which she was the veiled Divinity,—

¹ In whatever survives death, and is immortal in works of art

² That is, in the dim uncanny light which the moth leaves for the brighter light of Hesper-us, the evening star

215 The world I say of thoughts that worshipped her;
And therefore I went forth, with hope and
fear
And every gentle passion sick to death, Feeding my course with expectation's
breath,
Into the wintry forest of our life, 250 And struggling through its error¹ with vain strife,
And stumbling in my weakness and my haste,
And half bewildered by new forms, I
passed,
Seeking among those untaught foresters
If I could find one form resembling hers, 255 In which she might have masked herself from me
There,—One, whose voice was venomed
melody
Sate by a well, under blue nightshade
bowers,
The breath of her false mouth was like faint flowers;
Her touch was as electric poison,—flame 260 Out of her looks into my vitals came,
And from her living cheeks and bosom flew A killing an, which pierced like honey-dew Into the core of my green heart, and lay Upon its leaves; until, as hair grown gray 265 O'er a young brow, they hid its unblown prime
With ruins of unseasonable time

In many mortal forms I rashly sought
The shadow of that idol of my thought And some were fair—but beauty dies
away;
270 Others were wise—but honeyed words betray,
And one was true—oh! why not true to
me?
Then, as a hunted deer that could not flee, I turned upon my thoughts, and stood at bay,
Wounded and weak and panting; the cold
day
275 Trembled, for pity of my strife and pain, When, like a noonday dawn, there shone
again Deliverance. One stood on my path who seemed
As like the glorious shape which I had dreamed
As is the Moon, whose changes ever run 280 Into themselves, to the eternal Sun;
The cold chaste Moon, the Queen of Heaven's bright isles,
¹ irregular course

- Who makes all beautiful on which she
smiles,
That wandering shine of soft yet icy flame Which ever is transformed, yet still the same, 285 And warms not but illumines. Young and fair
As the descended Spirit of that sphere,
She hid me, as the Moon may hide the night
From its own darkness, until all was bright Between the Heaven and Earth of my calm
mind,
290 And, as a cloud charioted by the wind,
She led me to a cave in that wild place,
And sat beside me, with her downward
face
Illumining my slumbers, like the Moon Waxing and waning o'er Endymion 295 And I was laid asleep, spirit and limb,
And all my being became bright or dim
As the Moon's image in a summer sea, According as she smiled or frowned on
me,
And there I lay, within a chaste cold bed.
300 Alas, I then was nor alive nor dead; For at her silver voice came Death and Life,
Unmindful each of their accustomed strife.
Masked like twin babes, a sister and a brother,
The wandering hopes of one abandoned
mother, 305 And through the cavern without wings they flew,
And cried, "Away, he is not of our crew"
I wept, and though it be a dream, I weep.
- What storms then shook the ocean of my sleep,
Blotting that Moon, whose pale and waning
lips
310 Then shrank as in the sickness of eclipse;
And how my soul was as a laniplos sea,
And who was then its Tempest, and when
She,
The Planet of that hour, was quenched, what frost
Crept o'er those waters, till from coast to coast
315 The moving billows of my being fell Into a death of ice, immovable,
And then what earthquakes made it gape and split,
The white Moon smiling all the while on it,
These words conceal; if not, each word would be 320 The key of staunchless tears. Weep not for me!
- At length, into the obscure forest came The Vision I had sought through grief and shame.
Athwart that wintry wilderness of thorns Flashed from her motion splendor like the Morn's,
325 And from her presence life was radiated Through the gray earth and branches bare and dead;
So that her way was paved, and roofed
above
With flowers as soft as thoughts of budding love,
And music from her respiration spread 330 Like light,—all other sounds were penetrated
By the small, still, sweet spirit of that
sound,
So that the savage winds hung mute
around;
And odors warm and fresh fell from her hair
Dissolving the dull cold in the fire¹ air.
335 Soft as an Incarnation of the Sun, When light is changed to love, this glorious
One
Floated into the cavern where I lay,
And called my Spirit, and the dreaming
clay
Was lifted by the thing that dreamed below 340 As smoke by fire, and in her beauty's glow
I stood, and felt the dawn of my long night Was penetrating me with living light:
I knew it was the Vision veiled from me
So many years—that it was Emily.
- Twin Spheres of light² who rule this passive Earth,
This world of love, this me; and into both Awaken all its fruits and flowers, and dart Magnetic might into its central heart;
And lift its billows and its mists, and guide 350 By everlasting laws, each wind and tide
To its fit cloud, and its appointed cave;
And lull its storms, each in the craggy
grave
Which was its cradle, luring to faint
bowers
The armies of the rainbow-winged showers; 375 And, as those married lights, which from the towers
Of Heaven look forth and fold the wandering globe
In liquid sleep and splendor, as a robe;
And all their many-mingled influence blend,
If equal, yet unlike, to one sweet end;—

¹ frozen² Emily and Mary as the sun and the moon.

360 So ye, bright regents, with alternate sway Govern my sphere of being, night and day!
 Thou, not disdaining even a borrowed
 might,
 Thou, not eclipsing a remoter light;
 And, through the shadow of the seasons three,

365 From Spring to Autumn's sere maturity, Light it into the Winter of the tomb,
 Where it may ripen to a brighter bloom.
 Thou too, O Comet beautiful and fierce, Who drew the heart¹ of this frail Universe

370 Towards thine own, till, wrecked in that convulsion,
 Alternating attraction and repulsion, Thine went astray, and that was rent in twain,

Oh, float into our azure heaven again!
 Be there Love's folding-star² at thy return;

375 The living Sun will feed thee from its urn
 Of golden fire, the Moon will veil her horn
 In thy last smiles, adorning Even and Morn Will worship thee with incense of calm
 breath

And lights and shadows, as the star of
 Death

380 And Birth is worshiped by those sisters wild Called Hope and Fear—upon the heart are piled
 Their offerings,—of this sacrifice divine
 A world shall be the altar.

Lady mine,

Scorn not these flowers of thought, the fading birth

385 Which from its heart of hearts that plant puts forth
 Whose fruit, made perfect by thy sunny
 eyes,
 Will be as of the trees of Paradise

The day is come, and thou wilt fly with
 me

To whatsoever of dull mortality

390 Is mine, remain a vestal sister³ still;
 To the intense, the deep, the imperishable, Not mine but me, henceforth be thou united Even as a bride, delighting and delighted The hour is come:—the destined Star has risen

395 Which shall descend upon a vacant prison.
 The walls are high, the gates are strong, thick set

The sentinels—but true love never yet Was thus constrained; it overleaps all fence.

Like lightning, with invisible violence Piercing its continents,¹ like Heaven's free breath,

Which he who grasps can hold not, liker
 Death,

Who rides upon a thought, and makes his
 way

Through temple, tower, and palace, and the array

Of arms more strength has Love than he or they,

405 For it can burst his charnel, and make free
 The limbs in chains, the heart in agony,
 The soul in dust and chaos

Emily,

A ship is floating in the harbor now,
 A wind is hovering o'er the mountain's
 brow;

410 There is a path on the sea's azure floor—No keel has ever ploughed that path before;

The halcyons brood around the foamless isles,²

The treacherous Ocean has forsworn its
 wiles;

The merry mariners are bold and free 415 Say, my heart's sister, wilt thou sail with
 me?

Our bark is as an albatross, whose nest
 Is a far Eden of the purple East, And we between her wings will sit, while
 Night,

And Day, and Storm, and Calm, pursue their flight,

420 Our ministers, along the boundless Sea, Treading each other's heels, unheededly
 It is an isle under Ionian skies,

Beautiful as a wreck of Paradise,
 And, for the harbors are not safe and good,

425 This land would have remained a solitude
 But for some pastoral people native there, Who from the Elysian, clear, and golden
 air

Draw the last spirit of the age of gold,³ Simple and spirited, innocent and bold.

430 The blue Aegean girds this chosen home With ever-changing sound and light and
 foam,

Kissing the sifted sands, and caverns hoar;
 And all the winds wandering along the shore

³ The first period of the history of the world, the era of perfect happiness

Undulate with the undulating tide, 485 There are thick woods where sylvan forms abide,
 And many a fountain, rivulet, and pond,
 As clear as elemental diamond,
 Or serene morning air; and far beyond.
 The mossy tracks made by the goats and
 deer.
 440 (Which the rough shepherd treads but once a year)
 Pierce into glades, caverns, and bowers, and halls
 Built round with ivy, which the waterfalls illumine, with sound that never fails Accompany the noonday nightingales, 445 And all the place is peopled with sweet aids,
 The light clear element which the isle wears Is heavy with the scent of lemon-flowers, Which floats like mist laden with unseen
 showers,
 And falls upon the eyelids like faint sleep, 450 And from the moss violets and jonquils peep,
 And dart their arrowy odor through the broom Till you might faint with that delicious
 pain
 And every motion, odor, beam, and tone,
 With that deep music is in unison, 455 Which is a soul within the soul—they seem Like echoes of an antenatal dream.
 It is an isle 'twixt Heaven, Air, Earth, and
 Sea,
 Cradled, and hung in clear tranquillity,
 Bright as that wandering Eden, Lucifer, 460 Washed by the soft blue oceans of young
 air
 It is a favored place Famine or Blight, Pestilence, War, and Earthquake, never
 light
 Upon its mountain-peaks; blind vultures,
 they Sail onward far upon their fatal way, 465 The winged storms, chanting their thunder-psalm
 To other lands, leave azure chasms of calm Over this isle, or weep themselves in dew,
 From which its fields and woods ever renew Their green and golden immortality.
 470 And from the sea there rise, and from the
 sky
 There fall, clear exhalations, soft and
 bright,
 Veil after veil, each hiding some delight,
 Which Sun or Moon or zephyr draws aside, Till the isle's beauty, like a naked bride 475 Glowing at once with love and loveliness, Blushes and trembles at its own excess;

Yet, like a buried lamp, a Soul no less Burns in the heart of this delicious isle,
 An atom of the Eternal, whose own smile 480 Unfolds itself, and may be felt, not seen, O'er the gray rocks, blue waves, and forests green,
 Filling their bare and void interstices
 But the chief marvel of the wilderness Is a lone dwelling, built by whom or how 485 None of the rustic island-people know;
 'Tis not a tower of strength, though with its height
 It overtops the woods, but, for delight,
 Some wise and tender ocean-king, ere crime Had been invented, in the world's young prime,
 490 Reared it, a wonder of that simple time,
 An envy of the isles, a pleasure-house Made sacred to his sister and his spouse
 It scarce seems now a wreck of human art,
 But, as it were, Titanic, in the heart 495 Of Earth having assumed its form, then grown
 Out of the mountains, from the living
 stone,
 Lifting itself in caverns light and high,
 For all the antique and learned imagery
 Has been erased, and in the place of it 500 The ivy and the wild vine interknit
 The volumes of their many-twining stems, Parasite flowers illumine with dewy gems The lampless halls, and when they fade, the
 sky
 Peeps through their winter-woof of tracery 505 With moonlight patches, or star-atoms keen,
 Or fragments of the day's intense serene, Working mosaic on their Parian floors And, day and night, aloof, from the high towers
 And terraces, the Earth and Ocean seem 510 To sleep in one another's arms, and dream Of waves, flowers, clouds, woods, rocks, and all that we Read in their smiles, and call reality

 This isle and house are mine, and I have vowed Thee to be lady of the solitude 515 And I have fitted up some chambers there Looking towards the golden Eastern sun,
 And level with the living winds, which flow Like waves above the living waves below I have sent books and music there, and
 all 520 Those instruments with which high spirits
 call
 The future from its cradle, and the past
 Out of its grave, and make the present last

- In thoughts and joys which sleep, but cannot die, • Folded within their own eternity 525 Our simple life wants little, and true taste Hires not the pale drudge Luxury to waste
 The scene it would adorn, and therefore still, Nature with all her children haunts the hill.
 The ring-dove, in the embowering ivy, yet 530 Keeps up her love-lament, and the owls flit Round the evening tower, and the young stars glance Between the quick bats in their twilight dance;
 The spotted deer bask in the fresh moonlight Before our gate, and the slow, silent night 535 Is measured by the pants of their calm sleep.
 Be this our home in life, and when years heap
 Their withered hours, like leaves, on our decay, Let us become the overhanging day,
 The living soul of this Elysian isle, 540 Conscious, inseparable, one Meanwhile We two will rise, and sit, and walk together, Under the roof of blue Ionian weather,
 And wander in the meadows, or ascend
 The mossy mountains, where the blue heavens bend 545 With lightest winds, to touch their paramour;
 Or linger, where the pebble-paven shore,
 Under the quick, faint kisses of the sea Trembles and sparkles as with ecstasy,— Possessing and possessed by all that is 550 Within that calm circumference of bliss, And by each other, till to love and live
 Be one; or, at the noontide hour, arrive Where some old cavern hoar seems yet to keep The moonlight of the expired night asleep.
 555 Through which the awakened day can never peep;
 A veil for our seclusion, close as Night's,
 Where secure sleep may kill thine innocent lights;¹
 Sleep, the fresh dew of languid love, the rain Whose drops quench kisses till they burn again.
 560 And we will talk, until thought's melody Become too sweet for utterance, and it die In words, to live again in looks, which dart
 With thrilling tone into the voiceless heart.
 1 eyes
- Harmonizing silence without a sound.
 565 Our breath shall intermix, our bosoms bound,
 And our veins beat together, and our lips
 With other eloquence than words, eclipse
 The soul that burns between them, and the wells Which boil under our being's inmost cells, 570 The fountains of our deepest life, shall be Confused in passion's golden purity,
 As mountain-springs under the morning sun.
 We shall become the same, we shall be one Spirit within two frames, oh! wherefore two?
 575 One passion in twin-hearts, which grows and grew,
 Till like two meteors of expanding flame,
 Those spheres instinct with it become the same, Touch, mingle, are transfigured, ever still Burning, yet ever inconsumable; 580 In due another's substance finding food, Like flames too pure and light and unimbed
 To nourish their bright lives with baser prey, Which point to Heaven and cannot pass away.
 One hope within two wills, one will beneath 585 Two overshadowing minds, one life, one death, One Heaven, one Hell, one immortality,
 And one annihilation. Woe is me!
 The winged words on which my soul would pierce 590 Into the height of love's rare Universe, Are chains of lead around its flight of fire
 I pant, I sink, I tremble, I expire!
-
- Weak verses, go, kneel at your Sovereign's feet,
 And say:—"We are the masters of thy slave, What wouldst thou with us and ours and thine?" 595 Then call your sisters from Oblivion's cave, All singing loud: "Love's very pain is sweet,
 But its reward is in the world divine Which, if not here, it builds beyond the grave"
 So shall ye live when I am there. Then haste 600 Over the hearts of men, until ye meet

Marina, Vanna, Primus,¹ and the rest, And bid them love each other and be blessed;
And leave the troop which errs, and which reproves,
And come and be my guest,—for I am Love's.

1820 1824

Rarely, rarely, comest thou,
Spirit of Delight!
Wherefore hast thou left me now
Many a day and night?
5 Many a weary night and day
'Tis since thou art fled away

How shall ever one like me Win thee back again?
With the joyous and the free 10 Thou wilt scoff at pain.
Spirit false! thou hast forgot All but those who need thee not.

As a hzard with the shade
Of a trembling leaf, 15 Thou with sorrow art dismayed, Even the sighs of grief Reproach thee, that thou art not near,
And reproach thou wilt not hear.

Let me set my mournful ditty 20 To a merry measure, Thou wilt never come for pity.
Thou wilt come for pleasure, Pity then will cut away
Those cruel wings, and thou wilt stay

25 I love all that thou lovest,
Spirit of Delight!
The fresh Earth in new leaves dressed,
And the starry night,
Autumn evening, and the morn 30 When the golden mists are born.

I love snow, and all the forms Of the radiant frost,
I love waves, and winds, and storms, Everything almost 35 Which is Nature's, and may be Untainted by man's misery

I love tranquil solitude,
And such society

¹ Mary Shelley, Jane Williams, Edward Williams
The Williamses were warm friends of the Shelleys. See Shelley's To Edward Williams (p. 741) With a Guitar To Jane (p. 742), and To Jane (p. 743)

As is quiet, wise, and good;
40 Between thee and me What difference? but thou dost possess
The things I seek, not love them less.

I love Love—though he has wings,
And like light can flee, 45 But above all other things, Spirit, I love thee—Thou art love and life! Oh, come, Make once more my heart thy home.

TO NIGHT

1821 1824

Swiftly walk o'er the western wave, Spirit of Night!
Out of the misty eastern cave,
Where, all the long and lone daylight, 5 Thou wovest dreams of joy and fear, Which make thee terrible and dear,— Swift be thy flight!

Wrap thy forms in a mantle gray,
Star-inwrought!
10 Blind with thine han the eyes of Day;
Kiss her until she be wearied out,
Then wander o'er city, and sea, and land, Touching all with thine opiate wand—
Come, long-sought!
15 When I arose and saw the dawn,
I sighed for thee,
When light rode high, and the dew was
gone,
And noon lay heavy on flower and tree,
And the weary Day turned to his rest, 20 Lingered like an unloved guest,
I sighed for thee

Thy brother Death came, and cried, Wouldst thou me?
Thy sweet child Sleep, the filmy-eyed, 25 Murmured like a noontide bee, Shall I nestle near thy side?
Wouldst thou me?—And I replied,
No, not thee!

Death will come when thou art dead, 30 Soon, too soon;
Sleep will come when thou art fled;
Of neither will I ask the boon
I ask of thee, beloved Night,— Swift be thine approaching flight, 35 Come, soon, soon!

TIME

1821 1824

Unfathomable Sea! whose waves are
years,
Ocean of Time, whose waters of deep
woe

Are brackish with the salt of human
tears!
Thou shoreless flood, which in thy ebb and flow

- 5 Claspest the limits of mortality, And sick of prey, yet howling on for
more, Vomited thy wrecks on its inhospitable
shore;
Treacherous in calm, and terrible in
storm,
Who shall put forth on thee, 10 Unfathomable Sea?

TO EMILIA VIVIANI
1821 1824

Madonna,¹ wherefore hast thou sent to me Sweet-basil and mignonette?
Emblemning love and health, which never yet

- In the same wreath might be 5 Alas, and they are wet!
Is it with thy kisses or thy tears?
For never rain or dew Such fragrance drew From plant or flower—the very doubt endears 10 My sadness ever new,
The sighs I breathe, the tears I shed for
thee.

Send the stars light, but send not love to me,
In whom love ever made Health like a heap of embers soon to fade.

TO ——— 1821 1824

Music, when soft voices die, Vibrates in the memory,
Odors, when sweet violets sicken, Live within the sense they quicken.

- 5 Rose leaves, when the rose is dead,
Are heaped for the beloved's bed,
And so thy thoughts, when thou art gone, Love itself shall slumber on.

1821 1824

When passion's trance is overpast,
If tenderness and truth could last,
Or live, whilst all wild feelings keep Some mortal slumber, dark and deep,

- 5 I should not weep, I should not weep!

It were enough to feel, to see Thy soft eyes gazing tenderly,

¹An Italian term of address equivalent to madame, it means my lady.

And dream the rest—and burn and be The secret food of fires unseen, 10 Couldst thou but be as thou hast been.

- After the slumber of the year
The woodland violets reappear;
All things revive in field or grove,
And sky and sea, but two, which move 15 And form all others, life and love.

1821 1824

The flower that smiles today
Tomorrow dies;
All that we wish to stay Tempt and then flies.
5 What is this world's delight?
Lightning that mocks the night,
Brief even as bright.

- Virtue, how frail it is!
Friendship how rare!
10 Love, how it sells poor bliss
For proud despair!
But we, though soon they fall, Survive their joy, and all Which ours we call.
15 Whilst skies are blue and bright, Whilst flowers are gay,
Whilst eyes that change ere night
Make glad the day;
Whilst yet the calm hours creep, 20 Dream thou—and from thy sleep
Then wake to weep.

A LAMENT
1821 1824

O world! O life! O time!
On whose last steps I climb, Trembling at that where I had stood
before;

- When will return the glory of your prime?
5 No more—oh, never more!

Out of the day and night
A joy has taken flight, Fresh spring, and summer, and winter
hoar,

- Move my faint heart with grief, but with delight
10 No more—oh, never more!

SONNET: POLITICAL GREATNESS
1821 1824

Nor happiness, nor majesty, nor fame, Nor peace, nor strength, nor skill in arms or arts, Shepherd those herds whom tyranny makes
tame;

Verse echoes not one beating of their hearts,

⁵ History is but the shadow of their shame, Art veils her glass, or from the pageant starts

As to oblivion their blind millions fleet, Staining that Heaven with obscene imagery Of their own likeness. What are numbers knit

¹⁰ By force or custom? Man who man would be,

Must rule the empire of himself; in it Must be supreme, establishing his throne
On vanquished will, quelling the anarchy Of hopes and fears, being himself alone.

ADONAIS

AN ELEGY ON THE DEATH OF JOHN KEATS
1821 1821

¹ I weep for Adonais—he is dead!

Oh weep for Adonais! though our tears
Thaw not the frost which binds so dear a head!

And thou, sad Hour, selected from all years To mourn our loss, rouse thy obscure compeers,¹

And teach them thine own sorrow! Say.
“With me

Died Adonais, till the Future dares Forget the Past, his fate and fame shall be An echo and a light unto Eternity!”

² Where wert thou, mighty Mother,² when he lay,

When thy son lay, pierced by the shaft which flies

In darkness? where was lorn Urania
When Adonais died? With veiled eyes, Mid listening Echoes, in her paradise
She sate, while one,³ with soft enamored breath,

Rekindled all the fading melodies, With which, like flowers that mock the corse beneath,

He had adorned and hid the coming bulk
of death.

³ Oh, weep for Adonais—he is dead!

Wake, melancholy Mother, wake and weep!
Yet wherefore? Quench within their burning bed

Thy fiery tears, and let thy loud heart keep Like his, a mute and uncomplaining sleep;

¹ Hours less memorable than the one which marked the death of Keats.

² Urania, the muse of astronomy. Probably Shelley identifies her with the highest spirit of lyrical poetry

³ One echo.

For he is gone, where all things wise and fair

Descend. Oh, dream not that the amorous
Deep

Will yet restore him to the vital au, Death feeds on his mute voice, and laughs at our despair.

⁴ Most musical of mourners, weep again!

Lament anew, Urania!—He died,¹

Who was the sire of an immortal strain, Blind, old, and lonely, when his country's
pride,

The priest, the slave, and the libertine, Trampled and mocked with many a loathed rite

Of lust and blood;² he went, unterrified,
Into the gulf of death; but his clear Sprite Yet reigns o'er earth, the third among the sons of light.³

⁵ Most musical of mourners, weep anew!

Not all to that bright station dared to climb;

And happier they their happiness who knew,

Whose tapers yet burn through that night of time

In which suns perished, others more sublime,

Struck by the envious wrath of man on God,

Have sunk, extinct in their refulgent
prime,

And some yet live, treading the thorny
road,

Which leads, through toil and hate, to Fame's serene abode.

⁶ But now, thy youngest, dearest one has perished,

The nursing of thy widowhood, who
grew,

Like a pale flower by some sad maiden cherished,

And fed with true-love tears, instead of dew,⁴

Most musical of mourners, weep anew!

Thy extreme⁵ hope, the loveliest and the
last,

The bloom, whose petals nipped before they blew,

¹ Milton.

² An accurate characterization of the Restoration period.

³ The other two may be Homer and Shakespeare; or, if epic poets are meant, Homer and Dante. See Shelley's 4 Defense of Poetry (ed Cook, p. 31)

⁴ A reference to Keats's Isabella (p. 318).

⁵ Last

Died on the promise of the fruit, is waste,
The broken lily lies—the storm is overpast.

- 7 To that high Capital,¹ where kingly Death Keeps his pale court in beauty and decay, He came, and bought, with price of purest breath,

A grave among the eternal.—Come away!
Haste, while the vault of blue Italian day Is yet his fitting charnel-roof! while still He lies, as if in dewy sleep he lay, Awake him not! surely he takes his fill Of deep and liquid rest, forgetful of all ill.

- 8 He will awake no more, oh, never more!
Within the twilight chamber spreads apace The shadow of white Death, and at the
door

Invisible Corruption waits to trace His extreme way² to her dim dwelling-
place,

The eternal Hunger³ sits, but pity and awe Soothe her pale rage, nor dares she to deface

So far a prey, till darkness, and the law Of change, shall o'er his sleep the mortal curtain draw.

- 9 Oh, weep for Adonais!—The quick Dreams,
The passion-winged ministers of thought,
Who were his flocks, whom near the living
streams

Of his young spirit he fed, and whom he taught

The love which was its music, wander
not,—

Wander no more, from kindling brain to
brain,

But droop there, whence they sprung, and mourn then lot

Round the cold heart, where, after then sweet pain,⁴

They ne'er will gather strength, or find a home again

- 10 And one with trembling hands clasps his cold head,

And fans him with her moonlight wings,
and cries,

“Our love, our hope, our sorrow, is not dead,

See, on the silken fringe of his faint eyes,
Like dew upon a sleeping flower, there lies

A tear some Dream has loosened from his brain”

¹ Rome, where Keats had gone for his health

² to mark out Keats's last path

³ Corruption.

⁴ Birth pangs.

Lost Angel of a ruined paradise!

She knew not 'twas her own, as with no stain

She faded, like a cloud which had out-wept its rain.

- 11 One from a lucid urn of starry dew Washed his light limbs as if embalming
them,

Another clipped her profuse locks, and threw

The wreath upon him, like an anadem,¹ Which frozen tears instead of pearls beget,

Another in her wilful grief would break
Her bow and winged reeds, as if to stem
A greater loss with one which was more
weak;

And dull the barbed fire against his frozen
cheek.

- 12 Another Splendor on his mouth alit, That mouth, whence it was wont to draw the breath

Which gave it strength to pierce the guarded wit,

And pass into the panting heart beneath With lightning and with music: the damp
death

Quenched its caress upon his rev lips,
And, as a dying meteor stains a wreath Of moonlight vapor, which the cold night clips,²

It flushed through his pale limbs, and passed to its eclipse.

- 13 And others came—Desires and Adorations, Winged Persuasions and veiled Destinies, Splendors, and Glooms, and glimmering Incarnations

Of hopes and fears, and twilight Fantasies,

And Sorrow, with her family of Sighs, And Pleasure, blind with tears, led by the gleam

Of her own dying smile instead of eyes, Came in slow pomp,—the moving pomp might seem

Like pageantry of mist on an autumnal
stream.

- 14 All he had loved, and moulded into
thought,

From shape, and hue, and odor, and sweet
sound,

Lamented Adonais Morning sought

¹ wreath for the head ² embraces

- Her eastern watch-tower, and her hair unbound,
Wet with the tears which should adorn
the ground,
Dimmed the aerial eyes that kindle day;
Afar the melancholy thunder moaned, Pale Ocean in unquiet slumber lay,
And the wild winds flew round, sobbing in their dismay.
- 15 Lost Echo sits amid the voiceless mountains,
And feeds her grief with his remembered
lay,
And will no more reply to winds or fountains,
Or amorous birds perched on the young green spray,
Or herdsman's horn, or bell at closing
day, Since she can mimic not his lips, more
dear
Than those for whose disdain she pined
away
Into a shadow of all sounds ¹—a drear Murmur, between their songs, is all the woodmen hear.
- 16 Grief made the young Spring wild, and she threw down
Her kindling buds, as if she Autumn were,
Or they dead leaves; since her delight is flown,
For whom should she have waked the sullen year?
To Phœbus was not Hyacinth so dear Nor to himself Narcissus, as to both Thou, Adonais, wan they stand and sere Amid the faint companions of their youth, With dew all turned to tears; odor, to sighing ruth.
- 17 Thy spirit's sister, the lorn nightingale² Mourns not her mate with such melodious
pain;
Not so the eagle, who like thee could scale Heaven, and could nourish in the sun's domain
Her mighty youth with morning, doth complain,
Soaring and screaming round her empty
nest,
As Albion wails for thee the curse of Cain
Light on his head who pierced thy innocent breast,
- ¹ Narcissus, for whose love Echo pined away into a mere voice
² A reference to Keats's Ode to a Nightingale
(p. 831), and to the melody of his verse.
- And scared the angel soul that was its earthly guest!¹
- 18 Ah, woe is me! Winter is come and gone, But grief returns with the revolving year;
The airs and streams renew their joyous
tone;
The ants, the bees, the swallows reappear;
Fresh leaves and flowers deck the dead Seasons' bier;
The amorous birds now pair in every brake,²
And build their mossy homes in field and brere;³
And the green lizard, and the golden snake,
Like unimprisoned flames, out of their trance awake
- 19 Through wood and stream and field and hill and ocean
A quickening life from the Earth's heart has burst
As it has ever done, with change and motion,
From the great morning of the world when first God dawned on Chaos; in its stream immersed,
The lamps of Heaven flash with a softer
light;
All baser things pant with life's sacred thirst;
Diffuse themselves, and spend in love's
delight,
The beauty and the joy of their renewed
might.
- 20 The leprous corpse, touched by this spirit
tender,
Exhales itself in flowers of gentle breath; Like incarnations of the stars, when splendor
Is changed to fragrance, they illumine
death
And mock the merry worm that wakes beneath;
Nought we know dies. Shall that alone which knows
Be as a sword consumed before the sheath
- ¹ Shelley wrongly believed that the death of Keats was due to hostile attacks upon his poetry. Keats's Endymion had been severely criticized in an unsigned article published in The Quarterly Review, April, 1818 (Vol. 19, pp. 204-8). This article was written by J.
W. Croker. See p. 913. See also, Byron's Don Juan, XI, 60, 1, and n. 5 (p. 610), and

- ² thicket
³ briar

- By sightless lightning?—the intense atom
glows
A moment, then is quenched in a most cold repose.
- 21 Alas! that all we loved of him should be,
But for our grief, as if it had not been,
And grief itself be mortal! Woe is me!
Whence are we, and why are we? of what scene
The actors or spectators? Great and mean Meet massed in death, who lends what life must borrow.
As long as skies are blue, and fields are
green,
Evening must usher night, night urge the morrow,
Month follow month with woe, and year wake year to sorrow.
- 22 He will awake no more, oh, never more!
“Wake thou,” cried Misery, “childless Mother, rise
Out of thy sleep, and slake, in thy heart’s core,
A wound more fierce than his, with tears and sighs.”
And all the Dreams that watched Urania’s
eyes,
And all the Echoes whom their sister’s
song
Had held in holy silence, cried: “Arise!” Swift as a Thought by the snake Memory
stung,
From her ambrosial rest the fading Splendor sprung
- 23 She rose like an autumnal Night, that
springs
Out of the East, and follows wild and drear
The golden Day, which, on eternal wings, Even as a ghost abandoning a bier, Had left the Earth a corpse;—sorrow and
fear
So struck, so roused, so rapt Urania;
So saddened round her like an atmosphere Of stormy mist; so swept her on her way Even to the mournful place where Adonais
lay.
- 24 Out of her secret paradise she sped.
Through camps and cities rough with stone, and steel,
And human hearts, which to her airy tread Yielding not, wounded the invisible Palms of her tender feet where’er they fell:
- And barbed tongues, and thoughts more sharp than they,
Rent the soft Form they never could repel, Whose sacred blood, like the young tears
of May,
Paved with eternal flowers that undeserv-ing way.
- 25 In the death-chamber for a moment Death, Shamed by the presence of that living
Might,
Blushed to annihilation, and the breath Revisited those lips, and Life’s pale light Flashed through those limbs, so late her dear delight.
“Leave me not wild and dear and com-fortless,
As silent lightning leaves the starless
night!
Leave me not!” cried Urania: her distress Roused Death: Death rose and smiled, and met her vain caress.
- 26 “Stay yet awhile! speak to me once again;
Kiss me, so long but as a kiss may live,
And in my heartless¹ breast and burning biam
That word, that kiss, shall all thoughts else survive,
With food of saddest memory kept alive,
Now thou art dead, as if it were a part Of thee, my Adonais! I would give All that I am to be as thou now art!
But I am chained to Time, and cannot thence depart!
- 27 “O gentle child, beautiful as thou wert, Why didst thou leave the trodden paths of
men
Too soon, and with weak hands though mighty heart
Dare the unpastured dragon² in his den?
Defenceless as thou wert, oh, where was
then Wisdom the mirrored shield,³ or scorn the spear?
Or hadst thou waited the full cycle when Thy spirit should have filled its crescent sphere,⁴
The monsters of life’s waste had fled from thee like deer.

¹ Her heart had been given to Adonais.² The unfed and ravenous critic. See Scott's Marmion, l. 432.³ A reference to the shield which protected Perseus from the fatal gaze of the Gorgons, and which enabled him to cut off the head of Medusa as he saw it by reflection.⁴ Attained maturity of power.

- 28 "The herded wolves,¹ bold only to pursue,
The obscene ravens, clamorous o'er the dead;
The vultures to the conqueror's banner true
Who feed where Desolation first has fed,
And whose wings rain contagion,—how they fled,
When, like Apollo, from his golden bow
The Pythian of the age² one arrow sped
And smiled!—The spoilers tempt no second blow, They fawn on the proud feet that spurn them lying low.
- 29 "The sun comes forth, and many reptiles spawn, He sets, and each ephemeral insect then Is gathered into death without a dawn,
And the immortal stars awake again,
So is it in the world of living men
A godlike mind soars forth, in its delight Making earth bare and veiling heaven, and when It sinks, the swarms that dimmed or shared its light Leave to its kindred lamps the spirit's awful night."
- 30 Thus ceased she and the mountain shepherds came,
Their garlands sere, their magic mantles rent,³
The Pilgrim of Eternity,⁴ whose fame
Over his living head like Heaven is bent,
An early but enduring monument,
Came, veiling all the lightnings of his song In sorrow, from her wilds Ierne sent The sweetest lyric of her saddest wrong,
And love taught grief to fall like music from his tongue
- 31 Midst others of less note, came one frail form,⁵ A phantom among men; companionless
As the last cloud of an expiring storm Whose thunder is its knell; he, as I guess, Had gazed on Nature's naked loveliness, Actæon-like, and now he fled astray
With feeble steps o'er the world's wilderness,
- And his own thoughts, along that rugged way, Pursued, like raging hounds, their father and their prey.
- 32 A pardlike¹ spirit beautiful and swift—A Love in desolation masked;—a Power Girt round with weakness;—it can scarce uplift
The weight of the superincumbent hour.
It is a dying lamp, a falling shower,
A breaking billow,—even whilst we speak
Is it not broken? On the withering flower
The killing sun smiles brightly: on a cheek
The life can burn in blood, even while the heart may break
- 33 His head was bound with pansies² overblown,
And faded violets, white, and pined, and blue,
And a light spear topped with a cypress cone, Round whose rude shaft dark ivy-tresses grew Yet dripping with the forest's noonday dew, Vibrated, as the ever-beating heart Shook the weak hand that grasped it, of that crew
He came the last, neglected and apart;
A herd-abandoned deer struck by the hunter's dart³
- 34 All stood aloof, and at his partial moan Smiled through their tears, well knew that gentle band Who in another's fate now wept his own,
As in the accents of an unknown land⁴
He sung new sorrow, sad Urania scanned
The stranger's mien, and murmured
"Who art thou?"
He answered not, but with a sudden hand Made bare his branded and ensanguined brow, Which was like Cain's or Christ's—oh! that it should be so!⁵
- 35 What softer voice is hushed over the dead?
Athwart what brow is that dark mantle thrown?

¹ The banded critics² Byron in his English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (p. 485) by allusion to the Pythian Apollo, slayer of the Python³ See The Tempest, I, 2, 24⁴ Byron A reference to his Childe Harold's Pilgrimage (p. 523)⁵ Thomas Moore A reference to his Irish Melodies (p. 425), and probably to the suppression of the insurrection of 1803 and to the execution of the Irish leader, Robert Emmet.⁶ Shelley himself¹ leopard-like² The pansy is a symbol of thought, the violet, of modesty, the cypress, of mourning, the ivy of constancy in friendship³ See Shelley's Epipsychidion, 272 ff. (p. 721), also, Cowper's The Task, I, 108 ff⁴ That is he wrote in the language of England, a land unknown to the Greek muse, Urania.⁵ Shelley means that he bore marks of cruel treatment such as the world gave to Cain, an enemy of the race, or to Christ, a benefactor.

- What form leans sadly o'er the white death-bed,
In mockery of monumental stone,
The heavy heart heaving without a moan?
If it be he, who, gentlest of the wise,¹ Taught, soothed, loved, honored the departed one,
Let me not vex, with inharmonious sighs,
The silence of that heart's accepted sacrifice.
- 36 Our Adonais has drunk poison—oh, What deaf and viperous murderer could crown Life's early cup with such a draught of woe?
The nameless worm² would now itself disown.
It felt, yet could escape, the magic tone Whose prelude held all envy, hate, and wrong,
But what was howling in one breast alone,³ Silent with expectation of the song, Whose master's hand is cold, whose silver lyre unstrung
- 37 Live thou,⁴ whose infancy is not thy fame!
Lave! fear no heavier chastisement from me,
Thou noteless blot on a remembered name!
But be thyself, and know thyself to be!
And ever at thy season be thou free
To spill the venom when thy fangs o'erflow.
Remorse and Self-Contempt shall cling to thee, Hot Shame shall burn upon thy secret brow,
And like a beaten hound tremble thou shalt—as now.
- 38 Nor let us weep that our delight is fled Far from these carrion kites that scream below;
He wakes or sleeps with the enduring dead, Thou canst not soar where he is sitting now.⁵—Dust to the dust! but the pure spirit shall flow Back to the burning fountain whence it came,
- A portion of the Eternal, which must glow Through time and change, unquenchably the same, Whilst thy cold embers choke the sordid hearth of shame.
- 39 Peace, peace! he is not dead, he doth not sleep—
He hath awakened from the dream of life—
'Tis we, who, lost in stormy visions, keep With phantoms an unprofitable strife,
And in mad trance, strike with our spirit's knife Invulnerable nothings. We decay Like corpses in a charnel, fear and grief Convulse us and consume us day by day,
And cold hopes swarm like worms within our living clay.
- 40 He has outsoared the shadow of our night, Envy and calumny and hate and pain,
And that unrest which men miscall delight,
'An touch him not and torture not again,
From the contagion of the world's slow stain
He is secure, and now can never mourn
A heart grown cold, a head grown gray in vain;
Nor, when the spirit's self has ceased to burn,
With sparkless ashes load an unlamented urn.
- 41 He lives, he wakes—'tis Death is dead, not he,
Mourn not for Adonais.—Thou young Dawn, Turn all thy dew to splendor, for from thee
The spirit thou lamentest is not gone, Ye caverns and ye forests, cease to moan!
'Cease, ye faint flowers and fountains, and thou air, Which like a mourning veil thy scarf hadst thrown O'er the abandoned Earth, now leave it bare Even to the joyous stars which smile on its despair!
- 42 He is made one with Nature¹ there is heard His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder, to the song of night's sweet bird;
He is a presence to be felt and known

¹ Leigh Hunt, Keats's close friend and patron² The criticism of Endymion in The Quarterly Review was unsigned³ In the breast of the writer of the article in The Quarterly Review. A harsher criticism, however, appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, August, 1818 (Vol. 2, p. 519).⁴ The reviewer.⁵ See Paradise Lost, 4, 829¹ See Shelley's Prometheus Unbound, IV, 514-38 (p. 698).

- In darkness and in light, from herb and stone, Spreading itself where'er that Power may move
Which has withdrawn his being to its own;
Which wields the world with never-wearied love, Sustains it from beneath, and kindles it above.
- 43 He is a portion of the loveliness Which once he made more lovely: he doth bear His part, while the one Spirit's plastic stress Sweeps through the dull dense world, compelling there,
All new successions to the forms they wear;²
Torturing the unwilling dross that checks its flight
To its own likeness, as¹ each mass they bear;
And bursting in its beauty and its might From trees and beasts and men into the Heaven's light.
- 44 The splendors of the firmament of time
May be eclipsed, but are extinguished not;
Like stars to their appointed height they climb,
And death is a low mist which cannot blot
The brightness it may veil. When lofty thought Lifts a young heart above its mortal lair, And love and life contend in it for what Shall be its earthly doom, the dead live there And move like winds of light on dark and stormy air.
- 45 The inheritors of unfulfilled renown Rose from their thrones, built beyond mortal thought, Far in the Unapparent Chatterton Rose pale,—his solemn agony had not Yet faded from him; Sidney, as he fought And as he fell and as he lived and loved Sublimely mild, a Spirit without spot, Arose; and Lucan, by his death approved Oblivion as they rose shrank like a thing reprov'd.

But whose transmitted effluence cannot die
So long as fire outlives the parent spark,

"Thou art become as one of us," they cry,
"It was for thee yon kingless sphere has long Swung blind in unascended majesty, Silent alone amid an heaven of song.
Assume thy winged throne, thou Vesper of our throng!"
- 47 Who mourns for Adonais? Oh, come forth, Fond wretch! and know thyself and him aright.
Clasp with thy panting soul the pendulous earth,
As from a centre, dart thy spirit's light Beyond all world's, until its spacious might Satiates the void circumference then shrink Even to a point within our day and night,
And keep thy heart light lest it make thee sink
When hope has kindled hope, and lured thee to the brink
- 48 Or go to Rome, which is the sepulchre, Oh, not of him, but of our joy. 'Tis nought That ages, empires, and religions there Lie buried in the ravage they have wrought, For such as he can lend,—they borrow not Glory from those who made the world their prey;
And he is gathered to the kings of thought Who waged contention with their time's decay,
And of the past are all that cannot pass away.¹
- 49 Go thou to Rome,—at once the Paradise,
The grave, the city, and the wilderness;
And where its wrecks like shattered mountains rise,
And flowering weeds and fragrant copses dress
The bones of Desolation's nakedness, Pass, till the Spirit of the spot shall lead Thy footsteps to a slope of green access;²
Where, like an infant's smile, over the dead
A light of laughing flowers along the grass is spread;

- 50 And gray walls moulder round, on which dull Time
Feeds, like slow fire, upon a hoary brand,
And one keen pyramid¹ with wedge sublime,
Pavilioning the dust of him who planned
This refuge for his memory, doth stand Like flame transformed to marble; and
beneath,
A field is spread, on which a newer band Have pitched in Heaven's smile their camp 54
of death,
Welcoming him we lose with scarce extinguished breath
- 51 Here pause: these graves are all too
young² as yet
To have outgrown the sorrow which consigned
Its charge to each; and if the seal is set,
Here, on one fountain of a mourning mind, Break it not thou! too surely shalt thou find Thine own well full, if thou returnest
home,
Of tears and gall. From the world's bitter wind
Seek shelter in the shadow of the tomb
What Adonais is, why fear we to become? 55
- 52 The One remains, the many change and
pass;
Heaven's light forever shines, Earth's shadows fly,
Life, like a dome of many-colored glass, Stains the white radiance of Eternity, Until Death tramples it to fragments —
Die,
If thou wouldst be with that which thou dost seek!³
Follow where all is fled!—Rome's azure
sky,
Flowers, ruins, statues, music, words, are weak
The glory they transfuse with fitting truth
to speak
- 53 Why linger, why turn back, why shrink, my heart?
Thy hopes are gone before: from all things
here
They have departed; thou shouldst now depart!
A light is passed from the revolving year,

dear
Attracts to crush, repels to make thee wither.
The soft sky smiles,—the low wind whispers near.
'Tis Adonais calls! oh, hasten thither, No more let Life divide what Death can join together.
- That Light whose smile kindles the Universe,
That Beauty in which all things work and
move,
That Benediction which the eclipsing Curse
Of birth can quench not, that sustaining
Love
Which through the web of being blindly wove
By man and beast and earth and air and
sea,
Burns bright or dim, as¹ each are nurrors of
The fire for which all thirst, now beams
on me,
Consuming the last clouds of cold mortality.
- The breath whose might I have invoked in
song
Descends on me; my spirit's bark is driven, Far from the shore, far from the trembling throng
Whose sails were never to the tempest
given;
The massy earth and spherèd skies are riven!
I am borne darkly, fearfully, afar.
Whilst, burning through the inmost veil of Heaven,
The soul of Adonais, like a star, Beacons from the abode where the Eternal
are.

WORLDS ON WORLDS ARE ROLLING EVER

- Worlds on worlds are rolling ever
 From creation to decay,
 Like the bubbles on a river Sparkling, bursting, borne away.
 5 But they are still immortal Who, through birth's orient portal And death's dark chasm hurrying to and fro, Clothe their unceasing flight
 In the brief dust and light 10 Gathered around their chariots as they go; 10
 New shapes they still may weave,
 New gods, new laws receive, Bright or dim are they as the robes they last
 On Death's bare ribs had cast.
- 15 A power from the unknown God,
 A Promethean conqueror, came;
 Like a triumphal path he trod
 The thorns of death and shame
 A mortal shape to him 20 Was like the vapor dim Which the orient planet animates with
 light;
 Hell, Sin, and Slavery came,
 Like bloodhounds mild and tame, Nor preyed, until their lord had taken flight;

 Arose, and it shall set While blazoned as on Heaven's immortal
 noon
 The cross leads generations on.

DARKNESS HAS DAWNED IN THE EAST

- Darkness has dawned in the east
 On the noon of time
 The death-birds descend to their feast
 From the hungry clime 5 Let Freedom and Peace flee far
 To a sunnier strand,
 And follow Love's folding-star
 To the Evening land!

 Around mountains and islands inviolably Pranked on the sapphire sea.

THE WORLD'S GREAT AGE BEGINS ANEW

The world's great age begins anew,
The golden years return,
The earth doth like a snake renew Her winter weeds¹ outworn:

5 Heaven smiles, and faiths and empires

Like wrecks of a dissolving dream.

A brighter Hellas rears its mountains
From waves serene² far,

A new Peneus rolls his fountains 10 Against the morning star.
Where fairer Tempes bloom, there sleep Young Cyclads on a sunnier deep

A loftier Argo cleaves the main, Fraught with a later prize,

15 Another Orpheus sings again,
And loves, and weeps, and dies
A new Ulysses leaves once more Calypso for his native shore

Oh, write no more the tale of Troy, 20 If earth Death's scroll must be!
Nor mix with Larian rage the joy Which dawns upon the free Although a subtler Sphinx renew Riddles of death Thebes never knew²

25 Another Athens shall arise,
And to remoter time Bequeath, like sunset to the skies,
The splendor of its prime,
And leave, if nought so bright may live, 30 All earth can take or Heaven can give Saturn and Love their long repose Shall burst, more bright and good Than all who fell,³ than One who rose,

Than many unsubdued 35 Not gold, not blood, their altar dowers, But votive tears and symbol flowers

Oh, cease! must hate and death return?
'Cease! must men kill and die?

EVENING

PONTE AL MARE, PISA
1821 1824

The sun is set; the swallows are asleep;
The bats are fitting fast in the gray air.
The slow soft toads out of damp corners
creep,

And evening's breath, wandering here and there

5 Over the quivering surface of the stream, Wakes not one ripple from its summer
dream.

There is no dew on the dry grass tonight, Nor damp within the shadow of the trees;

The wind is intermitting, dry, and light, 10 And in the inconstant motion of the breeze

The dust and straws are driven up and
down,
And whined about the pavement of the town

Within the surface of the fleeting river
The wrinkled image of the city lay,

15 Immovably unquiet, and forever
It trembles, but it never fades away, Go to the []
You, being changed, will find it then as
now

The chasm in which the sun has sunk is shut

20 By darkest barriers of enormous cloud, Like mountain over mountain huddled—but

Growing and moving upwards in a crowd,

And over it a space of watery blue,
Which the keen evening star is shining
through.

One word is too often profaned
For me to profane it,
One feeling too falsely disdained

And pity from thee more dear
Than that from another.

I can give not what men call love, 10 But wilt thou accept not

TOMORROW

1821 1824

- Where art thou, beloved Tomorrow?
 When young and old, and strong and
 weak.
 Rich and poor, through joy and sorrow, Thy sweet smiles we ever seek.— 5 In thy place—ah! well-a-day!
 We find the thing we fled—Today

REMEMBRANCE

1821 1824

- Swifter far than summer's flight, Swifter far than youth's delight, Swifter far than happy night,
 Art thou come and gone 5 As the wood when leaves are shed,
 As the night when sleep is fled,
 As the heart when joy is dead,
 I am left lone, alone
- The swallow summer comes again, 10 The owlet night¹ resumes his reign,
 But the wild-swan youth is fain
 To fly with thee, false as thou My heart each day desires the morrow;
 Sleep itself is turned to sorrow;
 15 Vainly would my winter borrow Sunny leaves from any bough.

Lilies for a bridal bed,
 Roses for a matron's head,

¹ The dim, uncanny night

- Violets for a maiden dead—20 Pansies¹ let my flowers be,
 On the living grave I bear, Scatter them without a tear—
 Let no friend, however dear, Waste one hope, one fear for me.

TO EDWARD WILLIAMS

1821 1834

- The serpent is shut out from Paradise²
 The wounded deer³ must seek the herb no more
 In which its heart-cure lies.
 The widowed dove must cease to haunt a bower 5 Like that from which its mate with feigned sighs Fleed in the April hour.
 I too must seldom seek again Near happy friends a mitigated pain

- Of hatred I am proud,—with scorn content, 10 Indifference, that once hurt me, now is grown Itself indifferent.
 But, not to speak of love, pity alone ('an break a spirit already more than bent
 The miserable one 15 Turns the mind's poison into food,— Its medicine is tears,—its evil good

- Therefore, if now I see you seldomer, Dear friends, dear friend! know that I only fly
 Your looks, because they stir 20 Griets that should sleep, and hopes that cannot die:
 The very comfort that they minister
 I scarce can bear, yet I,
 So deeply is the arrow gone,
 Should quickly perish if it were withdrawn.

- 25 When I return to my cold home, you ask Why I am not as I have ever been.
 You spoil me for the task Of acting a forced part in life's dull
 scene,
 Of wearing on my brow the idle mask 30 Of author, great or mean,
 In the world's carnival I sought Peace thus, and but in you I found it not.

¹ The Fly is a symbol of purity, the rose, of constancy; the violet of modesty, the pansy, of thought, or remembrance. See Shelley's Adonais, 33 (p. 734).

² Shelley had been named "The Snake" by Byron.

³ See Shelley's Epipsychidion, 272 ff. (p. 123).

Full half an hour, today, I tried my lot With various flowers, and every one still said, 35 "She loves me—loves me not"
 And if this meant a vision long since fled—
 If it meant fortune, fame, or peace of
 thought—
 If it meant,—but I dread To speak what you may know too
 well:

40 Still there was truth in the sad oracle.

The crane o'er seas and forests seeks her home,¹ No bird so wild but has its quiet nest,
 When it no more would roam,
 The sleepless billows on the ocean's
 breast

45 Break like a bursting heart, and die in foam,
 And thus at length find rest Doubtless there is a place of peace Where my weak heart and all its throbs will cease

I asked her, yesterday, if she believed 50 That I had resolution. One who had Would ne'er have thus relieved His heart with words,—but what his judgment bade
 Would do, and leave the scorner un-relieved.

These verses are too sad 55 To send to you, but that I know, Happy yourself, you feel another's woe

1821 1824

I pant for the music which is divine,
 My heart in its thirst is a dying flower, Pour forth the sound like enchanted wine,

Loosen the notes in a silver shower, 5 Like a herbless plain for the gentle rain,
 I gasp, I faint, till they wake again Let me drink of the spirit of that sweet
 sound,

More, oh more,—I am thirsting yet.
 It loosens the serpent which care has
 bound

10 Upon my heart to stifle it;
 The dissolving strain, through every vein,
 Passes into my heart and brain

As the scent of a violet withered up, Which grew by the brink of a silver
 lake, 15 When the hot noon has drained its dewy cup,
 And mist there was none its thirst to slake—
 And the violet lay dead while the odor flew On the wings of the wind o'er the waters
 blue—

As one who drinks from a charmed cup 20 Of foaming, and sparkling, and murmuring wine,
 Whom, a mighty Enchantress filling up, Invites to love with her kiss divine

1822 1824

When the lamp is shattered,
 The light in the dust lies dead,
 When the cloud is scattered,
 The rainbow's glory is shed;
 5 When the lute is broken, Sweet tones are remembered not;
 When the lips have spoken,
 Loved accents are soon forgot.

As music and splendor 10 Survive not the lamp and the lute,
 The heart's echoes render No song when the spirit is mute—
 No song but sad dirges,
 Like the wind through a ruined cell, 15 Or the mournful surges That ring the dead seaman's knell

When hearts have once mingled, Love first leaves the well-built nest,
 The weak one is singled 20 To endure what it once possessed O Love! who bewailest
 The frailty of all things here,
 Why choose you the frailest
 For your cradle, your home, and your bier?

25 Its passions will rock thee,
 As the storms rock the ravens on high;
 Bright reason will mock thee,
 Like the sun from a wintry sky
 From thy nest every rafter 30 Will rot, and thine eagle home Leave thee naked to laughter,
 When leaves fall and cold winds come.

WITH A GUITAR: TO JANE¹ 1822 1832

- Ariel to Miranda.—Take
This slave of Music, for the sake Of him who is the slave of thee,
And teach it all the harmony 5 In which thou canst, and only thou, Make the delighted spirit glow,
Till joy denies itself again,
And, too intense, is turned to pain;
For by permission and command 10 Of thine own Prince Ferdinand Poor Ariel sends this silent token Of more than ever can be spoken;
Your guardian spirit, Ariel, who,
From life to life, must still pursue 15 Your happiness,—for thus alone Can Ariel ever find his own.
From Prospero's enchanted cell,
As the mighty verses tell,
To the throne of Naples, he 20 Lit you o'er the trackless sea, Flitting on, your prow before,
Like a living meteor.
When you die, the silent Moon,
In her interlunar² swoon, 25 Is not sadder in her cell Than deserted Ariel.
When you live again on earth,
Like an unseen star of birth, Ariel guides you o'er the sea 30 Of life from your nativity.
Many changes have been run Since Ferdinand and you begun Your course of love, and Ariel still Has tracked your steps, and served your
will;
35 Now, in humbler, happier lot,
This is all remembered not;
And now, alas! the poor sprite is Imprisoned, for some fault of his,
In a body like a grave.
40 From you he only dares to crave,
For his service and his sorrow,
A smile today, a song tomorrow.

- The artist who this idol wrought To echo all harmonious thought, 45 Felled a tree, while on the steep
The woods were in their winter sleep, Rocked in that repose divine
On the wind-swept Apennine;
And dreaming, some of autumn past, 50 And some of spring approaching fast,

- And some of April buds and showers,
And some of songs in July bowers,
And all of love; and so this tree—Oh, that such our death may be!— 55 Died in sleep, and felt no pain,
To live in happier form again.
From which, beneath Heaven's fairest star,
The artist wrought this loved guitar,
And taught it justly to reply, 60 To all who question skilfully, In language gentle as thine own, Whispering in enamored tone
Sweet oracles of woods and dells,
And summer winds in sylvan cells;
65 For it had learned all harmonies
Of the plains and of the skies,
Of the forests and the mountains,
And the many-voiced fountains;
The clearest echoes of the hills, 70 The softest notes of falling rills,
The melodies of birds and bees,
The murmuring of summer seas,
And pattering rain, and breathing dew,
And airs of evening, and it knew 75 That seldom-heard mysterious sound, Which, driven on its diurnal round,
As it floats through boundless day,
Our world enkindles on its way—
All this it knows but will not tell 80 To those who cannot question well
The Spirit that inhabits it;
It talks according to the wit
Of its companions; and no more Is heard than has been felt before, 85 By those who tempt it to betray These secrets of an elder day.
But, sweetly as its answers will Flatter hands of perfect skill, It keeps its highest, holiest tone 90 For our beloved Jane alone.

TO JANE¹

- The keen stars were twinkling,
And the fair moon was rising among them,
Dear Jane!
The guitar was tinkling, 5 But the notes were not sweet till you sung them
Again.

As the moon's soft splendor O'er the faint cold starlight of heaven Is thrown,

10 So your voice most tender To the strings without soul had then given Its own.

The stars will awaken,
Though the moon sleep a full hour later, 15 Tonight;
No leaf will be shaken Whilst the dew of your melody scatter
Delight.

Though the sound overpowers, 20 Sing again, with your dear voice revealing
A tone
Of some world far from ours, Where music and moonlight and feeling Are one.

LOVE

A widow bird sate mourning for her love
Upon a wintry bough,

No flower upon the ground,
And little motion in the air Except the mill-wheel's sound.

Rough wind, that moanest loud Grief too sad for song,

From A DEFENSE OF POETRY
1821 1840

According to one mode of regarding those two classes of mental action which are called reason and imagination, the former may be considered as mind contemplating the rela-5 tions borne by one thought to another, however produced, and the latter as mind acting upon those thoughts so as to color them with its own light, and composing from them, as from elements, other thoughts, each contain-10 ing within itself the principle of its own integrity. The one is the τὸ ποιῆν, or the principle of synthesis, and has for its object general results. Reason is the enumeration of quantities already known; imagination is the perception of the value of those quantities, both separately and as a whole. Reason respects the differences, and imagination the similitudes of things. Reason is to imagination as the instrument to the agent, as the body to the spirit, as the shadow to the substance.

Poetry, in a general sense, may be defined to be "the expression of the imagination"; and poetry is connate with the origin of man. Man is an instrument over which a series of external and internal impressions are driven, like the alternations of an ever-changing wind over an Æolian lyre, which move it by their motion to ever-changing melody. But there is a principle within the human being, and perhaps within all sentient beings, which acts otherwise than in a lyre, and produces not melody alone, but harmony, by an internal adjustment of the sounds and motions thus excited to the impressions which excite them. It is as if the lyre could accommodate its chords to the motions of that which strikes them, in a determined proportion of sound, even as the musician can accommodate his voice to the sound of the lyre. A child at play by itself will express its delight by its voice and motions; and every inflection of tone and every gesture will bear exact relation to a corresponding antitype in the pleasurable impressions which awakened it; it will be the reflected image of that impression; and as the lyre trembles and sounds after the wind has died away, so the child seeks, by prolonging in its voice and motions, the duration of the effect, to prolong also a consciousness of the cause. In relation to the objects which delight a child, these expressions are what poetry is to higher objects. The savage (for the savage is to ages what the child is to years) expresses the emotions produced in him by surrounding objects in a similar manner; and language and gesture, together with plastic or pictorial imitation, become the image, of the combined effect of those objects and his apprehension of them. Man in society, with all his passions and his pleasures, next becomes the object of the passions and pleasures of man; an additional class of emotions produces an augmented treasure of expression; and language, gesture, and the imitative arts become at once the representation and the medium, the pencil and the picture, the chisel and the statue, the chord and the harmony. The social sympathies, or those laws from which, as from its elements, society results, begin to develop themselves from the moment that two human beings co-exist; the future is contained within the present as the plant within the seed; and equality, diversity, unity, contrast, mutual dependence, become the principles alone capable of affording the motives according to which the will of a social being is determined to action, inasmuch as he is social; and constitute pleasure in sensation, virtue in sentiment, beauty in art, truth in reasoning, and love in the intercourse of kind. Hence men, even in the infancy of society, observe a certain order in their words and actions, distinct from that of the objects and the impressions represented by them, all expression being subject to the laws of that from which it proceeds. But let us dismiss those more general considerations which might involve an inquiry into the principles of society itself, and restrict our view to the manner in which the imagination is expressed upon its forms.

In the youth of the world, men dance and sing and imitate natural objects, observing in these actions, as in all others, a certain rhythm or order. And, although all men observe a similar, they observe not the same order in the motions of the dance, in the melody of the song, in the combinations of language, in the series of their imitations of natural objects. For there is a certain order or rhythm belonging to each of these classes of mimetic representation, from which the hearer and the spectator receive an intenser and purer pleasure than from any other, the sense of an approximation to this order has been called taste by modern writers. Every man, in the infancy of art, observes an order which approximates more or less closely to that from which this highest delight results; but the diversity is not sufficiently marked as that its gradations should be sensible, except in those instances where the predominance of this faculty of approximation to the beautiful (for so we may be permitted to name the relation between this highest pleasure and its cause) is very great. Those in whom it exists to excess are poets, in the most universal sense of the word; and the pleasure resulting from the manner in which they express the influence of society or nature upon their own minds, communicates itself to others, and gathers a sort of reduplication from the community. Their language is vitally metaphorical; that is, it marks the before unapprehended relations of things and perpetuates their apprehension, until words, which represent them, become, through time, signs for portions or classes of thought instead of pictures of integral thoughts, and then, if no new poets should arise to create afresh the associations which have been thus disorganized, language will be dead to all the nobler purposes of human intercourse. These similitudes or relations are finely said by Lord Bacon to be "the same footsteps of nature impressed upon the various subjects of the world"¹—and he considers the faculty which perceives them as the storehouse of axioms common to all knowledge. In the infancy of society every author is necessarily a poet, because language itself is poetry; and to be a poet is to apprehend the true and the beautiful, in a word, the good which exists in the relation subsisting, first between existence and perception, and secondly between perception and expression. Every original language near to its source is in itself the chaos of a cyclic poem;² the copiousness of lexicography and the distinctions of grammar are the works of a later age, and are merely the catalogue and the forms of the creations of poetry.

But poets, or those who imagine and express this indestructible order, are not only the authors of language and of music, of the dance, and architecture, and statuary, and painting; they are the institutors of laws, and the founders of civil society, and the inventors of the arts of life, and the teachers who draw into a certain propinquity with the beautiful and the true that partial apprehension of the agencies of the invisible world which is called religion. Hence all original religions are allegorical, or susceptible of allegory, and, like Janus, have a double face of false and true. Poets, according to the circumstances of the age and nation in which they appeared, were called, in the earlier epochs of the world, legislators or prophets; a poet essentially comprises and unites both these characters. For he not only beholds intensely the present as it is, and discovers those laws according to which present things ought to be ordered, but he beholds the future in the present, and his thoughts are the germs of the flower and the fruit of latest time. Not that I assert poets to be prophets in the gross sense of the word, or that they can foretell the form as surely as they foreknow the spirit of events; such is the pretence of superstition, which would make poetry an attribute of prophecy, rather than prophecy an attribute of poetry. A poet participates in the eternal, the infinite, and the one, as far as relates to his conceptions, time and place and number are not. The grammatical forms which express the moods of time, and the difference of persons, and the distinction of place, are convertible with respect to the highest poetry without injuring it as poetry, and the choruses of Æschylus, and the Book of Job, and Dante's Paradise, would afford, more than any other writings, examples of this fact, if the limits of this essay did not forbid citation. The creations of music, sculpture, and painting are illustrations still more decisive.

Language, color, form, and religious and civil habits of action, are all the instruments and materials of poetry, they may be called poetry by that figure of speech which considers the effect as a synonym of the cause. But poetry in a more restricted sense expresses those arrangements of language, and especially metrical language, which are created by that imperial faculty whose throne is curtained within the invisible nature of man. And this springs from the nature itself of language, which is a more direct representation of the actions and passions of our internal being, and is susceptible of more various and delicate combinations, than color, form, or motion, and is more plastic and obedient to the control of that faculty of which it is the creation. For language is arbitrarily produced by the imagination, and has relation to thoughts alone; but all other materials, instruments, and conditions of art have relations among each other, which limit and interpose between conception and expression. The former is as a mirror which reflects, the latter as a cloud which enfeebles, the light of which both are mediums of communication. Hence the fame of sculptors, painters, and musicians, although the intrinsic powers of the great masters of these arts may yield in no degree to that of those who have employed language as the hieroglyphic of their thoughts, has never equalled that of poets in the restricted sense of the term, as two performers of equal skill will produce unequal effects from a guitar and a harp. The fame of legislators and founders of religions, so long as their institutions last, alone seem to exceed that of poets in the restricted sense; but it can scarcely be a question, whether, if we deduct the celebrity which their flat-tery of the gross opinions of the vulgar usually conciliates, together with that which belonged to them in their higher character of poets, any excess will remain.

We have thus circumscribed the word poetry within the limits of that art which is the most familiar and the most perfect expression of the faculty itself. It is necessary, however, to make the circle still narrower, and to determine the distinction between measured and unmeasured language; for the popular division into prose and verse is inadmissible in accurate philosophy

Sounds as well as thoughts have relation both between each other and towards that which they represent, and a perception of the order of those relations has always been found connected with a perception of the order of the relations of thoughts. Hence the language of poets has ever affected a sort of uniform and harmonious recurrence of sound, without which it were not poetry, and which is scarcely less indispensable to the communication of its influence than the words themselves without reference to that peculiar order. Hence the vanity of translation; it were as wise to cast a violet into a crucible that you might discover the formal principles of its color and odor, as to seek to transfuse from one language into another the creations of a poet. The plant must spring again from its seed, or it will bear no flower—and this is the burthen of the curse of Babel.¹

An observation of the regular mode of the recurrence of harmony in the language of poetical minds, together with its relation to music, produced metre, or a certain system of traditional forms of harmony and language. Yet it is by no means essential that a poet should accommodate his language to this traditional form, so that the harmony, which is its spirit, be observed. The practice is indeed convenient and popular, and to be preferred especially in such composition as includes much action; but every great poet must inevitably innovate upon the example of his predecessors in the exact structure of his peculiar versification. The distinction between poets and prose writers is a vulgar error. The distinction between philosophers and poets has been anticipated. Plato was essentially a poet—the truth and splendor of his imagery, and the melody of his language, are the most intense that it is possible to conceive. He rejected the harmony of the epic, dramatic, and lyrical forms, because he sought to kindle a harmony in thoughts divested of shape and action, and he forebore to invent any regular plan of rhythm which would include, under determinate forms, the varied pauses of his style. Cicero sought to imitate the cadence of his periods, but with little success. Lord Bacon was a poet.¹ His language has a sweet and majestic rhythm which satisfies the sense, no less than the almost superhuman wisdom of his philosophy satisfies the intellect; it is a strain which distends and then bursts the circumference of the reader's mind, and pours itself forth together with it into the universal element with which it has perpetual sympathy. All the authors of revolutions in opinion are not only necessarily poets as they are inventors, nor even as their words unveil the permanent analogy of things by images which participate in the life of truth, but as their periods are harmonious and rhythmic, and contain in themselves the elements of verse, being the echo of the eternal music. Nor are those supreme poets, who have employed traditional forms of rhythm on account of the form and action of their subjects, less capable of perceiving and teaching the truth of things, than those who have omitted that form. Shakespeare, Dante, and Milton (to confine ourselves to modern writers) are philosophers of the very loftiest power.

A poem is the very image of life expressed in its eternal truth. There is this difference between a story and a poem, that a story is a catalogue of detached facts, which have no other connection than time, place, circumstance, cause, and effect, the other is the creation of actions according to the unchangeable forms of human nature, as existing in the mind of the creator, which is itself the image of all other minds. The one is partial, and applies only to a definite period of time, and a certain combination of events which can never again recur; the other is universal, and contains within itself the germ of a relation to whatever motives or actions have place in the possible varieties of human nature. Time, which destroys the beauty and the use of the story of particular facts, stripped of the poetry which should invest them, augments that of poetry, and forever develops new and wonderful applications of the eternal truth which it contains. Hence epitomes have been called the moths of just history;² they eat out the poetry of it. A story of particular facts is as a mirror which obscures and distorts that which should be beautiful; poetry is a mirror which makes beautiful that which is distorted.

The parts of a composition may be poetical, without the composition as a whole being a poem. A single sentence may be considered as a whole, though it may be found in the midst of a series of unassimilated portions; a single word even may be a spark of inextinguishable thought. And thus all the great historians, Herodotus, Plutarch, Livy, were poets; and although the plan of these writers, especially that of Livy, restrained them from developing this faculty in its highest degree, they made copious and ample amends for their subjection, by filling all the interstices of their subjects with living images.

Having determined what is poetry, and who are poets, let us proceed to estimate its effects upon society.

Poetry is ever accompanied with pleasure: all spirits on which it falls open themselves to receive the wisdom which is mingled with its delight. In the infancy of the world, neither poets themselves nor their auditors are fully aware of the excellency of poetry, for it acts in a divine and unapprehended manner, beyond and above consciousness, and it is reserved for future generations to contemplate and measure the mighty cause and effect in all the strength and splendor of their union. Even in modern times, no living poet ever arrived at the fulness of his fame; the jury which sits in judgment upon a poet, belonging as he does to all time, must be composed of his peers; it must be impelled by Time from the selectest of the wise of many generations. A poet is a nightingale, who sits in darkness and sings to cheer its own solitude with sweet sounds, his auditors are as men entranced by the melody of an unseen musician, who feel that they are moved and softened, yet know not whence or why. The poems of Homer and his contemporaries were the delight of infant Greece; they were the elements of that social system which is the column upon which all succeeding civilization has reposed. Homer embodied the ideal perfection of his age in human character; nor can we doubt that those who read his verses were awakened to an ambition of becoming like to Achilles, Hector, and Ulysses; the truth and beauty of friendship, patriotism, and persevering devotion to an object, were unveiled to their depths in these immortal creations; the sentiments of the auditors must have been refined and enlarged by a sympathy with such great and lovely impersonations, until from admiring they imitated, and from imitation they identified themselves with the objects of their admiration. Nor let it be objected that these characters are remote from moral perfection, and that they are by no means to be considered as edifying patterns for general imitation. Every epoch, under names more or less specious, has defied its peculiar errors; Revenge is the naked idol of the worship of a semi-barbarous age; and Self-Deceit is the veiled image of unknown evil, before which luxury and satiety lie prostrate. But a poet considers the vices of his contemporaries as the temporary dress in which his creations must be arrayed, and which cover without concealing the eternal proportions of their beauty. An epic or dramatic personage is understood to wear them around his soul, as he may the ancient armor or modern uniform around his body, whilst it is easy to conceive a dress more graceful than either. The beauty of the internal nature can not be so far concealed by its accidental vesture, but that the spirit of its form shall communicate itself to the very disguise, and indicate the shape it hides from the manner in which it is worn. A majestic form and graceful motions will express themselves through the most barbarous and tasteless costume. Few poets of the highest class have chosen to exhibit the beauty of their conceptions in its naked truth and splendor; and it is doubtful whether the alloy of costume, habit, etc. be not necessary to temper this planetary music¹ for mortal ears.

The whole objection, however, of the immortality of poetry rests upon a misconception of the manner in which poetry acts to produce the moral improvement of man. Ethical science arranges the elements which poetry has created, and propounds schemes and proposes examples of civil and domestic life; nor is it for want of admirable doctrines that men hate, and despise, and censure, and deceive, and subjugate one another. But poetry acts in another and diviner manner. It awakens and enlarges the mind itself by rendering it the receptacle of a thousand unapprehended combinations of thought. Poetry lifts the veil from the hidden beauty of the world, and makes familiar objects be as if they were not familiar; it reproduces all that it represents, and the impersonations clothed in its Elysian light stand thenceforward in the minds of those who have once contemplated them, as memorials of that gentle and exalted content which extends itself over all thoughts and actions with which it co-exists. The great secret of morals is love; or a going out of our own nature, and an identification of ourselves with the beautiful which exists in thought, action, or person, not our own. A man, to be greatly good, must imagine intensely and comprehensively; he must put himself in the place of another and of many others; the pains and pleasures of his species must become his own. The great instrument of moral good is the imagination; and poetry administers to the effect by acting upon the cause. Poetry enlarges the circumference of the imagination by replenishing it with thoughts of ever new delight, which have the power of attracting and assimilating to their own nature all other thoughts, and which form new intervals and interstices whose void forever craves fresh food. Poetry strengthens the faculty which is the organ of the moral nature of man, in the same manner as exercise strengthens a limb. A poet therefore would do ill to embody his own conceptions of right and wrong, which are usually those of his place and time, in his poetical creations, which participate in neither. By this assumption of the inferior office of interpreting the effect, in which perhaps after all he might acquit himself but imperfectly, he would resign a glory in the participation of the cause. There was little danger that Homer, or any of the eternal poets, should have so far misunderstood themselves as to have abdicated this throne of their widest dominion. Those in whom the poetical faculty, though great, is less intense, as Euripides, Lucan, Tasso, Spenser, have frequently affected a moral aim, and the effect of their poetry is diminished in exact proportion to the degree in which they compel us to advert to this purpose.

The functions of the poetical faculty are two-fold: by one it creates new materials of knowledge, and power, and pleasure; by the other it engenders in the mind a desire to reproduce and arrange them according to a certain rhythm and order which may be called the beautiful and the good. The cultivation of poetry is never more to be desired than at periods when, from an excess of the selfish and calculating principle, the accumulation of the materials of external life exceed the quantity of the power of assimilating them to the internal laws of human nature. The body has then become too unwieldy for that which animates it.

Poetry is indeed something divine. It is at once the centre and circumference of knowledge; it is that which comprehends all science, and that to which all science must be referred. It is at the same time the root and blossom of all other systems of thought; it is that from which all spring, and that which adorns all; and that which, if blighted, denies the fruit and the seed, and withholds from the barren world the nourishment and the succession of the scions of the tree of life. It is the perfect and consummate surface and bloom of all things; it is as the odor and the color of the rose to the texture of the elements which compose it, as the form and splendor of unfaded beauty to the secrets of anatomy and corruption. What were virtue, love, patriotism, friendship; what were the scenery of this beautiful universe which we inhabit; what were our consolations on this side of the grave, and what were our aspirations beyond it,—if poetry did not ascend to bring light and fire from those eternal regions where the owl-winged faculty of calculation dare not ever soar? Poetry is not like reasoning, a power to be exerted according to the determination of the will. A man cannot say, "I will compose poetry." The greatest poet even cannot say it; for the mind in creation is as a fading coal, which some invisible influence, like an inconstant wind, awakens to transitory brightness; this power arises from within, like the color of a flower which fades and changes as it is developed, and the conscious portions of our nature are unprophectic either of its approach or its departure. Could this influence be durable in its original purity and force, it is impossible to predict the greatness of the results; but when composition begins, inspiration is already on the decline, and the most glorious poetry that has ever been communicated to the world is probably a feeble shadow of the original conceptions of the poet. I appeal to the greatest poets of the present day whether it is not an error to assert that the finest passages of poetry are produced by labor and study. The toil and the delay recommended by critics can be justly interpreted to mean no more than a careful observation of the inspired moments, and an artificial connection of the spaces between their suggestions by the intertexture of conventional expressions—a necessity only imposed by the limitedness of the poetical faculty itself; for Milton conceived the Paradise Lost as a whole before he executed it in portions. We have his own authority also for the muse having “dictated” to him the “unpremeditated song.”¹ And let this be an answer to those who would allege the fifty-six various readings of the first line of the Orlando Furioso. Compositions so produced are to poetry what mosaic is to painting. The instinct and intuition of the poetical faculty is still more observable in the plastic and pictorial arts: a great statue or picture grows under the power of the artist as a child in the mother’s womb; and the very mind which directs the hands in formation, is incapable of accounting to itself for the origin, the gradations, or the media of the process.

Poetry is the record of the best and happiest moments of the happiest and best minds. We are aware of evanescent visitations of thought and feeling, sometimes associated with place or person, sometimes regarding our own mind alone, and always arising unforeseen and departing unbidden, but elevating and delightful beyond all expression; so that even in the desire and the regret they leave, there cannot but be pleasure, participating as it does in the nature of its object. It is, as it were, the interpenetration of a diviner nature through our own; but its footsteps are like those of a wind over the sea, which the morning calm erases, and whose traces remain only, as on the wrinkled sand which paves it. These and corresponding conditions of being are experienced principally by those of the most delicate sensibility and the most enlarged imagination, and the state of mind produced by them is at war with every base desire. The enthusiasm of virtue, love, patriotism, and friendship is essentially linked with such emotions, and whilst they last, self appears as what it is, an atom to a universe. Poets are not only subject to these experiences as spirits of the most refined organization, but they can color all that they combine with the evanescent hues of this ethereal world; a word, a trait in the representation of a scene or a passion will touch the enchanted chord, and reanimate, in those who have ever experienced these emotions, the sleeping, the cold, the buried image of the past. Poetry thus makes immortal all that is best and most beautiful in the world; it arrests the vanishing apparitions which haunt the interlunations¹ of life, and veiling them or in language or in form, sends them forth among mankind, bearing sweet news of kindred joy to those with whom their sisters abide—abide, because there is no portal of expression from the caverns of the spirit which they inhabit into the universe of things. Poetry redeems from decay the visitations of the divinity in man.

Poetry turns all things to loveliness, it exalts the beauty of that which is most beautiful, and it adds beauty to that which is most deformed, it marries exultation and horror, grief and pleasure, eternity and change; it subdues to union under its light yoke all irreconcilable things. It transmutes all that it touches, and every form moving within the radiance of its presence is changed by wondrous sympathy to an incarnation of the spirit which it breathes; its secret alchemy turns to potable² gold the poisonous waters which flow from death through life; it strips the veil of familiarity from the world, and lays bare the naked and sleeping beauty which is the spirit of its forms.

All things exist as they are perceived: at least in relation to the percipient.

The mind in its own place and in itself
Can make a Heaven of Hell, a Hell of Heaven.³

But poetry defeats the curse which binds us to be subjected to the accident of surrounding impressions. And whether it spreads its own figured curtain, or withdraws life’s dark veil from before the scene of things, it equally creates for us a being within our being. It makes us the inhabitant of a world to which the familiar world is a chaos. It reproduces the common universe of which we are portions and percipients, and it purges from our inward sight the film of familiarity which obscures from us the wonder of our being. It compels us to feel that which we perceive, and to imagine that which we know. It creates anew the universe, after it has been annihilated in our minds by the recurrence of impressions blunted by reiteration. It justifies the bold and true words of Tasso: *Non merita nome di creatore, se non Iddio ed il Poeta*⁴.

highest wisdom, pleasure, virtue, and glory, so he ought personally to be the happiest, the best, the wisest, and the most illustrious of men. As to his glory, let time be challenged to declare whether the fame of any other institutor of human life be comparable to that of a poet. That he is the wisest, the happiest, and the best, inasmuch as he is a poet, is equally incontrovertible; the greatest poets have been men of the most spotless virtue, of the most consummate prudence, and, if we would look into the interior of their lives, the most fortunate of men; and the exceptions, as they regard those who possessed the poetic faculty in a high yet inferior degree, will be found on consideration to confirm rather than destroy the rule. Let us for a moment stoop to the arbitration of popular breath, and usurping and uniting in our own persons the incompatible characters of accuser, witness, judge, and executioner, let us decide without trial, testimony, or form, that certain motives of those who are "there sitting where we dare not soar,"¹ are reprehensible. Let us assume that Homer was a drunkard, that Virgil was a flatterer, that Horace was a coward, that Tasso was a madman, that Lord Bacon was a peculator, that Raphael was a libertine, that Spenser was a poet laureate. It is inconsistent with this division of our subject to cite living poets, but posterity has done ample justice to the great names now referred to. Their errors have been weighed and found to have been dust in the balance,² if their sins were as scarlet, they are now white as snow,³ they have been washed in the blood of the mediator and redeemer,⁴ Time. Observe in what a ludicrous chaos the imputations of real or fictitious crime have been confused in the contemporary calumnies against poetry and poets, consider how little is as it appears—or appears as it is, look to your own motives, and judge not, lest ye be judged.⁵

Poetry, as has been said, differs in this respect from logic, that it is not subject to the control of the active powers of the mind, and that its birth and recurrence have no necessary connection with the consciousness or will. It is presumptuous to determine that these are the necessary conditions of all mental causation, when mental conditions are experienced insusceptible of being referred to them. The frequent recurrence of the poetical power, it is obvious to suppose, may produce in the mind a habit of order and harmony correlative with its own nature and with its effects upon other minds. But in the intervals of inspiration—and they may be frequent without being durable—a poet becomes a man, and is abandoned to the sudden reflux of the influences under which others habitually live. But as he is more delicately organized than other men, and sensible to pain and pleasure, both his own and that of others, in a degree unknown to them, he will avoid the one and pursue the other with an ardor proportioned to this difference. And he renders himself obnoxious to calumny when he neglects to observe the circumstances under which these objects of universal pursuit and flight have disguised themselves in one another's garments.

But there is nothing necessarily evil in this error, and thus cruelty, envy, revenge, avarice, and the passions purely evil, have never formed any portion of the popular imputations on the lives of poets.

I have thought it most favorable to the cause of truth to set down these remarks according to the order in which they were suggested to my mind, by a consideration of the subject itself, instead of observing the formality of a polemical reply,¹ but if the view which they contain be just, they will be found to involve a refutation of the arguments against poetry, so far at least as regards the first division of the subject. I can readily conjecture what should have moved the gall of some learned and intelligent writers who quarrel with certain versifiers; I, like them, confess myself unwilling to be stunned by the Thesoids of the hoarse Codri of the day. Bavius and Mævius undoubtedly are, as they ever were, insufferable persons. But it belongs to a philosophical critic to distinguish rather than confound.

The first part of these remarks has related to poetry in its elements and principles, and it has been shown, as well as the narrow limits assigned them would permit, that what is called poetry in a restricted sense, has a common source with all other forms of order and of beauty according to which the materials of human life are susceptible of being arranged, and which is poetry in a universal sense.

The second part² will have for its object an application of these principles to the present state of the cultivation of poetry, ¹To Peacock's The Four Ages of Poetry, which contained a rather narrow view of what constitutes poetry.

and a defense of the attempt to idealize the modern forms of manners and opinions, and compel them into a subordination to the imaginative and creative faculty. For the literature of England, an energetic development of which has ever preceded or accompanied a great and free development of the national will, has arisen as it were from a new birth. In spite of the low-thoughted envy which would undervalue contemporary merit, our own will be a memorable age in intellectual achievements, and we live among such philosophers and poets as surpass beyond comparison any who have appeared since the last national struggle for civil and religious liberty. The most unfailing herald, companion, and follower of the awakening of a great people to work a beneficial change in opinion or institution, is poetry. At such periods there is an accumulation of the power of communicating and receiving intense and impassioned conceptions respecting man and nature. The persons in whom this power resides may often, as far as regards many portions of their nature, have little apparent correspondence with that spirit of good of which they are the ministers. But even whilst they deny and abjure, they are yet compelled to serve the power which is seated on the throne of their own soul. It is impossible to read the compositions of the most celebrated writers of the present day without being startled with the electric life which burns within their words. They measure the circumference and sound the depths of human nature with a comprehensive and all-penetrating spirit, and they are themselves perhaps the most sincerely astonished at its manifestations; for it is less their spirit than the spirit of the age. Poets are the hierophants¹ of an unapprehended inspiration; the mirrors of the gigantic shadows which futurity casts upon the present; the words which express what they understand not; the trumpets which sing to battle and feel not what they inspire; the influence which is moved not, but moves. Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world.

Now Morning from her orient chamber
came,

And her first footsteps touch'd a verdant hill;

Crowning its lawny crest with amber
flame, Sylv'ring the untainted gushes of its
rill;
5 Which, pure from mossy beds, did down distill,
And after parting beds of simple flowers,
By many streams a little lake did fill,
Which round its marge reflected woven
bowers,
And, in its nuddle space, a sky that never 10 There the kingfisher saw his plumage

bright
Vying with fish of brilliant dye below,
Whose silken fins, and golden scales'

Sparkled his jetty eyes, his feet did
show
Beneath the waves like Afric's ebony, And on his back a fay reclined volup-tuously.

Ah! could I tell the wonders of an isle 20 That in that fairest lake had placed been,
I could e'en Dido of her grief¹ beguile,
Or rob from aged Lear his bitter teen²
For sure so fair a place was never seen,

Of all that ever charm'd romantic eye 25 It seem'd an emerald in the silver sheen Of the bright waters, or as when on
high,
Through clouds of fleecy white, laughs the cœrulean sky.

And all around it dipp'd luxuriously Slopings of verdure through the glossy tide,
30 Which, as it were in gentle amity, Rippled delighted up the flowery side.
As if to glean the ruddy tears, it tried,
Which fell profusely from the rose-tree stem!
Haply it was the workings of its pride, 35 In strife to throw upon the shore a gem Outvying all the buds in Flora's diadem.

TO BYRON
1814 1848

Byron! how sweetly sad thy melody!
Attuning still the soul to tenderness,
As if soft Pity, with unusual stress, Had touch'd her plaintive lute, and thou, being by,
5 Hadst caught the tones, nor suffer'd them
to die.
O'ershadowing sorrow doth not make thee
less Delightful: thou thy griefs dost dress
With a bright halo, shining beamily, As when a cloud the golden moon doth
veil, 10 Its sides are ting'd with a resplendent
glow,
Through the dark robe oft amber rays prevail,
And like fair veins in sable marble flow;
Still warble, dying swan¹ still tell the tale,
The enchanting tale, the tale of pleasing woe.

TO CHATTERTON
1848

O Chatterton! how very sad thy fate!²
Dear child of sorrow—son of misery!
How soon the film of death obscur'd that
eye,
Whence Genius mildly flash'd, and high debate.
5 How soon that voice, majestic and elate, Melted in dying numbers! Oh! how nigh Was night to thy fair morning. Thou didst
die
A half-blown flow'ret which cold blasts amate.³
But this is past: thou art among the stars 10 Of highest Heaven: to the rolling spheres Thou sweetly singest: naught thy hymning mars,
Above the ingrate world and human fears.
On earth the good man base detraction bars From thy fair name, and waters it with
tears.

WOMAN! WHEN I BEHOLD THEE FLIPPANT, VAIN
1817

Woman! when I behold thee flippant, vain, Inconstant, childish, proud, and full of fancies;
Without that modest softening that enhances

¹ The swan was said to sing melodiously when about to die

² Chatterton committed suicide in a fit of despondency, when seventeen years of age. See Shelley's Adonais, 45 (p 786).

³ subdued; disheartened

The downcast eye, repentant of the pain 5 That its mild light creates to heal again: E'en then, elate, my spirit leaps, and prances, E'en then my soul with exultation
dances
For that to love, so long, I've dormant lain:
But when I see thee meek, and kind, and
tender,
10 Heavens! how desperately do I adore Thy winning graces,—to be thy defender
I hotly burn—to be a Calidore A very Red Cross Knight—a stout Lennder—Might I be loved by thee like these of yore.
15 Light feet, dark violet eyes, and parted
hair;
Soft dimpled hands, white neck, and creamy breast,
Are things on which the dazzled senses
rest
Till the fond, fixed eyes, forget they stare.
From such fine pictures, heavens! I cannot dare 20 To turn my admiration, though unpossess'd
They be of what is worthy,—though not drest
In lovely modesty, and virtues rare.
Yet these I leave as thoughtless as a lark;
These lures I straight forget,—e'en ere I dine, 25 Or thrice my palate moisten: but when I mark
Such charms with mild intelligences
shine,
My ear is open like a greedy shark,
To catch the tunings of a voice divine.
Ah! who can e'er forget so fair a being?
30 Who can forget her half-retiring sweets?
God! she is like a milk-white lamb that bleats
For man's protection. Surely the All-seeing,
Who joys to see us with his gifts agreeing,
Will never give him pinions, who in-treats 35 Such innocence to ruin,—who vilely cheats
A dove-like bosom. In truth there is no freeing One's thoughts from such a beauty; when I hear
A lay that once I saw her hand awake,

Her form seems floating palpable, and near;

- 40 Had I e'er seen her from an arbor take A dewy flower, oft would that hand appear,
And o'er my eyes the trembling moisture shake.

WRITTEN ON THE DAY THAT MR.
1815 1817

- What though, for showing truth to flatter'd
state,
Kind Hunt was shut in prison, yet has he,
In his immortal spirit, been as free
As the sky-searching lark, and as elate.
5 Minion of grandeur! think you he did wait?
Think you he naught but prison walls did
see,
Till, so unwilling, thou unturn'dst the key?
Ah, no! far happier, nobler was his fate!
In Spenser's halls he stray'd, and bowers
fair, 10 Culling enchanted flowers; and he flew With daring Milton through the fields of
air.
To regions of his own his genius true Took happy flights. Who shall his fame impair When thou art dead, and all thy wretched crew?

TO A YOUNG LADY WHO SENT ME A LAUREL CROWN
1848

- Fresh morning gusts have blown away all
fear
From my glad bosom,—now from gloomi-
ness
I mount forever—not an atom less Than the proud laurel shall content my bier
5 No! by the eternal stars! or why sit here In the Sun's eye, and 'gainst my temples
press
Apollo's very leaves,² woven to bless By thy white fingers and thy spirit clear Lo! who dares say, "Do this!" Who dares call down 10 My will from its high purpose? Who say,
"Stand."
Or "Go"? This mighty moment I would frown

lished in The Examiner, 1812. He was released on Feb 8 1815. See Hunt's To

HOW MANY BARDS GILD THE LAPSSES

1815 1817

- How many bards gild the lapses of time!
A few of them have ever been the food
Of my delighted fancy,—I could brood Over their beauties, earthly, or sublime.
5 And often, when I sit me down to rhyme, These will in throngs before my mind intrude
But no confusion, no disturbance rude
Do they occasion; 'tis a pleasing chime So the unnumber'd sounds that evening stole, 10 The songs of birds—the whisp'ring of the leaves—
The voice of waters—the great bell that heaves
With solemn sound,—and thousand others
more,
That distance of recognizance bereaves,
Make pleasing music, and not wild uproar.

KEEN, FITFUL GUSTS ARE WHIS-P'RING HERE AND THERE 1817

- Keen, fitful gusts are whisp'ring here and
there
Among the bushes half leafless, and dry;
The stars look very cold about the sky,
And I have many miles on foot to fare.
5 Yet feel I little of the cool bleak air,
Or of the dead leaves rustling drearily,
Or of those silver lamps that burn on high,
Or of the distance from home's pleasant lair.
For I am brimful of the friendliness 10 That in a little cottage¹ I have found;
Of fair-hair'd Milton's eloquent distress,
And all his love for gentle Lycid drown'd;
Of lovely Laura in her light green dress,
And faithful Petrarch gloriously crown'd.

ON FIRST LOOKING INTO CHAPMAN'S HOMER

1815 1816

- Much have I travell'd in the realms of
gold,
And many goodly states and kingdoms
seen;
Round many western islands have I been Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold

⁵ Oft of one wide expanse had I been told That deep-brow'd Homer ruled as his demesne;

Yet did I never breathe its pure serene Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and
bold:

Then felt I like some watcher of the skies

¹⁰ When a new planet swims into his ken;
Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
He star'd at the Pacific¹—and all his men Look'd at each other with a wild surmise—Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

AS FROM THE DARKENING GLOOM A SILVER DOVE
1816 1876

As from the darkening gloom a silver dove Upsoars, and darts into the eastern light, On pinions that naught moves but pure
delight,

So fled thy soul into the realms above,

⁵ Regions of peace and everlasting love; Where happy spirits, crown'd with circlets bright

Of starry beam, and gloriously bedight,²

SONNET TO SOLITUDE
1816 1816

O Solitude! if I must with thee dwell, Let it not be among the jumbled heap Of murky buildings, climb with me the steep,—

Nature's observatory,—whence the dell,

⁵ Its flowery slopes, its river's crystal swell May seem a span; let me thy vigils keep 'Mongst boughs pavilion'd where the deer's swift leap

Startles the wild bee from the fox-glove
bell

But though I'll gladly trace³ these scenes with thee,

mind,

Whose words are images of thoughts refin'd,

Is my soul's pleasure; and it sure must be

TO ONE WHO HAS BEEN LONG IN CITY PENT¹
1816 1817

To one who has been long in city pent,
'Tis very sweet to look into the fair And open face of heaven,—to breathe a prayer

Full in the smile of the blue firmament.

⁵ Who is more happy, when, with heart's content,

Fatigued he sinks into some pleasant lair
Of wavy grass, and reads a debonaire
And gentle tale of love and languishment?

¹⁰ Returning home at evening, with an ear Catching the notes of Philomel,—an eye Watching the sailing cloudlet's bright

He mourns that day so soon has glided by.

That falls through the clear ether silently

OH! HOW I LOVE ON A FAIR SUM-MER'S EVE
1816 1848

Oh! how I love, on a fair summer's eve, When streams of light pour down the golden west,

And on the balmy zephyrs tranquil rest
The silver clouds, far—far away to leave

⁵ All meaner thoughts, and take a sweet reprieve

From little cares; to find, with easy quest, A fragrant wild, with Nature's beauty
drest,

And there into delight my soul deceive.

There wain my breast with patriotic lore,

bier—

Till their stern forms before my mind arise

Perhaps on wing of Poesy upsoar, Full often dropping a melodious tear, When some melodious sorrow spells mine
eyes.

I STOOD TIPTOE UPON A LITTLE HILL 1816 1817

Places of nestling green for Poets made —Leigh Hunt, The Story of Elmhurst.²

I stood tiptoe upon a little hill,
The air was cooling, and so very still That the sweet buds which with a modest

¹ See Paradise Lost, 9, 445; also Coleridge's Frost at Midnight, 52 (p. 350).

² Canto 3, 290 (p. 867).

Pull droopingly, in slanting curve aside, 5 Their scanty-leav'd, and finely-tapering stems,
 Had not yet lost those starry diadems Caught from the early sobbing of the morn.

The clouds were pure and white as flocks new shorn,
 And fresh from the clear brook, sweetly they slept

10 On the blue fields of heaven, and then there crept

A little noiseless noise among the leaves, Born of the very sigh that silence heaves
 For not the faintest motion could be seen Of all the shades that slanted o'er the green.

15 There was wide wand'ring for the greediest eye,

To peer about upon variety, Far round the horizon's crystal air to skim,
 And trace the dwindled edgings of its brim;

To picture out the quaint and curious bending

20 Of a fresh woodland alley, never ending,
 Or by the bowery clefts, and leafy shelves.
 Guess where the jaunty streams refresh
 themselves

I gazed awhile, and felt as light and free

As though the fanning wings of Mercury 25 Had play'd upon my heels. I was light-hearted,

And many pleasures to my vision slatted,
 So I straightway began to pluck a posy
 Of luxuries bright, milky, soft, and rosy

A bush of May flowers with the bees about them,

30 Ah, sure no tasteful nook would be without them,

And let a lush laburnum oversweep them,
 And let long grass grow round the roots to keep them

Moist, cool, and green; and shade the violets,

That they may bind the moss in leafy nets

35 A filbert hedge with wild briar over-
 twined,

And clumps of woodbine taking the soft
 wind

Upon their summer thrones; there too should be

The frequent chequer of a youngling tree,
 That with a score of light green brethren shoots

40 From the quaint mossiness of aged roots;

Round which is heard a spring-head of clear waters

Babbling so wildly of its lovely daughters
 The spreading blue-bells it may haply mourn

That such fair clusters should be rudely torn

45 From their fresh beds, and scattered thoughtlessly

By infant hands, left on the path to die.

Open afresh your round of starry folds,
 Ye ardent margolds!

Dry up the moisture from your golden lids,

50 For great Apollo bids

That in these days your praises should be sung

On many harps, which he has lately strung,
 And when again your dewiness he kisses,

Tell him, I have you in my world of blisses

55 So haply when I rove in some far vale, His nightly voice may come upon the gale.

Here are sweet peas, on tiptoe for a flight,

With wings of gentle flush o'er delicate
 white,

And taper fingers catching at all things,

60 To bind them all about with tiny rings

Linger awhile upon some bending planks That lean against a streamlet's rushy
 banks,

And watch intently Nature's gentle doings.
 They will be found softer than ring-dove's cooings

65 How silent comes the water round that bend,

Not the minutest whisper does it send To the o'erhanging willows' blades of grass

Slowly across the chequer'd shadows pass Why, you might read two sonnets, ere they reach

70 To where the hurrying freshnesses aye preach

A natural sermon o'er their pebbly beds, Where swarms of minnows show their little heads,

Staying then wavy bodies 'gainst the
 streams,

To taste the luxury of sunny beams

75 Temper'd with coolness How they ever wrestle

With their own sweet delight, and ever nestle

Their silver bellies on the pebbly sand.

¹ willows

- If you but scantily hold out the hand,
That very instant not one will remain;
80 But turn your eye, and they are there again.
The ripples seem right glad to reach those cresses,
And cool themselves among the em'ald
 tresses;
The while they cool themselves, they freshness give,
And moisture, that the bowery green may live:
85 So keeping up an interchange of favors, Like good men in the truth of their behaviors.
Sometimes goldfinches one by one will drop From low-hung branches, little space they stop,
But sip, and twitter, and their feathers sleek, 90 Then off at once, as in a wanton freak Or perhaps, to show their black, and golden
 wings,
Pausing upon their yellow flutterings.
Were I in such a place, I sure should pray That naught less sweet, nought call my thoughts away, 95 Than the soft rustle of a maiden's gown Fanning away the dandelion's down,
Than the light music of her nimble toes Patting against the sorrel as she goes How she would start, and blush, thus to be caught 100 Playing in all her innocence of thought O let me lead her gently o'er the brook, Watch her half-smiling lips, and downward look;
O let me for one moment touch her wrist,
Let me one moment to her breathing list, 105 And as she leaves me may she often turn Her fair eyes looking through her locks auburne
What next? A tuft of evening primroses,
O'er which the mind may hover till it dozes,
O'er which it well might take a pleasant
 sleep,
110 But that 'tis ever startled by the leap Of buds into ripe flowers; or by the flitting
Of diverse moths, that aye their rest are quitting;
Or by the moon lifting her silver rim Above a cloud, and with a gradual swim 115 Coming into the blue with all her light O Maker of sweet poets, dear delight
Of this fair world, and all its gentle lovers, Spangler of clouds, halo of crystal rivers, Mingler with leaves, and dew and tumbling
 streams,
120 O'loser of lovely eyes to lovely dreams, Lover of loneliness, and wandering,
Of upcast eye, and tender pondering!
Thee must I praise above all other glories That smile us on to tell delightful stories 125 For what has made the sage or poet write But the fair paradise of Nature's light?
In the calm grandeur of a sober line,
We see the waving of the mountain pine;
And when a tale is beautifully staid, 130 We feel the safety of a hawthorn glade.
When it is moving on luxurious wings,
The soul is lost in pleasant smotherings.
Fair dewy roses brush against our faces,
And flowering laurels spring from diamond vases, 135 O'er head we see the jasmine and sweet briar,
And bloomy grapes laughing from green attire;
While at our feet, the voice of crystal bubbles Charms us at once away from all our troubles.
So that we feel uplifted from the world, 140 Walking upon the white clouds wreath'd and curl'd.
So felt he who first told how Psyche went On the smooth wind to realms of wonder-
 ment;
What Psyche felt, and Love, when their full lips
First touch'd, what amorous and fondling kisses
145 They gave each other's cheeks, with all their sighs,
And how they kiss each other's tremulous
 eyes
The silver lamp,—the ravishment,—the wonder—
The darkness,—loneliness,—the fearful
 thunder;
Their woes gone by, and both to heaven
 upflown, 150 To bow for gratitude before Jove's
 throne
So did he feel, who pull'd the boughs aside,
That we might look into a forest wide,
To catch a glimpse of Fauns, and Dryades Coming with softest rustle through the
 trees;
155 And garlands woven of flowers wild, and
 sweet,
Upheld by ivory wrists, or sporting feet Telling us how fair, trembling Syrinx
 fled
Arcadian Pan, with such a fearful dread

Poor nymph,—poor Pan,—how he did weep to find,
 160 Nought but a lovely sighing of the wind Along the reedy stream; a half-heard
 strain,
 Full of sweet desolation—balmy pain.

What first inspired a bard of old to sing Narcissus pining o'er the untainted
 spring?

165 In some delicious ramble, he had found A little space, with boughs all woven
 round;
 And in the midst of all, a clearer pool
 Than e'er reflected in its pleasant cool,
 The blue sky here, and there, serenely peeping

170 Through tendril wreaths fantastically creeping
 And on the bank, a lonely flower he spied, A meek and forlorn flower, with naught of
 pride,
 Drooping its beauty o'er the watery clear-
 ness,

To woo its own sad image into nearness:
 175 Deaf to light Zephyrus it would not move; But still would seem to droop, to pine, to
 love

So while the poet stood in this sweet spot,
 Some fainter gleamings o'er his fancy shot;

Nor was it long ere he had told the tale 180 Of young Narcissus, and sad Echo's bale

Where had he been, from whose warm head outflow

That sweetest of all songs, that ever new,
 That aye refreshing, pure deliciousness, Coming ever to bless

185 The wanderer by moonlight? to him bringing
 Shapes from the invisible world, unearthly singing

From out the muddle air, from flowery nests,

And from the pillowy silkiness that rests Full in the speculation of the stars.

190 Ah! surely he had burst our mortal bars,
 Into some wond'rous region he had gone,
 To search for thee, divine Endymion!

He was a poet, sure a lover too,
 Who stood on Latinus' top, what time there blew

195 Soft breezes from the myrtle vale below;
 And brought in faintness solemn, sweet, and slow

A hymn from Dian's temple, while up-swelling,

The incense went to her own starry dwelling

But though her face was clear as infant's
 eyes,

200 Though she stood smiling o'er the sacrifice,

The poet wept at her so piteous fate,
 Wept that such beauty should be desolate So in fine wrath some golden sounds he won,

And gave meek Cynthia her Endymion

205 Queen of the wide air, thou most lovely queen

Of all the brightness that mine eyes have seen!

As thou exceedest all things in thy shine,
 No every tale, does this sweet tale of thine O for three words of honey, that I might 210 Tell but one wonder of thy bridal night!

Where distant ships do seem to show their keels,

Phæbus awhile delay'd his mighty wheels,
 And turn'd to smile upon thy bashful eyes, Ere he his unseen pomp would solemnize

215 The evening weather was so bright, and
 clear,

That men of health were of unusual cheer;
 Stepping like Homer at the trumpet's call,
 Or young Apollo on the pedestal¹

And lovely women were as fair and warm 220 As Venus looking sideways in alarm²

The breezes were ethereal, and pure, And crept through half-closed lattices to cure

The languid sick; it cool'd their fever'd
 sleep,

And soothed them into slumbers full and
 deep.

225 Soon they awoke clear-eyed nor burnt with thirsting,

Nor with hot fingers, nor with temples bursting.

And springing up, they met the wond'ring
 sight

Of their dear friends, high foolish with
 delight,

Who feel their arms and breasts, and kiss and stare,

230 And on their placid foreheads part the hair.

Young men and maidens at each other gaz'd

With hands held back, and motionless, amaz'd

To see the brightness in each other's eyes;

² Probably the statue Venus de Medici.

And so they stood, all'd with a sweet surprise, 235 Until their tongues were loos'd in poesy.
 Therefore no lover did of anguish die:
 But the soft numbers,¹ in that moment spoken,
 Made silken ties, that never may be broken.
 Cynthia! I cannot tell the greater blisses, 240 That follow'd thine, and thy dear shepherd's kisses:
 Was there a poet born?—but now no more,
 My wand'ring spirit must no further soar.—

CHAUCER⁷

What is more gentle than a wind in summer?
 What is more soothing than the pretty hummer
 That stays one moment in an open flower,
 And buzzes cheerily from bower to bower?
 5 What is more tranquil than a musk-rose blowing
 In a green island, far from all men's knowing?
 More healthful than the leafiness of dales?
 More secret than a nest of nightingales?
 More serene than Cordelia's countenance?
 10 More full of visions than a high romance?
 What but thee, Sleep? Soft closer of our eyes!
 Low murmurer of tender lullabies!
 Light hoverer around our happy pillows!
 Wreather of poppy buds, and weeping willows!
 15 Silent entangler of a beauty's tresses!
 Most happy listener! when the morning blesses Thee for enlivening all the cheerful eyes That glance so brightly at the new sun-rise.
 But what is higher beyond thought than thee?
 20 Fresher than berries of a mountain tree?
 More strange, more beautiful, more smooth, more regal,
 Than wings of swans, than doves, than dim-seen eagle?
 What is it? And to what shall I compare it?

¹ verses⁸ 'immeasurable' 'knew not² was no earthly person³ heart's ease⁹ 'had not⁴ The Flower and the Leaf, 17-21. This poem for a long time was accredited to Chaucer. Its authorship is unknown.

It has a glory, and naught else can share it:
 25 The thought thereof is awful, sweet, and holy,
 Chasing away all worldliness and folly,
 Coming sometimes like fearful claps of thunder, Or the low rumblings earth's regions under;
 And sometimes like a gentle whispering 30 Of all the secrets of some wond'rous thing That breathes about us in the vacant air,
 So that we look around with prying stare, Perhaps to see shapes of light, aerial humming,¹
 And catch soft floatings from a faint-heard hymning; 35 To see the laurel wreath, on high suspended,
 That is to crown our name when life is ended Sometimes it gives a glory to the voice,
 And from the heart up-springs, rejoice!
 Sounds which will reach the Framer of all things, 40 And die away in ardent mutterings.

No one who once the glorious sun has seen,
 And all the clouds, and felt his bosom clean
 For his great Maker's presence, but must know What 'tis I mean, and feel his being glow:
 45 Therefore no insult will I give his spirit,
 By telling what he sees from native merit.

O Poesy! for thee I hold my pen,
 That am not yet a glorious denizen
 Of thy wide heaven—Should I rather kneel 50 Upon some mountain-top until I feel A glowing splendor round about me hung,
 And echo back the voice of thine own tongue?

O Poesy! for thee I grasp my pen,
 That am not yet a glorious denizen
 55 Of thy wide heaven; yet, to my ardent prayer, Yield from thy sanctuary some clear air, Smooth'd for intoxication by the breath Of flowering bays,² that I may die a death Of luxury, and my young spirit follow 60 The morning sun-beams to the great Apollo Like a fresh sacrifice; or, if I can bear
 The o'erwhelming sweets, 'twill bring to me the fair

Visions of all places: a bowery nook
 Will be Elysium—an eternal book

65 Whence I may copy many a lovely saying ³ painting⁴ ⁵ A kind of laurel tree.

- About the leaves, and flowers—about the playing Of nymphs in woods, and fountains, and the shade Keeping a silence round a sleeping maid,
And many a verse from so strange influence
- 70 That we must ever wonder how, and whence it came. Also imaginings will hover Round my fire-side, and haply there discover Vistas of solemn beauty, where I'd wander In happy silence, like the clear Meander
- 75 Through its lone vales; and where I found a spot
Of awfuller shade, or an enchanted grot,
Or a green hill o'erspread with chequer'd dyes
Of flowers, and fearful from its loveliness, Write on my tablets all that was permitted,
- 80 All that was for our human senses fitted.
Then the events of this wide world I'd seize Like a strong giant, and my spirit tease Till at its shoulders it should proudly see Wings to find out an immortality.
- 85 Stop and consider! life is but a day;
A fragile dew-drop on its perilous way
From a tree's summit, a poor Indian's sleep While his boat hastens to the monstrous steep Of Montmorency! Why so sad a moan?
- 90 Life is the rose's hope while yet unblown;
The reading of an ever-changing tale;
The light uplifting of a maiden's veil;
A pigeon tumbling in clear summer air;
A laughing school-boy, without grief or care,
- 95 Riding the springy branches of an elm O for ten years, that I may overwhelm Myself in Poesy, so I may do the deed That my own soul has to itself decreed Then will I pass the countries that I see
- 100 In long perspective, and continually Taste their pure fountains. First the realm I'll pass Of Flora and old Pan: sleep in the grass, Feed upon apples red, and strawberries,
And choose each pleasure that my fancy sees;
- 105 Catch the white-handed nymphs in shady places,
To woo sweet kisses from averted faces,— Play with their fingers, touch their shoulders white Into a pretty shrinking with a bite
As hard as lips can make it: till agreed,
- 110 A lovely tale of human life we'll read.
And one will teach a tame dove how it best May fan the cool air gently o'er my rest; Another, bending o'er her nimble tread,
Will set a green robe floating round her head,
- 115 And still will dance with ever varied ease, Smiling upon the flowers and the trees:
Another will entice me on, and on Through almond blossoms and rich cinnamon; Till in the bosom of a leafy world
- 120 We rest in silence, like two gems upcurl'd
In the recesses of a pearly shell.
And can I ever bid these joys farewell?
Yes, I must pass them for a nobler life,
Where I may find the agonies, the strife
Of human hearts for lo! I see afar, (O'ersailing the blue cragginess, a car And steeds with streamy manes—the charioteer Looks out upon the winds with glorious fear
And now the numerous trappings quiver lightly Along a huge cloud's ridge, and now with sprightly Wheel downward come they into fresher
skies,
Tipt round with silver from the sun's bright eyes.
Still downward with capacious whirl they glide,
And now I see them on a green-hill's side
In breezy rest among the nodding stalks
The charioteer with wondrous gesture talks
To the trees and mountains; and there soon appear Shapes of delight, of mystery, and fear, Passing along before a dusky space
- 140 Made by some mighty oaks as they would chase
Some ever-fleeting music on they sweep Lo! how they murmur, laugh, and smile, and weep.
Some with upholden hand and mouth severe,
Some with their faces muffled to the ear Between their arms, some, clear in youthful bloom,
Go glad and smilingly athwart the gloom;
Some looking back, and some with upward
gaze;
Yes, thousands in a thousand different ways
Flit onward—now a lovely wreath of girls Dancing their sleek hair into tangled curls;

And now broad wings. Most awfully intent
The driver of those steeds is forward bent,
And seems to listen: O that I might know
All that he writes with such a hurrying glow.

155 The visions all are fled—the car is fled Into the light of heaven, and in their stead
A sense of real things comes doubly strong,
And, like a muddy stream, would bear along

My soul to nothingness: but I will strive 160 Against all doubtings, and will keep alive
The thought of that same chariot, and the strange Journey it went.

Is there so small a range In the present strength of manhood, that the high

Imagination cannot freely fly

Paw up against the light, and do strange deeds

Upon the clouds? Has she not shown us
all?

From the clear space of ether, to the small Breath of new buds unfolding? From the meaning

170 Of Jove's large eye-brow,¹ to the tender greening

Of April meadows? Here her altar shone, E'en in this isle, and who could paragon
The fervid choir² that lifted up a noise
Of harmony, to where it aye will poise

175 Its mighty self of convoluting sound, Huge as a planet, and like that roll round, Eternally around a dizzy void?

Ay, in those days the Muses were nigh
cloy'd

With honors; nor had any other care

180 Than to sing out and sooth their wavy hair.

Could all this be forgotten? Yes, a schism Nurtured by foppery and barbarism, Made great Apollo blush for this his land:
Men were thought wise who could not understand

185 His glories: with a puling infant's force
They sway'd about upon a rocking horse,
And thought it Pegasus. Ah, dismal soul'd!
The winds of heaven blew, the ocean roll'd Its gathering waves—ye felt it not. The

Of summer nights collected still to make The morning precious: beauty was awake!
Why were ye not awake? But ye were dead To things ye knew not of,—were closely
wed

And compass vile: so that ye taught a 200 A thousand handicraftsmen wore the mask Of Poesy. Ill-fated, impious race!

That blasphemed the bright Lyrist to his

And did not know it,—no, they went about,
Holding a poor, decrepid standard out,

205 Mark'd with most flimsy mottoes, and in large

The name of one Boileau!

O ye whose charge

It is to hover round our pleasant hills!

Whose congregated majesty so fills

My boundly² reverence, that I cannot trace

210 Your hallowed names, in this unholy place, So near those common folk; did not their shames

Affright you? Did our old lamenting Thames

Delight you? Did ye never cluster round Delicious Avon, with a mournful sound,

215 And weep? Or did ye wholly bid adieu

To regions where no more the laurel grew?

Or did ye stay to give a welcoming

To some lone spirits who could proudly
sing

Their youth away, and die? 'Twas even so.

220 But let me think away those times of
woe:

Now 'tis a fairer season, ye have breathed Rich benedictions o'er us, ye have wreathed

Fresh garlands: for sweet music has been heard

In many places;—some has been upstirr'd

225 From out its crystal dwelling in a lake,

By a swan's ebon bill;³ from a thick brake,⁴

Nested and quiet in a valley mild,

Bubbles a pipe, fine sounds are floating wild

About the earth: happy are ye and glad.

- 230 These things are, doubtless: yet in truth we've had Strange thunders from the potency of
song;
Mingled indeed with what is sweet and 270 strong
From majesty: but in clear truth the themes
Are ugly clubs, the Poets Polyphemes 235 Disturbing the grand sea. A drainless shower
Of light is Poesy; 'tis the supreme of
power;
'Tis might half slumb'ring on its own right arm.
The very archings of her eye-lids charm
A thousand willing agents to obey, 240 And still she governs with the mildest
sway:
But strength alone though of the Muses
born
Is like a fallen angel. trees uptorn, Darkness, and worms, and shrouds, and sepulchres
Delight it; for it feeds upon the burrs, 245 And thorns of life; forgetting the great end
Of Poesy, that it should be a friend To soothe the cares, and lift the thoughts of man.
- Yet I rejoice. a myrtle fairer than E'er grew in Paphos, from the bitter weeds 250 Lifts its sweet head into the air, and feeds
A silent space with ever sprouting green.
All tenderest birds there find a pleasant screen,
Creep through the shade with jaunty fluttering,
Nibble the little cupped flowers and sing.
255 Then let us clear away the choking thorns From round its gentle stem; let the young fawns, Yeaned¹ in aftertimes, when we are flown,
Find a fresh sward beneath it, overgrown With simple flowers: let there nothing
be 260 More boisterous than a lover's bended knee;
Nought more ungentle than the placid look
Of one who leans upon a closed book; Nought more untranquil than the grassy slopes Between two hills. All hail, delightful hopes!
265 As she was wont, th' imagination Into most lovely labyrinths will be gone,
And they shall be accounted poet kings ¹ born
- Who simply tell the most heart-easing
things.
O may these joys be ripe before I die.
- Will not some say that I presumptuously Have spoken? that from hastening disgrace
'Twere better far to hide my foolish face?
That whining boyhood should with reverence bow Ere the dread thunderbolt could reach?
How!
- 275 If I do hide myself, it sure shall be In the very fane, the light of Poesy:
If I do fall, at least I will be laid Beneath the silence of a poplar shade;
And over me the grass shall be smooth shaven, 280 And there shall be a kind memorial graven.
But off, Despondence! miserable bane!
They should not know thee, who athirst to gain
A noble end, are thirsty every hour.
What though I am not wealthy in the
dower 285 Of spanning wisdom, though I do not
know
The shiftings of the mighty winds that blow
Hither and thither all the changing
thoughts
Of man: though no great minist'ring reason sorts
Out the dark mysteries of human souls
To clear conceiving: yet there ever rolls 290 A vast idea before me, and I glean Therefrom my liberty; thence too I've seen
The end and aim of Poesy 'Tis clear As anything most true; as that the year 295 Is made of the four seasons—manifest
As a large cross, some old cathedral's crest, Lifted to the white clouds. Therefore should I
Be but the essence of deformity,
A coward, did my very eyelids wink 300 At speaking out what I have dared to think.
Ah! rather let me like a madman run Over some precipice, let the hot sun Melt my Dædalian wings, and drive me
down
Convuls'd and headlong! Stay! an inward frown 305 Of conscience bids me be more calm awhile
An ocean dim, sprinkled with many an isle, Spreads awfully before me. How much
toil!
How many days! what desperate turmoil!

Ere I can have explored its widenesses.

310 Ah, what a task! upon my bended knees,
I could unsay those—no, impossible!
Impossible!

For sweet relief I'll dwell On humbler thoughts, and let this strange assay

Begun in gentleness die so away

315 E'en now all tumult from my bosom fades.
I turn full-hearted to the friendly aids
That smooth the path of honor, brotherhood,

And friendliness, the nurse of mutual good.
The hearty grasp that sends a pleasant sonnet¹

320 Into the brain ere one can think upon it,
The silence when some rhymes are coming
out,

And when they're come, the very pleasant rout.

The message certain to be done tomorrow.
'Tis perhaps as well that it should be to harrow

325 Some precious book from out its snug retreat,
To cluster round it when we next shall meet

Scarcely can I scribble on, for lovely airs Are fluttering round the room like doves in pairs,

330 Many delights of that glad day recalling, When first my senses caught their tender falling.

And with these airs come forms of elegance Stooping their shoulders o'er a horse's prance, (Careless, and grand—fingers soft and
round

Parting luxuriant curls,—and the swift
bound

335 Of Bacchus from his chariot, when his eye Made Ariadne's cheek look blushing.
Thus I remember all the pleasant flow Of words at opening a portfolio.

Things such as these are ever harbingers

340 To trains of peaceful images the stars Of a swan's neck unseen among the rushes;
A linnet starting all about the bushes;
A butterfly, with golden wings broad parted,

Nestling a rose, convuls'd as though it smarted

345 With over pleasure—many, many more, Might I indulge at large in all my store
Of luxuries; yet I must not forget Sleep, quiet with his poppy coronet:

¹ song

For what there may be worthy in these rhymes

350 I partly owe to him: and thus, the chimes
Of friendly voices had just given place To as sweet a silence, when I 'gan retrace
The pleasant day, upon a couch at ease.

355 It was a poet's house¹ who keeps the keys Of pleasure's temple. Round about were hung

The glorious features of the bards who sung

In other ages—cold and sacred busts Smiled at each other. Happy he who trusts
To clear Futurity his darling fame!

360 Then there were fauns and satyrs taking aim

At swelling apples with a frisky leap
And reaching fingers, 'mid a luscious heap Of vine-leaves. Then there rose to view a fane

Of liny² marble, and thereto a train

365 Of nymphs approaching fairly o'er the sward

One, loveliest, holding her white hand toward

The dazzling sunrise; two sisters sweet Bending their graceful figures till they meet

Over the trippings of a little child;

370 And some are hearing, eagerly, the wild Thrilling liquidity of dewy piping.

See, in another picture, nymphs are wiping (cherishingly Diana's timorous limbs;—

375 A fold of lawny mantle dabbling swims At the bath's edge, and keeps a gentle motion

With the subsiding crystal: as when ocean Heaves calmly its broad swelling smoothness o'er

Its rocky marge, and balances once more The patient weeds; that now unshent by foam

380 Feel all about their undulating home.

Sappho's meek head was there half smiling down

At nothing; just as though the earnest
frown

(Of over-thinking had that moment gone
From off her brow, and left her all alone.

385 Great Alfred's too, with anxious, pitying eyes,

As if he always listened to the sighs
Of the goaded world; and Kosciuszko's worn

By horrid sufferance—mightily forlorn

390 Starts at the sight of Laura; nor can wean His eyes from her sweet face. Most happy they!

For over them was seen a free display Of outspread wings, and from between them shone

The face of Poesy: from off her throne 395 She overlook'd things that I scarce could tell.

The very sense of where I was might well Keep Sleep aloof: but more than that there came

Thought after thought to nourish up the flame

Within my breast; so that the morning
light

And up I rose refresh'd, and glad, and gay, Resolving to begin that very day
These lines, and howsoever they be done,
I leave them as a father does his son.

ADDRESSED TO BENJAMIN ROBERT HAYDON

1816 1817

Great spirits now on earth are sojourning;
He of the cloud, the cataract, the lake,¹ Who on Helvellyn's summit, wide awake, Catches his freshness from Archangel's wing.

5 He of the rose, the violet, the spring,²
The social smile, the chain for Freedom's sake.

And lo!—whose steadfastness would never take

A meaner sound than Raphael's whispering.³

10 And other spirits there are standing apart Upon the forehead of the age to come;
These, these will give the world another
heart,

And other pulses Hear ye not the hum
Of mighty workings in the human mart?
Listen awhile ye nations, and be dumb

TO G. A. W⁴
1816 1817

Nymph of the downward smile and side-long glance,

In what diviner moments of the day Art thou most lovely?—when gone far astray

Into the labyrinths of sweet utterance,

5 Or when serenely wand'ring in a trance

⁴ Georgiana Augusta Wylie, afterward the wife of Keats's brother George.

Of sober thought?—or when starting away
With careless robe to meet the morning ray Thou spar'st the flowers in thy mazy dance?

Haply 'tis when thy ruby lips part sweetly, 10 And so remain, because thou listenest But thou to please wert nurtured so completely

That I can never tell what mood is best I shall as soon pronounce which Grace more neatly

Trips it before Apollo than the rest.

In a drear-nighted December,
Too happy, happy tree,
Thy branches ne'er remember Their green felicity.

5 The north cannot undo them,
With a sleety whistle through them, Nor frozen thawings glue them From budding at the prime.

In a drear-nighted December, 10 Too happy, happy brook, Thy bubbleings ne'er remember Apollo's summer look;
But with a sweet forgetting,
They stay their crystal fretting, 15 Never, never petting¹
About the frozen time.

Ah! would 'twere so with many A gentle girl and boy!
But were there ever any 20 Writh'd not at passed joy?
To know the change and feel it,
When there is none to heal it,
Nor numbed sense to steel it,
Was never said in rhyme.

HAPPY IS ENGLAND 1817

Happy is England! I could be content
To see no other verdure than its own,
To feel no other breezes than are blown Through its tall woods with high romances blent:

5 Yet do I sometimes feel a languishment
For skies Italian, and an inward groan
To sit upon an Alp as on a throne, And half forget what world or worldling meant

Happy is England, sweet her artless daughters;

10 Enough their simple loveliness for me,

¹ complaining

Enough their whitest arms in silence clinging:

Yet do I often warmly burn to see Beauties of deeper glance, and hear their singing,
And float with them about the summer waters.

ON THE GRASSHOPPER AND CRICKET
1816 1817

The poetry of earth is never dead:
When all the birds are faint with the hot
sun,

And hide in cooling trees, a voice will run From hedge to hedge about the new-mown mead,

5 That is the Grasshopper's—he takes the lead

In summer luxury.—he has never done With his delights; for when tired out with fun

He rests at ease beneath some pleasant weed

The poetry of earth is ceasing never:

10 On a lone winter evening, when the frost Has wrought a silence, from the stove there shrills

The Cricket's song, in warmth increasing ever,

And seems to one, in drowsiness half lost,
The Grasshopper's among some grassy hills

AFTER DARK VAPORS HAVE OPPRESS'D OUR PLAINS
1817 1817

After dark vapors have oppress'd our
plains

For a long dreary season, comes a day
Born of the gentle South, and clears away From the sick heavens all unseemly stains.

5 The anxious month, relieved of its pains, Takes as a long-lost right the feel of May;
The eyelids with the passing coolness
play

Like rose leaves with the drip of summer rains

The calmest thoughts come round us, as of leaves

10 Budding—fruit ripening in stillness—autumn
suns

Smiling at eve upon the quiet sheaves—Sweet Sappho's cheek—a smiling infant's
breath—

The gradual sand that through an hourglass runs—

A woodland rivulet—a Poet's death.

WRITTEN ON THE BLANK SPACE AT THE END OF CHAUCER'S TALE OF
"THE FLOURE AND THE LEFE"¹ 1817 1817

This pleasant tale is like a little copse:
The honied lines do freshly interlace
To keep the reader in so sweet a place, So that he here and there full-hearted
stops,

5 And oftentimes he feels the dewy drops Come cool and suddenly against his face,
And by the wandering melody may trace Which way the tender-legged linnet hops Oh! what a power has white simplicity!

10 What mighty power has this gentle story!
I that forever feel athirst for glory Could at this moment be content to lie Meekly upon the grass, as those whose sobbings

Were heard of none beside the mournful robins.

1829

Come hither, all sweet maidens, soberly.
Down-looking aye, and with a chasten'd
light

Hide in the fringes of your eyelids white,
And meekly let your fair hands joined be,

5 As if so gentle that ye could not see,
Untouch'd, a victim of your beauty bright.
Sinking away to his young spirit's night,— Sinking bewilder'd 'mid the dreary sea
'Tis young Leander toiling to his death.

10 Nigh swooning, he doth purse his weary
lips

For Hero's cheek, and smiles against her smile

O horrid dream! see how his body dips Dead-heavy; arms and shoulders gleam awhile.

He's gone up bubbles all his amorous
breath!

TO LEIGH HUNT, ESQ.
1817 1817

Glory and loveliness have pass'd away;
For if we wander out in early morn,
No wreathed incense do we see upborne Into the east, to meet the smiling day

5 No crowd of nymphs soft-voic'd, and young, and gay,

In woven baskets bringing ears of corn,² Roses, and pinks, and violets, to adorn
The shrine of Flora in her early May But there are left delights as high as these.

10 And I shall ever bless my destiny,
That in a time, when under pleasant trees

ON SEEING THE ELGIN MARBLES²
1817 1817

My spirit is too weak—mortality Weighs heavily on me like unwilling sleep,
And each imagin'd pinnacle and steep
Of godlike hardship, tells me I must die 5 Like a sick eagle looking at the sky.
Yet 'tis a gentle luxury to weep That I have not the cloudy winds to keep, Fresh for the opening of the morning's
eye
Such dim-conceiv'd glories of the brain 10 Bring round the heart an undescribable feud,
So do these wonders a most dizzy pain, That mingles Grecian grandeur with the rude Wasting of old Time—with a billowy
man—
A sun—a shadow of a magnitude

ON THE SEA
1817 1848

It keeps eternal whisperings around Desolate shores, and with its mighty swell Gluts twice ten thousand caverns, till the spell
Of Hecate leaves them their old shadowy
sound
5 Often 'tis in such gentle temper found,
That scarcely will the very smallest shell Be mov'd for days from where it sometime fell,
When last the winds of heaven were un-
bound.
Oh ye! who have your eye-balls ver'd and tir'd,
10 Feast them upon the wideness of the sea, Oh ye! whose ears are dinn'd with uproar
rude,
Or fed too much with cloying melody—Sit ye near some old cavern's mouth, and brood
Until ye start, as if the sea-nymphs quir'd!

- Fair-plumed Syren, Queen of far-away!
 Leave melodizing on this wintry day,
 Shut up thine olden pages, and be mute:

 Frozen North, and chilling East, Sounded tempests to the feast Of the forest's whispering fleeces, 10 Since men knew nor rent nor leases.

- No, the bugle sounds no more,
 And the twanging bow no more,

 Gone, the song of Gamelyn;

 Once again her forest days,
 She would weep, and he would craze:

TO THE NILE
 1818 1848

Son of the old moon-mountains African!
 Chief of the Pyramid and Crocodile!
 We call thee fruitful, and, that very while,
 A desert fills our seeing's inward span, 5 Nurse of swart nations⁴ since the world began,
 Art thou so fruitful? or dost thou beguile Such men to honor thee, who, worn with
 toil,
 Rest for a space 'twixt Cairo and Decan?
 O may dark fancies err! They surely do;
 10 'Tis ignorance that makes a barren waste Of all beyond itself, thou dost bedew Green rushes like our rivers, and dost taste
 The pleasant sun-rise. Green isles hast thou too,
 And to the sea as happily dost haste.

TO SPENSER
 1818 1848

Spenser! a jealous honoror of thine,
 A forer deep in thy midmost trees,
 Did last eve ask my promise to refine Some English that might strive thine ear to please.

THE HUMAN SEASONS
 1818 1819

Four seasons fill the measure of the year;
 There are four seasons in the mind of
 man;

He has his lusty spring, when fancy clear Takes in all beauty with an easy span:
 5 He has his summer, when luxuriously Spring's honied eud of youthful thought he loves

To ruminate, and by such dreading high Is nearest unto heaven: quiet coves
 His soul has in its autumn, when his wings 10 He furl eth close; contented so to look On mists in idleness—to let fair things Pass by unheeded as a threshold brook.
 He has his winter too of pale misfeature,
 Or else he would forego his mortal nature.

ENDYMION
 1817-18 1818

BOOK I

A thing of beauty is a joy forever:
 Its loveliness increases; it will never Pass into nothingness, but still will keep A bower quiet for us, and a sleep 5 Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing

Therefore, on every morrow, are we wreathing
 A flowery band to bind us to the earth, Spite of despondence, of the mhuman dearth

Of noble natures, of the gloomy days, 10 Of all the unhealthy and o'er-darkened ways

Made for our searching: yes, in spite of
 all,
 Some shape of beauty moves away the pall From our dark spirits: Such the sun, the
 moon,
 Trees old, and young, sprouting a shady boon

15 For simple sheep; and such are daffodils With the green world they live in, and clear rills

That for themselves a cooling covert make

- 'Gainst the hot season; the mid-forest brake,¹
Rich with a sprinkling of fair musk-rose
blooms:
- 20 And such too is the grandeur of the dooms²
We have imagined for the mighty dead,
All lovely tales that we have heard or read:
An endless fountain of immortal drink, Pouring unto us from the heaven's brink.
- 25 Nor do we merely feel these essences For one short hour, no, even as the trees That whisper round a temple become soon
Dear as the temple's self, so does the moon,
The passion Poesy, glories infinite, 30 Haunt us till they become a cheering light Unto our souls, and bound to us so fast, That, whether there be shine, or gloom o'ercast,
They always must be with us, or we die.
- Therefore, 'tis with full happiness that I
- 35 Will trace the story of Endymion
The very music of the name has gone Into my being, and each pleasant scene Is growing fresh before me as the green
Of our own valleys: so I will begin
- 40 Now while I cannot hear the city's din; Now while the early budders are just new,
And run in mazes of the youngest hue About old forests, while the willow trails Its delicate amber, and the dairy pails
- 45 Bring home increase of milk And, as the
year
Grows lush in juicy stalks, I'll smoothly
steer
My little boat, for many quiet hours, With streams that deepen freshly into
bowers
Many and many a verse I hope to write,
- 50 Before the daisies, vermeil rim'd and
white,
Hide in deep herbage; and ere yet the bees Hum about globes of clover and sweet peas,
I must be near the middle of my story
O may no wintry season, bare and hoar, 55 See it half finish'd: but let Autumn bold, With universal tinge of sober gold,
Be all about me when I make an end.
And now at once, adventuresome, I send My herald thought into a wilderness:
- 60 There let its trumpet blow, and quickly dress
My uncertain path with green, that I may speed
Easily onward, thorough flowers and weed.
- 1 thicket 2 destinies
- Upon the sides of Latmos was outspread
A mighty forest; for the moist earth fed 65 So plenteously all weed-laden roots Into o'er-hanging boughs, and precious fruits.
And it had gloomy shades, sequestered
deep,
Where no man went, and if from shepherd's keep A lamb stray'd far a-down those inmost glens, 70 Never again saw he the happy pens Whither his brethren, bleating with content,
Over the hills at every nightfall went.
Among the shepherds, 'twas believed ever,
That not one fleecy lamb which thus did sever
75 From the white flock, but pass'd un-worried
By angry wolf, or pard¹ with prying head, Until it came to some unfooted plains Where fed the herds of Pan: aye great his gains
Who thus one lamb did lose. Paths there were many,
80 Winding through palmy fern, and rushes fenny,
And ivy banks; all leading pleasantly
To a wide lawn, whence one could only see Stems thronging all around between the swell
Of turf and slanting branches who could tell 85 The freshness of the space of heaven
above,
Edg'd round with dark tree tops, through which a dove
Would often beat its wings, and often too
A little cloud would move across the blue!
- Full in the middle of this pleasantness
- 90 There stood a marble altar, with a tress
Of flowers budded newly; and the dew Had taken fairy phantasies to strew Daisies upon the sacred sward last eve,
And so the dawned light in pomp receive.
- 95 For 'twas the morn: Apollo's upward fire
Made every eastern cloud a silvery pyre
Of brightness so unsullied, that therein
A melancholy spirit well might win
Oblivion, and melt out his essence fine
- 100 Into the winds: rain-scented eglantine Gave temperate sweets to that well-wooing
sun;
The lark was lost in him; cold springs had run
To warm their chilliest bubbles in the grass;
1 leopard

Man's voice was on the mountains; and the mass
 105 Of nature's lives and wonders puls'd tenfold,
 To feel this sunrise and its glories old.

Now while the silent workings of the dawn
 Were busiest, into that self-same lawn
 All suddenly, with joyful cries, there sped 110 A troop of little children garlanded, Who gathering round the altar, seem'd to pry Earnestly round as wishing to espy
 Some folk of holiday. nor had they waited For many moments, ere their ears were sated
 115 With a faint breath of music, which ev'n
 then Fill'd out its voice, and died away again Within a little space again it gave Its airy swellings, with a gentle wave, To light-hung leaves, in smoothest echoes breaking 120 Through copse-clad valleys,—ere their death, o'er-taking
 The surgy murmurs of the lonely sea

And now, as deep into the wood as we Might mark a lynx's eye, there glimmer'd
 light
 Fair faces and a rush of garments white.
 125 Plainer and plainer showing, till at last Into the widest alley they all past, Making directly for the woodland altar O kindly muse! let not my weak tongue fault
 In telling of this goodly company, 130 Of their old piety, and of their glee But let a portion of ethereal dew Fall on my head, and presently unnew¹
 My soul, that I may dare, in wayfaring, To stammer where old Chaucer us'd to sing

135 Leading the way, young damsels danced along,
 Bearing the burden of a shepherd song;
 Each having a white wicker overbrim'd With April's tender younglings: next well trimm'd,
 A crowd of shepherds with as sunburnt

140 As may be read of in Arcadian books;
 Such as sat listening round Apollo's pipe,
 When the great deity, for earth too ripe, Let his divinity o'erflowing die

In music, through the vales of Thessaly.¹ 145 Some idly trail'd their sheep-hooks on the
 ground,
 And some kept up a shrilly mellow sound With ebon-tipped flutes: close after these,
 Now coming from beneath the forest trees,
 A venerable priest full soberly.
 150 Begirt with minist'ring looks: always his eye
 Steadfast upon the matted turf he kept,
 And after him his sacred vestments swept From his right hand theré swung a vase, milk-white,
 Of mingled wine, out-sparkling generous
 light,
 155 And in his left he held a basket full Of all sweet herbs that searching eye could cull
 Wild thyme, and valley-lilies whiter still Than Leda's love,² and cresses from the

 His aged head, crowned with beechen wreath, 160 Seem'd like a poll³ of ivy in the teeth Of winter hoar. Then came another crowd Of shepherds, lifting in due time aloud Their share of the ditty. After them appear'd,
 Up-follow'd by a multitude that rear'd 165 Their voices to the clouds, a fair wrought car,
 Easily rolling so as scarce to mar
 The freedom of three steeds of dapple brown:
 Who stood therein did seem of great renown Among the throng. His youth was fully blown,
 170 Showing like Ganymede to manhood
 grown,
 And, for those simple times, his garments were
 A chieftain king's beneath his breast, half bare,
 Was hung a silver bugle, and between His nervy knees there lay a boar-spear
 keen.
 175 A smile was on his countenance, he seem'd,
 To common lookers-on, like one who dream'd
 Of idleness in groves Elysian

Of happy changes in emphatic dreams, 415 Along a path between two little streams,— Guarding his forehead, with her round

From stumbling over stumps and hillocks small,
Until they came to where these streamlets
fall, 420 With mingled babbings and a gentle rush, Into a river, clear, brimful, and flush With crystal mocking of the trees and sky
A little shallop, floating there hard by, Pointed its beak over the fringed bank, 425 And soon it lightly dipt, and rose, and sank,
And dipt again, with the young couple's weight,— Peona guiding, through the water straight, Towards a bowery island opposite,
Which gaining presently, she steered light 430 Into a shady, fresh, and ripply cove, Where nested was an arbor, overwove
By many a summer's silent fingering,

Tell me thine ailment tell me all amiss!"— 520 Ah! thou hast been unhappy at the change Wrought suddenly in me What indeed more strange?

Or more complete to overwhelm surprise?
Ambition is so sluggish 'tis no prize,
That toiling years would put within my

No man e'er panted for a mortal love
So all have set my heavier grief above These things which happen. Rightly have they done

I, who still saw the horizontal sun 530 Heave his broad shoulder o'er the edge of the world,

Out-facing Lucifer, and then had hurl'd
My spear aloft, as signal for the chase—
I, who for very sport of heart, would race 535 With my own steed from Araby; pluck
down

A vulture from his towery perching,
frown

A lion into growling, loth retire—
To lose, at once, all my toil-bredning fire, And sink thus low! but I will ease my
breast

Of secret grief, here in this bowery nest

540 "This river does not see the naked sky, Till it begin to progress silvery Around the western border of the wood, Whence, from a certain spot, its winding flood

Seems at the distance like a crescent moon 545 And in that nook, the very pride of June, Had I been used to pass my weary eyes,
The rather for the sun unwilling leaves
So dear a picture of his sovereign power,
And I could witness his most kingly hour, 550 When he doth tighten up the golden reins,
And paces leisurely down amber plains

His snorting four. Now when his chariot
last

Its beam against the zodiac-lion cast,¹ There blossom'd suddenly a magic bed 555 Of sacred dittany,² and poppies red At which I wondered greatly, knowing well That but one night had wrought this flowery spell,

And, sitting down close by, began to muse
What it might mean. Perhaps, thought I, Morpheus,

560 In passing here, his owlet pinions shook;
Or, it may be, ere matron Night uptook
Her ebullient, young Mercury, by stealth, Had dipt his rod in it such garland wealth

Came not by common growth. Thus on I
thought,

565 Until my head was dizzy and distraught Moreover, through the dancing poppies
stole

A breeze, most softly lulling to my soul,
And shaping visions all about my sight Of colors, wings, and bursts of spangly
light,

570 The which became more strange, and strange, and dim,

And then were gulf'd in a tumultuous swim

And then I fell asleep Ah, can I tell
The enchantment that afterwards befell?
Yet it was but a dream yet such a dream 575 That never tongue, although it overteem With mellow utterance, like a cavern
spring,

Could figure out and to conception bring All I beheld and felt Methought I lay Watching the zenith, where the milky way 580 Among the stars in virgin splendor pours;
And travelling my eye, until the doors Of heaven appear'd to open for my sight,
I became loth and fearful to alight From such high soaring by a downward
glance

585 So kept me steadfast in that airy trance, Spreading imaginary pinions wide
When, presently, the stars began to glide,
And faint away, before my eager view

At which I sigh'd that I could not pursue, 590 And dropt my vision to the horizon's
verge;

And lo! from opening clouds, I saw emerge
The loveliest moon, that ever silver'd o'er A shell for Neptune's goblet she did soar
So passionately bright, my dazzled soul

 All its more ponderous and bulky worth Is friendship, whence there ever issues
 forth 805 A steady splendor, but at the tip-top, There hangs by unseen film, an orb'd drop Of light, and that is love: its influence, Thrown in our eyes, genders a novel sense,
 At which we start and fret, till in the end, 810 Melting into its radiance, we blend, Mingle, and so become a part of it,— Nor with aught else can our souls interknit
 So wingedly: when we combine therewith, Life's self is nourish'd by its proper pith, 815 And we are nurtured like a pelican brood Aye, so delicious is the unsating food, That men, who might have tower'd in the Left by men-slugs and human serpentry,

 Have been content to let occasion die,
 Whilst they did sleep in love's Elysium
 And, truly, I would rather be struck dumb,

825 Than speak against this ardent listless-
ness:

For I have ever thought that it might bless
The world with benefits unknowingly,
As does the nightingale, upperched high,
And cloister'd among cool and bunched
leaves—

830 She sings but to her love, nor e'er conceives

How tiptoe Night holds back her dark-gray hood.

Just so may love, although 'tis understood The mere commingling of passionate
breath,

Produce more than our searching witnesseth:

835 What I know not: but who, of men, can tell

That flowers would bloom, or that green fruit would swell

To melting pulp, that fish would have bright mail,

The earth its dower of river, wood, and
vale,

The meadows runnels, runnels pebble-stones,

840 The seed its harvest, or the lute its tones, Tones ravishment, or ravishment its sweet,
If human souls did never kiss and greet.

“Now, if this earthly love has power to make

Men's being mortal, immortal; to shake

845 Ambition from their memories, and brim Their measure of content. what merest whim,

Seems all this poor endeavor after fame.

To one, who keeps within his steadfast aim
A love immortal, an immortal too.

850 Look not so wilder'd; for these things are true,

And never can be born of atomies

That buzz about our slumbers, like brain-
flies,

Leaving us fancy-sick. No, no, I'm sure,

My restless spirit never could endure

855 To brood so long upon one luxury, Unless it did, though fearfully, espy

A hope beyond the shadow of a dream.

My sayings will the less obscured seem,
When I have told thee how my waking

sight

860 Has made me scruple whether that same
night

Was pass'd in dreaming. Harken, sweet Peona!

Beyond the matron-temple of Latona, Which we should see but for these darkening boughs,

Lies a deep hollow, from whose ragged
brows

865 Bushes and trees do lean all round athwart And meet so nearly, that with wings outraught,¹

And spreaded tail, a vulture could not glide Past them, but he must brush on every side.

Some moulder'd steps lead into this cool cell,

870 Far as the slabbed margin of a well, Whose patient level peeps its crystal eye Right upward, through the bushes, to the
sky.

Oft have I brought thee flowers, on their stalks set

Like vestal pinnoses, but dark velvet

875 Edges them round, and they have golden pits

'Twas there I got them, from the gaps and slits

In a mossy stone, that sometimes was my seat,

When all above was faint with mid-day heat.

And there in strife no burning thoughts to heed,

880 I'd bubble up the water through a reed, So reaching back to boyhood make me
ships

Of moulted feathers, touchwood,² alder chips,

With leaves stuck in them, and the Neptune be

Of their pretty ocean. Oftener, heavily,

885 When lovelorn hours had left me less a child,

I sat contemplating the figures wild

Of o'er-head clouds melting the mirror
through.

Upon a day, while thus I watch'd, by flew
A cloudy Cupid, with his bow and quiver, 890 So plainly character'd, no breeze would shiver

The happy chance: so happy, I was fain

To follow it upon the open plain,

And, therefore, was just going, when, behold!

A wonder, fair as any I have told—895 The same bright face I tasted in my

sleep,

Smiling in the clear well. My heart did leap

Through the cool depth.—It moved as if to flee—

I started up, when lo! refreshfully,

There came upon my face, in plenteous
showers,

 915 And a whole age of lingering moments crept Sluggishly by, ere more contentment swept Away at once the deadly yellow spleen Yes, thrice have I this fair enchantment

 920 When last the wintry gusts gave over strife With the conquering sun of spring, and left the skies
 Warm and serene, but yet with moisten'd

 In pity of the shatter'd infant buds,— That time thou didst adorn, with amber studs, 925 My hunting cap, because I laugh'd and smil'd,
 Chatted with thee, and many days exil'd All torment from my breast,—'twas even
 then,
 Striving about, yet, coop'd up in the den
 Of helpless discontent,—hurling my lance 930 From place to place, and following at chance,
 At last, by hap, through some young trees it struck,
 And, plashing among bedded pebbles stuck
 In the middle of a brook,—whose silver ramble Down twenty little falls, through reeds and bramble, 935 Tracing¹ along, it brought me to a cave, 1 wandering
- Whence it ran brightly forth, and white did lave
 The nether sides of mossy stones and rock,—
 'Mong which it gurgled blythe adieus, to mock
 Its own sweet grief at parting. Overhead, 940 Hung a lush screen of drooping weeds, and spread Thick, as to curtain up some woodnymph's home
 "Ah! impious mortal, whither do I roam?"
 Said I, low-voic'd. "Ah, whither! 'Tis the grot (Of Proserpine, when Hell, obscure and hot, Doth her resign, and where her tender
 hands
 She dabbles, on the cool and slucy sands:
 Or 'tis the cell of Echo, where she sits,
 And dabbles thorough silence, till her wits
 Are gone in tender madness, and anon, 950 Faints into sleep, with many a dying tone Of sadness O that she would take my vows,
 And breathe them sighingly among the
 boughs,
 To sue her gentle ears for whose fair head, Daily, I pluck sweet flowerets from their
 bed, 955 And weave them dyngly—send honeywhispers
 Round every leaf, that all those gentle lipsers
 May sigh my love unto her pitying!
 O charitable Echo! hear, and sing
 This ditty to her!—tell her!"—So I stay'd 960 My foolish tongue, and listening, half-afraid,
 Stood stupefied with my own empty folly And blushing for the freaks of melancholy Salt tears were coming, when I heard my name
 Most fondly hupp'd, and then these accents
 came 965 "Endymion! the cave is secreter
 Than the isle of Delos Echo hence shall stir No sighs but sigh-warm kisses, or light noise
 Of thy combing hand, the while it travelling cloy
 And trembles through my labyrinthine
 hair."
 970 At that oppress'd I hurried in.—Ah!
 where Are those swift moments? Whither are they fled?
 I'll smile no more, Peona; nor will wed

Sorrow the way to death; but patiently Bear up against it: so farewell, sad sigh; 775 And come instead demurest meditation,
 To occupy me wholly, and to fashion My pilgrimage for the world's dusky brink.

No more will I count over, link by link, My chain of grief: no longer strive to find 980 A half-forgetfulness in mountain wind Blustering about my ears: aye, thou shalt
 see,

Dearest of sisters, what my life shall be;
 What a calm round of hours shall make my days

There is a paly flame of hope that plays 985 Where'er I look: but yet, I'll say 'tis naught—

And here I bid it die Have not I caught, Already, a more healthy countenance?
 By this the sun is setting; we may chance Meet some of our near-dwellers with my car "

990 This said, he rose, faint-smiling like a star
 Through autumn mists, and took Peona's
 hand
 They stepped into the boat, and launch'd from land

And, downward, suddenly began to dip,
As if, athirst with so much toil, 'twould sip
The crystal spout-head: so it did, with touch
- 90 Most delicate, as though afraid to smutch
Even with mealy gold the waters clear.
But, at that very touch, to disappear
So fairy-quick, was strange! Bewildered, Endymion sought around, and shook each
bed
- 95 Of covert flowers in vain; and then he flung Himself along the grass. What gentle
tongue,
What whisperer, disturb'd his gloomy
rest?
pitched
- It was a nymph uprisen to the breast In the fountain's pebbly margin, and she stood
- 100 'Mong likes, like the youngest of the brood
To him her dripping hand she softly kist,
And anxiously began to plait and twist Her ringlets round her fingers, saying
"Youth!
Too long, alas, hast thou starv'd on the ruth,
- 105 The bitterness of love too long indeed, Seeing thou art so gentle Could I weed Thy soul of care, by heavens, I would offer
All the bright riches of my crystal coffer
To Amphitrite; all my clear-eyed fish, 110 Golden, or rainbow-sided, or purplish, Vermilion-tail'd, or fin'd with silvery gauze;
Yea, or my veined pebble-floor, that draws A virgin light to the deep, my grotto-sands Tawny and gold, ooz'd slowly from far lands
- 115 By my diligent springs; my level lilies,
shells,
My charming rod, my potent river spells:
Yes, everything, even to the pearly cup Meander gave me,—for I bubbled up To fainting creatures in a desert wild.
- 120 But woe is me, I am but as a child To gladden thee; and all I dare to say, Is, that I pity thee, that on this day I've been thy guide, that thou must wander far
- In other regions, past the scanty bar
- 125 To mortal steps, before thou canst be ta'en
From every wasting sigh, from every pain.
Into the gentle bosom of thy love
Why it is thus, one knows in heaven above
But, a poor Naiad, I guess not Farewell!
130 I have a ditty for my hollow cell."
- Hereat, she vanish'd from Endymion's
gaze,
Who brooded o'er the water in amaze:
The dashing fount pour'd on, and where its pool
Lay, half-asleep, in grass and rushes cool.
135 Quick waterflies and gnats were sporting
still,
And fish were dimpling, as if good nor ill Had fallen out that hour. The wanderer, Holding his forehead, to keep off the burr
Of smothering fancies, patiently sat down:
And, while beneath the evening's sleepy
frown Glowworms began to trim their starry
lamps,
Thus breath'd he to himself: "Whoso en-camps
To take a fancied city of delight,

- O what a wretch is he! and when 'tis his, 145 After long toil and travelling, to miss The kernel of his hopes, how more than vile:
 Yet, for him there's refreshment even in
 toil;
 Another city doth he set about, Free from the smallest pebble-bead of doubt 150 That he will seize on trickling honeycombs Alas, he finds them dry, and then he foams,
 And onward to another city speeds
 But this is human life the war, the deeds,
 The disappointment, the anxiety, 155 Imagination's struggles, far and nigh, All human; bearing in themselves this good,
 That they are still the air, the subtle food,
 To make us feel existence, and to show How quiet death is. Where soil is, men grow, 160 Whether to weeds or flowers, but for me,
 There is no depth to strike in I can see Naught earthly worth my compassing, so stand
 Upon a misty, jutting head of land—Alone? No, no; and by the Orphean lute, 165 When mad Eurydice is listening to 't, I'd rather stand upon this misty peak,
 With not a thing to sigh for, or to seek,
 But the soft shadow of my three-seen¹
 love,
 Than be—I care not what O meekest dove 170 Of heaven! O Cynthia, ten-times bright and fair!
 From thy blue throne, now filling all the
 air, Glance but one little beam of temper'd
 light
 Into my bosom, that the dreadful night
 And tyranny of love be somewhat scan'd!
 175 Yet do not so, sweet queen; one torment
 spare'd,
 Would give a pang to jealous misery, Worse than the torment's self: but rather tie
 Large wings upon my shoulders, and point
 out My love's far dwelling Though the playful rout 180 Of Cupids shun thee, too divine art thou, Too keen in beauty, for thy silver prow Not to have dipp'd in love's most gentle
 stream
 O be propitious, nor severely deem My madness impious, for, by all the stars 185 That tend thy bidding, I do think the bars That kept my spirit in are burst—that I Am sailing with thee through the dizzy
 sky!
 How beautiful thou art! The world how
 deep!
 How tremulous -dazzlingly the wheels
 sweep 190 Around them axle! Then these gleaming reins,
 How lithe! When thus thy chariot attains Its airy goal, haply some bower veils Those twilight eyes? Those eyes!—my spirit fails—
 Dear goddess, help! or the wide-gaping au-195 Will gulf me—help!—At this with mad-den'd stare,
 And lifted hands, and trembling lips, he
 stood;
 Like old Deucalion mountam'd o'er the flood,
 Or blind Orion hungry for the morn And, but from the deep cavern there was borne 200 A voice, he had been froze to senseless
 stone,
 Nor sigh of his, nor plaint, nor passion'd moan
 Had more been heard Thus swell'd it forth "Descend, Young mountaineer! descend where alleys bend
 Into the sparry¹ hollows of the world!
 205 Oft hast thou seen bolts of the thunder hurl'd
 As from thy threshold, day by day hast been
 A little lower than the chilly sheen Of ivy pinnacles, and dipp'dst thine arms
 Into the deadening ether that still charms 210 Then mable being now, as deep profound
 As those are high, descend! He ne'er is crown'd
 With immortality, who fears to follow Where airy voices lead so through the hollow,
 The silent mysteries of earth, descend!" 215 He heard but the last words, nor could contend
 One moment in reflection for he fled Into the fearful deep, to hide his head From the clear moon, the trees, and coming madness
 'Twas far too strange, and wonderful for sadness,

- To dive into the deepest. Dark, nor light, 265
 The region; nor bright, nor sombre wholly,
 But mingled up; a gleaming melancholy,
 A dusky empire and its diadems, 225 One faint eternal eventide of gems.
 Aye, millions sparkled on a vein of gold, Along whose track the prince quick footsteps told,
 With all its lines abrupt and angular Out-shooting sometimes, like a meteor-star, 230 Through a vast antie,¹ then the metal woof,
 Like Vulcan's rainbow, with some monstrous roof
 Curves hugely now, far in the deep abyss,
 It seems an angry lightning, and doth hiss Fancy into belief anon it leads 235 Through winding passages, where sameness breeds Vexing conceptions of some sudden
 change;
 Whether to silver grots, or giant range Of sapphire columns, or fantastic bridge Athwart a flood of crystal On a ridge 240 Now faeth he, that o'er the vast beneath Towers like an ocean-cliff, and whence he seeth
 A hundred water falls, whose voices come But as the murmuring surge Chilly and numb
 His bosom grew, when first he, far away 245 Deseried an orb'd diamond, set to stay² Old darkness from his throne 'twas like
 the sun
 Uprisen o'er chaos and with such a stun Came the amazement, that, absorb'd in it,
 He saw not fiercer wonders—past the wit 250 Of any spirit to tell, but one of those Who, when this planet's sphering time doth close,
 Will be its high remembrancers: who they?
 The mighty ones who have made eternal
 day
 For Greece and England While astonishment 255 With deep-drawn sighs was quieting, he went Into a marble gallery, passing through A mimic temple, so complete and true
 In sacred custom, that he well-nigh fear'd To search it inwards, whence far off ap-
 pear'd,
 260 Through a long pillar'd vista, a fair shine,
 And just beyond, on light tiptoe divine.
 A quiver'd Dian Stepping awfully,
 The youth approach'd, oft turning his

- And when, more near against the marble
 cold
 He had touch'd his forehead, he began to thread
 All courts and passages, where silence dead Rous'd by his whispering footsteps mur-mur'd faint:
 And long he travers'd to and fro, to acquaint 270 Himself with every mystery, and awe, Till, weary, he sat down before the maw
 Of a wide outlet, fathomless and dun, To wild uncertainty and shadows grim There, when new wonders ceas'd to float
 before, 275 And thoughts of self came on, how crude and sore
 The journey homeward to habitual self¹
 A mad-pursuing of the fog-born elf, Whose fitting lantern, through rude nettle-
 briar,
 Beats us into a swamp, into a fire, 280 Into the bosom of a hated thing
 What misery most drowningly doth sing In lone Endymion's ear, now he has caught¹
 The goal of consciousness? Ah, 'tis the
 thought,
 The deadly feel of solitude for lo!
 285 He cannot see the heavens, nor the flow Of rivers, nor hill-flowers running wild
 In pink and purple chequer, nor, up-pil'd, The cloudy rack slow journeying in the west,
 Like herded elephants, nor felt, nor prest 290 Cool grass, nor tasted the fresh slumberous
 air;
 But far from such companionship to wear
 An unknown tune, surcharg'd with grief,
 away,
 Was now his lot And must he patient stay, Tracing fantastic figures with his spear?
 295 "No!" exclaim'd he, "why should I tarry
 here?"
 No! loudly echoed times innumerable At which he straightway started, and 'gan
 tell
 His paces back into the temple's chief:
 Warning and glowing strong in the belief 300 Of help from Dian so that when again He caught her airy form, thus did he plain.²

- 305 Art thou now forested? O woodland Queen,
What smoothest air thy smother forehead woos?
Where dost thou listen to the wide halloos Of thy departed nymphs? Through what dark tree Glimmers thy crescent? Wheresoe'er it be, 310 'Tis in the breath of heaven: thou dost taste
Freedom as none can taste it, nor dost
waste
Thy loveliness in dismal elements; But, finding in our green earth sweet contents,
There livest blissfully Ah, if to thee 315 It feels Elysian, how rich to me, An exil'd mortal, sounds its pleasant
name!
Within my breast there lives a choking
flame—
O let me cool 't the zephyr-boughs among!
A homeward fever parches up my tongue—320 O let me slake it at the running springs!
Upon my ear a noisy nothing rings—
O let me once more hear the linnet's note!
Before mine eyes thick films and shadows float—
O let me 'noint them with the heaven's
light!
325 Dost thou now lave thy feet and ankles
white?
O think how sweet to me the freshening sluice!
Dost thou now please thy thirst with berry-juice?
O think how this dry palate would rejoice!
If in soft slumber thou dost hear my voice, 330 O think how I should love a bed of flowers!
Young goddess! let me see my native
bowers!
Deliver me from this rapacious deep!"
- Thus ending loudly, as he would o'erleap His destiny, alert he stood: but when 335 Obstinate silence came heavily again, Feeling about for its old couch of space
And airy cradle, lowly bow'd his face Desponding, o'er the marble floor's cold thrill.
But 'twas not long; for, sweeter than the
rill
340 To its old channel, or a swollen tide To margin shallows,¹ were the leaves he spied,
And flowers, and wreaths, and ready myrtle crowns
- Upheaping through the slab: refreshment drowns
Itself, and strives its own delights to hide—345 Nor in one spot alone; the floral pride In a long whispering birth enchanted grew Before his footsteps; as when heav'd anew Old ocean rolls a lengthen'd wave to the shore,
Down whose green back the short-liv'd foam, all hoar, 350 Bursts gradual, with a wayward indolence Increasing still in heart, and pleasant
sense,
Upon his fairy journey on he hastes,
So anxious for the end, he scarcely wastes One moment with his hand among the sweets:
355 Onward he goes—he stops—his bosom beats
As plainly in his ear, as the faint charm Of which the throbs were born This still alarm,
This sleepy music, forc'd him walk tiptoe For it came more softly than the east could blow
360 Arion's magic to the Atlantic isles, Or than the west, made jealous by the smiles
Of thron'd Apollo, could breathe back the lyre
To seas Ionian and Tyrian.
- O did he ever live, that lonely man, 365 Who lov'd—and music slew not? 'Tis the pest
Of love, that fairest joys give most unres-That things of delicate and tenderest worth Are swallow'd all, and made a sear'd
dearth,
By one consuming flame: it doth immerse 370 And suffocate true blessings in a curse Half-happy, by comparison of bliss, Is miserable. 'Twas even so with this Dew-dropping melody, in the Carian's ear;¹
First heaven, then hell, and then forgotten
clear,
375 Vanish'd in elemental passion
- And down some swart abyss he had
gone,
Had not a heavenly guide benignant led To where thick myrtle branches, 'gainst his
head
Brushing, awakened: then the sounds again 380 Went noiseless as a passing noontide rain

¹ willows¹ That is, in the ear of Endymion, who was said to reside in Caria, Asia Minor.

- Over a bower, where little space he stood,
 For as the sunset peeps into a wood So saw he panting light, and towards it went Through winding alleys; and lo, wonder-
 ment!
- 385 Upon soft verdure saw, one here, one there, Cupids a-slumbering on their pinions fair.¹
- After a thousand mazes overgone,
 At last, with sudden step, he came upon A chamber, myrtle wall'd, embower'd high, 390 Full of light, incense, tender minstrelsy,
 And more of beautiful and strange beside:
 For on a silken couch of rosy pride,
 In midst of all, there lay a sleeping youth Of fondest beauty; fonder, in fair sooth, 395 Than sighs could fathom, or contentment
 reach:
 And coverlids gold-tinted like the peach,
 Or ripe October's faded marigolds, Fell sleek about him in a thousand folds—400 Not hiding up an Apollonian curve Of neck and shoulder, nor the tenting swerve²
 Of knee from knee, nor ankles pointing
 light;
 But rather, giving them to the fill'd sight Officiously. Sideway his face repos'd On one white arm, and tenderly unclos'd, 405 By tenderest pressure, a faint damask mouth
 To slumbry pout; just as the morning south Disparts a dew-lipp'd rose. Above his
 head,
 Four lily stalks did their white honors wed
 To make a coronal; and round him grew 410 All tendrils green, of every bloom and hue, Together intertwin'd and trammel'd fresh.
 The vine of glossy sprout; the ivy mesh,
 Shading its Ethiop berries; and woodbine,
 Of velvet-leaves and bugle-blooms divine; 415 Convolvulus in streaked vases flush;
 The creeper, mellowing for an autumn blush;
 And virgin's bower, trailing airily;
 With others of the sisterhood. Hard by.
 Stood serene Cupids watching silently.
 420 One, kneeling to a lyre, touch'd the strings, Muffling to death the pathos with his
 wings;
 And, ever and anon, uprose to look At the youth's slumber; while another took A willow-bough, distilling odorous dew, 425 And shook it on his hair; another flew
- In through the woven roof, and flutteringwise Rain'd violets upon his sleeping eyes.
- At these enchantments, and yet many
 more,
 The breathless Latman¹ wonder'd o'er and o'er, 430 Until, impatient in embarrassment, He forthright pass'd, and lightly treading
 went
 To that same feather'd lyrist, who straight-
 way, Smiling, thus whisper'd: "Though from upper day Thou art a wanderer, and thy presence
 here
 435 Might seem unholy, be of happy cheer!
 For 'tis the nicest touch of human honor, When some ethereal and high-favoring donor
 Presents immortal bowers to mortal sense;
 As now 'tis done to thee, Endymion. Hence 440 Was I in no wise startled. So recline Upon these living flowers. Here is wine, Alive with sparkles—never, I aver, Since Ariadne was a vintager,
 So cool a purple taste these juicy pears, 445 Sent me by sad Vertumnus, when his fears Were high about Pomona: here is cream, Deepening to richness from a snowy
 gleam;
 Sweeter than that nurse Amalthea skimm'd
 For the boy Jupiter: and here, undimm'd 450 By any touch, a bunch of blooming plums Ready to melt between an infant's gums.
 And here is manna pick'd from Syrian
 trees,
 In starlight, by the three Hesperides Feast on, and meanwhile I will let thee
 know 455 Of all these things around us." He did so.
 Still brooding o'er the cadence of his lyre.
 And thus: "I need not any hearing tire
 By telling how the sea-born goddess pin'd For a mortal youth,² and how she strove to bind 460 Him all in all unto her doting self.
 Who would not be so prison'd? but, fond
 elf,
 He was content to let her amorous plea Faint through his careless arms, content to see

² A reference to the story of Venus and Adonis. See Endymion, I, 626 (p. 775). Adonis was killed by a wild boar. As a result of Venus's grief the gods required Adonis to spend only a part of each year in Hades. See II 475-76.

¹ See Spenser's description of the garden of Adonis, in The Faerie Queene, III, 6, 44-47.

² Keats defines this as a swerve in the form of the top of a tent.

- An unseiz'd heaven dying at his feet; 465 Content, O fool! to make a cold retreat, When on the pleasant grass such love, lovelorn,
 Lay sorrowing; when every tear was born 500
 Of diverse passion; when her lips and eyes Were closed in sullen moisture, and quick sighs
 470 Came vex'd and pettish through her nostrils small.
 Hush! no exclaim—yet, justly mightst 505 thou call Curses upon his head—I was half glad, But my poor mistress went distract and
 mad,
 When the boar tusk'd him: so away she flew 475 To Jove's high throne, and by her plain-ings¹ drew Immortal tear-drops down the thunder-er's² beard;
 Whereon, it was decreed he should be rear'd
 Each summer time to life Lo! this is he,
 That same Adonis, safe in the privacy 480 Of this still region all his winter-sleep.
 Aye, sleep; for when our love-sick queen
 did weep
 Over his waned corse, the tremulous shower Heal'd up the wound, and, with a balmy
 power,
 Medicin'd death to a lengthen'd drowsi-
 ness:
 485 The which she fills with visions, and doth 520
 dress
 In all this quiet luxury, and hath set Us young immortals, without any let,³

 Look! how those winged listeners all this while Stand anxious—see! behold!—This clamant⁵ word 495 Broke through the careful silence; for 530 they heard A rustling noise of leaves, and out there flutter'd Pigeons and doves:⁶ Adonis something mutter'd
- The while one hand, that erst upon his thigh
 Lay dormant, mov'd convuls'd and gradually 500 Up to his forehead. Then there was a hum Of sudden voices, echoing, "Come! come!
 Arise! awake! Clear summer has forth walk'd Unto the clover-sward, and she has talk'd Full soothingly to every nested finch: 505 Rise, Cupids! or we'll give the blue-bell pinch
 To your dimpled arms.¹ Once more sweet life begin!"
 At this, from every side they hurried in,
 Rubbing their sleepy eyes with lazy wrists,
 And doubling over head their little fists 510 In backward yawns. But all were soon alive:
 For as delicious wine doth, sparkling, dive In nectar'd clouds and curls through water
 fair,
 So from the arbor roof down swell'd an
 air 515 Odorous and enlivening; making all To laugh, and play, and sing, and loudly
 call
 For their sweet queen when lo! the wreathed green Disparted, and far upward could be seen Blue heaven, and a silver car, air-borne, Whose silent wheels, fresh wet from clouds of morn, 520 Spun off a drizzling dew,—which falling chill
 On soft Adonis' shoulders, made him still Nestle and turn uneasily about.
 Soon were the white doves plain, with neck stretch'd out,
 And silken traces lighten'd in descent, 525 And soon, returning from love's banish-
 ment,
 Queen Venus leaning downward openarm'd:
 Her shadow fell upon his breast, and charm'd
 A tumult to his heart, and a new life Into his eyes Ah, miserable strife, 530 But for her comforting 'unhappy sight,

Cupids awake! or black and blue we'll pinch

O it has ruffled every spirit there, 535 Saving Love's self, who stands superb to share

The general gladness awfully he stands,
 A sovereign quell¹ is in his waving hands,
 No sight can bear the lightning of his bow,
 His quiver is mysterious, none can know

540 What themselves think of it, from forth his eyes

There darts strange light of varied hues and dyes

A scowl is sometimes on his brow, but who Look full upon it feel anon the blue
 Of his fan eyes run liquid through their souls

545 Endymion feels it, and no more controls
 The burning prayer within him, so, bent low,

He had begun a planning of his woe
 But Venus, bending forward, said "My child,

550 Favor this gentle youth, his days are wild With love—he—but alas! too well I see Thou know'st the deepness of his misery
 Ah, smile not so, my son: I tell thee true,
 That when through heavy hours I used to rue 555 The endless sleep of this new-born Adon', Thus stranger eye I pitied For upon A dreary morning once I fled away Into the breezy clouds, to weep and pray

 For this my love for vexing Mars had teas'd

Me even to tears thence, when a little eas'd,

560 Down-looking, vacant, through a hazy wood,

I saw this youth as he despatching stood Those same dark curls blown vagrant in the wind,

Those same full fringed lids a constant blind

565 Over his sullen eyes I saw him throw Himself on wither'd leaves, even as though Death had come sudden; for no jot he mov'd,

Yet mutter'd wildly I could hear he lov'd
 Some fair immortal, and that his embrace Had zon'd² her through the night There is no trace 570 Of this in heaven I have mark'd each cheek,

And find it is the vainest thing to seek,
 And that of all things 'tis kept secretest Endymion! one day thou wilt be blest
 So still obey the guiding hand that fends

575 Thee safely through these wonders for sweet ends

'Tis a concealment needful in extreme
 And if I guess'd not so, the sunny beam Thou shouldst mount up to with me. Now adieu!

Here must we leave thee"—At these words upflew

580 The impatient doves, uprose the floating ear,

Up went the hum celestial High afar
 The Latman saw them vanish into naught,
 And, when all were clear vanish'd, still he caught 585 A vivid lightning from that dreadful bow

 When all was darken'd, with Etnean throe
 The earth clos'd—gave a solitary moan—
 And left him once again in twilight lone

He did not rave, he did not stare aghast,
 For all those visions were o'ergone, and past,

590 And he in loneliness he felt assur'd
 Of happy tunes, when all he had endur'd Would seem a feather to the mighty prize
 So, with unusual gladness, on he hies Through caves, and palaces of mottled ore.

595 Gold dome, and crystal wall, and turquois floor,

Black polish'd porticos of awful shade,
 And, at the last, a diamond balustrade,
 Leading afar past wild magnificence, Spiral through ruggedest loopholes, and thence 600 Stretching across a void, then guiding o'er Enormous chasms, where, all foam and roar,

Streams subterranean tease their granite beds;

Then heighten'd just above the silvery heads

Of a thousand fountains, so that he could dash

605 The waters with his spear, but at the splash,

Done heedlessly, those spouting columns rose

Sudden a poplar's height, and 'gan to enclose

His diamond path with fretwork, streaming round

Alive, and dazzling cool, and with a sound,

610 Haply, like dolphin tumults, when sweet shells

Welcome the float of Thetis Long he dwells

On this delight; for, every minute's space,
 The streams with changed magic interlace.

 And then the water, into stubborn

 But he revives at once: for who beholds New sudden things, nor casts his mental

 In sombre chariot, dark foldings thrown About her majesty, and front death-pale, With turrets crown'd. Four maned lions

 away
 In another gloomy arch

Wherefore delay.

650 Young traveller, in such a mournful place?
 Art thou wayworn, or canst not further trace
 The diamond path? And does it indeed end Abrupt in middle air? Yet earthward bend
¹ forests

Thy forehead, and to Jupiter cloud-borne 655 Call ardently! He was indeed wayworn, Abrupt, in middle air, his way was lost,
 To cloud-borne Jove he bowed, and there crost Towards him a large eagle,¹ 'twixt whose
 wings,
 Without one impious word, himself he flings, 660 Committed to the darkness and the gloom Down, down, uncertain to what pleasant
 doom, Swift as a fathoming plummet down he fell Through unknown things; till exhaled asphodel.²
 And rose, with spicy fannings inter-breath'd, 665 Came swelling forth where little caves were wreath'd
 So thick with leaves and mosses, that they seem'd
 Large honey-combs of green, and freshly teem'd³
 With airs delicious In the greenest nook
 The eagle landed him, and farewell took

It was a jasmine bower, all bestrown With golden moss. His every sense had grown Ethereal for pleasure, 'bove his head Flew a delight half-graspable, his tread Was Hesperian, to his capable ears 675 Silence was music from the holy spheres.⁴
 A dewy luxury was in his eyes,
 The little flowers felt his pleasant sighs And stirr'd them faintly Verdant cave and cell
 He wander'd through, oft wondering at such swell 680 Of sudden exaltation: but, "Alas,"
 Said he, "will all this gush of feeling pass Away in solitude? And must they wane, Like melodies upon a sandy plain, Without an echo? Then shall I be left 685 So sad, so melancholy, so bereft!
 Yet still I feel immortal! O my love, My breath of life, where art thou? High
 above,
 Dancing before the morning gates of
 heaven?
 Or keeping watch among those stairways seven, 690 Old Atlas' children? Art a maid of the waters,

⁴ The ancients believed that the movement of the celestial spheres produced music

- One of shell-winding Triton's brighthair'd daughters?
 Or art, impossible! a nymph of Dian's, Weaving a coronal of tender scions For very idleness? Where'er thou art, 695 Methinks it now is at my will to start Into thine arms; to scare Aurora's train, And snatch thee from the morning; o'er the main
 To scud like a wild bird, and take thee off From thy sea-foamy cradle; or to doff 700 Thy shepherd vest, and woo thee 'mid fresh
 leaves
 No, no, too eagerly my soul deceives Its powerless self: I know this cannot be O let me then by some sweet dreaming flee
 To her entrancements: hither sleep awhile!
 705 Hither most gentle sleep! and soothing foil For some few hours the coming solitude "
- Thus spake he, and that moment felt endued
 With power to dream deliciously, so wound Through a dim passage, searching till he found 710 The smoothest mossy bed and deepest,
 where
 He threw himself, and just into the air Stretching his indolent arms, he took, O
 bliss!
 A naked waif "Fair Cupid, whence is
 this?"
 A well-known voice sigh'd, "Sweetest, here am I!"
 715 At which soft ravishment, with doting cry
 They trembled to each other—Helicon!
 O fountain'd hill! Old Homer's Helicon!
 That thou wouldst spout a little streamlet
 o'er These sorry pages, then the verse would soar
 720 And sung above this gentle pair, like lark Over his nested young: but all is dark Around thine aged top, and thy clear fount Exhales in mists to heaven. Aye, the count Of mighty Poets is made up; the scroll 725 Is folded by the Muses; the bright roll Is in Apollo's hand: our dazed eyes Have seen a new tinge in the western skies
 The world has done its duty. Yet, oh yet, Although the sun of Poesy is set, 730 These lovers did embrace, and we must weep
 That there is no old power left to steep
 A quill immortal in their joyous tears.
 Long time ere silence did their anxious fears
 Question that thus it was; long time they lay
- 735 Fondling and kissing every doubt away, Long time ere soft caressing sobs began To mellow into words, and then there ran Two bubbling springs of talk from their sweet lips
 "O known Unknown! from whom my being sips 740 Such darling essence, wherefore may I not Be ever in these arms? in this sweet spot Pillow my chin forever! ever press These toying hands and kiss their smooth excess!
 Why not forever and forever feel 745 That breath about my eyes? Ah, thou wilt steal
 Away from me again, indeed, indeed—Thou wilt be gone away, and wilt not heed My lonely madness. Speak, delicious fair!
 Is—it to be so? No! Who will dare 750 To pluck thee from me? And, of thine own will,
 Full well I feel thou wouldst not leave me
 Still
 Let me entwine thee surer, surer—now How can we part? Elysium who art thou?
 Who, that thou canst not be forever here, 755 Or lift me with thee to some starry sphere?
 Enchantress! tell me by this soft embrace,
 By the most soft completion of thy face, Those lips, O slippery blisses, twinkling
 eyes,
 And by these tenderest, milky sovereign-ties—760 These tenderest, and by the nectar-wine, The passion "———" "O dost thou vine!
 Endymion! dearest! Ah, unhappy me!
 His soul will 'scape us—O felicity!
 How he does love me! His poor temples beat 765 To the very tune of love—how sweet, sweet,
 sweet.
 Revive, dear youth, or I shall faint and die, Revive, or these soft hours will hurry by In tranced dulness; speak, and let that spell Affright this lethargy! I cannot quell 770 Its heavy pressure, and will press at least My lips to thine, that they may richly feast Until we taste the life of love again What! dost thou move? dost kiss? O bliss!
 O pain!
 I love thee, youth, more than I can conceive;
 775 And so long absence from thee doth bereave
 My soul of any rest: yet must I hence Yet, can I not to starry eminence ' perfection

- Uplift thee, nor for very shame can
 down Myself to thee. Ah, dearest, do not groan 780 Or thou wilt force me from this secrecy, And I must blush in heaven O that I Had done 't already; that the dreadful
 smiles
 At my lost brightness, my impassion'd
 wiles,
 Had waned from Olympus' solemn height, 785 And from all serious Gods; that our de-
 light
 Was quite forgotten, save of us alone!
 And wherefore so ashamed? 'Tis but to atone
 For endless pleasure, by some coward blushes
 Yet must I be a coward!—Honor rushes 790 Too palpable before me—the sad look Of Jove—Minerva's start—no bosom
 shook
 With awe of purity—no Cupid pinion In reverence veil'd—my crystalline dominion
 Half lost, and all old hymns made nullity!
 795 But what is this to love? O I could fly With thee into the ken of heavenly powers, So thou wouldst thus, for many sequent
 hours,
 Press me so sweetly Now I swear at once
 That I am wise, that Pallas is a dunce—800 Perhaps her love like mine is but unknown—
 O I do think that I have been alone
 In chastity: yes, Pallas has been sighing, While every eve saw me my hair upturning With fingers cool as aspen leaves. Sweet
 love, 805 I was as vague as solitary dove, Nor knew that nests were built Now a soft kiss—
 Ave, by that kiss, I vow an endless bliss,
 An immortality of passion's thine:
 Ere long I will exalt thee to the shine 810 Of heaven ambrosial, and we will shade Ourselves whole summers by a river glade;
 And I will tell thee stories of the sky,
 And breathe thee whispers of its minstrels
 My happy love will overwing all bounds!
 815 O let me melt into thee; let the sounds Of our close voices marry at their birth;
 Let us entwine hoveringly—O dearth Of human words! roughness of mortal speech!
 Laspings empyrean will I sometime teach 820 Thine honied tongue—lute-breathings, which I gasp
 To have thee understand, now while I clasp
- Thee thus, and weep for fondness—I am pain'd,
 Endymion: woe! woe! is grief contain'd In the ver' depths of pleasure, my sole
 life?"—
 825 Hereat, with many sobs, her gentle strife Melted into a languor He return'd Entranced vows and tears.
- Ye who have yearn'd With too much passion, will here stay and pity,
 For the mere sake of truth; as 'tis a ditty 830 Not of these days, but long ago 'twas told By a cavern wind unto a forest old,¹
 And then the forest told it in a dream To a sleeping lake, whose cool and level
 gleam
 A poet caught as he was journeying 835 To Phœbus' shrine and in it he did fling His weary limbs, bathing an hour's space
 And after, straight in that inspired place
 He sang the story up into the air, Giving it universal freedom There 840 Has it been ever sounding for those ears Whose tips are glowing hot The legend cheers
 Yon sentinel stars; and he who listens to it Must surely be self-doom'd or he will rue
 it
 For quenchless burnings come upon the
 heart,
 845 Made fiercer by a fear lest any part Should be engulfed in the eddying wind
 As much as here is penn'd doth always find A resting-place, thus much comes clear and plain,
 Anon the strange voice is upon the wane—850 And 'tis but echo'd from departing sound, That the fair visitant at last unwound Her gentle limbs, and left the youth asleep—
 Thus the tradition of the gusty deep
- Now turn we to our former chroniclers—855 Endymion awoke, that grief of hers Sweet paining on his ear: he sickly guess'd How lone he was once more, and sadly
 press'd
 His empty arms together, hung his head,
 And moat forlorn upon that widow'd bed 860 Sat silently Love's madness he had known: Often with more than tortured lion's groan Moanings had burst from him; but now that rage
 Had pass'd away: no longer did he wage

- A rough-voic'd war against the dooming stairs.
865 No, he had felt too much for such harsh jars:
The lyre of his soul Æolian tun'd Forgot all violence, and but commun'd With melancholy thought. O he had swoon'd Drunk from pleasure's nipple; and his
love 870 Henceforth was dove-like —Loth was he to move
From the imprinted couch, and when he did,
'Twas with slow, languid paces, and face
hid
In muffling hands So temper'd, out he stray'd
Half seeing visions that might have dis-may'd 875 Alecto's serpents, ravishments more keen Than Hermes' pipe,¹ when anxious he did lean Over eclipsing eyes and at the last
It was a sounding grotto, vaulted, vast.
O'erstudded with a thousand, thousand pearls, 880 And crimson mouthed shells with stubborn curls,
Of every shape and size, even to the bulk In which whales arbor close, to brood and sulk Against an endless storm Moreover too, Fish-semblances, of green and azure hue, 885 Ready to snort their streams. In this cool wonder Endymion sat down, and 'gan to ponder
On all his life his youth, up to the day When 'mid acclaim, and feasts, and gar-lands gay,
He stept upon his shepherd throne the look 890 Of his white palace in wild forest nook,
And all the revels he had lorded there.
Each tender maiden whom he once thought
fair,
With every friend and fellow-woodlander—Pass'd like a dream before him. Then the spur 895 Of the old bards to mighty deeds: his plans To nurse the golden age 'mong shepherd clans.
That wondrous night the great Pan-festival²
His sister's sorrow: and his wanderings all,
- Until into the earth's deep maw he rush'd.
900 Then all its buried magic, till it flush'd High with excessive love. "And now," thought he,
"How long must I remain in jeopardy Of blank amazements that amaze no more?
Now I have tasted her sweet soul to the core 905 All other depths are shallow essences, Once spiritual, are like muddy lees, Meant but to fertilize my earthly root,
And make my branches lift a golden fruit
Into the bloom of heaven's other light.
910 Though it be quick and sharp enough to blight
The Olympian eagle's vision, is dark, Dark as the parentage of chaos Hark!
My silent thoughts are echoing from these shells;
Or they are but the ghosts, the dying swells 915 Of noises far away?—hark!"—Hereupon
He kept an anxious ear The humming tone Came louder, and behold, there as he lay,
On either side outgush'd, with misty spray
A copious spring, and both together dash'd 920 Swift, mad, fantastic round the rocks, and lash'd
Among the conchs and shells of the lofty grot,
Leaving a trickling dew At last they shot Down from the ceiling's height, pouring a noise
As of some breathless racers whose hopes poise 925 Upon the last few steps, and with spent force
Along the ground they took a winding
course
Endymion follow'd—for it seem'd that one Ever pursued, the other strove to shun—Follow'd their languid mazes, till well nigh
930 He had left thinking of the mystery,—
And was now rapt in tender hoverings Over the vanish'd bliss. Ah! what is it sings
His dream away? What melodies are these?
They sound as through the whispering of
trees.
935 Not native in such barren vaults Give ear!

"O Arethusa, peerless nymph! why fear Such tenderness as mine? Great Dian, why.

Why didst thou hear her prayer? O that I Were rippling round her dainty fairness

But ever since I heedlessly did lave
- 970 In thy decentful stream, a panting glow Grew strong within me: wherefore serve me so,
And call it love? Alas, 'twas cruelty
Not once more did I close my happy eye Amid the thrush's song Away! avaunt!
- 975 O 'twas a cruel thing.”—“Now thou dost taunt
So softly, Arethusa, that I think If thou wast playing on my shady brink, Thou wouldst bathe once again. Innocent

1 Diana The Oreads were nymphs of mountains and hills
- Will shade us with their wings. Those fitful sighs
'Tis almost death to hear: O let me pour A dewy balm upon them!—fear no more, Sweet Arethusa! Dian's self must feel 985 Sometime these very pangs. Dear maiden, steal
Blushing into my soul, and let us fly
These dreary caverns for the open sky
I will delight thee all my winding course,
From the green sea up to my hidden source 990 About Arcadian forests; and will show
The channels where my coolest waters flow Through mossy rocks; where, 'mid exuberant green,
I roam in pleasant darkness, more unseen Than Saturn in his exile; where I brim 995 Round flowery islands, and take thence a skim
Of mealy sweets, which myriads of bees Buzz from their honied wings: and thou shouldst please Thyself to choose the richest, where we might
Be incense-pillow'd every summer night
Doff all sad fears, thou white deliciousness, And let us be thus comforted, unless Thou couldst rejoice to see my hopeless
stream
Hurry distracted from Sol's temperate
beam,
And pour to death along some hungry sands.”—
- 1005 “What can I do, Alpheus? Dian stands Severe before me: persecuting fate!
Unhappy Arethusa! thou wast late A huntress free in”—At this, sudden fell Those two sad streams adown a fearful dell.
1010 The Latmian listen'd, but he heard no
more,
Save echo, faint repeating o'er and o'er
The name of Arethusa On the verge Of that dark gulf he wept, and said “I urge Thee, gentle Goddess of my pilgrimage,
By our eternal hopes, to soothe, to assuage,
If thou art powerful, these lovers' pains;
And make them happy in some happy
plains.”
- He turn'd—there was a whelming sound
—he slept,
There was a cooler light; and so he kept 1020 Towards it by a sandy path, and lo!
More suddenly than doth a moment go,
The visions of the earth were gone and
fled—
He saw the giant sea above his head

 And, ample as the largest winding-sheet, A cloak of blue wrapp'd up his aged bones, O'erwrought with symbols by the deepest groans
 Of ambitious magic every ocean-form 200 Was woven in with black distinctness:
 storm,
 And calm, and whispering, and hideous
 roar, Quicksand, and whirlpool, and deserted
 shore,
 Were emblem'd in the woof, with every shape
 That skims, or dives, or sleeps, 'twixt cape and cape 205 The gulping whale was like a dot in the spell,
 Yet look upon it, and 'twould size and swell
 To its huge self; and the minutest fish
 Would pass the very hardest gazer's wish,
 And show his little eye's anatomy.
 210 Then there was pictur'd the regality Of Neptune, and the sea-nymphs round his state,
 In beauteous vassalage, look up and wait Beside this old man lay a pearly wand,
 And in his lap a book, the which he conn'd 215 So steadfastly, that the new denizen Had time to keep him in amazed ken, To mark these shadowings, and stand in awe
- The old man rais'd his hoary head and saw
 The wilder'd stranger—seeming not to see, 220 His features were so lifeless Suddenly He woke as from a trance; his snow-white brows

 Or will he touch me with his searing hand,
 And leave a black memorial on the sand?
 Or tear me piecemeal with a bony saw,

 Look'd high defiance. Lo! his heart 'gan warm
 With pity, for the gray-hair'd creature wept.
 Had he then wrong'd a heart where sorrow kept?
²⁸⁵ Had he, though blindly contumelious, brought Rheum to kind eyes, a sting to human
 thought,
 Convulsion to a mouth of many years?
 He had in truth; and he was ripe for tears
 The penitent shower fell, as down he knelt felt

 spake:

 295 Into mine own for why? thou openest
 The prison gates that have so long oppress My weary watching Though thou know'st it not,
 Thou art commission'd to this fated spot For great enfranchisement. O weep no
 more,
 300 I am a friend to love, to loves of yore: Aye, hadst thou never lov'd an unknown
 power,
 I had been grieving at this joyous hour.
 But even now most miserable old,
 I saw thee, and my blood no longer cold 305 Gave mighty pulses: in this tottering case Grew a new heart, which at this moment plays
 As dancingly as thine. Be not afraid, For thou shalt hear this secret all display'd,
 Now as we speed towards our joyous task "
- 310 So saying, this young soul in age's mask Went forward with the Carian side by side:
 Resuming quickly thus, while ocean's tide Hung swollen at their backs, and jewel'd sands
 Took silently their foot-prints.
- "My soul stands 315 Now past the midway from mortality,
 And so I can prepare without a sigh
 To tell thee briefly all my joy and pain
 I was a fisher once, upon this main,
 And my boat danc'd in every creek and
 bay;
 320 Rough billows were my home by night and
 day,—
 The sea-gulls not more constant; for I had No housing from the storm and tempest's
 mad,
 But hollow rocks,—and they were palaces
 Of silent happiness, of slumberous ease:
 325 Long years of misery have told me so.
 Aye, thus it was one thousand years ago
 One thousand years!—Is it then possible To look so plainly through them? to dispel A thousand years with backward glance
 sublime?
 330 To breathe away as 'twere all scummy slime
 From off a crystal pool, to see its deep,
 And one's own image from the bottom peep?
- Yes! now I am no longer wretched thrall, My long captivity and moanings all 335 Are but a slime, a thin-pervading scum, The which I breathe away, and thronging
 come Like things of yesterday my youthful pleasures
- "I touch'd no lute, I sang not, trod no measures:
 I was a lonely youth on desert shores.
 340 My sports were lonely, 'mid continuous roars,
 And craggy isles, and sea-mew's plaintive cry
 Plaining discrepant between sea and sky Dolphins were still my playmates, shapes
 unseen
 Would let me feel their scales of gold and green, 345 Nor be my desolation; and, full oft,
 When a dread waterspout had rear'd aloft
 Its hungry hugeness, seeming ready ripe To burst with hoarsest thunders, and wipe
 My life away like a vast sponge of fate, 350 Some friendly monster, pitying my sad
 state,
 Has dived to its foundations, gulf'd it
 down,
 And left me tossing safely. But the crown
 Of all my life was utmost quietude
 More did I love to be in cavern rude, 355 Keeping in wait whole days for Neptune's
 voice,
 And if it came at last, hark, and rejoice!
 There blush'd no summer eve but I would steer
 My skiff along green shelving coasts, to
 hear
 The shepherd's pipe come clear from aery
 steep, 360 Mingled with ceaseless bleatings of his sheep:
 And never was a day of summer shine.
 But I beheld its birth upon the brine:
 For I would watch all night to see unfold Heaven's gates, and Æthon snort his morning gold 365 Wide o'er the swelling streams: and constantly
 At brim of day-tide, on some grassy lea, My nets would be spread out, and I at
 rest.
 The poor folk of the sea-country I blest With daily boon of fish most delicate.

- 370 They knew not whence this bounty, and elate
Would strew sweet flowers on a sterile beach.
- “Why was I not contented? Wherefore reach
At things which, but for thee, O Latinian!
Had been my dreary death? Fool! I began 375 To feel distemper’d longings to desue
The utmost privilege that ocean’s sire¹ (ould grant in benediction, to be free Of all his kingdom. Long in misery
I wasted, ere in one extremest fit 380 I plung’d for life or death. To interknit One’s senses with so dense a breathing stuff
Might seem a work of pain; so not enough
Can I admire how crystal-smooth it felt,
And buoyant round my limbs At first I dwelt 385 Whole days and days in sheer astonishment,
Forgetful utterly of self-intent, Moving but with the mighty ebb and flow Then, like a new fledg’d bird that first doth show
His spread feathers to the morrow chill, 390 I tried in fear the pinions of my will ’Twas freedom! and at once I visited The ceaseless wonders of this ocean-bed
No need to tell thee of them, for I see That thou hast been a witness—it must be 395 For these I know thou canst not feel a drouth,
By the melancholy corners of that mouth
So I will in my story straightway pass To more immediate matter. Woe, alas!
That love should be my bane! Ah, Scylla
fair!
400 Why did poor Glaucus ever—ever dare To sue thee to his heart? Kind stranger-
youth!
I lov’d her to the very white of truth,
And she would not conceive it Timid
thing!
She fled me swift as sea-bird on the wing, 405 Round every isle, and point, and promontory,
From where large Hercules wound up his story²
Far as Egyptian Nile My passion grew
The more, the more I saw her dainty hue Gleam delicately through the azure clear 410 Until ’twas too fierce agony to bear;
And in that agony, across my grief
- It flash’d, that Circe might find some relief—
Cruel enchantress! So above the water I rear’d my head, and look’d for Phœbus’ daughter.³
- 415 Phœbus’s isle was wondering at the moon—
It seem’d to whirl around me, and a swoon Left me dead-drifting to that fatal power
- “When I awoke, ’twas in a twilight
bower;
Just when the light of morn, with hum of bees, 420 Stole through its verdurous matting of fresh trees
How sweet, and sweeter! for I heard a lyre,
And over it a sighing voice expire It ceased—I caught light footsteps, and anon
’The fairest face that morn e’er look’d upon 425 Push’d through a screen of roses. Starry Jove!
With tears, and smiles, and honey-words she wove
A net whose thralldom was more bliss than
all
The range of flower’d Elysium. Thus did fall
The dew of her rich speech: ‘Ah! All
awake?
430 O let me hear thee speak, for Cupid’s sake!
I am so oppress’d with joy! Why, I have shed
An urn of tears, as though thou wert cold
dead,
And now I find thee living, I will pour From these devoted eyes their silver store, 435 Until exhausted of the latest drop,
So it will pleasure thee, and force thee stop Here, that I too may live but if beyond Such cool and sorrowful offerings, thou art fond Of soothing warmth, of dalliance supreme; 440 If thou art ripe to taste a long love-dream, If smiles, if dimples, tongues for ardor mute,
Hang in thy vision like a tempting fruit,
O let me pluck it for thee’ Thus she link’d Her charming syllables, till indistinct 445 Their music came to my o’er-sweeten’d
soul;
And then she hover’d over me, and stole So near, that if no nearer it had been This furrow’d visage thou hadst never seen.

“Young man of Latmos! thus particular 450 Am I, that thou may'st plainly see how far This fierce temptation went: and thou may'st not Exclaim, How then, was Scylla quite forgot?

“Who could resist? Who in this universe?
 She did so breathe ambrosia; so immerse 455 My fine existence in a golden clime.
 She took me like a child of suckling time,
 And cradled me in roses. Thus condemn'd,
 The current of my former life was stemm'd,
 And to this arbitrary queen of sense 460 I bow'd a tranced vassal nor would thence Have mov'd, even though Amphon's harp had woo'd Me back to Scylla o'er the billows rude For as Apollo each eve doth devise A new apparelling for western skies; 465 So every eve, nay every spendthrift hour Shed balmy consciousness within that bower.
 And I was free of haunts umbrageous, Could wander in the mazy forest-house
 Of squirrels, foxes shy, and antler'd deer, 470 And birds from covert's innermost and drear Warbling for very joy mellifluous sorrow—
 To me new-born delights!

“Now let me borrow,
 For moments few, a temperament as stern
 As Pluto's sceptre, that my words not burn 475 These uttering lips, while I in calm speech tell How specious heaven was changed to real hell

“One morn she left me sleeping, half awake
 I sought for her smooth arms and lips, to slake
 My greedy thirst with nectarous camel-draughts, 480 But she was gone Whereat the barbed shafts Of disappointment stuck in me so sore,
 That out I ran and search'd the forest o'er Wandering about in pine and cedar gloom Damp awe assail'd me; for there 'gan to boom 485 A sound of moan, an agony of sound,

Sepulchral from the distance all around.
 Then came a conquering earth-thunder, and rumbled
 That fierce complain to silence while I stumbled
 Down a precipitous path, as if impell'd.
 490 I came to a dark valley.—Groanings swell'd

Poisonous about my ears, and louder grew,
 The nearer I approach'd a flame's gaunt
 blue,
 That glar'd before me through a thorny
 brake.¹

This fire, like the eye of gordian² snake 495 Bewitch'd me towards; and I soon was near

A sight too fearful for the feel of fear.
 In thicket had I cur'd the haggard³
 scene—

The banquet of my arms, my arbor queen, Seated upon an uptorn forest root, 500 And all around her shapes, wizard and brute,
 Laughing, and wailing, grovelling, serpent-
 ing,
 Showing tooth, tusk, and venom-bag, and sting!

O such deformities! Old Charon's self,
 Should he give up awhile his penny pelf,⁴ 505 And take a dream 'mong rushes Stygian, It could not be so phantasied Fierce, wan,
 And tyrannizing was the lady's look,
 As over them a gnarled staff she shook Ofttimes upon the sudden she laugh'd out, 510 And from a basket emptied to the rout Clusters of grapes, the which they raven'd⁵ quick

And roar'd for more, with many a hungry lick

About their shaggy jaws Avenging,
 slow,

Anon she took a branch of mistletoe,
 And emptied on't a black dull-gurgling phial:

Groan'd one and all, as if some piercing trial

Was sharpening for their pitiable bones
 She lifted up the charm appealing groans From their poor breasts went sung to her ear

520 In vain; remorseless as an infant's bier She whick'd against their eyes the sooty oil.

Whereat was heard a noise of painful toil, Increasing gradual to a tempest rage,

 spirits of the dead across the River Styx ⁵ devoured

- Shrieks, yells, and groans of torture-pilgrimage, 525 Until their grieved bodies 'gan to bloat
 And puff from the tail's end to stifled throat.
 Then was appalling silence: then a sight
 More wilder than all that hoarse affright,
 For the whole herd, as by a whirlwind writhen, 530 Went through the dismal air like one huge Python Antagonizing Boreas,—and so vanish'd Yet there was not a breath of wind. she banish'd These phantoms with a nod Lo! from the dark Came waggish fauns, and nymphs, and satyrs stark, 535 With dancing and loud revelry,—and went Swifter than centaurs after rapine bent.— Sighing an elephant appear'd and bow'd Before the fierce witch, speaking thus aloud
 In human accent 'Potent goddess! chief 540 Of pains resistless! make my being brief, Or let me from this heavy prison fly:
 Or give me to the air, or let me die!
 I sue not for my happy crown again;
 I sue not for my phalanx on the plain, 545 I sue not for my lone, my widow'd wife,
 I sue not for my ruddy drops of life,
 My children fair, my lovely girls and boys—
 I will forget them, I will pass these joys, Ask nought so heavenward, so too—too high.
 550 Only I pray, as fairest boon, to die,
 Or be deliver'd from this cumbrous flesh,
 From this gross, detestable, filthy mesh,
 And merely given to the cold bleak air Have merely, Goddess! Circe, feel my prayer!"
- 555 "That curst magician's name fell icy numb Upon my wild conjecturing truth had come Naked and sabre-like against my heart
 I saw a fury whetting a death-dart,
 And my slain spirit, overwrought with fright, 560 Fainted away in that dark lair of night Think, my deliverer, how desolate
 My waking must have been! disgust, and hate,
 And terrors manifold divided me
 A spoil amongst them I prepar'd to flee 565 Into the dungeon core of that wild wood I fled three days—when lo! before me stood
- Glaring the angry witch. O Dis, even now, A clammy dew is beading on my brow,
 At mere remembering her pale laugh, and curse.
 570 'Ha! ha! Sir Dainty! there must be a nurse Made of rose-leaves and thistle-down, express,
 To cradle thee, my sweet, and lull thee. yes,
 I am too flinty-hard for thy nice touch:
 My tenderest squeeze is but a giant's clutch.
 575 So, fairy-thing, it shall have lullabies Unheard of yet: and it shall still its cries Upon some breast more hly-feminine Oh, no—it shall not pine, and pine, and pine More than one pretty, tissing thousand years; 580 And then 'twere pity, but fate's gentle shears Cut short its immortality. Sea-flirt!
 Young dove of the waters! truly I'll not hurt
 One hair of thine. see how I weep and sigh, That our heart-broken parting is so nigh 585 And must we part? Ah, yes, it must be so Yet ere thou leavest me in utter woe, Let me sob over thee my last adieus,
 And speak a blessing Mark me! Thou hast thews Immortal, for thou art of heavenly race 590 But such a love is mine, that here I chase Eternally away from thee all bloom
 Of youth, and destine thee towards a tomb Hence shalt thou quickly to the watery vast;
 And there, ere many days be overpast, 595 Disabled age shall seize thee; and even then Thou shalt not go the way of aged men;
 But live and wither, cripple and still breathe Ten hundred years: which gone, I then bequeath Thy fragile bones to unknown burial.
 600 Adieu, sweet love, adieu!"—As shot stars fall, She fled ere I could groan for merely Stung
 And poison'd was my spirit: despair sung
 A war-song of defiance 'gainst all hell.
 A hand was at my shoulder to compel 605 My sullen steps; another 'fore my eyes Moved on with pointed finger. In this guise Enforced, at the last by ocean's foam

- I found me, by my fresh, my native home.
 Its tempering coolness, to my life akin, 610 'Came salutary as I waded in,
 And, with a blind voluptuous rage, I gave Battle to the swollen billow-ridge, and drave Large froth before me, while there yet remain'd
 Hale strength, nor from my bones all marrow drain'd.
- 615 "Young lover, I must weep—such hellish spite With dry cheek who can tell? Why thus my might Proving upon this element, dismay'd, Upon a dead thing's face my hand I laid,
 I look'd—'twas Scylla! Cursed, cursed Circe!
- 620 O vulture-witch, hast never heard of mercy?
 Could not thy harshest vengeance be content,
 But thou must nip this tender innocent Because I lov'd her?—Cold, O cold indeed Were her fair limbs, and like a common weed
- 625 The sea-swoll took her hair. Dead as she
 was
 I clung about her waist, nor ceas'd to
 pass
 Fleet as an arrow through unfathom'd brine,
 Until there shone a fabric crystalline, Ribb'd and inlaid with coral, pebble, and pearl.
- 630 Headlong I darted; at one eager swirl Gain'd its bright portal, enter'd, and behold!
 'Twas vast, and desolate, and icy-cold;
 And all around—But wherefore this to
 thee
 Who in few minutes more thyself shalt
 see?—
- 635 I left poor Scylla in a niche and fled My fever'd parchings up, my scathing
 dread
 Met palsy half way: soon these limbs became Gaunt, wither'd, sapless, feeble, cramp'd, and lame.
- "Now let me pass a cruel, cruel space, 640 Without one hope, without one faintest trace
 Of mitigation, or redeeming bubble
 Of color'd phantasy; for I fear 'twould trouble
 Thy brain to loss of reason: and next tell
- How a restoring chance came down to quell 645 One half of the witch in me.
- "On a day,
 Sitting upon a rock above the spray,
 I saw grow up from the horizon's brink
 A gallant vessel soon she seem'd to sink Away from me again, as though her course 650 Had been resum'd in spite of hindering force—
 So vanish'd. and not long, before arose Dark clouds, and muttering of wind mo-
 rose,
 Old Æolus would stifle his mad spleen, But could not: therefore all the billows
 green 655 Toss'd up the silver spume against the clouds
 The tempest came. I saw that vessel's shrouds
 In perilous bustle; while upon the deck Stood trembling creatures I beheld the wreck;
 The final gulping, the poor struggling souls:
- 660 I heard their cries amid loud thunder-rolls.
 O they had all been sav'd but crazed old Annull'd my vigorous cravings and thus quell'd
 And curb'd, think on't, O Latmian! did I sit Writhing with pity, and a cursing fit 665 Against that hell-born Circe. The crew had gone,
 By one and one, to pale oblivion;
 And I was gazing on the surges prone,
 With many a scalding tear and many a
 groan,
 When at my feet emerg'd an old man's
 hand, 670 Grasping this scroll, and this same slender wand
 I knelt with pain—reach'd out my hand—had grasp'd These treasures—touch'd the knuckles—they unclasp'd—
 I caught a finger: but the downward weight O'erpowered me—it sank. Then 'gan abate 675 The storm, and through chill aguish gloom outburst
 The comfortable sun. I was athirst To search the book, and in the warming air Parted its dripping leaves with eager care Strange matters did it treat of, and drew
 on

680 My soul page after page, till well-nigh won
Into forgetfulness; when, stupefied, I read these words, and read again, and tried My eyes against the heavens, and read
again.
O what a load of misery and pain 685 Each Atlas-line bore off!—a shine of hope Came gold around me, cheering me to cope Strenuous with hellish tyranny. Attend!
For thou hast brought their promise to an end

715 Is, in this restless world, for me reserv’d.

¹ The misery which each line bears is compared to the world which Atlas bore upon his shoulders

What! if from thee my wandering feet had swerv’d, Had we both perish’d?”—“Look!” the sage replied,

“Dost thou not mark a gleaming through the tide,

Of divers brilliances? ’Tis the edifice

720 I told thee of, where lovely Scylla lies;

And where I have enshrined piously

All lovers, whom fell storms have doom’d
to die

Throughout my bondage.” Thus dis-coursing, on

They went till unobscur’d the porches
shone;

725 Which hurryingly they gain’d, and enter’d straight.

Sure never since King Neptune held his state

Was seen such wonder underneath the stars.

Turn to some level plain where haughty
Mars

Has legion’d all his battle, and behold

730 How every soldier, with firm foot, doth hold

His even breast see, many steeled squares, And rigid ranks of iron—whence who dares

One step? Imagine further, line by line, These warrior thousands on the field supine:—

735 So in that crystal place, in silent rows, Poor lovers lay at rest from joys and woes.—

The stranger from the mountains, breathless, trac’d

Such thousands of shut eyes in order
plac’d,

Such ranges of white feet, and patient
lips

740 All ruddy,—for here death no blossom nips.

He mark’d their brows and foreheads;
saw their hair

Put sleekly on one side with nicest care;
And each one’s gentle wrists, with reverence,

Put cross-wise to its heart

“Let us commence,”

745 Whisper’d the guide, stuttering with joy, “even now.”

He spake, and, trembling like an aspenbough,

Began to tear his scroll in pieces small, Uttering the while some mumblings funeral.

He tore it into pieces small as snow

750 That drifts unfeather'd when bleak northerns blow;
 And having done it, took his dark blue cloak
 And bound it round Endymion: then struck His wand against the empty air times nine —
 "What more there is to do, young man, is
 thine
 755 But first a little patience, first undo This tangled thread, and wind it to a clue
 Ah, gentle! 'tis as weak as spider's skein,
 And shouldst thou break it—What, is it done so clean?
 A power overshadows thee! Oh, brave!
 760 The spite of hell is tumbling to its grave Here is a shell; 'tis pearly blank to me, Nor mark'd with any sign or charactery¹—Canst thou read aught? O read for pity's sake!
 Olympus! we are safe! Now, Carian, 800
 break
 765 This wand against yon lyre on the pedestal!"

'Twas done and straight with sudden swell and fall Sweet music breath'd her soul away, and sigh'd
 A lullaby to silence—"Youth! now strew These miced leaves on me, and passing through 770 Those files of dead, scatter the same
 around,
 And thou wilt see the issue"—'Mid the
 sound
 Of flutes and viols, ravishing his heart, Endymion from Glaucus stood apart,
 And scatter'd in his face some fragments
 light 775 How lightning-swift the change! a youthful wight²
 Smiling beneath a coral diadem, Out-sparkling sudden like an upturn'd
 gem, Appear'd, and, stepping to a beauteous corse, Kneel'd down beside it, and with tenderest force 780 Press'd its cold hand, and wept,—and Scylla sigh'd!
 Endymion, with quick hand, the charm applied—
 The nymph arose: he left them to their joy.

And onward went upon his high employ, Showering those powerful fragments on the dead 785 And, as he pass'd, each lifted up its head.
 As doth a flower at Apollo's touch Death felt it to his inwards 'twas too much Death fell a-weeping in his charnel-house
 The Latmian persever'd along, and thus 790 All were re-animated There arose
 A noise of harmony, pulses and throes Of gladness in the air—while many, who Had died in mutual arms devout and true, Sprang to each other madly, and the
 rest
 795 Felt a high certainty of being blest They gaz'd upon Endymion Enchant-
 ment
 Grew drunken, and would have its head and bent.
 Delicious symphonies, like airy flowers, Budded, and swell'd, and, full-blown, shed full showers 800 Of light, soft, unseen leaves of sound, divine
 The two deliverers tasted a pure wine
 Of happiness, from fairy-press ooz'd out Speechless they eyed each other, and about
 The fair assembly wander'd to and fro, 805 Distracted with the richest overflow Of joy that ever pour'd from heaven

—"Away!"

Shouted the new-born God, "Follow, and
 pay
 Our piety to Neptunus supreme!"— Then Scylla, blushing sweetly from her
 dream, 810 They led on first, bent to her meek surprise,
 Through portal columns of a giant size,
 Into the vaulted, boundless emerald.
 Joyous all follow'd as the leader call'd, Down marble steps, pouring as easily 815 As hour-glass sand,—and fast, as you might see Swallows obeying the south summer's call Or swans upon a gentle waterfall

Thus went that beautiful multitude, not far,
 Ere from among some rocks of glittering spar,
 820 Just within ken, they saw descending thick Another multitude. Whereat more quick Moved either host. On a wide sand they met,
 And of those numbers every eye was wet;

- For each their old love found. A murmuring rose,
825 Like what was never heard in all the throes Of wind and waters: 'tis past human wit 865
To tell; 'tis dizziness to think of it.
- This mighty consummation made, the host Mov'd on for many a league, and gain'd, and lost 830 Huge sea-marks; vanward swelling in 870
array,
And from the rear diminishing away,— Till a faint dawn surpris'd them. Glaucus cried,
"Behold! behold, the palace of his pride!
God Neptune's palaces!" With noise increas'd, 835 They shoulder'd on towards that brighten- 875 ing east.
At every onward step proud domes arose In prospect,—diamond gleams, and golden glows
Of amber 'gainst their faces levelling.
Joyous, and many as the leaves in spring, 840 Still onward; still the splendor gradual 880
swell'd.
Rich opal domes were seen, on high upheld By jasper pillars, letting through their shafts
A blush of coral. Copious wonder-draughts Each gazer drank; and deeper drank more
near.
845 For what poor mortals fragment up, as 885 mere¹
As marble was there lavish, to the vast
Of one fair palace, that far, far surpass'd, Even for common bulk, those olden three, Memphis, and Babylon, and Nineveh.
- 850 As large, as bright, as color'd as the bow Of Iris, when unfading it doth show Beyond a silvery shower, was the arch Through which this Paphian army took its march,
Into the outer courts of Neptune's state:
855 Whence could be seen, direct, a golden gate, To which the leaders sped; but not half raught²
Ere it burst open swift as fairy thought,
And made those dazzled thousands veil their eyes
Like callow eagles at the first sunrise.
860 Soon with an eagle nativeness their gaze Ripe from hue-golden swoons took all the blaze,
And then, behold! large Neptune on his throne
- Of emerald deep: yet not exalt alone;
At his right hand stood winged Love, and
His left sat smiling Beauty's paragon.¹
- Far as the mariner on highest mast Can see all round upon the calmed vast,
So wide was Neptune's hall: and as the blue
Doth vault the waters, so the waters drew Their doming curtains, high, magnificent, Aw'd from the throne aloof;—and when storm-rent Disclos'd the thunder-gloomings in Jove's
air;
But sooth'd as now, flash'd sudden everywhere,
Noiseless, sub-marine cloudlets, glittering Death to a human eye: for there did spring From natural west, and east, and south, and north,
A light as of four sunsets, blazing forth A gold-green zenith 'bove the Sea-God's
head.
Of lucid depth the floor, and far outspread
As breezeless lake, on which the slim canoe Of feather'd Indian darts about, as through
The delicate air: air verily,
But for the portraiture of clouds and sky:
Thus palace floor breath-air,—but for the amaze 885 Of deep-seen wonders motionless.—and blaze
Of the dome pomp, reflected in extremes, Globing a golden sphere.
- They stood in dreams Till Triton blew his horn The palace rang;
The Nereids danc'd; the Sirens faintly sang;
890 And the great Sea-King bow'd his dripping head.
Then Love took wing, and from his pinions
shed
On all the multitude a nectarous dew.
The ooze-born Goddess² beckoned and drew
Fair Scylla and her guides to conference; 895 And when they reach'd the throned eminence
She kiss'd the sea-nymph's cheek,—who sat her down
A-toying with the doves. Then,—“Mighty
crown,
And sceptre of this kingdom!” Venus
said,

¹ entire; perfect² reached¹ Venus.² Venus. See Endymion, 1, 626, and n. (p. 775).

"Thy vows were on a time to Nais paid.
 900 Behold!"— Two copious tear-drops instant fell From the God's large eyes; he smil'd delectable, And over Glaucus held his blessing hands.—
 "Endymion! Ah! still wandering in the bands Of love? Now this is cruel. Since the hour 905 I met thee in earth's bosom, all my power Have I put forth to serve thee. What, not yet Escap'd from dull mortality's harsh net?
 A little patience, youth! 'twill not be long,
 Or I am skillless quite: an idle tongue, 910 A humid eye, and steps luxurious,
 Where these are new and strange, are ominous Aye, I have seen these signs in one of heaven,
 When others were all blind: and were I given To utter secrets, haply I might say 915 Some pleasant words—but Love will have his day.
 So wait awhile expectant. Pr'ythee soon,
 Even in the passing of thine honey-moon, Visit thou my Cythera: thou wilt find Cupid well-natur'd, my Adonis kind; 920 And pray persuade with thee—Ah, I have done, All blisses be upon thee, my sweet son!"— Thus the fair Goddess: while Endymion Kneelt to receive those accents halcyon.¹

Meantime a glorious revelry began 925 Before the Water-Monarch Nectar ran In courteous fountains to all cups out-reach'd;
 And plunder'd vines, teeming exhaustless, pleach'd²
 New growth about each shell and pendent lyre;
 The which, in disentangling for their fire, 930 Pull'd down fresh foliage and coverture For dainty toying. Cupid, empire-sure, Flutter'd and laugh'd, and oft-times through the throng
 Made a delighted way. Then dance, and song,
 And garlanding grew wild; and pleasure reign'd.
 935 In harmless tendril they each other chain'd, And strove who should be smother'd deepest in Fresh crush of leaves.

¹ calm; peaceful (The halcyon, or kingfisher, was said to make its nest at sea and to calm the waves.)

² interwove

O 'tis a very sin
 For one so weak to venture his poor verse
 In such a place as this O do not curse, 940 High Muses! let him hurry to the ending

All suddenly were silent. A soft blend
 ing
 Of dulcet instruments came charmingly;
 And then a hymn.

"King of the stormy sea!
 Brother of Jove, and co-inheritor 945 Of elements; Eternally before Thee the waves awful bow. Fast, stubborn rock, At thy fear'd trident shrinking, doth unlock Its deep foundations, hissing into foam
 All mountain-rivers, lost in the wide home 950 Of thy capacious bosom, ever flow Thou frownest, and old Æolus thy foe Skulks to his cavern, 'mid the gruff complaint
 Of all his rebel tempests Dark clouds faint
 When, from thy diadem, a silver gleam 955 Slants over blue dominion. Thy bright team Gulfs in the morning light, and scuds along To bring thee nearer to that golden song Apollo singeth, while his chariot Waits at the doors of heaven Thou art not 960 For scenes like this: an empire stern hast thou;
 And it hath furrow'd that large front: yet now,
 As newly come of heaven, dost thou sit
 To blend and interknit Subdued majesty with this glad time 965 O shell-borne King sublime!
 We lay our hearts before thee evermore—
 We sing, and we adore!

"Breathe softly, flutes;
 Be tender of your strings, ye soothing lutes, 970 Nor be the trumpet heard! O vain, O vain, Not flowers budding in an April rain, Nor breath of sleeping dove, nor river's flow,—
 No, nor the Æolian twang of Love's own bow, Can mingle music fit for the soft ear 975 Of goddess Cytherea!
 Yet deign, white Queen of Beauty, thy fair eyes On our souls' sacrifice

"Bright-winged child!
 Who has another care when thou hast smil'd?
 980 Unfortunates on earth, we see at last All death-shadows, and glooms that overcast
 Our spirits, fann'd away by thy light pinions O sweetest essence! sweetest of all minions!
 God of warm pulses, and dishevell'd hair, 985 And panting bosoms bare!
 Dear unseen light in darkness! eclipser
 Of light in light! delicious poisoner!
 Thy venom'd goblet will we quaff until

We fill—we fill!

990 And by thy mother's lips——”

Was heard no more

For clamor, when the golden palace door Opened again, and from without, in shone

A new magnificence. On oozy throne

Smooth-moving came Oceanus the old,

995 To take a latest glimpse at his sheep-fold,

Before he went into his quiet cave

To muse forever—then a lucid wave

Scoop'd from its trembling sisters of mid-
sea,

Afloat, and pillowing up the majesty

1000 Of Doris, and the Ægean seer,¹ her spouse—

Next, on a dolphin, clad in laurel boughs,

Theban Amphion leaning on his lute

His fingers went across it.—All were mute

To gaze on Amphitrite, queen of pearls,

1005 And Thetis pearly too.—

The palace whirls

Around giddy Endymion, seeing he

Was there far strayed from mortality.

He could not bear it—shut his eyes in vain,

Imagination gave a dizzy pain.

1010 “O I shall die! sweet Venus, be my stay!

Where is my lovely mistress? Well-away!

I die—I hear her voice—I feel my wing—”

At Neptune's feet he sank. A sudden ring

Of Nereids were about him, in kind strife

1015 To usher back his spirit into life

But still he slept. At last they interwove

Their cradling arms, and purpos'd to convey

Towards a crystal bower far away.

Lo! while slow carried through the pitying crowd,

1020 To his inward senses these words spake aloud;

Written in starlight on the dark above.

“Dearest Endymion! my entire love!

How have I dwelt in fear of fate's 'tis done—

Immortal bliss for me too hast thou won.

1025 Arise then! for the hen-dove shall not hatch

Her ready eggs, before I'll kissing snatch

Thee into endless heaven. Awake! awake!”

The youth at once arose: a placid lake

Came quiet to his eyes; and forest green,

1030 Cooler than all the wonders he had seen,

Lull'd with its simple song his fluttering
breast.

How happy once again in grassy nest!

Ægean Sea.

BOOK IV

Muse of my native land! loftiest Muse!

O first-born on the mountains! by the hues

Of heaven on the spiritual air begot:

Long didst thou sit alone in northern grot.

5 While yet our England was a wolfish den,

Before our forests heard the talk of men;

Before the first of Druids was a child,¹—

Long didst thou sit amid our regions wild

Rapt in a deep prophetic solitude.

10 There came an eastern voice² of solemn mood—

Yet wast thou patient. Then sang forth the

Nine,³

Apollo's garland—yet didst thou divine

Such home-bred gloiy, that they cried in

vain,

“Come hither, sister of the Island!”⁴

Plain

15 Spake fair Ausonia;⁵ and once more she

spake

A higher summons⁶—“still didst thou be-

Thee to thy native hopes. O thou hast won

A full accomplishment!”⁷ The thing is done,

Which undone, these our latter days had risen

20 On barren souls. Great Muse, thou know'st what prison

Of flesh and bone curbs, and confines, and frets

Our spirits' wings—despondency besets

Our pillows, and the fresh tomorrow morn

Seems to give forth its light in very scorn

25 Of our dull, uninspir'd, snail-paced lives

Long have I said, how happy he who shrives

To thee! But then I thought on poets gone,

And could not pray—nor can I now—so

on

I move to the end in lowliness of heart.—

30 “Ah, woe is me! that I should fondly part

From my dear native land! Ah, foolish

maid!

Glad was the hour, when, with thee, myriads hade

Adieu to Ganges and their pleasant fields!

To one so friendless the clear freshet yields

35 A bitter coolness; the ripe grape is sour.

Yet I would have, great gods! but one short hour
Of native air—let me but die at home.”

Endymion to heaven's airy dome
Was offering up a hecatomb¹ of vows, 40 When these words reach'd him. Whereupon he bows
His head through thorny-green entanglement
Of underwood, and to the sound is bent, Anxious as hind towards her hidden fawn.

“Is no one near to help me? No fair
dawn 45 Of life from charitable voice? No sweet saying
To set my dull and sadden'd spirit playing?
No hand to toy with mine? No lips so
sweet
That I may worship them? No eyelids
meet
To twinkle on my bosom? No one dies 50 Before me, till from these enslaving eyes Redemption sparkles!—I am sad and
lost.”

Thou, Carian lord, hadst better have been tost
Into a whirlpool Vanish into air, Warm mountaineer! for canst thou only bear 55 A woman's sigh alone and in distress?
See not her charms! Is Phœbe passion-
less?
Phœbe is fairer far—O gaze no more:— Yet if thou wilt behold all beauty's store, Behold her panting in the forest grass!
60 Do not those curls of glossy jet surpass For tenderness the arms so idly lain Amongst them? Feelest not a kindred
pain,
To see such lovely eyes in swimming search After some warm delight, that seems to perch 65 Dovelike in the dim cell lying beyond Their upper lids?—Hist!

“O for Hermes' wand,
To touch this flower into human shape!
That woodland Hyacinthus could escape From his green prison, and here kneeling
down 70 Call me his queen, his second life's fair crown!
Ah me, how I could love!—My soul doth
melt
For the unhappy youth—Love! I have felt ¹ great number

So faint a kindness, such a meek surrender
To what my own full thoughts had made too tender,

75 That but for tears my life had fled away!—
Ye deaf and senseless minutes of the day,
And thou, old forest, hold ye this for true,
There is no lightning, no authentic dew
But in the eye of love: there's not a sound, 80 Melodious howsoever, can confound The heavens and earth in one to such a
death
As doth the voice of love there's not a breath
Will mingle kindly with the meadow air, Till it has panted round, and stolen a share 85 Of passion from the heart!”—

Upon a bough
He leant, wretched. He surely cannot now Thurst for another love: O impious, That he can ever dream upon it thus!— Thought he, “Why am I not as are the
dead,

90 Since to a woe like this I have been led Through the dark earth, and through the wondrous sea?
Goddess! I love thee not the less: from thee
By Juno's smile I turn not—no, no, no—While the great waters are at ebb and flow—

95 I have a triple soul! O fond pretence—
For both, for both my love is so immense,
I feel my heart is cut for them in twain.”

And so he groan'd, as one by beauty slain.

The lady's heart beat quick, and he could
see

100 Her gentle bosom heave tumultuously.
He sprang from his green covert: there she lay,

Sweet as a muskrose upon new-made hay.
With all her limbs on tremble, and her eyes Shut softly up alive. To speak he tries.

105 “Fair damsel, pity me! forgive that I Thus violate thy bower's sanctity!
O pardon me, for I am full of grief—Grief born of thee, young angel! fairest thief!

Who stolen hast away the wings wherewith 110 I was to top the heavens Dear maid, sith Thou art my executioner, and I feel Loving and hatred, misery and weal,
Will in a few short hours be nothing to me,
And all my story that much passion slew
me;

115 Do smile upon the evening of my days.
And, for my tortur'd brain begins to craze.
Be thou my nurse; and let me understand

- How dying I shall kiss that lily hand.— Dost weep for me? Then should I be content.
- 120 Scowl on, ye fates! until the firmament Outblackens Erebus, and the full-cavern'd
earth
Crumbles into itself. By the cloud-garth Of Jove, those tears have given me a thirst To meet oblivion."—As her heart would burst
- 125 The maiden sobb'd awhile, and then replied:
"Why must such desolation betide As that thou speak'st of? Are not these green nooks Empty of all misfortune? Do the brooks Utter a gorgon's voice? Does yonder thrush,
- 130 Schooling its half-fledg'd little ones to brush
About the dewy forest, whisper tales?— Speak not of grief, young stranger, or cold snails Will slime the rose tonight Though if thou wilt,
Methinks 'twould be a guilt—a very guilt—
- 135 Not to companion thee, and sigh away
The light—the dusk—the dark—till break
of day!"
- "Dear lady," said Endymion, "'tis past:
I love thee' and my days can never last That I may pass in patience still speak'
- 140 Let me have music dying, and I seek No more delight—I bid adieu to all.
Didst thou not after other climates call,
And murmur about Indian streams?"— Then she,
Sitting beneath the midmost forest tree, 145 For pity sang this roundelay—
- "O Sorrow,
Why dost borrow
The natural hue of health, from vermeil
lips?—
To give maiden blushes
150 To the white rose bushes?
Or is't thy dewy hand the daisy tips?
- "O Sorrow,
Why dost borrow
The lustrous passion from a falcon-eye?— 155 To give the glowworm light?
Or, on a moonless night,
To tinge, on siren shores, the salt sea-spray?
- "O Sorrow,
Why dost borrow 160 The mellow ditties from a mourning tongue?—
- To give at evening pale Unto the nightingale,
That thou mayst listen the cold dews
among?
- 165 "O Sorrow,
Why dost borrow Heart's lightness from the merriment of May?—
A lover would not tread
A cowslip on the head, Though he should dance from eve till peep
of day—
- 170 Nor any drooping flower Held sacred for thy bower, Wherever he may sport himself and play.
- "To Sorrow,
I bade good-morrow, 175 And thought to leave her far away behind,
But cheerly, cheerly,
She loves me dearly;
She is so constant to me, and so kind,
I would deceive her 180 And so leave her,
But ah! she is so constant and so kind.
- "Beneath my palm trees, by the river side,
I sat a-weeping in the whole world wide,
There was no one to ask me why I wept,— 185 And so I kept Brimming the water-lily cups with tears Cold as my fears
- "Beneath my palm trees, by the river side,
I sat a-weeping. What enamour'd bride, 190 Cheated by shadowy wooer from the clouds,
But hides and shrouds Beneath dark palm trees by a river side?
- "And as I sat, over the light blue hills
There came a noise of revellers: the rills 195 Into the wide stream came of purple hue—
'Twas Bacchus and his crew!
The earnest trumpet spake, and silver thrills From kissing cymbals made a merry din—
'Twas Bacchus and his kin!
- 200 Like to a moving vintage down they came, Crown'd with green leaves, and faces all on
flame;
All madly dancing through the pleasant valley,
To scare thee, Melancholy!
O then, O then, thou wast a simple name!
205 And I forgot thee, as the berried holly
By shepherds is forgotten, when, in June, Tall chestnuts keep away the sun and
moon.—
I rush'd into the folly!
- "Within his ear, aloft, young Bacchus stood, 210 Trifling his ivy-dart,¹ in dancing mood,
With sidelong laughing;
And little rills of crimson wine imbrued His plump white arms, and shoulders, enough
white

¹ killing, like a Gorgon¹ The ivy was sacred to Bacchus.

For Venus' pearly bite:
 215 And near him rode Silenus on his ass, Pelted with flowers as he on did pass Tipisly quaffing.

"Whence came ye, merry damsels! whence came ye!

So many, and so many, and such glee!

220 Why have ye left your bowers desolate, Your lutes, and gentler fate?—

'We follow Bacchus; Bacchus on the wing,
 A-conquering!

Bacchus, young Bacchus! good or ill betide, 225 We dance before him thorough kingdoms wide:—

Come hither, lady fair, and joined be
 To our wild minstrelsy!

"Whence came ye, jolly Satyrs! whence came ye!

So many, and so many, and such glee!

230 Why have ye left your forest haunts, why left

Your nuts in oak-tree cleft?—

'For wine, for wine we left our kernel tree, For wine we left our heath, and yellow brooms,

And cold mushrooms;

235 For wine we follow Bacchus through the
 earth;

Great God of breathless cups and chirping mirth!—

Come hither, lady fair, and joined be
 To our mad minstrelsy!

"Over wide streams and mountains great we went,

240 And, save when Bacchus kept his ivy tent, Onward the tiger and the leopard pants,
 With Asian elephants

Onward these myriads—with song and dance,
 With zebras striped, and sleek Arabians'
 prance,

245 Web-footed alligators, crocodiles, Bearing upon their scaly backs, in files,

Plump infant laughers mimicking the coil
 Of seamen, and stout galley-rowers' toil
 With toying oars and silken sails they glide,

250 Nor care for wind and tide

"Mounted on panthers' furs and lions'
 manes,

From rear to van they scour about the plains;

A three days' journey in a moment done—
 And always, at the rising of the sun,

255 About the wild they hunt with spear and horn,

On spleenful unicorn.

"I saw Osirian Egypt kneel adown
 Before the vine-wreath crown!

I saw parch'd Abyssinia rouse and sing 260 To the silver cymbals' ring!

I saw the whelming vintage hotly pierce Old Tartary the fierce!

The kings of Inde their jewel-scepters vail,¹
 And from their treasures scatter pearly hail;

265 Great Brahma from his mystic heaven
 groans,

And all his priesthood moans, Before young Bacchus' eye-wink turning pale—

Into these regions came I following him, Sick-hearted, weary—so I took a whim

270 To stray away into these forests drear Alone, without a peer:

And I have told thee all thou mayest hear.

"Young stranger!

I've been a ranger

275 In search of pleasure throughout every clime:
 Alas, 'tis not for me!

Bewitch'd I sure must be,
 To lose in grieving all my maiden prime.

"Come then, Sorrow!

Sweetest Sorrow!

280 Like an own babe I nurse thee on my
 breast:

I ought to leave thee

And deceive thee,

But now of all the world I love thee best.

285 "There is not one,

No, no, not one

But thee to comfort a poor lonely maid;

Thou art her mother,

And her brother,

290 Her playmate, and her wooer in the shade."

O what a sigh she gave in finishing,
 And look, quite dead to every worldly
 thing!

Endymion could not speak, but gazed on
 her,

And listened to the wind that now did stir 295 About the crisped oaks full drearily,

Yet with as sweet a softness as might be Remember'd from its velvet summer song.

At last he said: "Poor lady, how thus long Have I been able to endure that voice?

300 Fair Melody! kind Siren! I've no choice;
 I must be thy sad servant evermore:

I cannot choose but kneel here and adore Alas, I must not think—by Phœbe, no!

Let me not think, soft Angel! shall it be so?
 305 Say, beautifullest, shall I never think?

O thou could'st foster me beyond the brink Of recollection! make my watchful care

Close up its bloodshot eyes, nor see despair!
 Do gently murder half my soul, and I

310 Shall feel the other half so utterly!— I'm giddy at that cheek so fair and smooth;

O let it blush so ever! let it soothe

My madness! let it mantle rosy-warm

Wilt fall asleep? O let me sip that tear!
And whisper one sweet word that I may ³⁶⁰ know
- ³²⁰ This is this world—sweet dewy blossom!''
—Woe!
Woe! Woe to that Endymion! Where is he?— Even these words went echoing dismally Through the wide forest—a most fearful
tone,
Like one repenting in his latest moan; ³²⁵ And while it died away a shade pass'd by,
As of a thundercloud. When arrows fly Through the thick branches, poor ring-doves sleek forth Their timid necks and tremble; so these both Leant to each other trembling, and sat so ³³⁰ Waiting for some destruction—when lo!
Foot-feather'd Mercury appear'd sublime Beyond the tall tree tops; and in less time Than shoots the slanted hail-storm, down ³⁷⁰ he dropt Towards the ground; but rested not, nor stopt ³³⁵ One moment from his home: only the sword
He with his wand light touch'd, and heavenward Swifter than sight was gone—even before The teeming earth a sudden witness bore Of his swift magic. Diving swans appear ³⁴⁰ Above the crystal circlings white and clear;
And catch the cheated eye in wide surprise, How they can dive in sight and unseen
rise—
So from the turf outsprang two steeds jet-black,
Each with large dark-blue wings upon his ³⁸⁰ back.
- ³⁴⁵ The youth of Caria plac'd the lovely dame On one, and felt himself in spleen to tame The other's fierceness. Through the air they flew,
High as the eagles. Like two drops of dew Exhal'd to Phœbus' lips, away they are
gone, ³⁵⁰ Far from the earth away—unseen, alone, Among cool clouds and winds, but that the
free,
The buoyant life of song can floating be Above their heads, and follow them untir'd.—
Muse of my native land, am I inspir'd?
- This is the giddy air, and I must spread Wide pinions to keep here; nor do I dread Or height, or depth, or width, or any chance Precipitous: I have beneath my glance Those towering horses and their mournful freight.
³⁶⁰ Could I thus sail, and see, and thus await Fearless for power of thought, without thine aid?—
- There is a sleepy dusk, an odorous shade From some approaching wonder, and behold Those winged steeds, with snorting nostrils
bold ³⁶⁵ Snuff at its faint extreme, and seem to tire,
Dying to embers from their native fire!
- There curl'd a purple mist around them;
soon,
It seem'd as when around the pale new
moon
Sad Zephyr droops the clouds like weeping willow:
³⁷⁰ 'Twas Sleep slow journeying with head on pillow.
For the first time, since he came nigh dead-born
From the old womb of night, his cave forlorn
Had he left more forlorn; for the first
time,
He felt aloof the day and morning's prime—³⁷⁵ Because into his depth Cimmerian There came a dream, showing how a young man,¹ Ere a lean bat could plump its wintery
skin,
Would at high Jove's empyreal footstool win
An immortality, and how espouse ³⁸⁰ Jove's daughter, and be reckon'd of his house.
Now was he slumbering towards heaven's gate,
That he might at the threshold one hour wait
To hear the marriage melodies, and then Sink downward to his dusky cave again.
³⁸⁵ His litter of smooth semiluculent mist, Diversely ting'd with rose and amethyst, Puzzled those eyes that for the centre
sought;
And scarcely for one moment could be caught
His sluggish form reposing motionless.
- ¹ Endymion, beloved of Diana.

290 Those two on winged steeds, with all the stress
 Of vision search'd for him, as one would look Athwart the shallows of a river nook
 To catch a glance at silver-throated eels,— Or from old Skiddaw's top, when fog conceals 395 His rugged forehead in a mantle pale,
 With an eye-guess towards some pleasant
 vale Descry a favorite hamlet faint and far.

These raven horses, though they foster'd
 are
 Of earth's splenetic fire, dully drop 400 Their full-vein'd ears, nostrils blood wide.
 and stop;
 Upon the spiritless must have they out-
 spread
 Their ample feathers, are in slumber
 dead,—
 And on those pinions, level in mid air, Endymion sleepeth and the lady fair.
 405 Slowly they sail, slowly as icy isle Upon a calm sea drifting: and meanwhile The mournful wanderer dreams. Behold!
 he walks
 On heaven's pavement; brotherly he talks
 To divine powers: from his hand full fain 410 Juno's proud birds¹ are pecking pearly grain.
 He tries the nerve of Phœbus' golden bow,
 And asketh where the golden apples grow:
 Upon his arm he braces Pallas' shield,
 And strives in vain to unsettle and wield 415 A Jovian thunderbolt: arch Hebe brings A full-brimm'd goblet, dances lightly, sings
 And tantalizes long; at last he drinks
 And lost in pleasure at her feet he sinks, Touching with dazzled lips her starlight
 hand.

120 He blows a bugle,—an ethereal band Are visible above the Seasons four,— Green-kirtled Spring, flush Summer, golden store
 In Autumn's sickle, Winter frosty hoar, Join dance with shadowy Hours; while still the blast, 425 In swells unmitigated, still doth last To sway their floating morris.² "Whose is this?
 Whose bugle?" he inquires; they smile—
 "O Dis!
 Why is this mortal here? Dost thou not
 know
 Its mistress' lips? Not thou?—'Tis Dian's: lo!

430 She rises crescented!" He looks, 'tis she,
 His very goddess: good-bye earth, and sea,
 And air, and pains, and care, and suffer-
 ing;
 Good-bye to all but love! Then doth he
 spring
 Towards her, and awakes—and, strange, o'erhead,
 435 Of those same fragrant exhalations bred, Beheld awake his very dream: the gods Stood smiling; merry Hebe laughs and nods;
 And Phœbe bends towards him crescented.
 O state perplexing! On the pinion bed, 440 Too well awake, he feels the panting side Of his delicious lady He who died!
 For soaring too audacious in the sun, When that same treacherous wax began to run,
 Felt not more tongue-tied than Endymion.
 445 His heart leapt up as to its rightful throne, To that fair-shadow'd passion puls'd its
 way—
 Ah, what perplexity! Ah, well a day!
 So fond, so beauteous was his bed-fellow,
 He could not help but kiss her: then he grew 450 Awhile forgetful of all beauty save Young Phœbe's, golden hair'd; and so 'gan crave Forgiveness: yet he turn'd once more to look At the sweet sleeper,—all his soul was shook,—
 She press'd his hand in slumber; so once
 more 455 He could not help but kiss her and adore.
 At this the shadow wept, melting away.
 The Latmian started up: "Bright goddess,
 stay!
 Search my most hidden breast! By truth's own tongue,
 I have no dædalæ³ heart: why is it wrung 460 To desperation? Is there nought for me, Upon the bourne of bliss, but misery?"

These words awoke the stranger of dark
 tresses:
 Her dawning love-look rapt Endymion blesses With 'havior soft. Sleep yawn'd from underneath.
 465 "Thou swan of Ganges, let us no more breathe
 This murky phantasm! thou contented seem'st
 Pillow'd in lovely idleness, nor dream'st
 What horrors may discomfort thee and me.
 Icarus. ³ cunning; deceptive

Ah, shouldst thou die from my heart-treachery!—

470 Yet did she merely weep—her gentle soul Hath no revenge in it. as it is whole In tenderness, would I were whole in love!
Can I prize thee, fair maid, all price above,
Even when I feel as true as innocence?

475 I do, I do—What is this soul then?
Whence

Came it? It does not seem my own, and I Have no self-passion or identity.
Some fearful end must be where, where is it?

By Nemesis, I see my spirit flit 480 Alone about the dark—Forgive me, sweet—Shall we away?" He rous'd the steed—they beat

Their wings chivalrous into the clear air, Leaving old Sleep within his vapory lair.

The good-night blush of eve was waning
slow,

485 And Vesper, risen star, began to throe In the dusk heavens silverly, when they Thus sprang direct towards the Galaxy Nor did speed hinder converse soft and strange—

Eternal oaths and vows they interchange, 490 In such wise, in such temper, so aloof
Up in the winds, beneath a starry roof, So witless of their doom, that verily
'Tis well-nigh past man's search their hearts to see,

Whether they wept, or laugh'd, or griev'd, or toy'd—

495 Most like with joy gone mad, with sorrow
cloy'd

Full facing their swift flight, from ebony streak,

The moon put forth a little diamond peak,
No bigger than an unobserved star,
Or tiny point of fairy scimitar;

500 Bright signal that she only stoop'd to tie Her silver sandals, ere deliciously She bow'd into the heavens her timid
head.

Slowly she rose, as though she would have
fled,

While to his lady meek the Carian turn'd, 505 To mark if her dark eyes had yet discern'd
This beauty in its birth—Despair! despair!
He saw her body fading gaunt and spare In the cold moonshine Straight he seiz'd her wrist;

It melted from his grasp: her hand he kiss'd,

510 And, horror! kiss'd his own—he was alone.

Her steed a little higher soar'd, and then Dropt hawkwise to the earth.

There lies a den,
Beyond the seeming confines of the space
Made for the soul to wander in and trace 515 Its own existence, of remotest glooms.

Dark regions are around it, where the tombs

Of buried griefs the spirit sees, but scarce
One hour doth linger weeping, for the pierce

Of new-born woe it feels more inly smart.
520 And in these regions many a venom'd dart
At random flies, they are the proper home
Of every ill. the man is yet to come

Who hath not journeyed in this native hell
But few have ever felt how calm and well 525 Sleep may be had in that deep den of all There anguish does not sting; nor pleasure pall:

Woe-hurricanes beat ever at the gate,
Yet all is still within and desolate.

Beset with painful gusts, within ye hear 530 No sound so loud as when on curtain'd bier
The death-watch tick is stifled. Enter none Who strive therefore: on the sudden it is won

Just when the sufferer begins to burn,
Then it is free to him; and from an urn, 535 Still fed by melting ice, he takes a draught—

Young Semele such richness never quaff'd In her maternal longing! Happy gloom!
Dark Paradise! where pale becomes the bloom

Of health by due; where silence dreardest 540 Is most articulate; where hopes infest; Where those eyes are the brightest far that keep

Their lids shut longest in a dreamless
sleep

O happy spirit-home! O wondrous soul!
Pregnant with such a den to save the whole 545 In thine own depth. Hail, gentle Carian!
For, never since thy griefs and woes began.
Hast thou felt so content a grievous feud Hath led thee to this Cave of Quietude Aye, his lull'd soul was there, although upborne

550 With dangerous speed: and so he did not mourn

Because he knew not whither he was going.
So happy was he, not the aerial blowing Of trumpets at clear parley from the east Could rouse from that fine relish, that high feast.

They stung the feather'd horse: with fierce alarm

He flapp'd towards the sound. Alas, no charm

Could lift Endymion's head, or he had view'd

A skyeey mask, a pimon'd multitude,— And silvery was its passing: voices sweet

560 Warbling the while as if to lull and greet The wanderer in his path. Thus warbled
they,

While past the vision went in bright array

"Who, who from Dian's feast would be
away!

For all the golden bowers of the day 565 Are empty left! Who, who away would be From Cynthia's wedding and festivity?
Not Hesperus: lo! upon his silver wings He leans away for highest heaven and sings,

Snapping his lucid fingers merrily!—

570 Ah, Zephyrus; art here, and Flora too!
Ye tender bibbers of the rain and dew,
Young playmates of the rose and daffodil,
Be careful, ere ye enter in, to fill

Your baskets high

575 With fennel green, and balm, and golden pines,

Savory, latter-mint, and columbines,
Cool parsley, basil sweet, and sunny thyme.
Yea, every flower and leaf of every clime,
All gather'd in the dewy morning: hie

580 Away! fly! fly!—

Crystalline brother of the belt of heaven, Aquarius! to whom king Jove has given Two liquid pulse streams 'stead of feather'd
wings,

Two fan-like fountains,—thine illuminings 585 For Dian play.

Dissolve the frozen purity of air;
Let thy white shoulders silvery and bare Show cold through watery pinions; make more bright

The Star-Queen's¹ crescent on her marriage
night:

590 Haste, haste away!—

Castor has tamed the planet Lion, see!
And of the Bear has Pollux mastery:
A third is in the race! who is the third Speeding away swift as the eagle bird?

595 The ramping Centaur!

The Lion's mane's on end: the Bear how ferce!

The Centaur's arrow ready seems to pierce
Some enemy: far forth his bow is bent Into the blue of heaven. He'll be shent,²

600 Pale unrelentor,

When he shall hear the wedding lutes a-playing—

Andromeda! sweet woman! why delaying So timidly among the stars: come hither!
Join this bright throng, and nimbly follow whither

605 They all are going

Danae's son,¹ before Jove newly bow'd, Has wept for thee, calling to Jove aloud.
Thee, gentle lady, did he disenthral.

610 Ye shall forever live and love, for all

Thy tears are flowing—

By Daphne's fright, behold Apollo!—"

More

Endymion heard not. down his steed him
bore,

Prone to the green head of a misty hill

His first touch of the earth went nigh to kill.

615 "Alas!" said he, "were I but always borne

Through dangerous winds, had but my.
footsteps worn

A path in hell, forever would I bless

Horrors which nourish an uneasiness

For my own sullen conquering: to him

620 Who lives beyond earth's boundary, grief is dim,

Sorrow is but a shadow now I see

The grass, I feel the solid ground—Ah,
me!

It is thy voice—divinest! Where?—who?
who

Left thee so quiet on this bed of dew?

625 Behold upon this happy earth we are,

Let us ay love each other; let us fare

On forest-fruits, and never, never go

Among the abodes of mortals here below,

Or be by phantoms duped O destiny!

630 Into a labyrinth now my soul would fly,

But with thy beauty will I deaden it Where didst thou melt to? By thee will I sit

Forever let our fate stop here—a kid

I on this spot will offer Pan will bid

635 Us live in peace, in love and peace among

His forest wildernesses I have clung

To nothing, lov'd a nothing, nothing seen

Or felt but a great dream! Oh, I have been Presumptuous against love, against the

sky,

640 Against all elements, against the tie

Of mortals each to each, against the blooms

Of flowers, rush of rivers, and the tombs

Of heroes gone! Against his proper glory

Has my own soul conspired: so my story

645 Will I to children utter, and repent

There never liv'd a mortal man, who bent
His appetite beyond his natural sphere,

But starv'd and died My sweetest Indian,
here,

Here will I kneel, for thou redeemed hast

¹ Diana's.

² put to shame or confusion

650 My life from too thin breathing: gone and
past
Are cloudy phantasms. Caverns lone,
farewell!

And air of visions, and the monstrous swell Of visionary seas! No, never more Shall airy voices cheat me to the shore 655 Of tangled wonder, breathless and aghast Adieu, my daintiest Dream! although so vast

My love is still for thee. The hour may come When we shall meet in pure Elysium On earth I may not love thee, and therefore

660 Doves will I offer up, and sweetest store All through the teeming year: so thou wilt
shine

On me, and on this damsel fair of mine.
And bless our simple lives My Indian
bliss!

My river-lily bud! one human kiss!

665 One sign of real breath—one gentle
squeeze,

Warm as a dove's nest among summer
trees,

And warm with dew at ooze from living
blood!

Whither didst melt? Ah, what of that!— all good

We'll talk about—no more of dreaming—
Now,

670 Where shall our dwelling be? Under the brow

(Of some steep mossy hill, where ivy dun Would hide us up, although spring leaves
were none;

And where dark yew trees, as we rustle
through,

Will drop their scarlet berry cups of dew?

675 O thou wouldst joy to live in such a place, Dusk for our loves, yet light enough to grace

Those gentle limbs on mossy bed reclin'd For by one step the blue sky shouldst thou find,

And by another, in deep dell below,

680 See, through the trees, a little river go All in its mid-day gold and glimmering Honey from out the gnarled hive I'll
bring,

And apples, wan with sweetness, gather
thee,—

Cresses that grow where no man may them
see,

685 And sorrel untorn by the dew-claw'd stag Pipes will I fashion of the syrinx flag,¹

¹ A reference to the myth of the Arcadian nymph Syrinx, who, to escape the embraces of Pan, was changed into a tuft of reeds, out of which Pan then made his pipes

That thou mayst always know whither I
roam,
When it shall please thee in our quiet home To listen and think of love. Still let me
speak;

690 Still let me dive into the joy I seek,— For yet the past doth prison me. The
rill,

Thou haply mayst delight in, will I fill With fairy fishes from the mountain tarn.
And thou shalt feed them from the squirrel's barn

695 Its bottom will I strew with amber shells, And pebbles blue from deep enchanted wells

Its sides I'll plant with dew-sweet eglan-tine,

And honeysuckles full of clear bee-wine
I will entice this crystal rill to trace

700 Love's silver name upon the meadow's
face

I'll kneel to Vesta, for a flame of fire,
And to god Phœbus, for a golden lyre,

To Empress Dian, for a hunting spear,
To Vesper, for a taper silver-clear,

705 That I may see thy beauty through the
night,

To Flora, and a nightingale shall light Tame on thy finger; to the River-Gods,

And they shall bring thee taper fishing-rods

Of gold, and lines of Naiads' long bright
tress

710 Heaven shield thee for thine utter loveliness!

Thy mossy footstool shall the altar be 'Fore which I'll bend, bending, dear love, to thee:

Those lips shall be my Delphos, and shall
speak

Laws to my footsteps, color to my cheek, 715 Trembling or steadfastness to this same
voice,

And of three sweetest pleasurings the choice.

And that affectionate light, those diamond
things,

Those eyes, those passions, those supreme pearl springs,

Shall be my grief, or twinkle me to pleasure

720 Say, is not bliss within our perfect seizure?
O that I could not doubt!"

The mountaineer

Thus strove by fancies vain and crude to clear

His briar'd path to some tranquillity
It gave bright gladness to his lady's eye.

- 725 And yet the tears she wept were tears of sorrow;
Answering thus, just as the golden morrow Beam'd upward from the valleys of the east:
"O that the flutter of this heart had ceas'd,
Or the sweet name of love had pass'd away 730 Young feather'd tyrant! by a swift decay Wilt thou devote this body to the earth:
And I do think that at my very birth
I lisp'd thy blooming titles inwardly; For at the first, first dawn and thought of
thee, 735 With uplift hands I blest the stars of
heaven.
Art thou not cruel? Ever have I striven To think thee kind, but ah, it will not do!
When yet a child, I heard that kisses drew Favor from thee, and so I kisses gave 740 To the void air, bidding them find out love.
But when I came to feel how far above
All fancy, pride, and fickle maidenhood,
All earthly pleasure, all imagin'd good,
Was the warm tremble of a devout kiss,— 745 Even then, that moment, at the thought of this,
Fainting I fell into a bed of flowers,
And languish'd there three days. Ye milder powers, Am I not cruelly wrong'd? Believe, believe
Me, dear Endymion, were I to weave 750 With my own fancies garlands of sweet
life, Thou shouldst be one of all. Ah, bitter
strife!
I may not be thy love. I am forbidden—Indeed I am—thwarted, affrighted, chid-
den,
By things I trembled at, and gorgon wrath 755 Twice hast thou ask'd whither I went henceforth
Ask me no more! I may not utter it, Nor may I be thy love. We might commit Ourselves at once to vengeance; we might
die;
We might embrace and die: voluptuous
thought!
760 Enlarge not to my hunger, or I'm caught In trammels of perverse deliciousness.
No, no, that shall not be: thee will I bless,
And bid a long adieu."

The Carian

- No word return'd: both lovelorn, silent,
wan,
765 Into the valleys green together went.

Far wandering, they were perforce content
To sit beneath a fair lone beechen tree;
Nor at each other gaz'd, but heavily Por'd on its hazel cirque of shedded leaves.

- 770 Endymion! unhappy! it nigh grieves
Me to behold thee thus in last extreme: Enskied ere this, but truly that I deem Truth the best music in a first-born song.
Thy lute-voic'd brother¹ will I sing ere long,
775 And thou shalt aid—hast thou not aided
me?
Yes, moonlight Emperor! felicity Has been thy meed for many thousand
years;
Yet often have I, on the brink of tears, Mourn'd as if yet thou wert a forester;— Forgetting the old tale.

- He did not stir 780 His eyes from the dead leaves, or one small pulse Of joy he might have felt. The spirit culls
Unfaded amaranth,² when wild it strays Through the old garden-ground of boyish
days.
785 A little onward ran the very stream By which he took his first soft poppy
dream;
And on the very bark 'gainst which he leant
A crescent he had carv'd, and round it spent His skill in little stars. The teeming tree 790 Had swollen and green'd the pious charactery,
But not ta'en out. Why, there was not a slope
Up which he had not fear'd the antelope,
And not a tree, beneath whose rooty shade
He had not with his tamed leopards
play'd:
795 Nor could an arrow light, or javelin, Fly in the air where his had never been—
And yet he knew it not.

O treachery!

- Why does his lady smile, pleasing her eye
With all his sorrowing? He sees her not.
800 But who so stares on him? His sister sure!
Peona of the woods!—Can she endure—Impossible—how dearly they embrace!
His lady smiles; delight is in her face;
It is no treachery.

¹ A reference to Hyperion, whom Keats already had in mind as the subject of a poem. Hyperion was not a brother of Endymion.

² An imaginary flower supposed never to fade

- "Dear brother mine!
 805 Endymion, weep not so! Why shouldst thou pine
 When all great Latmos so exalt will be?
 Thank the great gods, and look not bitterly;
 And speak not one pale word, and sigh no
 more.
 Sure I will not believe thou hast such store 810 Of grief, to last thee to my kiss again.
 Thou surely canst not bear a mind in pain,
 Come hand in hand with one so beautiful.
 Be happy both of you! for I will pull
 The flowers of autumn for your coronals.
 815 Pan's holy priest for young Endymion calls;
 And when he is restor'd, thou, fairest dame,
 Shalt be our queen. Now, is it not a shame
 To see ye thus,—not very, very sad?
 Perhaps ye are too happy to be glad:
 820 O feel as if it were a common day;
 Free-voic'd as one who never was away
 No tongue shall ask, Whence come ye?
 but ye shall
 Be gods of your own rest imperial.
 Not even I, for one whole month, will pry 825 Into the hours that have pass'd us by, Since in my arbor I did sing to thee.
 O Hermes! on this very night will be A hymning up to Cynthia, queen of light;
 For the soothsayers old saw yesternight 830 Good visions in the air,—whence will befall, As say these sages, health perpetual To shepherds and their flocks; and furthermore,
 In Dian's face they read the gentle lore:
 Therefore for her these vesper-carols are.
 835 Our friends will all be there from nigh and far.
 Many upon thy death have ditties made;
 And many, even now, their foreheads
 shade
 With cypress,¹ on a day of sacrifice
 New singing for our maids shalt thou devise, 840 And pluck the sorrow from our hunts-men's brows.
 Tell me, my lady-queen, how to espouse
 This wayward brother to his rightful joys!
 His eyes are on thee bent, as thou didst
 poise
 His fate most goddess-like. Help me, I pray,
 845 To lure—Endymion, dear brother, say What ails thee?" He could bear no more, and so
 Bent his soul fiercely like a spiritual bow, ¹The cypress is an emblem of mourning.
- And twang'd it inwardly, and calmly said:
 "I would have thee my only friend, sweet
 maid!
 850 My only visitor! not ignorant though,
 That those deceptions which for pleasure
 go
 'Mong men, are pleasures real as real may
 be:
 But there are higher ones I may not see,
 If impiously an earthly realm I take.
 855 Since I saw thee, I have been wide awake Night after night, and day by day, until
 Of the empyrean I have drunk my fill.
 Let it content thee, sister, seeing me More happy than betides mortality.
 860 A hermit young, I'll live in mossy cave, Where thou alone shalt come to me, and lave
 Thy spirit in the wonders I shall tell.
 Through me the shepherd realm shall prosper
 well;
 For to thy tongue will I all health confide.
 865 And, for my sake, let this young maid abide
 With thee as a dear sister. Thou alone, Peona, mayst return to me I own This may sound strangely: but when, dearest girl,
 Thou seest it for my happiness, no pearl 870 Will trespass down those cheeks. Companion fair!
 Wilt be content to dwell with her, to share This sister's love with me?" Like one resign'd
 And bent by circumstance, and thereby blind
 In self-commitment, thus that meek unknown:
 875 "Aye, but a buzzing by my ears has flown,
 Of jubilee to Dian—truth I heard?
 Well then, I see there is no little bird, Tender soever, but is Jove's own care.¹ Long have I sought for rest, and, unaware, 880 Behold I find it! so exalted too!
 So after my own heart! I knew, I knew There was a place untenanted in it:
 In that same void white Chastity shall sit,
 And monitor me nightly to lone slumber.
 885 With sanest lips I vow me to the number Of Dian's sisterhood; and, kind lady, With thy good help, this very night shall
 see
 My future days to her fane consecrate."
- As feels a dreamer what doth most create 890 His own particular fright, so these three felt
 Or like one who, in after ages, knelt Far under-ground, a sleeper meets his friends 895 Who know him not. Each diligently bends Towards common thoughts and things for very fear;

 Striving their ghastly malady to cheer,
 By thinking it a thing of yes and no,
 That housewives talk of. But the spirit-blow 900 Was struck, and all were dreamers. At the last Endymion said: "Are not our fates all
 cast?
 Why stand we here? Adieu, ye tender
 pair!
 Adieu!" Whereat those maidens, with wild stare, Walk'd dizzily away. Pained and hot 905 His eyes went after them, until they got Near to a cypress grove, whose deadly maw,
 In one swift moment, would what then he saw Engulf forever. "Stay!" he cried, "ah
 stay!
 Turn, damsels! hie! one word I have to say.
 910 Sweet Indian, I would see thee once again.
 It is a thing I dote on: so I'd fain, Peona, ye should hand in hand repair Into those holy groves, that silent are Behind great Dian's temple. I'll be gone.
 915 At Vesper's earliest twinkle—they are
 gone—
 But once, once, once again—" At this he
 press'd
 His hands against his face, and then did
 rest
 His head upon a mossy hillock green,
 And so remain'd as he a corpse had been 920 All the long day; save when he scantily lifted
 His eyes abroad, to see how shadows shifted
 With the slow move of time,—sluggish and weary
 Until the poplar tops, in journey dreary, Had reach'd the river's brim. Then up he
 rose,
 925 And, slowly as that very river flows, Walk'd towards the temple grove with this lament:
 "Why such a golden eve? The breeze is sent Careful and soft, that not a leaf may fall Before the serene father of them all
- 930 Bows down his summer head below the west.
 Now am I of breath, speech, and speed possess,
 But at the setting I must bid adieu To her for the last time. Night will strew
 On the damp grass myriads of lingering
 leaves, 935 And with them shall I die; nor much it grieves
 To die, when summer dies on the cold
 sward.
 Why, I have been a butterfly, a lord Of flowers, garlands, love-knots, silly posies, Groves, meadows, melodies, and arbor
 roses;
 940 My kingdom's at its death, and just it is That I should die with it: so in all this We miscall grief, bale, sorrow, heartbreak,
 woe,
 What is there to plain of? By Titan's
 foe!
 I am but lightly serv'd" So saying, he 945 Tripp'd lightly on, in sort of deathful
 glee;
 Laughing at the clear stream and setting
 sun,
 As though they jests had been: nor had he done
 His laugh at nature's holy countenance,
 Until that grove appear'd, as if perchance, 950 And then his tongue with sober seemlish'd²
 Gave utterance as he enter'd: "Ha! I said, King of the butterflies, but by this gloom,
 And by old Rhadamanthus' tongue of
 doom,
 955 This dusk religion, pomp of solitude,
 And the Promethean clay by thief en-dued,³
 By old Saturnus' forelock, by his head Shook with eternal palsy, I did wed Myself to things of light from infancy;
 And thus to be cast out, thus lorn to die, 960 Is sure enough to make a mortal man Grow impious" So he inwardly began On things for which no wording can be found:
 Deeper and deeper sinking, until drown'd Beyond the reach of music: for the choir 965 Of Cynthia he heard not, though rough briar
 Nor muffling thicket interpos'd to dull

¹ Jupiter.² seemliness³ Prometheus stole fire from heaven and gave it to man, whom he made of clay and endowed with life

The vesper hymn, far swollen, soft and full,
 Through the dark pillais of those sylvan aisles
 He saw not the two maidens, nor their smiles, 970 Wan as primroses gather'd at midnight
 By chilly-finger'd spring. "Unhappy wight!
 Endymion!" said Peona, "we are here!
 What wouldst thou ere we all are laid on bier?"
 Then he embriac'd her, and his lady's hand 975 Press'd, saying "Sister, I would have command, If it were heaven's will, on our sad fate"
 At which that dark-eyed stranger stood elate
 And said, in a new voice, but sweet as love,
 To Endymion's amaze "By Cupid's dove, 980 And so thou shalt! and by the hly truth Of my own breast thou shalt, beloved youth!"
 And as she spake, into her face there came Light, as reflected from a silver flame
 Her long black hair swell'd ample in display 985 Full golden, in her eyes a brighter day Dawn'd blue and full of love Aye, he beheld Phœbe, his passion! joyous she upheld Her lucid bow, continuing thus "Drear drear Has our delaying been, but foolish fear 990 Withheld me first, and then decrees of fate;
 And then 'twas fit that from this mortal state Thou shouldst, my love, by some unlook'd-for change Be spiritualiz'd Peona, we shall range These forests, and to thee they safe shall be 995 As was thy cradle, hither shalt thou flee To meet us many a time" Next Cynthia bright Peona kiss'd, and bless'd with fair good night
 Her brother kiss'd her too, and knelt adown Before his goddess, in a blissful swoon 1000 She gave her fair hands to him, and behold, Before three swiftest kisses he had told,
 They vanish'd far away!—Peona went Home through the gloomy wood in wonderment.

ISABELLA; OR THE POT OF BASIL*

A STORY FROM BOCCACCIO²
 1818 1820

- 1 Fair Isabel, poor simple Isabel!
 Lorenzo, a young palmer in Love's eye³
 They could not in the self-same mansion dwell Without some stir of heart, some malady,
 They could not sit at meals but feel how well It soothed each to be the other by,
 They could not, sure, beneath the same roof sleep
 But to each other dream, and nightly weep.
- 2 With every morn their love grew tenderer, With every eve deeper and tenderer still;
 He might not in house, field, or garden stir,
 But her full shape would all his seeing fill,
 And his continual voice was pleasanter
 To her, than noise of trees or hidden rill,
 Her lute-string gave an echo of his name,
 She spoilt her half-done broidery with the same
- 3 He knew whose gentle hand was at the latch
 Before the door had given her to his eyes,
 And from her chamber-window he would catch Her beauty farther than the falcon spies,
 And constant as her vespers would he watch, Because her face was turn'd to the same skies;
 And with sick longing all the night outwear,
 To hear her morning-step upon the stair
- 4 A whole long month of May in this sad plight Made their cheeks paler by the break of June.
 "Tomorrow will I bow to my delight, Tomorrow will I ask my lady's boon."—
 "O may I never see another night, Lorenzo, if thy lips breathe not love's tune."—
 So spake they to their pillows; but, alas, Honeyless days and days did he let pass;

* An aromatic shrubby plant.

² From The Decameron, 4, 5.

³ That is, a votary of Love

- 5 Until sweet Isabella's untouch'd cheek Fell sick within the rose's just domain, Fell thin as a young mother's, who doth seek
By every lull to cool her infant's pain:
"How ill she is," said he, "I may not
speak;
And yet I will, and tell my love all
plain:
If looks speak love-laws, I will drink her
tears,
And at the least 'twill startle off her
care."
- 6 So said he one fair morning, and all day
His heart beat awfully against his side:
And to his heart he inwardly did pray For power to speak; but still the ruddy tide
Stuffed his voice, and puls'd resolve away—Fever'd his high conceit of such a bride, Yet brought him to the meekness of a
child:
Alas! when passion is both meek and wild!
- 7 So once more he had wak'd and anguished
A dreary night of love and misery,
If Isabel's quick eye had not been wed
To every symbol on his forehead high;
She saw it waxing very pale and dead,
And straight all flush'd; so, hup'd tenderly,
"Lorenzo!"—here she ceas'd her timid
quest,
But in her tone and look he read the rest
- 8 "O Isabella, I can half perceive That I may speak my grief into thine ear,
If thou didst ever anything believe, Believe how I love thee, believe how near My soul is to its doom: I would not grieve Thy hand by unwelcome pressing, would not fear
Thine eyes by gazing; but I cannot live Another night, and not my passion shrive.
- 9 "Love! thou art leading me from wintry
cold,
Lady! thou leadest me to summer clime,
And I must taste the blossoms that unfold In its ripe warmth this gracious morning time."
So said, his erewhile timid lips grew bold,
And poesied with hers in dewy rhyme:
Great bliss was with them, and great happiness
Grew, like a lusty flower in June's caress
- 10 Parting, they seem'd to tread upon the
air,
Twin roses by the zephyr blown apart
Only to meet again more close, and share The inward fragrance of each other's
heart.
She, to her chamber gone, a ditty fair Sang, of delicious love and honey'd dart;
He with light steps went up a western hill,
And bade the sun farewell, and joy'd his fill.
- 11 All close they met again, before the dusk Had taken from the stars its pleasant
veil,
All close they met, all eves, before the dusk
Had taken from the stars its pleasant
veil,
Close in a bower of hyacinth and musk, Unknown of any, free from whispering tale.
Ah! better had it been forever so,
Than idle ears should pleasure in their woe.
- 12 Were they unhappy then?—It cannot be—Too many tears for lovers have been
shed,
Too many sighs give we to them in fee,¹
Too much of pity after they are dead,
Too many doleful stories do we see, Whose matter in bright gold were best be read,
Except in such a page where Theseus' spouse²
Over the pathless waves towards him bows
- 13 But, for the general award of love,
The little sweet doth kill much bitter-
ness;
Though Dido silent is in under-grove,
And Isabella's was a great distress, Though young Lorenzo in warm Indian clove
Was not embalm'd, this truth is not the
less—Even bees, the little almsmen of spring-
bowers,
Know there is richest juice in poison-
flowers.
- 14 With her two brothers this fair lady dwelt, Enriched from ancestral merchandize, And for them many a weary hand did swelt
In torched mines and noisy factories,

¹ pay: wages² Ariadne She aided Theseus in finding his way out of the labyrinth and fled with him to the island of Naxos, where she was abandoned. (Odyssey, 11, 321 ff)

- And many once proud-quiver'd loins did melt In blood from stinging whip;—with hollow eyes
Many all day in dazzling river stood,
To take the rich-ored driftings of the flood.
- 15 For them the Ceylon diver held his breath,
And went all naked to the hungry shark,
For them his ears gush'd blood; for them in death
The seal on the cold ice with piteous bark Lay full of darts; for them alone did seethe
A thousand men in troubles wide and dark.
Half-ignorant, they turn'd an easy wheel,
That set sharp racks at work, to pinch and peel.
- 16 Why were they proud? Because their marble founts Gush'd with more pride than do a wretch's tears!—
Why were they proud? Because fair orange-mounts Were of more soft ascent than lazar stairs!¹—Why were they proud? Because red-lin'd accounts Were richer than the songs of Grecian years!—
Why were they proud? again we ask aloud, Why in the name of Glory were they proud?
- 17 Yet were these Florentines as self-retired In hungry pride and gainful cowardice,
As two close Hebrews in that land inspired,
Paled in² and vineyarded from beggar-spies;
The hawks of ship-mast forests³—the untired
And pannier'd mules for ducats and old lies—Quick cat's-paws on the generous stray-away,— Great wits in Spanish, Tuscan, and Malay.
- 18 How was it these same ledger-men could spy Fair Isabella in her downy nest?
How could they find out in Lorenzo's eye
A straying from his toil? Hot Egypt's pest⁴
- Into their vision covetous and sly!
How could these money-bags see east and west?—
Yet so they did—and every dealer fair Must see behind, as doth the hunted hare.
- 19 O eloquent and famed Boccaccio!
Of thee we now should ask forgiving boon,
And of thy spicy myrtles as they blow,
And of thy roses amorous of the moon,
And of thy lilies, that do paler grow
Now they can no more hear thy ghittorn's¹ tune, For venturing syllables that ill beseeem
The quiet glooms of such a piteous theme.
- 20 Grant thou a pardon here, and then the tale Shall move on soberly, as it is meet,
There is no other crime, no mad assail
To make old prose in modern rhyme more sweet
But it is done—succeed the verse or fail—
To honor thee, and thy gone spirit greet,
To stead thee as a verse in English tongue,
An echo of thee in the north-wind sung
- 21 These brethren having found by many signs What love Lorenzo for their sister had,
And how she lov'd him too, each uncon-fines
His better thoughts to other, well nigh mad
That he, the servant of their trade designs, Should in their sister's love be blithe and glad,
When 'twas their plan to coax her by degrees
To some high noble and his olive-trees
- 22 And many a jealous conference had they,
And many times they bit their lips alone,
Before they fix'd upon a surest way To make the youngster for his crime atone;
And at the last, these men of cruel clay Cut Mercy with a sharp knife to the bone,
For they resolved in some forest dim To kill Lorenzo, and there bury him.
- 23 So on a pleasant morning, as he leant
Into the sunrise, o'er the balustrade
Of the garden-terrace, towards him they bent

¹ hospital stairs² enclosed³ They take advantage of trading vessels in port⁴ Swarms of flies See Exodus, 8 21.¹ A stringed instrument similar to a guitar.

- Their footing through the dews; and to him said,
 "You seem there in the quiet of content, Lorenzo, and we are most loth to invade Calm speculation, but if you are wise, Bestride your steed while cold is in the 28
 skies.
- 24 "Today we purpose, aye, this hour we mount
 To spur three leagues towards the Apennine,
 Come down, we pray thee, ere the hot sun count
 His dewy rosary on the eglantine "
 Lorenzo, courteously as he was wont, Bow'd a fair greeting to these serpents' whine,
 And went in haste, to get in readiness, With belt, and spur, and bracing hunts-man's dress.
- 25 And as he to the court-yard pass'd along, Each third step did he pause, and lis-ten'd oft
 If he could hear his lady's matin-song,
 Or the light whisper of her footstep
 soft;
 And as he thus over his passion hung,
 He heard a laugh full musical aloft;
 When, looking up, he saw her features
 bright
 Smile through an in-door lattice, all de-
 light.
- 26 "Love, Isabel!" said he, "I was in pain Lest I should miss to bid thee a good
 morrow "
 Ah! what if I should lose thee, when so fain
 I am to stifle all the heavy sorrow
 Of a poor three hours' absence? but we'll gain
 Out of the amorous dark what day doth borrow.
 Good bye! I'll soon be back."—"Good bye!" said she:—
 And as he went she chanted merrily.
- 27 So the two brothers and their murder'd
 man Rode past fair Florence, to where Arno's
 stream Gurgles through straiten'd banks, and still doth fan Itself with dancing bulrush, and the bream Keeps head against the freshets. Sick and wan
- The brothers' faces in the ford did seem, Lorenzo's flush with love.—They pass'd the water
 Into a forest quiet for the slaughter.
- 28 There was Lorenzo slain and buried in,
 There in that forest did his great love cease,
 Ah! when a soul doth thus its freedom win,
 It aches in loneliness—is ill at peace As the break-covert bloodhounds of such sin:
 They dipp'd their swords in the water, and did tease
 Their horses homeward, with convulsed
 spur,
 Each richer by his being a murderer.
- 29 They told their sister how, with sudden
 speed, Lorenzo had ta'en ship for foreign lands,
 Because of some great urgency and need
 In their affairs, requiring trusty hands Poor girl! put on thy stifling widow's weed,¹
 And 'scape at once from Hope's accursed bands;
 Today thou wilt not see him, nor tomorrow,
 And the next day will be a day of sorrow
- 30 She weeps alone for pleasures not to be, Sorely she wept until the night came on,
 And then, instead of love, O misery!
 She brooded o'er the luxury alone:
 His image in the dusk she seem'd to see,
 And to the silence made a gentle moan,
 Spreading her perfect arms upon the air,
 And on her couch low murmuring "Where?
 O where?"
- 31 But Selfishness, Love's cousin, held not long
 Its fiery vigil in her single breast;
 She fretted for the golden hour, and hung Upon the time with feverish unrest—
 Not long—for soon into her heart a throng
 Of higher occupants, a richer zest, Came tragic, passion not to be subdued,
 And sorrow for her love in travels rude
- 32 In the mid days of autumn, on their eves
 The breath of winter comes from far
 away,
 And the sick west continually bereaves Of some gold tinge, and plays a rounde-
¹ garment; attire

- Of death among the bushes and the leaves,
To make all bare before he dares to stray From his north cavern. So sweet Isabel By gradual decay from beauty fell,
- 33 Because Lorenzo came not. Oftentimes She ask'd her brothers, with an eye all
pale,
Striving to be itself, what dungeon chimes Could keep him off so long? They spake a tale
Time after time, to quiet her. Their crimes Came on them, like a smoke from Hinnom's vale;
And every night in dreams they groan'd
aloud,
To see their sister in her snowy shroud
- 34 And she had died in drowsy ignorance, But for a thing more deadly dark than
all;
It came like a fierce potion, drunk by chance,
Which saves a sick man from the feather'd pall
For some few gasping moments; like a lance,
Waking an Indian from his cloudy hall
With cruel pierce, and bringing him again Sense of the gnawing fire at heart and
brain.
- 35 It was a vision —In the drowsy gloom,
The dull of midnight, at her couch's foot Lorenzo stood, and wept: the forest tomb Had marr'd his glossy hair which once could shoot
Lustre into the sun, and put cold doom Upon his lips, and taken the soft lute
From his lorn voice, and past his loamed ears
Had made a miry channel for his tears
- 36 Strange sound it was, when the pale shadow spake;
For there was striving, in its piteous
tongue,
To speak as when on earth it was awake,
And Isabella on its music hung:
Languor there was in it, and tremulous
shake,
As in a palsied Druid's harp unstrung;
And through it moan'd a ghostly under-
song,
Like hoarse night-gusts sepulchral briars
among.
- 37 Its eyes, though wild, were still all dewy
bright
- With love, and kept all phantom fear aloof
From the poor girl by magic of their light,
The while it did unthread the horrid
woof
Of the late darken'd time,—the murderous spite Of pride and avarice,—the dark pine roof
In the forest,—and the sodden turfed dell, Where, without any word, from stabs he fell
- 38 Saying moreover, "Isabel, my sweet!
Red whortleberries droop above my
head,
And a large flint-stone weighs upon my
feet;
Around me beeches and high chestnuts
shed
Their leaves and prickly nuts, a sheep-fold bleat
Comes from beyond the river to my bed
Go, shed one tear upon my heather-bloom,
And it shall comfort me within the tomb
- 39 "I am a shadow now, alas! alas!
Upon the skirts of human nature dwelling
Alone: I chant alone the holy mass, While little sounds of life are round me
knelling,
And glossy bees at noon do fieldward pass,
And many a chapel bell the hour is telling,
Paining me through these sounds grow strange to me,
And thou art distant in Humanity
- 40 "I know what was, I feel full well what is,
And I should rage, if spirits could go
mad;
Though I forget the taste of earthly bliss, That paleness warms my grave, as though I had A seraph chosen from the bright abyss To be my spouse thy paleness makes me glad;
Thy beauty grows upon me, and I feel A greater love through all my essence steal."
- 41 The Spirit mourn'd "Adieu!"—dissolv'd and left
The atom darkness in a slow turmoil;
As when of healthful midnight sleep bereft, Thinking on rugged hours and fruitless
toil,

- We put our eyes into a pillowy cleft,
And see the spangly¹ gloom froth up and boil:
It made sad Isabella's eyelids ache,
And in the dawn she started up awake;
- 42 "Ha! ha!" said she, "I knew not this hard life,
I thought the worst was simple misery;
I thought some Fate with pleasure or with strife
Portion'd us—happy days, or else to
die;
But there is crime—a brother's bloody knife!
Sweet Spirit, thou hast school'd my infancy:
I'll visit thee for this, and kiss thine eyes,
And greet thee morn and even in the skies."
- 43 When the full morning came, she had de-vis'd
How she might secret to the forest hie, How she might find the clay, so dearly priz'd,
And sing to it one latest lullaby;
How her short absence might be unsurmis'd,
While she the inmost of the dream would try.
Resolv'd, she took with her an aged nurse,
And went into that dismal forest-hearse.
- 44 See, as they creep along the river side, How she doth whisper to that aged dame,
And, after looking round the champaign²
wide,
Shows her a knife. — "What feverous hectic flame Burns in thee, child? — What good can thee betide,
That thou should'st smile again?" —
The evening came,
And they had found Lorenzo's earthy bed.
The flint was there, the berries at his head
- 45 Who hath not loiter'd in a green churchyard,
And let his spirit, like a demon-mole,
Work through the clayey soil and gravel
hard,
To see skull, coffin'd bones, and funeral
stole;
Pitying each form that hungry Death hath marr'd,
And filling it once more with human
soul?
- Ah! this is holiday to what was felt When Isabella by Lorenzo knelt.
- 46 She gaz'd into the fresh-thrown mould, as though
One glance did fully all its secrets tell;
Clearly she saw, as other eyes would know Pale limbs at bottom of a crystal well; Upon the murderous spot she seem'd to grow,
Like to a native lily of the dell:
Then with her knife, all sudden, she began To dig more fervently than misers can.
- 47 Soon she turn'd up a soiled glove, whereon Her silk had play'd in purple phan-
tasies,
She kiss'd it with a lip more chill than
stone,
And put it in her bosom, where it dries
And freezes utterly unto the bone Those dainties made to still an infant's cries:
Then 'gan she work again; nor stay'd her
care,
But to throw back at times her veiling hair.
- 48 That old nurse stood beside her wondering, Until her heart felt pity to the core At sight of such a dismal laboring,
And so she kneeled, with her locks all
hoar,
And put her lean hands to the horrid thing:
Three hours they labor'd at this travail soie,
At last they felt the kernel of the grave,
And Isabella did not stamp and rave.
- 49 Ah! wherefore all this wormy circumstance?
Why linger at the yawning tomb so long?
O for the gentleness of old Romance,
The simple plaining¹ of a minstrel's
song!
Fair reader, at the old tale take a glance,
For here, in truth, it doth not well belong To speak. — O turn thee to the very tale, And taste the music of that vision pale
- 50 With duller steel than the Perséan sword² They cut away no formless monster's
head,
But one, whose gentleness did well accord With death, as life. The ancient harps have said,
Love never dies, but lives, immortal Lord
If Love impersonate was ever dead.

- Pale Isabella kiss'd it, and low moan'd.
 'Twas love; cold,—dead indeed, but not dethron'd.
- 51 In anxious secrecy they took it home,
 And then the prize was all for Isabel:
 She calm'd its wild hair with a golden comb,
 And all around each eye's sepulchral cell Pointed each fringed lash; the smeared loam
 With tears, as chilly as a dripping well, She drench'd away:—and still she comb'd, and kept Sighing all day—and still she kiss'd, and wept.
- 52 Then in a silken scarf,—sweet with the dews
 Of precious flowers pluck'd in Araby,
 And divine liquids come with odorous ooze Through the cold serpent-pipe¹ refreshfully,—
 She wrapp'd it up; and for its tomb did choose
 A garden-pot, wherein she laid it by,
 And cover'd it with mould, and o'er it set Sweet Basil, which her tears kept ever wet.
- 53 And she forgot the stars, the moon, and
 sun,
 And she forgot the blue above the trees,
 And she forgot the dells where waters run,
 And she forgot the chilly autumn breeze, She had no knowledge when the day was
 done,
 And the new morn she saw not: but in peace
 Hung over her sweet Basil evermore,
 And moisten'd it with tears unto the core.
- 54 And so she ever fed it with thin tears, Whence thick, and green, and beautiful it grew,
 So that it smelt more balmy than its peers
 Of Basil-tufts in Florence; for it drew Nurture besides, and life, from human fears,
 From the fast mouldering head there shut from view.
 So that the jewel, safely casketed,
 Came forth, and in perfumed leaflets spread.
- 55 O Melancholy, linger here awhile!
 O Music, Music, breathe despondingly!
 O Echo, Echo, from some sombre isle, Unknown, Lethæan, sigh to us—O sigh!
- Spirits in grief, lift up your heads, and
 smile;
 Lift up your heads, sweet Spirits, heavily,
 And make a pale light in your cypress¹ glooms, Tinting with silver wan your marble tombs.
- 56 Moan hither, all ye syllables of woe,
 From the deep throat of sad Melpomene!
 Through bronzed lyre in tragic order go,
 And touch the strings into a mystery; Sound mournfully upon the winds and
 low;
 For simple Isabel is soon to be Among the dead: she withers, like a palm Cut by an Indian for its juicy balm.
- 57 O leave the palm to wither by itself; Let not quick winter chill its dying
 hour!—
 It may not be—those Baalites of pelf,² Her brethren, noted the continual shower From her dead eyes; and many a curious
 elf, Among her kindred, wonder'd that such
 dower
 Of youth and beauty should be thrown aside
 By one mark'd out to be a noble's bride.
- 58 And, furthermore, her brethren wonder'd
 much
 Why she sat drooping by the Basil green,
 And why it flourish'd, as by magic touch; Greatly they wonder'd what the thing might mean.
 They could not surely give belief, that such A very nothing would have power to wean
 Her from her own fair youth, and pleasures gay,
 And even remembrance of her love's delay.
- 59 Therefore they watch'd a time when they might sift
 This hidden whim; and long they watch'd in vain;
 For seldom did she go to chapel-shrift,
 And seldom felt she any hunger-pain;
 And when she left, she hurried back, as swift
 As bird on wing to breast its eggs again;
 And, patient as a hen-bird, sat her there Beside her Basil, weeping through her hair.

¹ The cypress is an emblem of mourning. It is a common tree in graveyards

² Worshipers of pelf, as pagans worshiped Baal.

60 Yet they contriv'd to steal the Basil-pot,
 And to examine it in secret place;
 The thing was vile with green and livid spot,
 And yet they knew it was Lorenzo's
 face:
 The guerdon of their murder they had got,
 And so left Florence in a moment's
 space,
 Never to turn again.—Away they went,
 With blood upon their heads, to banishment.

61 O Melancholy, turn thine eyes away!
 O Music, Music, breathe despondingly!
 O Echo, Echo, on some other day,
 From isles Lethæan, sigh to us—O sigh!
 Spirits of grief, sing not your "Well-away!"
 For Isabel, sweet Isabel, will die;
 Will die a death too lone and incomplete,
 Now they have ta'en away her Basil sweet.

62 Piteous she look'd on dead and senseless
 things,
 Asking for her lost Basil amorously,
 And with melodious chuckle in the strings Of her lorn voice, she oftentimes would cry
 After the pilgrim in his wanderings, To ask him where her Basil was, and
 why
 'Twas hid from her: "For cruel 'tis," said she,
 "To steal my Basil-pot away from me"

63 And so she pined, and so she died forlorn, Imploping for her Basil to the last.
 No heart was there in Florence but did mourn
 In pity of her love, so overcast.
 And a sad ditty of this story born From mouth to mouth through all the country pass'd:
 Still is the burthen sung — "O cruelty,
 To steal my Basil-pot away from me!"

TO HOMER
 1818 1848

Standing aloof in giant ignorance,
 Of thee I hear and of the Cyclades,
 As one who sits ashore and longs perchance
 To visit dolphin-coral in deep seas.
 5 So thou wast blind;—but then the veil was rent,
 For Jove uncertain'd Heaven to let thee
 live,
 And Neptune made for thee a spumy tent,

And Pan made sing for thee his foresthive;
 Ay on the shores of darkness there is light, 10 And precipices show untrodden green,
 There is a budding morrow in midnight,
 There is a triple sight in blindness keen;
 Such seeing hadst thou, as it once befel To Dian, Queen of Earth, and Heaven, and Hell.

FRAGMENT OF AN ODE TO MAIA
 1818 1848

Mother of Hermes! and still youthful Maia!
 May I sing to thee
 As thou wast hymned on the shores of Baïæ?
 Or may I woo thee
 5 In earlier Sicilian? or thy smiles Seek as they once were sought, in Grecian isles,
 By bards who died content on pleasant
 sward,
 Leaving great verse unto a little clan?
 O, give me their old vigor, and unheard 10 Save of the quiet primrose, and the span Of heaven and few ears, Rounded by thee, my song should die away Content as theirs,
 Rich in the simple worship of a day.

TO AILSA ROCK
 1818 1819

Hearken, thou craggy ocean pyramid!
 Give answer from thy voice, the sea-fowls' screams!
 When were thy shoulders mantled in huge
 streams?
 When, from the sun, was thy broad forehead hid?
 5 How long is 't since the mighty power bid Thee heave to airy sleep from fathom dreams?
 Sleep in the lap of thunder or sunbeams,
 Or when gray clouds are thy cold cover-lid.
 Thou answer'st not; for thou art dead
 asleep;
 10 Thy life is but two dead eternities—
 The last in air, the former in the deep;
 First with the whales, last with the eagle-
 skies—
 Drown'd wast thou till an earthquake made thee steep,
 Another cannot wake thy giant size.

¹ Baïæ and Sicily were both Greek colonies.

1818

1820

- Ever let the Fancy roam,
 Pleasure never is at home.
 At a touch sweet Pleasure melteth,
 Like to bubbles when rain pelteth,
 5 Then let winged Fancy wander Through the thought still spread beyond
 her
 Open wide the muid's cage-door,
 She'll dart forth, and cloudward soar.
 O sweet Fancy! let her loose, 10 Summer's joys are spoilt by use,
 And the enjoying of the spring Fades as does its blossoming, Autumn's red-lipp'd fruitage too, Blushing through the mist and dew, 15 Cloys with tasting. What do then?
 Sit thee by the ingle,¹ when The sear faggot blazes bright, Spirit of a winter's night;
 When the soundless earth is muffled, 20 And the caked snow is shuffled From the ploughboy's heavy shoon,² When the Night doth meet the Noon
 In a dark conspiracy To banish Even from her sky 25 Sit thee there, and send abroad,
 With a mind self-overaw'd, Fancy, high-commission'd — send her!
 She has vassals to attend her.
 She will bring, in spite of frost, 30 Beauties that the earth hath lost,
 She will bring thee, all together,
 All delights of summer weather;
 All the buds and bells of May,
 From dewy sward or thorny spray, 35 All the heaped autumn's wealth,
 With a still, mysterious stealth.
 She will mix these pleasures up Like three fit wines in a cup,
 And thou shalt quaff it — thou shalt hear 40 Distant harvest-carols clear; Rustle of the reaped corn,³ Sweet birds antheming the morn:
 And, in the same moment — hark!
 'Tis the early April lark, 45 Or the rooks, with busy caw, Foraging for sticks and straw Thou shalt, at one glance, behold
 The daisy and the margold; White-plum'd lilies, and the first 50 Hedge-grown primrose that hath burst, Shaded hyacinth, alway Sapphire queen of the mid-May;
 And every leaf, and every flower Pearled with the self-same shower.

- 55 Thou shalt see the field-mouse peep Meagre from its celled sleep;
 And the snake all winter-thin Cast on sunny bank its skin, Freckled nest-eggs thou shalt see 60 Hatching in the hawthorn-tree, When the hen-bird's wing doth rest Quiet on her mossy nest;
 Then the hurry and alarm
 When the bee-hive casts its swarm, 65 Acorns ripe down-pattering, While the autumn breezes sing.

- Oh, sweet Fancy! let her loose;
 Every thing is spoilt by use.
 Where's the cheek that doth not fade, 70 Too much gaz'd at? Where's the maid Whose lip mature is ever new?
 Where's the eye, however blue, Doth not weary? Where's the face
 One would meet in every place?
 75 Where's the voice, however soft,
 One would hear so very oft?
 At a touch sweet Pleasure melteth
 Like to bubbles when rain pelteth.
 Let, then, winged Fancy find 80 Thee a mistress to thy mind.
 Dulcet-eyed as Ceres' daughter,¹ Ere the God of Torment taught her How to frown and how to chide,
 With a waist and with a side 85 White as Hebe's, when her zone² Slipt its golden clasp, and down Fell her kirtle to her feet, While she held the goblet sweet,
 And Jove grew languid. — Break the mesh 90 Of the Fancy's silken leash, Quickly break her prison-string And such joys as these she'll bring. — Let the winged Fancy roam, Pleasure never is at home.

ODE

1819

- Bards of Passion and of Mirth,
 Ye have left your souls on earth!
 Have ye souls in heaven too,
 Double-lived in regions new?
 5 Yes, and those of heaven commune
 With the spheres of sun and moon;
 With the noise of fountains wond'rous,
 And the parley³ of voices thund'rous;
 With the whisper of heaven's trees 10 And one another, in soft ease Seated on Elysian lawns

¹ Proserpine, whom Pluto carried as his bride to the lower world.² girdle³ parley; discourse

Brows'd by none but Dian's fawns;¹ Underneath large blue-bells tented,
 Where the daisies are rose-scented, 15 And the rose herself has got Perfume which on earth is not;
 Where the nightingale doth sing
 Not a senseless, tranced thing, But divine melodious truth, 20 Philosophic numbers smooth; Tales and golden histories Of heaven and its mysteries

Thus ye live on high, and then On the earth ye live again, 25 And the souls ye left behind you Teach us, here, the way to find you, Where your other souls are joying.
 Never slumber'd, never cloying Here, your earth-born souls still speak 30 To mortals, of their little week,
 Of their sorrows and delights,
 Of their passions and their spites;
 Of their glory and their shame;
 What doth strengthen and what maim.
 35 Thus ye teach us, every day.
 Wisdom, though fled far away

Bards of Passion and of Mirth,
 Ye have left your souls on earth!
 Ye have souls in heaven too, 40 Double-lived in regions new!

ODE ON MELANCHOLY

1819

1820

No, no! go not to Lethe, neither twist Wolf's-bane,² tight-rooted, for its porsonous wine,
 Nor suffer thy pale forehead to be kiss'd By nightshade, ruby grape of Proserpine;
 5 Make not your rosary of yew-berries,³ Nor let the beetle,⁴ nor the death-moth⁵
 be Your mournful Psyche,⁶ nor the downy owl
 A partner in your sorrow's mysteries;
 For shade to shade will come too drowsily, 10 And drown the wakeful anguish of the soul

¹ The fawn was Diana's favorite animal.² A kind of poisonous plant³ The yew is an emblem of mourning⁴ The sacred beetle of Egypt was regarded as a symbol of the resurrection of the soul, and was placed in coffins⁵ A moth with markings which resembled the human skull.⁶ Psyche, the soul, was symbolized by the butterfly.

But when the melancholy fit shall fall Sudden from heaven like a weeping
 cloud,
 That fosters the droop-headed flowers all,
 And hides the green hill in an April shroud;
 15 Then glut thy sorrow on a morning rose,
 Or on the rainbow of the salt sand-
 wave,
 Or on the wealth of globed peonies;
 Or if thy mistress some rich anger shows, Emprison her soft hand, and let her rave, 20 And feed deep, deep upon her peerless eyes

She dwells with Beauty — Beauty that must die;
 And Joy, whose hand is ever at his lips Bidding adieu; and aching Pleasure nigh, Turning to poison while the bee-mouth sips:
 25 Ay, in the very temple of Delight Veil'd Melancholy has her sovran shrine, Though seen of none save him whose strenuous tongue Can burst Joy's grape against his palate fine;
 His soul shall taste the sadness of her
 might,
 30 And be among her cloudy trophies

ODE ON A GRECIAN URN

1819

1820

Thou still unravish'd bride of quietness, Thou foster-child of silence and slow
 time,
 Sylvan historian,¹ who canst thus express A flowery tale more sweetly than our rhyme:
 5 What leaf-fring'd legend haunts about thy shape
 Of deities or mortals, or of both,
 In Tempe or the dales of Arcady?
 What men or gods are these? What maidens loth?
 What mad pursuit? What struggle to escape?
 10 What pipes and timbrels? What wild ecstasy?

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard
 Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on;

¹ historian of scenes of the wood

Not to the sensual ear,¹ but, more en-
dear'd,

Pipe to the spirit ditties of no tone.

15 Fair youth, beneath the trees, thou canst not leave

Thy song, nor ever can those trees be bare;

Bold lover, never, never canst thou
kiss,

Though winning near the goal—yet, do not grieve,

She cannot fade, though thou hast not thy bliss,

20 Forever wilt thou love, and she be fair!

Ah, happy, happy boughs! that cannot
shed

Your leaves, nor ever bid the spring adieu;

And, happy melodist, unwearied, Forever piping songs forever new;

25 More happy love! more happy, happy
love!

Forever warm and still to be enjoy'd, Forever panting, and forever young;

All breathing human passion far above, That leaves a heart high-sorrowful and
cloy'd,

30 A burning forehead, and a parching
tongue.

Who are these coming to the sacrifice?

To what green altar, O mysterious priest,

Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the
skies,

And all her silken flanks with garlands
drest?

35 What little town by river or sea shore,
Or mountain-built with peaceful citadel, Is emptied of this folk, this pious morn?

And, little town, thy streets forevermore Will silent be; and not a soul to tell

40 Why thou art desolate, can e'er return.

O Attic shape! Fair attitude! with brede² Of marble men and maidens over-

wrought,

With forest branches and the trodden
weed;

Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of
thought

45 As doth eternity. Cold pastoral!³

When old age shall this generation waste,

Thou shalt remain, in midst of other
woe

Than ours, a friend to man, to whom thou say'st,

50 "Beauty is truth, truth beauty," that is all Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.¹

ODE ON INDOLENCE

1819

1848

They toll not, neither do they spin.²

One morn before me were three figures
seen,

With bowed necks, and joined hands,
side-fac'd;

And one behind the other stepp'd serene,
In placid sandals, and in white robes grac'd;

5 They pass'd, like figures on a marble urn, When shifted round to see the other
side;

They came again; as when the urn
once more

Is shifted round, the first seen shades return;

And they were strange to me, as may betide

10 With vases, to one deep in Phidian
lore.

How is it, shadows! that I knew ye not?
How came ye muffled in so hush a mask?

Was it a silent deep-disguised plot

To steal away, and leave without a task

15 My idle days? Ripe was the drowsy hour;
The blissful cloud of summer-indolence Benumb'd my eyes; my pulse grew less and less;

Pain had no sting, and pleasure's wreath no flower:

O, why did ye not melt, and leave my sense

20 Unhaunted quite of all but—nothing-
ness?

A third time pass'd they by, and, passing,
turn'd

Each one the face a moment whiles to
me;

Then faded, and to follow them I burn'd And ach'd for wings because I knew the three;

25 The first was a fair maid, and Love her
name;

The second was Ambition, pale of cheek,

And ever watchful with fatigued eye.
The last, whom I love more, the more of blame
Is heap'd upon her, maiden most unmeek,—

30 I knew to be my demon¹ Poesy.

They faded, and, forsooth! I wanted
 wings.
O folly! What is Love? and where is it?

And for that poor Ambition! it springs From a man's little heart's short fever-fit;

35 For Poesy!—no,—she has not a joy,— At least for me,—so sweet as drowsy noons,
And evenings steep'd in honied indolence;

O, for an age so shelter'd from annoy, That I may never know how change the moons,

40 Or hear the voice of busy commonsense!

And once more came they by,—alas!
 wherefore?

My sleep had been embroider'd with dim dreams,
My soul had been a lawn besprinkled o'er With flowers, and stirring shades, and baffled beams.

45 The morn was clouded, but no shower fell, Tho' in her lids hung the sweet tears of May.

The open casement press'd a newleav'd vine,

Let in the budding warmth and thistle's lay,

O shadows! 'twas a time to bid farewell!
50 Upon your skirts had fallen no tears of mine

So, ye three ghosts, adieu! Ye cannot raise

My head cool-bedded in the flowery
 grass,

For I would not be dieted with praise.

A pet-lamb in a sentimental farce!

55 Fade softly from my eyes, and be once
 more

In masque-like figures on the dreamy urn;

Farewell! I yet have visions for the
 night,

And for the day faint visions there is store;

Vanish, ye phantoms! from my idle spright, 60 Into the clouds, and nevermore return!

LA BELLE DAME SANS MERCI²
1819 1820

Ah, what can ail thee, wretched wight,³ Alone and palely loitering,
The sedge is wither'd from the lake,
And no birds sing.

5 Ah, what can ail thee, wretched wight,
So haggard and so woe-begone?
The squirrel's granary is full,
And the harvest's done.

I see a lily on thy brow, 10 With anguish moist and fever dew;
And on thy cheek a fading rose Fast withereth too.

I met a lady in the meads Full beautiful—a faery's child; 15 Her hair was long, her foot was light,
And her eyes were wild

I set her on my pacing steed,
And nothing else saw all day long;
For sideways would she lean, and sing 20 A faery's song.

I made a garland for her head,
And bracelets too, and fragrant zone,⁴ She look'd at me as she did love,
And made sweet moan

25 She found me roots of relish sweet,
And honey wild, and manna dew;
And sure in language strange she said,
"I love thee true."

She took me to her elfin grot, 30 And there she gaz'd and sigh'd deep,
And there I shut her wild, wild eyes—
So kiss'd to sleep

And there we slumber'd on the moss,
And there I dream'd—ah! woe betide!— 35 The latest dream I ever dream'd On the cold hillside.

I saw pale kings, and princes too,
Pale warriors, death-pale were they all;
Who cry'd—"La Belle Dame sans Merci 40 Hath thee in thrall!"

How fever'd is the man, who cannot look Upon his mortal days with temperate
blood,

- Who vexes all the leaves of his life's book,
And robs its fair name of its maidenhood;
5 It is as if the rose should pluck herself,
Or the ripe plum finger its misty bloom,
As if a Naiad, like a meddling elf, Should darken her pure grot with muddy
gloom:

- But the rose leaves herself upon the briar,
For winds to kiss and grateful bees to feed, 10 And the ripe plum still wears its dum attire.
The undisturbed lake has crystal space, Why then should man, teasing the world for grace,
Spoil his salvation for a fierce miscreed?¹

ANOTHER ON FAME

TO SLEEP

1819 1848

O soft embalmer of the still midnight, Shutting, with careful fingers and benign, Our gloom-pleas'd eyes, embower'd from the light,

Enshaded in forgetfulness divine:

- 5 O soothest Sleep! if so it please thee, close

In midst of this thine hymn my willing
eyes,

Or wait the amen, ere thy poppy throws Around my bed its lulling charities.

Then save me, or the passed day will shine

- 10 Upon my pillow, breeding many woes,— Save me from curious conscience, that still lords

Its strength for darkness, burrowing like a mole;

And seal the hushed casket of my soul

ODE TO PSYCHE

1819 1820

O Goddess! hear these tuneless numbers,
wrung

By sweet enforcement and remembrance
dear,

And pardon that thy secrets should be sung

Even unto thine own soft-conched¹ ear:

- 5 Surely I dreamt today, or did I see The wing'd Psyche with awaken'd eyes?
I wander'd in a forest thoughtlessly,
And, on the sudden, fainting with surprise,

Saw two fair creatures, couched side by side

- 10 In deepest grass, beneath the whi-p'ring roof

Of leaves and trembled blossoms, where there ran

A brooklet, scarce espied

'Mid hush'd, cool-rooted flowers fragrant-ey'd,

Blue, silver-white, and budded Tyrian,²

- 15 They lay calm-breathing on the bedded
grass;

Their arms embraced, and their pinions too;

Their lips touch'd not, but had not bade
adieu,

As if disjoined by soft-handed slumber.

And ready still past kisses to outnumber

- 20 At tender eye-dawn of aurean love:

The winged boy I knew;
But who wast thou, O happy, happy

His Psyche true!

O latest-born and loveliest vision far 25 Of all Olympus' faded hierarchy' Fairer than Phoebe's sapphire-region'd
star,
Or Vesper, amorous glowworm of the
sky;
Fairer than these, though temple thou hast none,
Nor altar heap'd with flowers;
30 Nor virgin-choir to make delicious moan
Upon the midnight hours;
No voice, no lute, no pipe, no incense
sweet
From chain-swung censer teeming;
No shrine, no grove, no oracle, no heat 35 Of pale-mouth'd prophet dreaming.

O brightest! though too late for antique
vows,
Too, too late for the fond believing
lyre,
When holy were the haunted forest
boughs,
Holy the air, the water, and the fire;
40 Yet even in these days so far retir'd From happy pieties, thy lucent fans, Fluttering among the faint Olympians,
I see, and sing, by my own eyes inspir'd
So let me be thy choir, and make a moan
45 Upon the midnight hours;
Thy voice, thy lute, thy pipe, thy incense
sweet
From swinged censer teeming;
Thy shrine, thy grove, thy oracle, thy heat
Of pale-mouth'd prophet dreaming

50 Yes, I will be thy priest, and build a fane
In some untrodden region of my mind, Where branched thoughts, new grown with pleasant pain, Instead of pines shall murmur in the wind.
Far, far around shall those dark-cluster'd
trees

55 Fledge the wild-ridged mountains steep by steep;
And there by zephyrs, streams, and birds,
and bees,
The moss-lain Dryads shall be lull'd to
sleep;
And in the midst of this wide quietness
A rosy sanctuary will I dress 60 With the wreath'd trellis of a working
brain,

With buds, and bells, and stars without a name,
With all the gardener Fancy e'er could feign,
Who breeding flowers, will never breed
the same.
And there shall be for thee all soft delight 65 That shadowy thought can win, A bright torch, and a casement ope at
night,
To let the warm Love in!

ODE TO A NIGHTINGALE

1819

1819

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness
pains
My sense, as though of hemlock¹ I had drunk,
Or emptied some dull opiate to the drains One minute past, and Lethe-wards had sunk:
5 'Tis not through envy of thy happy lot, But being too happy in thine happiness,—
That thou, light-winged Dryad of the trees,
In some melodious plot
Of beechen green, and shadows number-
less, 10 Singest of summer in full-throated ease.

O for a draught of vintage! that hath been Cool'd a long age in the deep-delved
earth,
Tasting of Flora and the country green, Dance, and Provençal song, and sunburnt mirth!
15 O for a beaker full of the warm South, Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene,
With beaded bubbles winking at the brim,
And purple-stained mouth;
That I might drink, and leave the world
unseen,
20 And with thee fade away into the forest dim.

Fade far away, dissolve, and quite forget What thou among the leaves hast never known,
The weariness, the fever, and the fret Here, where men sit and hear each other
groan,
25 Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs.

¹ A drug made from the leaves or fruit of the thin, and dies;

Where but to think is to be full of

And leaden-eyed despairs, Where Beauty cannot keep her lustrous

10 Or new Love pine at them beyond tomorrow.

Away! away! for I will fly to thee, Not charioted by Bacchus and his pards,¹
But on the viewless² wings of Poesy, Though the dull brain perplexes and retards:
35 Already with thee! tender is the night,
And haply the Queen-Moon is on her
throne,
Cluster'd around by all her starry fays;
But here there is no light, Save what from heaven is with the breezes blown 40 Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy ways.

I cannot see what flowers are at my feet, Nor what soft incense hangs upon the
boughs,
But, in embalmed³ darkness, guess each

Wherewith the seasonable month endows

And mid-May's eldest child,
The coming musk-rose, full of dewy
wine, 50 The murmurous haunt of flies on summer eves

I have been half in love with easeful
Death,
Call'd him soft names in many a mused

Thou wast not born for death, immortal

No hungry generations tread thee down;
The voice I hear this passing night was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown:
65 Perhaps the self-same song that found a path Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
She stood in tears amid the alien corn;¹
The same that oft-times hath Charm'd magic casements, opening on the foam

Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
To toll me back from thee to my sole

As she is fam'd to do, deceiving elf 75 Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades Past the near meadows, over the still
stream,
Up the hill-side; and now 'tis buried
deep
In the next valley-glades.
Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
80 Fled is that music—do I wake or sleep?

LAMIA

1819 1820

PART I

Upon a time, before the faery broods Drove Nymph and Satyr from the prosperous woods,
Before King Oberon's bright diadem, Sceptre, and mantle, clasp'd with dewy
gem,
5 Frighted away the Dryads and the Fauns From rushes green, and brakes,² and cowslip'd lawns,
The ever-smitten Hermes empty left His golden throne, bent warm on amorous theft:
From high Olympus had he stolen light, 10 On this side of Jove's clouds, to escape the sight

Of his great summoner, and made retreat
 Into a forest on the shores of Crete.
 For somewhere in that sacred island dwelt A nymph, to whom all hoofed Satyrs knelt;

15 At whose white feet the languid Tritons
 pour'd
 Pearls, while on land they wither'd and ador'd.

Fast by the springs where she to bathe was wont,

And in those meads where sometime she might haunt,

Were strewn rich gifts, unknown to any Muse,

20 Though Fancy's casket were unlock'd to choose.

Ah, what a world of love was at her feet!
 So Hermes thought, and a celestial heat

Burnt from his winged heels to either ear,
 That from a whiteness, as the lily clear,

25 Blush'd into roses 'mid his golden hair, Fallen in jealous curls about his shoulders
 bare

From vale to vale, from wood to wood, he flew,

Breathing upon the flowers his passion
 new,

And wound with many a river to its head.
 30 To find where this sweet nymph prepar'd her secret bed:

In vain; the sweet nymph might nowhere be found,

And so he rested, on the lonely ground, Pensive, and full of painful jealousies Of the Wood-Gods, and even the very trees.

35 There as he stood, he heard a mournful
 voice,

Such as once heard, in gentle heart, destroys

All pain but pity: thus the lone voice
 spake:

"When from this wreathed tomb shall I
 awake!

When move in a sweet body fit for life,

40 And love, and pleasure, and the ruddy
 strife

Of hearts and lips! Ah, miserable me!"

The God, dove-footed, glided silently

Round bush and tree, soft-brushing, in his speed,

The taller grasses and full-flowering weed.

45 Until he found a palpitating snake, Bright, and cirque-couchant¹ in a dusky brake.

She was a gordian shape¹ of dazzling
 hue,

Vermilion-spotted, golden, green, and blue; Strip'd like a zebra, freckled like a paid,²

50 Ey'd like a peacock, and all crimson barr'd;

And full of silver moons, that, as she
 breath'd,

Dissolv'd, or brighter shone, or interwreath'd

Their lustres with the gloomier tapestries—

So rainbow-sided, touch'd with miseries, 55 She seem'd, at once, some penanc'd lady
 elf,

Some demon's mistress, or the demon's
 self.

Upon her crest she wore a wannish fire Sprinkled with stars, like Ariadne's tial;³

Her head was serpent, but ah, bitter-sweet!
 60 She had a woman's mouth with all its pearls complete.

And for her eyes—what could such eyes do there

But weep, and weep, that they were born so fair?

As Proserpine still weeps for her Sicilian air⁴

Her throat was serpent, but the words she spake

65 Came, as through bubbling honey, for Love's sake.

And thus; while Hermes on his pinions
 lay,

Like a stoop'd falcon ere he takes his prey.

"Fair Hermes, crown'd with feathers, fluttering light,

I had a splendid dream of thee last night:
 70 I saw thee sitting, on a throne of gold,

Among the Gods, upon Olympus old,
 The only sad one; for thou didst not hear

The soft, lute-finger'd Muses chanting
 clear,

Nor even Apollo when he sang alone,

75 Deaf to his throbbing throat's long, long melodious moan.

I dreamt I saw thee, rob'd in purple flakes, Break amorons through the clouds, as morning breaks,

And, swiftly as a bright Phœbean dart, Strike for the Cretan isle; and here thou art!

¹ That is, twisted into an intricate knot ² leopard
³ crown (It became a constellation after Ariadne's death)

⁴ The vale of Enna, in Sicily, from which she was carried off by Pluto to the lower world.

- 80 Too gentle Hermes, hast thou found the maid?"
Whereat the star of Lethe¹ not delay'd His rosy eloquence, and thus inquired:
"Thou smooth-lipp'd serpent, surely high inspired!
Thou beauteous wreath, with melancholy
eyes, 85 Possess whatever bliss thou canst devise, Telling me only where my nymph is fled,— Where she doth breathe!"—"Bright planet, thou hast said," Return'd the snake, "but seal with oaths, fair God!"
"I swear," said Hermes, "by my serpent rod,² 90 And by thine eyes, and by thy starry
crown!"
Light flew his earnest words, among the blossoms blown.
Then thus again the brilliance feminine:
"Too frail of heart! for this lost nymph of thine,
Free as the air, invisibly, she strays 95 About these thornless wilds; her pleasant
days
She tastes unseen; unseen her nimble feet Leave traces in the grass and flowers
sweet;
From weary tendrils, and bow'd branches
green,
She plucks the fruit unseen, she bathes un-
seen:
100 And by my power is her beauty veil'd
To keep it unaffronted, unassail'd
By the love-glances of unlovely eyes, Of Satyrs, Fauns, and blear'd Silenus'³
sighs.
Pale grew her immortality, for woe 105 Of all these lovers, and she grieved so I took compassion on her, bade her steep Her hair in weird syrups, that would keep Her loveliness invisible, yet free To wander as she loves, in liberty.
110 Thou shalt behold her, Hermes, thou alone, If thou wilt, as thou swearest, grant my boon!"
Then, once again, the charmed God began An oath, and through the serpent's ears it ran Warm, tremulous, devout, psalterian.⁴ 115 Ravish'd, she lifted her Circean head, Blush'd a live damask, and swift-lipping
said,
"I was a woman, let me have once more
A woman's shape, and charming as before.
I love a youth of Corinth—O the bliss!
120 Give me my woman's form, and place me where he is.
Stoop, Hermes, let me breathe upon thy
brow,
And thou shalt see thy sweet nymph even
now."
The God on half-shut feathers sank serene, She breath'd upon his eyes, and swift was seen 125 Of both the guarded nymph near-smiling on the green.
It was no dream; or say a dream it was, Real are the dreams of Gods, and smoothly
pass
Their pleasures in a long immortal dream.
One warm, flush'd moment, hovering, it might seem 130 Dash'd by the wood-nymph's beauty, so he burn'd;
Then, lighting on the printless verdure,
turn'd
To the swoon'd serpent, and with languid arm,
Delicate, put to proof the lithe Caducean charm⁵
So done, upon the nymph his eyes he bent
135 Full of adoring tears and blandishment, And towards her stept she, like a moon in wane,
Faded before him, cower'd, nor could restrain
Her fearful sobs, self-folding like a flower That faints into itself at evening hour.
But the God fostering her chilled hand, 140 She felt the warmth, her eyelids open'd bland,
And, like new flowers at morning song of bees, Bloom'd, and gave up her honey to the lees.
Into the green-recessed woods they flew;
145 Nor grew they pale, as mortal lovers do.
Left to herself, the serpent now began To change; her elfin blood in madness ran,
Her mouth foam'd, and the grass, therewith besprent,
Wither'd at dew so sweet and virulent;
150 Her eyes in torture fix'd, and anguish
drear,
Hot, glaz'd, and wide, with lid-lashes all sear, Flash'd phosphor and sharp sparks, without one cooling tear.
¹ Hermes, so called because he led souls to Hades.
² The magic rod of Hermes was entwined with serpents.
³ musical
⁴ He touched her with his magic rod, the caduceus.

- The colors all inflam'd throughout her train,
 She writh'd about, convuls'd with scarlet pain:
- 155 A deep volcanian yellow took the place
 Of all her milder-mooned body's grace;
 And, as the lava ravishes the mead, Spoilt all her silver mail, and golden brede;¹
 Made gloom of all her frecklings, streaks, and bars,
- 160 Eclips'd her crescents, and lick'd up her stars:
 So that, in moments few, she was undrest
 Of all her sapphires, greens, and amethyst,
 And rubious-argent² of all these bereft, Nothing but pain and ugliness were left.
- 165 Still shone her crown; that vanish'd, also she Melted and disappear'd as suddenly;
 And in the air, her new voice luting soft, Cried, "Lycius! gentle Lycius!"—Borne aloft
 With the bright mists about the mountains hoar
- 170 These words dissolv'd: Crete's forests heard no more.
- Whither fled Lamia, now a lady bright,
 A full-born beauty new and exquisite?
 She fled into that valley they pass o'er Who go to Corinth from Cenchreas' shore;
- 175 And rested at the foot of those wild hills,
 The rugged founts of the Peræan rills,
 And of that other ridge whose barren back Stretches, with all its mist and cloudy rack, South-westward to Cleone. There she stood
- 180 About a young bird's flutter from a wood, Fair, on a sloping green of mossy tread,
 By a clear pool, wherein she passion'd
 To see herself escap'd from so sore ills, While her robes flaunted with the daffodils
- 185 Ah, happy Lycius!—for she was a maid More beautiful than ever twisted braid,
 Or sigh'd, or blush'd, or on spring-flow' red lea Spread a green kirtle to the minstrelsy:
 A virgin purest lipp'd, yet in the lore
- 190 Of love deep learned to the red heart's core:
 Not one hour old, yet of sciential³ brain
- To unperplex bliss from its neighbor pain; Define their pettish limits, and estrange Their points of contact, and swift counter-change;
- 195 Intrigue with the specious chaos, and dispart
 Its most ambiguous atoms with sure art;
 As though in Cupid's college she had spent Sweet days a lovely graduate, still unshent,¹
 And kept his rosy terms² in idle languishment.
- 200 Why this fair creature chose so fairly
 By the wayside to linger, we shall see;
 But first 'tis fit to tell how she could muse
 And dream, when in the serpent prison-house,
 Of all she list, strange or magnificent:
- 205 How, ever, where she will'd, her spirit went;
 Whether to faint Elysium, or where Down through tress-lifting waves the Nereids fair Wind into Thetis' bower by many a pearly stair;
 Or where God Bacchus drains his cups divine,
- 210 Stretch'd out, at ease, beneath a glutinous pine;
 Or where in Pluto's gardens palatine³ Mulciber's columns gleam in far piazzian line.
 And sometimes into cities she would send Her dream, with feast and rioting to blend,
- 215 And once, while among mortals dreaming thus,
 She saw the young Corinthian Lycius Charioting foremost in the envious race,
 Like a young Jove with calm uneager face,
 And fell into a swooning love of him.
- 220 Now on the moth-time of that evening dim
 He would return that way, as well she knew,
 To Corinth from the shore; for freshly blew
 The eastern soft wind, and his galley now Grated the quaystones with her brazen prow
- 225 In port Cenchreas, from Egina isle Fresh anchor'd; whither he had been awhile
 To sacrifice to Jove, whose temple there Waits with high marble doors for blood and incense rare.
 Jove heard his vows, and better'd his desire;

- 230 For by some freakful chance he made retire From his companions, and set forth to walk, Perhaps grown wearied of their Corinth talk.
Over the solitary hills he fared, Thoughtless at first, but ere eve's star appear'd
- 235 His phantasy was lost, where reason fades,
In the calm'd twilight of Platonic shades Lamia beheld him coming, near, more near—Close to her passing, in indifference drear, His silent sandals swept the mossy green;
- 240 So neighbor'd to him, and yet so unseen
She stood: he pass'd, shut up in mysteries,
His mind wrapp'd like his mantle, while her eyes Follow'd his steps, and her neck regal white Turn'd — syllabing thus, "Ah, Lyeius bright,
- 245 And will you leave me on the hills alone?
Lyeius, look back' and be some pity shown!"
He did, not with cold wonder fearingly,
But Orpheus-like at an Eurydice,
For so delicious were the words she sung,
- 250 It seem'd he had lov'd them a whole summer long:
And soon his eyes had drunk her beauty up, Leaving no drop in the bewildering cup,
And still the cup was full,—while he, afraid Lest she should vanish ere his lip had paid
- 255 Due adoration, thus began to adore;
Her soft look growing coy, she saw his chain so sure:
"Leave thee alone! Look back! Ah, Goddess, see Whether my eyes can ever turn from thee!
For pity do not this sad heart belie—
- 260 Even as thou vanishest so shall I die.
Stay! though a Naiad of the rivers, stay!
To thy far wishes will thy streams obey.
Stay! though the greenest woods be thy domain, Alone they can drink up the morning rain."
- 265 Though a descended Pleiad, will not one Of thine harmonious sisters keep in tune Thy spheres,¹ and as thy silver proxy shine?
So sweetly to these ravish'd ears of mine Came thy sweet greeting, that if thou shouldst fade
- 270 Thy memory will waste me to a shade:— For pity do not melt!"—"If I should stay," Said Lamia, "here, upon this floor of clay,
And pain my steps upon these flowers too rough,
What canst thou say or do of charm enough
- 275 To dull the nice remembrance of my home?
Thou canst not ask me with thee here to roam Over these hills and vales, where no joy is,— Empty of immortality and bliss!
Thou art a scholar, Lyeius, and must know
- 280 That finer spirits cannot breathe below
In human climes, and live Alas! poor youth, What taste of purer air hast thou to soothe My essence? What serener palaces, Where I may all my many senses please,
- 285 And by mysterious sleights a hundred thirsts appease?
It cannot be—Adieu!" So said, she rose Tiptoe with white arms spread. He, sick to lose The amorous promise of her lone complain, Swoon'd, murmuring of love, and pale with pain.
- 290 The cruel lady, without any show
Of sorrow for her tender favorite's woe, But rather, if her eyes could brighter be,
With brighter eyes and slow amenity, Put her new lips to his, and gave afresh
- 295 The life she had so tangled in her mesh
And as he from one trance was waking Into another, she began to sing, Happy in beauty, life, and love, and everything,
A song of love, too sweet for earthly lyres,
- 300 While, like held breath, the stars drew in their panting fires.
And then she whisper'd in such trembling tone,
As those who, safe together met alone
For the first time through many anguish'd days, Use other speech than looks; bidding him raise
- 305 His drooping head, and clear his soul of doubt, For that she was a woman, and without Any more subtle fluid in her veins
Than throbbing blood, and that the self-same pains Inhabited her frail-strung heart as his
- 310 And next she wonder'd how his eyes could miss

¹ A reference to the ancient belief that the movement of the celestial spheres produced music.

Her face so long in Corinth, where, she ³⁵⁰
 said,
 She dwelt but half retir'd, and there had led Days happy as the gold coin could invent Without the aid of love, yet in content ³¹⁵ Till she saw him, as once she pass'd him
 by,
 Where 'gainst a column he leant thoughtfully
 At Venus' temple porch, 'mid baskets heap'd
 Of amorous herbs and flowers, newly reap'd
 Late on that eve, as 'twas the night before ³²⁰ The Adonian feast;¹ whereof she saw no
 more,
 But wept alone those days, for why should ³⁶⁰ she adore?
 Lycius from death awoke into amaze,
 To see her still, and singing so sweet lays;
 Then from amaze into delight he fell ³²⁵ To hear her whisper woman's lore so well;
 And every word she spake entic'd him on To unperplex'd delight and pleasure
 known.
 Let the mad poets say whate'er they please
 Of the sweets of Fairies, Peris, Goddesses, ³³⁰ There is not such a treat among them all, Haunters of cavern, lake, and waterfall,
 As a real woman, lineal indeed From Pyrrha's pebbles² or old Adam's seed.
 Thus gentle Lamia judg'd, and judg'd aright, ³³⁵ That Lycius could not love in half a fright, So threw the goddess off, and won his heart
 More pleasantly by playing woman's part.
 With no more awe than what her beauty gave,
 That, while it smote, still guaranteed to save.
³⁴⁰ Lycius to all made eloquent reply, Marrying to every word a twin-born sigh;
 And last, pointing to Corinth, ask'd her
 sweet,
 If 'twas too far that night for her soft
 feet.
 The way was short, for Lamia's eagerness ³⁴⁵ Made, by a spell, the triple league decrease
 To a few paces; not at all surmis'd
 By blinded Lycius, so in her compris'd They pass'd the city gates, he knew not how,
 So noiseless, and he never thought to know.

² After the deluge, Deucalion and Pyrrha repeopled the earth by casting behind them stones which became men and women

As men talk in a dream, so Corinth all, Throughout her palaces imperial,
 And all her populous streets and temples lewd,¹ Mutter'd, like tempest in the distance brew'd,
 To the wide-spreaded night above her towers.
³⁵⁵ Men, women, rich and poor, in the cool
 hours,
 Shuffled their sandals o'er the pavement
 white,
 Companion'd or alone; while many a light Flar'd, here and there, from wealthy festivals,
 And threw their moving shadows on the walls,
 Or found them cluster'd in the corniced
 shade
 Of some arch'd temple door, or dusky colonnade.

Muffling his face, of greeting friends in
 fear,
 Her fingers he press'd hard, as one came near
 With curl'd gray beard, sharp eyes, and smooth bald crown, ³⁶⁵ Slow-stepp'd, and rob'd in philosophic gown:
 Lycius shrank closer, as they met and past,
 Into his mantle, adding wings to haste, While hurried Lamia trembled: "Ah," said he,
 "Why do you shudder, love, so ruefully?
³⁷⁰ Why does your tender palm dissolve in
 dew?"—
 "I'm wearied," said fair Lamia: "tell me who
 Is that old man? I cannot bring to mind His features.—Lycius! wherefore did you blind Yourself from his quick eyes?" Lycius
 replied,
³⁷⁵ " 'Tis Apollonius sage, my trusty guide And good instructor; but tonight he seems The ghost of folly haunting my sweet dreams "

While yet he spake they had arriv'd
 before
 A pillar'd porch, with lofty portal door, ³⁸⁰ Where hung a silver lamp, whose phosphor
 glow
 Reflected in the slabbed steps below, Mild as a star in water; for so new.

¹ That is, temples or buildings devoted to lewd practices in the service of Venus, goddess of love. Corinth was a seat of Venus worship

And so unsullied was the marble's hue,
 So through the crystal polish, liquid fine, 385 Ran the dark veins, that none but feet
 divine
 Could e'er have touch'd there. Sounds Æolian
 Breath'd from the hinges, as the ample span
 Of the wide doors disclos'd a place unknown
 Some time to any, but those two alone, 590 And a few Persian mutes, who that same year
 Were seen about the markets: none knew
 where
 They could inhabit, the most curious Were foil'd, who watch'd to trace them to their house.
 And but the flitter-winged verse must tell, 395 For truth's sake, what woe afterwards befel,
 'Twould humor many a heart to leave them
 thus,
 Shut from the busy world of more incredulous.

PART II

Love in a hut, with water and a crust, Is — Love, forgive us! — cinders, ashes,
 dust;
 Love in a palace is perhaps at last More grievous torment than a hermit's fast —
 5 That is a doubtful tale from fairy land, Hard for the non-elect to understand.
 Had Lycius liv'd to hand his story down.
 He might have given the moral a fresh
 frown,
 Or clench'd it quite: but too short was their bliss 10 To breed distrust and hate, that make the soft voice hiss.
 Besides, there, nightly, with terrific glare,
 Love, jealous grown of so complete a pair, Hover'd and buzz'd his wings, with fearful roar,
 Above the lintel¹ of their chamber door, 15 And down the passage cast a glow upon the floor.

For all this came a ruin: side by side
 They were enthroned, in the even tide, Upon a couch, near to a curtaining Whose airy texture, from a golden string.
 20 Floated into the room, and let appear Unveil'd the summer heaven, blue and
 clear,

¹ A horizontal piece spanning an opening

Betwixt two marble shafts:—there they repos'd,
 Where use had made it sweet, with eyelids clos'd, 25 Saving a tithe which love still open kept,
 That they might see each other while they almost slept,
 When from the slope side of a suburb hill, Deafening the swallow's twitter, came a thrill
 Of trumpets—Lycius started—the sounds
 fled,
 But left a thought, a buzzing in his head.
 30 For the first time, since first he harbor'd in That purple-lined palace of sweet sin,
 His spirit pass'd beyond its golden bourn
 Into the noisy world almost forsworn.
 The lady, ever watchful, penetrant, 35 Saw this with pain, so arguing a want Of something more, more than her empery Of joys; and she began to moan and sigh
 Because he mus'd beyond her, knowing
 well
 That but a moment's thought is passion's passing bell 40 "Why do you sigh, fair creature?" whisper'd he:
 "Why do you think?" return'd she tenderly:
 "You have deserted me;—where am I
 now?
 Not in your heart while care weighs on your brow.
 No, no, you have dismiss'd me; and I go 45 From your breast houseless: aye, it must be so."
 He answer'd, bending to her open eyes,
 Where he was mirror'd small in paradise,
 "My silver planet, both of eve and morn!
 Why will you plead yourself so sad forlorn,
 50 While I am striving how to fill my heart
 With deeper crimson, and a double smart?
 How to entangle, trammel up, and snare
 Your soul in mine, and labyrinth you there Like the hid scent in an unbudded rose?
 55 Aye, a sweet kiss—you see your mighty woes.
 My thoughts! shall I unveil them? Listen
 then!
 What mortal hath a prize, that other men
 May be confounded and abash'd withal, But lets it sometimes pace abroad majes-tical, 60 And triumph, as in thee I should rejoice Amid the hoarse alarm of Corinth's voice.
 Let my foes choke, and my friends shout
 afar,

- While through the thronged streets your bridal car Wheels round its dazzling spokes."—The lady's cheek 65 Trembled, she nothing said, but, pale and meek,
Arose and knelt before him, wept a rain Of sorrows at his words, at last with
pain
Beseeching him, the while his hand she 110
wrung,
To change his purpose. He thereat was stung,
70 Perverse, with stronger fancy to reclaim Her wild and timid nature to his aim:
Besides, for all his love, in self despite,
Against his better self, he took delight Luxurious in her sorrows, soft and new.
75 His passion, cruel grown, took on a hue Fierce and sanguineous as 'twas possible In one whose brow had no dark veins to swell
Fine was the mitigated fury, like Apollo's presence when in act to strike 80 The serpent—Ha, the serpent! certes, she Was none. She burnt, she lov'd the tyranny,
And, all subdued, consented to the hour When to the bridal he should lead his paramour.
Whispering in midnight silence, said the
youth, 85 "Sure some sweet name thou hast, though,
by my truth,
I have not ask'd it, ever thinking thee
Not mortal, but of heavenly progeny, As still I do. Hast any mortal name, Fit appellation for this dazzling frame?
90 Or friends or kinsfolk on the citied earth,
To share our marriage feast and nuptial mirth?"
"I have no friends," said Lamia, "no, not
one;
My presence in wide Corinth hardly
known:
My parents' bones are in their dusty urns 95 Sepulchred, where no kindled incense burns.
Seeing all their luckless race are dead, save me,
And I neglect the holy rite for thee
Even as you list invite your many guests;
But if, as now it seems, your vision rests 100 With any pleasure on me, do not bid Old Apollonius—from him keep me hid." Lycius, perplex'd at words so blind and blank,
Made close inquiry; from whose touch she shrank,
- Feigning a sleep; and he to the dull shade 105 Of deep sleep in a moment was betray'd.
It was the custom then to bring away
The bride from home at blushing shut of
day,
Veil'd, in a chariot, heralded along By strewn flowers, torches, and a marriage
song, 110 With other pageants: but this fair unknown
Had not a friend So being left alone, (Lycius was gone to summon all his kin)
And knowing surely she could never win His foolish heart from its mad pompous-
ness, 115 She set herself, high-thoughted, how to dress
The misery in fit magnificence.
She did so, but 'tis doubtful how and whence
Came, and who were her subtle servitors.
About the halls, and to and from the doors, 120 There was a noise of wings, till in short space
The glowing banquet-room shone with wide-arched grace.
A haunting music, sole perhaps and lone Supportress of the fairy roof, made moan Throughout, as fearful the whole charm might fade.
125 Fresh carved cedar, mimicking a glade Of palm and plantain, met from either
side,
High in the midst, in honor of the bride:
Two palms and then two plantains, and
so on,
From either side their stems branch'd one to one 130 All down the aisled place; and beneath all There ran a stream of lamps straight on from wall to wall.
So canopied, lay an untasted feast Teeming with odors. Lamia, regal drest, Silently pac'd about, and as she went, 135 In pale contented sort of discontent, Mission'd her viewless servants to enrich The fretted splendor of each nook and niche.
Between the tree-stems, marbled plain at first,
Came jasper panels; then, anon, there burst
140 Forth creeping imagery of slighter trees,
And with the larger wove in small intricacies.
Approving all, she faded at self-will,
And shut the chamber up, close, hush'd and still,

Complete and ready for the revels rude, 145 When dreadful guests would come to spout her solitude.

The day appear'd, and all the gossip
 rout
 O senseless Lycius! Madman! wherefore flout
 The silent-blessing fate, warm cloister'd
 hours,
 And show to common eyes these secret
 bowers?
 150 The herd approach'd, each guest, with busy brain,
 Arriving at the portal, gaz'd amain, And enter'd marveling for they knew the street,
 Remember'd it from childhood all complete
 Without a gap, yet ne'er before had seen 155 That royal porch, that high-built fair
 demesne,
 So in they hurried all, amaz'd, curious, and keen Save one, who look'd thereon with eye severe.
 And with calm-planted steps walk'd in austere;
 'Twas Apollonius: something too he laugh'd, 160 As though some knotty problem, that had daft¹
 His patient thought, had now begun to thaw,
 And solve, and melt:—'twas just as he foresaw.

He met within the murmurous vestibule His young disciple " 'Tis no common
 rule,

165 Lycius," said he, "for uninvited guest To force himself upon you, and infest With an unbidden presence the bright throng
 Of younger friends, yet must I do this
 wrong,
 And you forgive me." Lycius blush'd, and led 170 The old man through the inner doors broad-spread,
 With reconciling words and courteous mien Turning into sweet milk the sophist's spleen.

Of wealthy lustre was the banquet-room, Fill'd with pervading brilliance and perfume:

175 Before each lucid panel fuming stood A censer fed with myrrh and spiced wood,
 Each by a sacred tripod held aloft, Whose slender feet wide-swerv'd upon the soft

Wool-woofed carpets: fifty wreaths of smoke

180 From fifty censers their light voyage took To the high roof, still mimick'd as they rose

Along the mirror'd walls by twin-clouds odorous.

Twelve spher'd tables, by silk seats inspher'd,

High as the level of a man's breast rear'd 185 On libbard's¹ paws, upheld the heavy
 gold

Of cups and goblets, and the store thrice told

Of Ceres' horn, and, in huge vessels, wine Come from the gloomy tun with merry
 shine

Thus loaded with a feast the tables stood, 190 Each shrining in the midst the image of a God.

When in an antechamber every guest Had felt the cold full sponge to pleasure
 press'd,

By minist'ring slaves, upon his hands and
 feet,

And fragrant oils with ceremony meet 195 Pour'd on his hair, they all mov'd to the feast

In white robes, and themselves in order
 plac'd

Around the silken couches, wondering Whence all this mighty cost and blaze of wealth could spring

Soft went the music the soft air along, 200 While fluent Greek a vowel'd undersong Kept up among the guests, discoursing
 low

At first, for scarcely was the wine at flow;
 But when the happy vintage touch'd their brains,

Louder they talk, and louder come the strains

205 Of powerful instruments:—the gorgeous dyes,

The space, the splendor of the draperies,
 The roof of awful richness, nectarous cheer,

Beautiful slaves, and Lamia's self, appear,
 Now, when the wine has done its rosy deed, 210 And every soul from human trammels

 Some hungry spell that loveliness absorbs.
 There was no recognition in those orbs
 "Lamia!" he cried—and no soft-ton'd

 The many heard, and the loud revelry

 A deadly silence step by step increas'd Until it seem'd a horrid presence there,
 And not a man but felt the terror in his

 the shriek
²⁷⁰ With its sad echo did the silence break
 "Begone, foul dream!" he cried, gazing
 again

Around his demon eyes! Corinthians, see!
230 My sweet bride withers at their potency."
"Fool!" said the sophist in an under-tone Gruff with contempt; which a death-nigh-ing moan
From Lycius answer'd, as heart-struck and lost,
He sank supine beside the aching ghost.
235 "Fool! Fool!" repeated he, while his eyes
still Relented not, nor mov'd; "from every ill
Of life have I preserv'd thee to this day, And shall I see thee made a serpent's
prey?"
Then Lamia breath'd death breath; the sophist's eye, 300 Like a sharp spear, went through her utterly,
Keen, cruel, perçant,¹ stinging she, as
well
As her weak hand could any meaning tell, Motion'd him to be silent; vainly so,
He look'd and look'd again a level—No!
305 "A serpent!" echoed he; no sooner said,
Than with a frightful scream she vanished:
And Lycius' arms were empty of delight, As were his limbs of life, from that same
night.
On the high couch he lay!—His friends came round—310 Supported him—no pulse, or breath they found,
And, in its marriage robe, the heavy body wound.

THE EVE OF ST. AGNES

1819

1820

1 St. Agnes' Eve—Ah, bitter chill it was!
The owl, for all his feathers, was a-cold,
The hare limp'd trembling through the frozen grass,
And silent was the flock in woolly fold:
Numb were the beadsman's² fingers, while he told His rosary,³ and while his frosted breath,

¹ piercing² A poor man supported in an almshouse and required to pray for its founder³ numbered the beads on his rosary

Like pious incense from a censer old, Seem'd taking flight for heaven, without a death,
Past the sweet Virgin's picture, while his prayer he saith.

2 His prayer he saith, this patient, holy
man;
Then takes his lamp, and riseth from his knees,
And back returneth, meagre, barefoot,
wan,
Along the chapel aisle by slow degrees:
The sculptur'd dead, on each side, seem to freeze,
Emprison'd in black, purgatorial rails:
Knights, ladies, praying in dumb ora-
t'ries,
He passeth by; and his weak spirit fails To think how they may ache in icy hoods and mails.

3 Northward he turneth through a little
door,
And scarce three steps, ere Music's golden tongue Flatter'd to tears this aged man and poor;
But no—already had his deathbell rung.
The joys of all his life were said and
sung:
His was harsh penance on St. Agnes'
Eve:
Another way he went, and soon among Rough ashes sat he for his soul's reprieve,
And all night kept awake, for sinners' sake to grieve.

4 That ancient beadsman heard the prelude soft;
And so it chanc'd, for many a door was
wide,
From hurry to and fro. Soon, up aloft, The silver, snarling trumpets 'gan to chide:
The level chambers, ready with their
pride,
Were glowing to receive a thousand guests:
The carved angels, ever eager-eyed, Star'd, where upon their heads the cornice rests,
With hair blown back, and wings put cross-wise on their breasts.

5 At length burst in the argent¹ revelry,
With plume, tiara,² and all rich array,

¹ shining² A crownlike head ornament.

- Numerous as shadows haunting fairly The brain, new stuff'd, in youth, with triumphs gay
 Of old romance. These let us wish
 away,
 And turn, sole-thoughted, to one lady
 there,
 Whose heart had brooded, all that wintry 9
 day,
 On love, and wing'd St. Agnes' saintly
 care,
 As she had heard old dames full many times declare.
- 6 They told her how, upon St Agnes' Eve, Young virgins might have visions of
 delight,
 And soft adorings from their loves receive
 Upon the honey'd middle of the night,
 If ceremonies due they did aright;
 As, supperless to bed they must retire,
 And couch supine their beauties, lily 10
 white,
 Nor look behind, nor sideways, but require
 Of Heaven with upward eyes for all that they desire
- 7 Full of this whim was thoughtful Made-
 line.
 The music, yearning like a god in pain,
 She scarcely heard her maiden eyes
 divine,
 Fix'd on the floor, saw many a sweeping train¹
 Pass by—he heeded not at all in vain Came many a tiptoe, amorous cavalier, 11
 And back retir'd, not cool'd by high disdain,
 But she saw not her heart was other-
 where.
 She sigh'd for Agnes' dreams, the sweetest of the year
- 8 She danc'd along with vague, regardless
 eyes,
 Anxious her lips, her breathing quick and short:
 The hallow'd hour was near at hand—she sighs
 Amid the tumbrels,² and the throng'd resort
 Of whisperers in anger, or in sport;
 'Mid looks of love, defiance, hate, and 12
 scorn,
- Hoodwink'd¹ with faery fancy; all amort,² Save to St. Agnes and her lambs unshorn,
 And all the bliss to be before tomorrow
 morn
- 9 So, purposing each moment to retire, She linger'd still. Meantime, across the moors,
 Had come young Porphyro, with heart on fire
 For Madeline. Beside the portal doors, Buttress'd from moonlight, stands he,
 and implores
 All saints to give him sight of Madeline,
 But for one moment in the tedious hours,
 That he might gaze and worship all un-
 seen;
 Perchance speak, kneel, touch, kiss—in sooth such things have been.
- 10 He ventures in: let no buzz'd whisper
 tell.
 All eyes be muffled, or a hundred swords Will storm his heart, Love's feverous citadel
 For him, those chambers held barbarian hordes,
 Hyena foemen, and hot-blooded lords,
 Whose very dogs would execrations howl Against his lineage: not one breast affords
 Him any mercy, in that mansion foul, Save one old beldame, weak in body and in soul
- 11 Ah, happy chance! the aged creature
 came,
 Shuffling along with ivory-headed wand,
 To where he stood, hid from the torch's
 flame,
 Behind a broad hall-pillar, far beyond The sound of merriment and chorus
 bland:
 He startled her; but soon she knew his
 face,
 And grasp'd his fingers in her palsied
 hand, Saying, "Mercy, Porphyro! hie thee from this place."
 They are all here tonight, the whole bloodthirsty race!
- 12 "Get hence! get hence! there's dwarfish Hildebrand;
 He had a fever late, and in the fit

- He cursed thee and thine, both house 16

dear,
We're safe enough, here in this armchair sit,
And tell me how"—"Good Saints! not here, not here, Follow me, child, or else these stones will be thy bier."
- 13 He follow'd through a lowly arched way, Brushing the cobwebs with his lofty 17 plume,
And as she mutter'd "Well-a—well-a-
day!"
He found him in a little moonlight room, Pale, lattic'd, chill, and silent as a tomb
"Now tell me where is Madeline," said
he,
"O tell me, Angela, by the holy loom Which none but secret sisterhood may
see,
When they St Agnes' wool are weaving piously."
- 14 "St Agnes! Ah! it is St. Agnes' Eve—Yet men will murder upon holy days.
Thou must hold water in a witch's sieve,
And be hege-lord of all the elves and
fays,
To venture so: it fills me with amaze
To see thee, Porphyro!—St Agnes'
Eve!
God's help! my lady fair the conjuror plays
This very night. good angels her deceive!
But let me laugh awhile, I've mickle² time to grieve."
- 15 Feebly she laugheth in the languid moon, While Porphyro upon her face doth
look,
Like puzzled urchin on an aged crone Who keepeth clos'd a wond'rous riddle- 19 book,
As spectacled she sits in chimney nook But soon his eyes grew brilliant, when she told His lady's purpose; and he scarce could brook
Tears, at the thought of those enchantments cold,
And Madeline asleep in lap of legends old.
¹ godmother ² much; ample
- Sudden a thought came like a full-blown
rose,
Flushing his brow, and in his pained
heart
Made purple riot. then doth he propose A stratagem, that makes the beldame start:
"A cruel man and impious thou art.
Sweet lady, let her pray, and sleep, and
dream
Alone with her good angels, far apart From wicked men like thee. Go, go!—I deem Thou canst not surely be the same that thou didst seem."
- "I will not harm her, by all saints I swear," Quoth Porphyro "O may I ne'er find
grace
When my weak voice shall whisper its last prayer,
If one of her soft ringlets I displace,
Or look with ruffian passion in her face Good Angela, believe me by these tears;
Or I will, even in a moment's space, Awake, with horrid shout, my foemen's
ears,
And beard them, though they be more fang'd than wolves and bears."
- 18 "Ah! why wilt thou affright a feeble
soul?
A poor, weak, palsy-stricken, churchyard thing,
Whose passing-bell may ere the midnight toll;
Whose prayers for thee, each morn and
evening,
Were never miss'd"—Thus planning, doth she bring A gentler speech from burning Por-phyro,
So woful, and of such deep sorrowing,
That Angela gives promise she will do Whatever he shall wish, betide her weal or
woe.
- 19 Which was, to lead him, in close secrecy, Even to Madeline's chamber, and there hide
Him in a closet, of such privacy
That he might see her beauty unespied, And woe perhaps that night a peerless bride,
While legion'd faeries pac'd the coverlet,
And pale enchantment held her sleepy-eyed.

Never on such a night have lovers met, 23 Since Merlin paid his demon all the monstrous debt¹

20 "It shall be as thou wishest," said the
 dame:
 All cates² and dainties shall be stored
 there Quickly on this feast-night: by the tambour frame³
 Her own lute thou wilt see: no time to spare,
 For I am slow and feeble, and scarce
 dare
 On such a catering trust my dizzy head Wait here, my child, with patience; kneel in prayer
 The while Ah! thou must needs the lady wed,
 Or may I never leave my grave among the dead."

21 So saying, she hobbled off with busy
 fear.
 The lover's endless minutes slowly
 pass'd,
 The dame return'd, and whisper'd in his ear
 To follow her; with aged eyes aghast From fright of dim espial. Safe at last, Through many a dusky gallery, they 25
 gain
 The maiden's chamber, silken, hush'd, and chaste;
 Where Porphyro took covert, pleas'd amain⁴
 His poor guide hurried back with agues in her brain.

22 Her falt'ring hand upon the balustrade, Old Angela was feeling for the stair, When Madeline, St. Agnes' charmed
 maid,
 Rose, like a mission'd spirit, unaware:
 With silver taper's light, and pious care, She turn'd, and down the aged gossip
 led
 To a safe level matting. Now prepare.
 Young Porphyro, for gazing on that
 bed,
 She comes, she comes again, like ringdove fray'd⁵ and fled

⁵ alarmed

Out went the taper as she hurried in;
 Its little smoke, in pallid moonshine,
 died:

She clos'd the door, she panted, all akin
 To spirits of the air, and visions wide.
 No uttered syllable, or, woe betide!
 But to her heart, her heart was voluble, Paining with eloquence her balmy side.
 As though a tongueless nightingale should swell

Her throat in vain, and die, heart-stifled, in her dell.

24 A casement high and triple-arch'd there
 was,
 All garlanded with carven imag'ries Of fruits, and flowers, and bunches of knot-grass,
 And diamonded with panes of quaint

 Innumerable of stains and splendid dyes,
 As are the tiger-moth's deep-damask'd

 And in the midst, 'mid thousand heraldries,
 And twilight saints, and dim emblazon-
 ings,
 A shielded scutcheon blush'd with blood of queens and kings.

25 Full on this casement shone the wintry
 moon,
 And threw warm gules¹ on Madeline's fair breast,
 As down she knelt for heaven's grace and boon;
 Rose-bloom fell on her hands, together prest,
 And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
 And on her hair a glory, like a saint:
 She seem'd a splendid angel, newly

- 27 Soon, trembling in her soft and chilly
nest,
In sort of wakeful swoon, perplex'd she
lay,
Until the poppi'd warmth of sleep op-
press'd
Her soothed limbs, and soul fatigued

Flown, like a thought, until the morrow-
day;
Blissfully haven'd both from joy and
pain;
Clasp'd like a missal where swart Pay-nims pray;¹ Blinded alike from sunshine and from
rain,
As though a rose should shut, and be a bud again.
- 28 Stol'n to this paradise, and so entranced, Porphyro gazed upon her empty dress,
And listen'd to her breathing, if it chanced
To wake into a slumberous tenderness, Which when he heard, that minute did he bless,
And breath'd himself: then from the closet crept,
Noiseless as fear² in a wide wilderness,
And over the hush'd carpet, silent, stept.
And 'tween the curtain peep'd, where, lo!—how fast she slept.
- 29 Then by the bed-side, where the faded
moon
Made a dim, silver twilight, soft he set A table, and, half anguish'd, threw thereon
A cloth of woven crimson, gold, and jet.—
O for some drowsy Morphean amulet!
The boisterous, midnight, festive clarion,
The kettle-drum, and far-heard clarinet, 33 Affray his ears, though but in dying
tone.— The hall door shuts again, and all the noise
is gone.
- 30 And still she slept an azure-lidded sleep, In blanched linen, smooth, and lavender'd,³

Open thine eyes, for meek St. Agnes’

Or I shall drowse beside thee, so my soul

⁴ The beautiful lady without pity; the title of a poem by Alain Chartier, a translation of which Keats found in a volume of Chaucer. See Keats's poem of this title (p 829)

Close to her ear touching the melody;— Wherewith disturb'd, she utter'd a soft
 moan:
 He ceased—she panted quick—and suddenly
 Her blue affrayed eyes wide open shone:
 Upon his knees he sank, pale as smoothsculptured stone.

34 Her eyes were open, but she still beheld,
 Now wide awake, the vision of her sleep:
 There was a painful change, that nigh expell'd
 The blisses of her dream so pure and
 deep
 At which fair Madeline began to weep, And moan forth witless words with many a sigh, While still her gaze on Porphyro would keep,
 Who knelt, with joined hands and piteous eye,
 Fearing to move or speak, she look'd so dreamingly.

35 "Ah, Porphyro!" said she, "but even
 now
 Thy voice was at sweet tremble in mine
 ear,
 Made tuneable with every sweetest vow;
 And those sad eyes were spiritual and
 clear.
 How chang'd thou art! how pallid, chill, and drear!
 Give me that voice again, my Porphyro, Those looks immortal, those complain-ings dear!
 Oh leave me not in this eternal woe,
 For if thou diest, my love, I know not where to go."

36 Beyond a mortal man impassion'd far At these voluptuous accents, he arose, Ethereal, flush'd, and like a throbbing
 star
 Seen mid the sapphire heaven's deep
 repose;
 Into her dream he melted, as the rose Blendeth its odor with the violet,— Solution sweet: meantime the frost-wind blows
 Like Love's alarum pattering the sharp sleet Against the window-panes; St. Agnes' moon hath set.

37 'Tis dark: quick pattereth the flaw-blown sleet.
 "This is no dream, my bride, my Madeline!"

'Tis dark: the iced gusts still rave and beat:

"No dream, alas! alas! and woe is
 mine!

Porphyro will leave me here to fade and pine.—

Cruel! what traitor could thee hither
 bring?

I curse not, for my heart is lost in thine, Though thou forsakest a deceived
 thing,—

A dove forlorn and lost with sick unpruned wing."

38 "My Madeline! sweet dreamer! lovely bride!

Say, may I be for aye thy vassal blest?
 Thy beauty's shield, heart-shap'd and vermeil-dyed?

Ah, silver shrine, here will I take my rest

After so many hours of toil and quest,
 A famish'd pilgrim,—sav'd by miracle.
 Though I have found, I will not rob thy nest

Saving of thy sweet self; if thou think'st well

To trust, fair Madeline, to no rude infidel.

39 "Hark! 'tis an elfin-storm from faery
 land,

Of haggard seeming,¹ but a boon indeed:
 Arise—arise! the morning is at hand,— The bloated wassailers will never heed:—

Let us away, my love, with happy
 speed;

There are no ears to hear, or eyes to
 see,—

Drown'd all in Rhenish² and the sleepy mead³

Awake! arise! my love, and fearless be,
 For o'er the southern moors I have a home
 for thee."

40 She hurried at his words, beset with fears,

For there were sleeping dragons all
 around,

At glaring watch, perhaps, with ready spears—

Down the wide stairs a darkling way they found.—

In all the house was heard no human
 sound.

But his sagacious eye an inmate owns:
By one and one, the bolts full easy

The chains he silent on the footworn

The key turns, and the door upon its hinges groans.

- 42 And they are gone — aye, ages long ago
These lovers fled away into the storm That night the Baron dreamt of many a
woe,
And all his warrior-guests, with shade and form Of witch, and demon, and large coffin-worm,
Were long be-nightmar'd Angela the

Died palsy-twitch'd, with meagre face

The headsman, after thousand aves²

THE EVE OF ST. MARK

A FRAGMENT
1819 1848

- Upon a Sabbath-day it fell;
Twice holy was the Sabbath-bell,
That call'd the folk to evening prayer;
The city streets were clean and fair 5 From wholesome drench of April rains.
And, on the western window panes,
The chilly sunset faintly told Of unmatu'r'd green valleys cold,
Of the green thorny bloomless hedge.
10 Of rivers new with spring-tide sedge,
Of primroses by shelter'd rills,

¹ tapestry hung on the walls

² The beads of a rosary, which are counted as the Aves, or salutations to the Virgin Mary, are uttered.

- And daisies on the aguish¹ hills,
Twice holy was the Sabbath-bell.
The silent streets were crowded well 15 With staid and pious companies, Warm from their fire-side orat'ries;
And moving, with demurest air,
To even-song, and vesper prayer.
Each arched porch, and entry low, 20 Was fill'd with patient folk and slow,
With whispers hush, and shuffling feet, While play'd the organ loud and sweet.

- The bells had ceas'd, the prayers begun,
And Bertha had not yet half done 25 A curious volume, patch'd and torn,
That all day long, from earliest morn,
Had taken captive her two eyes,
Among its golden broderies, Perplex'd her with a thousand things, — 30 The stars of Heaven, and angel's wings, Martyrs in a fiery blaze,
Azure saints in silver rays, Moses' breastplate,³ and the seven Candlesticks John saw in Heaven,⁴ 35 The winged Lion of Saint Mark,⁵
And the Covenantal Ark,⁶
With its many mysteries, Cherubim and golden mice.⁶

- Bertha was a maiden fan, 40 Dwelling in th' old Minster-square;
From her fireside she could see,
Sidelong, its rich antiquity,
Far as the Bishop's garden-wall,
Where sycamores and elm-trees tall, 45 Full-leav'd, the forest had outstript,
By no sharp north-wind ever nipt,
So shelter'd by the mighty pile.
Bertha arose, and read awhile,
With forehead 'gainst the window-pane.
50 Again she tried, and then again, Until the dusk eve left her dark Upon the legend of St. Mark.
From plaited lawn-frill, fine and thin,
She lifted up her soft warm chin, 55 With aching neck and swimming eyes,
And daz'd with saintly imag'ries.

- All was gloom, and silent all,
Save now and then the still foot-fall
Of one returning homewards late, 60 Past the echoing minster-gate
The clamorous daws, that all the day
Above tree-tops and towers play,

Pair by pair had gone to rest,
Each in its ancient belfry-nest, 65 Where asleep they fall betimes,
To music of the drowsy chimes

All was silent, all was gloom, Abroad and in the homely room:
Down she sat, poor cheated soul!
70 And struck a lamp from the dismal coal;

Lean'd forward, with bright drooping hair
And slant book, full against the glare.
Her shadow, in uneasy guise, Hover'd about, a giant size, 75 On ceiling-beam and old oak chair,
The parrot's cage, and panel square;
And the warm angled winter-screen,
On which were many monsters seen, Call'd doves of Siam, Luma mice, 80 And legless birds of Paradise, Macaw, and tender av'davat,¹
And milken-furr'd Angora cat.
Untir'd she read, her shadow still Glower'd about, as it would fill 85 The room with wildest forms and shades,
As though some ghostly queen of spades
Had come to mock behind her back,
And dance, and ruffle her garments black.
Untir'd she read the legend page,

On land, on sea, in pagan chains, Rejoicing for his many pains.

HYPERION

1818-19 1820

Deep in the shady sadness of a vale Far sunken from the healthy breath of
morn,
Far from the fiery noon, and eve's one
star,
Sat gray-hair'd Saturn, quiet as a stone, 5 Still as the silence round about his lan, Forest on forest hung about his head Like cloud on cloud. No stir of air was
there,
Not so much life as on a summer's day Robs not one light seed from the feather'd
grass, 10 But where the dead leaf fell, there did it
rest.
A stream went voiceless by, still deadened
By reason of his fallen divinity Spreading a shade; the Naiad 'mid her reeds
Press'd her cold finger closer to her lips.
15 Along the margin-sand large foot-marks went,
No further than to where his feet had stray'd,
And slept there since. Upon the sodden ground
His old right hand lay nerveless, listless,
dead,
Unceptred, and his realmless eyes were closed; 20 While his bow'd head seem'd list'ning to the Earth,
His ancient mother, for some comfort yet.

It seem'd no force could wake him from his place;
But there came one,² who with a kindred

¹ writes

² Thes, Hyperion's sister and wife, and one of the female Titans

- Touch'd his wide shoulders, after bending low 25 With reverence, though to one who knew it not.
 She was a Goddess of the infant world;
 By her in stature the tall Amazon Had stood a pigmy's height: she would have ta'en Achilles by the hair and bent his neck; 30 Or with a finger stay'd Ixion's wheel.
 Her face was large as that of Memphian sphinx, Pedestal'd haply in a palace court,
 When sages look'd to Egypt for their lore
 But oh! how unlike marble was that face:
 35 How beautiful, if sorrow had not made Sorrow more beautiful than Beauty's self.
 There was a listening fear in her regard,¹
 As if calamity had but begun;
 As if the vanward clouds of evil days 40 Had spent their malice, and the sullen rear Was with its stored thunder laboring up One hand she press'd upon that aching spot Where beats the human heart, as if just there, Though an immortal, she felt cruel pain:
 45 The other upon Saturn's bended neck
 She laid, and to the level of his ear Leaning with parted lips, some words she spake
 In solemn tenor and deep organ tone:
 Some mourning words, which in our feeble tongue 50 Would come in these like accents; O how frail To that large utterance of the early Gods!
 "Saturn, look up!—though wherefore, poor old King?
 I have no comfort for thee, no not one:
 I cannot say, 'O wherefore sleepest thou?' 55 For heaven is parted from thee, and the earth Knows thee not, thus afflicted, for a God;
 And ocean too, with all its solemn noise,
 Has from thy sceptre pass'd; and all the air Is emptied of thine hoary majesty.
 60 Thy thunder, conscious of the new command, Rumbles reluctant o'er our fallen house;
 And thy sharp lightning in unpractis'd hands Scorcheth and burns our once serene domain.
 O aching time! O moments big as years!
- 65 All as ye pass swell out the monstrous truth,
 And press it so upon our weary griefs
 That unbelief has not a space to breathe.
 Saturn, sleep on:—O thoughtless, why did I Thus violate thy slumbrous solitude?
 70 Why should I ope thy melancholy eyes?
 Saturn, sleep on! while at thy feet I weep."
- As when, upon a tranced summer-night,
 Those green-rob'd senators of mighty woods,
 Tall oaks, branch-charmed by the earnest stars, 75 Dream, and so dream all night without a stir, Save from one gradual solitary gust Which comes upon the silence, and dies off,
 As if the ebbing air had but one wave;
 So came these words and went; the while in tears 80 She touch'd her fair large forehead to the ground, Just where her falling hair might be outspread
 A soft and silken mat for Saturn's feet
 One moon, with alteration slow, had shed
 Her silver seasons four upon the night, 85 And still these two were postured motionless, Like natural sculpture in cathedral cavern;
 The frozen God still couchant on the earth,
 And the sad Goddess weeping at his feet:
 Until at length old Saturn lifted up 90 His faded eyes, and saw his kingdom gone,
 And all the gloom and sorrow of the place,
 And that fair kneeling Goddess; and then spake,
 As with a palsied tongue, and while his beard Shook horrid with such aspen-malady:
 95 "O tender spouse of gold Hyperion, Thea, I feel thee ere I see thy face;
 Look up, and let me see our doom in it, Look up, and tell me if this feeble shape Is Saturn's; tell me, if thou hear'st the voice 100 Of Saturn; tell me, if this wrinkling brow, Naked and bare of its great diadem, Peers like the front of Saturn. Who had power To make me desolate? whence came the strength?

- How was it nurtur'd to such bursting
forth, 105 While Fate seem'd strangled in my nervous grasp?
But it is so, and I am smother'd up,
And buried from all godlike exercise Of influence benign on planets pale,
Of admonitions to the winds and seas, 110 Of peaceful sway above man's harvesting, And all those acts which Deity supreme Doth ease its heart of love in.—I am gone Away from my own bosom: I have left My strong identity, my real self, 115 Somewhere between the throne, and where I sit
Here on this spot of earth Search, Thea, search!
Open thine eyes eterne, and sphere them
round
Upon all space: space starr'd, and lorn of
light;
Space region'd with life-air; and barren
void;
120 Spaces of fire, and all the yawn of hell.— Search, Thea, search! and tell me, if thou
seest
A certain shape or shadow, making way
With wings or chariot fierce to repossess A heaven he lost erewhile: it must—it must 125 Be of ripe progress—Saturn must be King Yes, there must be a golden victory, There must be Gods thrown down, and trumpets blown
Of triumph calm, and hymns of festival Upon the gold clouds metropolitan, 130 Voices of soft proclaim, and silver strain Of strings in hollow shells; and there shall
be Beautiful things made new, for the surprise
(Of the sky-children; I will give command Thea! Thea! Thea! where is Saturn?) 135 This passion lifted him upon his feet.
And made his hands to struggle in the
air,
His Druid locks to shake and ooze with sweat,
His eyes to fever out, his voice to cease
He stood, and heard not Thea's sobbing
deep:
140 A little time, and then again he snatch'd Utterance thus —“But cannot I create?
Cannot I form? Cannot I fashion forth Another world, another universe,
To overbear and crumble this to naught?
145 Where is another chaos? Where?”— That word
- Found way unto Olympus, and made
quake
The rebel three.¹—Thea was startled up,
And in her bearing was a sort of hope,
As thus she quick-voic'd spake, yet full of awe.
150 “This cheers our fallen house come to our friends,
O Saturn! come away, and give them
heart;
I know the covert, for thence came I hither.”
Thus brief; then with beseeching eyes she went With backward footing through the shade a space 155 He follow'd, and she turn'd to lead the way Through aged boughs, that yielded like the mist Which eagles cleave upmounting from their nest.
Meanwhile in other realms big tears were shed,
More sorrow like to this, and such like
woe, 160 Too huge for mortal tongue or pen of scribe
The Titans fierce, self-hid, or prison-
bound,
Groan'd for the old allegiance once more.
And listen'd in sharp pain for Saturn's
voice
But one of the whole mammoth-brood still kept 165 His sov'reignty, and rule, and majesty,— Blazing Hyperion on his orb'd fire Still sat, still snuff'd the incense, teeming up
From man to the sun's God, yet insecure
For as among us mortals omens drear 170 Fright and perplex, so also shuddered he—Not at dog's howl, or gloom-bird's² hated screech,
Or the familiar visiting of one Upon the first toll of his passing-bell,
Or prophesyings of the midnight lamp, 175 But horrors, portion'd to a giant nerve, Oft made Hyperion ache His palace
bright
Bastion'd with pyramids of glowing gold,
And touch'd with shade of bronzed obelisks, Glar'd a blood-red through all its thousand courts,

¹ Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune, who had rebelled against their father Saturn (Cronus)

² owl's

- 180 Arches, and domes, and fiery galleries;
And all its curtains of Aurorian¹ clouds Flush'd angrily while sometimes eagle's
wings,
Unseen before by Gods or wondering men, Darken'd the place, and neighing steeds were heard,
- 185 Not heard before by Gods or wondering
men
Also, when he would taste the spicy wreaths Of incense, breath'd aloft from sacred hills,
Instead of sweets, his ample palate took Savor of poisonous brass and metal sick
- 190 And so, when harbor'd in the sleepy west, After the full completion of fair day,—
For rest divine upon exalted couch
And slumber in the arms of melody, He pac'd away the pleasant hours of ease
- 195 With stride colossal, on from hall to hall;
While far within each aisle and deep recess,
His winged minions in close clusters stood, Amaz'd and full of fear, like anxious men Who on wide plains gather in panting troops,
- 200 When earthquakes jar their battlements and towers
Even now, while Saturn, rous'd from icy trance, Went step for step with Thea through the woods,
Hyperion, leaving twilight in the rear,
Came slope upon the threshold of the west.
- 205 Then, as was wont, his palace-door flew open
In smoothest silence, save what solemn tubes, Blown by the serious Zephyrs, gave of
sweet
And wandering sounds, slow-breathed melodies;
And like a rose in vermeil tint and shape,
- 210 In fragrance soft, and coolness to the
eye,
That inlet to severe magnificence Stood full blown, for the God to enter in.
- He enter'd, but he enter'd full of wrath,
His flaming robes stream'd out beyond his heels,
- 215 And gave a roar, as if of earthly fire,
That scar'd away the meek ethereal Hours And made their dove-wings tremble. On he flared,
- From stately nave to nave, from vault to vault,
Through bowers of fragrant and enwreathed light,
- 220 And diamond-paved lustrous long arcades, Until he reach'd the great main cupola, There standing fierce beneath, he stamp'd his foot,
And from the basement deep to the high towers
Jarr'd his own golden region, and before
- 225 The quavering thunder thereupon had ceas'd,
His voice leapt out, despite of godlike curb,
To this result: "O dreams of day and
night!
O monstrous forms! O effigies of pain!
O spectres busy in a cold, cold gloom!"
- 230 O lank-ear'd Phantoms of black-weeded pools!
Why do I know ye? why have I seen ye?
why
Is my eternal essence thus distraught
To see and to behold these horrors new?
Saturn is fallen, am I too to fall?
- 235 Am I to leave this haven of my rest,
This cradle of my glory, this soft clime,
This calm luxuriance of blissful light,
These crystalline pavilions, and pure fanes,
Of all my lucent empire? It is left
- 240 Deserted, void, nor any haunt of mine
The blaze, the splendor, and the symmetry.
I cannot see—but darkness, death and darkness.
- Even here, into my centre of repose,
The shady visions come to domineer, Insult, and blind, and stifle up my pomp—Fall!—No, by Tellus and her biny robes!
Over the fiery frontier of my realms
I will advance! a terrible right arm Shall scare that infant thunderer, rebel Jove,
- 250 And bid old Saturn take his throne
again!"—
He spake, and ceas'd, the while a heavier thrust
Held struggle with his throat but came not
forth,
For as in theatres of crowded men Hubbub increases more they call out
"Hush!"
- 255 So at Hyperion's words the Phantoms pale Bestirr'd themselves, thrice horrible and
cold;
And from the mirror'd level where he stood A mist arose, as from a scummy marsh.
At this, through all his bulk an agony

¹ pertaining to Aurora, goddess of the dawn² lift up

- 260 Crept gradual, from the feet unto the crown, Like a lithe serpent vast and muscular Making slow way, with head and neck convuls'd From over-strained might. Releas'd, he fled To the eastern gates, and full six dewy hours 265 Before the dawn in season due should blush, He breath'd fierce breath against the sleepy portals, Clear'd them of heavy vapors, burst them wide Suddenly on the ocean's chilly streams.
The planet orb of fire, whereon he rode 270 Each day from east to west the heavens through, Spun round in sable curtaining of clouds;
Not therefore veiled quite, blindfold, and hid,
But ever and anon the glancing spheres.

Which sages and keen-eyed astrologers
Then living on the earth, with laboring thought 280 Won from the gaze of many centuries:
Now lost, save what we find on remnants huge
Of stone, or marble swart, their import gone,
Their wisdom long since fled—Two wings this orb Possess'd for glory, two fair argent³ wings, 285 Ever exalted at the God's approach And now, from forth the gloom their plumes immense Rose, one by one, till all outspread were.
While still the dazzling globe maintain'd eclipse, Awaiting for Hyperion's command.
290 Fain would he have commanded, fain took throne
And bid the day begin, if but for change
He might not:—No, though a primeval God:
The sacred seasons might not be disturb'd Therefore the operations of the dawn
- 295 Stay'd in their birth, even as here 'tis told Those silver wings expanded asterly, Eager to sail their orb; the porches wide Open'd upon the dusk demesnes of night,
And the bright Titan, frenzied with new woes, 300 Unus'd to bend, by hard compulsion bent His spirit to the sorrow of the time;
And all along a dismal rack of clouds,
Upon the boundaries of day and night,
He stretch'd himself in grief and radiance faint.
305 There as he lay, the Heaven with its stars Look'd down on him with pity, and the voice Of Cœlus, from the universal space, Thus whisper'd low and solemn in his ear
"O brightest of my children dear, earth-born 310 And sky-engendered, Son of Mysteries All unrevealed even to the powers Which met at thy creating, at whose joys And palpitations sweet, and pleasures soft,
I, Cœlus, wonder, how they came and whence, 315 And at the fruits thereof what shapes they be, Distinct, and visible; symbols divine, Manifestations of that beauteous life Diffus'd unseen throughout eternal space
Of these new-form'd art thou, oh brightest child!
320 Of these, thy brethren and the Goddesses!
There is sad feud among ye, and rebellion
Of son against his sire I saw him fall,
I saw my first-born¹ tumbled from his throne!
To me his arms were spread, to me his voice 325 Found way from forth the thunders round his head!
Pale wox² I, and in vapors hid my face Art thou, too, near such doom? vague fear there is:
For I have seen my sons most unlike Gods Divine ye were created, and divine 330 In sad demeanor, solemn, undisturb'd, Unruffled, like high Gods, ye liv'd and ruled:
Now I behold in you fear, hope, and wrath; Actions of rage and passion, even as I see them, on the mortal world beneath, 335 In men who die.—This is the grief, O Son!
Sad sign of ruin, sudden dismay, and fall!
Yet do thou strive; as thou art capable,
As thou canst move about, an evident God;
And canst oppose to each malignant hour 340 Ethereal presence:—I am but a voice;
My life is but the life of winds and tides, ¹ Saturn.

- No more than winds and tides can I avail:—
 But thou canst.—Be thou therefore in the

 Of circumstance; yea, seize the arrow's

 345 Before the tense string murmur.—To the earth!
 For there thou wilt find Saturn, and his woes,
 Meantime I will keep watch on thy bright
 sun,
 And of thy seasons be a careful nurse."— Ere half this region-whisper had come
 down,
 350 Hyperion arose, and on the stars Lifted his curv'd lids, and kept them wide
 'ntil it ceas'd; and still he kept them wide:
 And still they were the same bright, patient
 stars.
 Then with a slow incline of his broad
 breast,
 375 Like to a diver in the pearly seas, Forward he stoop'd over the airy shore,
 And plung'd all noiseless into the deep
 night.

BOOK II

- Just at the self-same beat of Time's wide
 wings
 Hyperion slid into the rustled air,
 And Saturn gain'd with Thea that sad
 place Where Cybele and the bruised Titans mourn'd.
 5 It was a den where no insulting light Could glimmer on their tears; where their own groans
 They felt, but heard not, for the solid roar Of thunderous waterfalls and torrents hoarse,
 Pouring a constant bulk, uncertain where.
 10 Crag jutting forth to crag, and rocks that seem'd
 Ever as if just rising from a sleep, Forehead to forehead with their monstrous horns;
 And thus in thousand hugest phantasies
 Made a fit roofing to this nest of woe.
 15 Instead of thrones, hard flint they sat
 upon,
 Couches of rugged stone, and slaty ridge Stubborn'd with iron. All were not assembled:
 Some chain'd in torture, and some wander-
 ing.
 Cæus, and Gyges, and Briareüs, 20 Typhon, and Dolor, and Porphyryon,

- With many more, the brawniest in assault,
 Were pent in regions of laborious breath; Dungeon'd in opaque element, to keep Their clenched teeth still clench'd, and all their limbs 25 Lock'd up like veins of metal, cramped and screw'd;
 Without a motion, save of their big hearts Heaving in pain, and horribly convuls'd With sanguine, feverous, boiling gurge'¹ of pulse.
 Mnemosyne was straying in the world;
 30 Far from her moon had Phœbe wandered,
 And many else were free to roam abroad,
 But for the main, here found they covert
 dear.
 Scarce images of life, one here, one there, Lay vast and edgeways; like a dismal cirque 35 Of Druid stones, upon a forlorn moor,
 When the chill rain begins at shut of eve.
 In dull November, and then chancel vault, The Heaven itself, is blinded throughout
 night.
 Each one kept shroud, nor to his neighbor gave 40 Or word, or look, or action of despair Creus was one; his ponderous iron mace Lay by him, and a shatter'd rib of rock Told of his rage, ere he thus sank and pined.
 Iapetus another; in his grasp, 45 A serpent's plashy² neck, its barbed
 tongue
 Squeeze'd from the gorge, and all its un-curl'd length
 Dead, and because the creature could not spit
 Its poison in the eyes of conquering Jove Next Cottus: prone he lay, chin uppermost,
 50 As though in pain; for still upon the flint He ground severe his skull, with open mouth
 And eyes at horrid working Nearest him Asia, born of most enormous Cæf, Who cost her mother Tellus keener pangs, 55 Though feminine, than any of her sons More thought than woe was in her dusky
 face,
 For she was prophesying of her glory;
 And in her wide imagination stood Palm-shaded temples, and high rival fænes, 60 By Oxus or in Ganges' sacred isles.
 Even as Hope upon her anchor leans,³ So leant she; not so fair, upon a tusk Shed from the broadest of her elephants.

¹ whirlpool
² speckled

³ See Hebrews, 6:19.

Above her, on a crag's uneasy shelf, 65 Upon his elbow rais'd, all prostrate else, Shadow'd Enceladus; once tame and mild
 As grazing ox unworried in the meads;
 Now tiger-passion'd, lion-thoughted,
 wroth,

He meditated, plotted, and even now 70 Was hurling mountains in that second war,¹

Not long delay'd, that scar'd the younger
 Gods
 To hide themselves in forms of beast and bird.

Not far hence Atlas; and beside him prone Phorcus, the sire of Gorgons. Neighbor'd close

75 Oceanus, and Tethys, in whose lap Sobbed Clymene among her tangled hair.
 In midst of all lay Themis, at the feet Of Ops the queen all clouded round from
 sight;

No shape distinguishable, more than when 80 Thick night confounds the pine-tops with
 the clouds:

And many else whose names may not be told.

For when the Muse's wings are air-ward
 spread,
 Who shall delay her flight? And she must chant:

Of Saturn, and his guide, who now had clumb'd

85 With damp and slippery footing from a depth

More horrid still. Above a sombre cliff Their heads appear'd, and up their stature
 grew

Till on the level height their steps found
 ease:

Then Thea spread abroad her trembling
 arms

90 Upon the precincts of this nest of pain,
 And sidelong fix'd her eye on Saturn's
 face:

There saw she direst strife; the supreme God

At war with all the frailty of grief,
 Of rage, or fear, anxiety, revenge,

95 Remorse, spleen, hope, but most of all
 despair.

Against these plagues he strove in vain;
 for Fate

Had pour'd a mortal oil upon his head,
 A disanointing poison: so that Thea,

100 Affrighted, kept her still, and let him pass
 First onwards in, among the fallen tribe.

As with us mortal men, the laden heart Is persecuted more, and fever'd more,
 When it is nighing to the mournful house Where other hearts are sick of the same bruise;

105 So Saturn, as he walk'd into the midst, Felt faint, and would have sunk among the rest,

But that he met Enceladus's eye,
 Whose mightiness, and awe of him, at once Came like an inspiration; and he shouted,

110 "Titans, behold your God!" at which some groan'd;

Some started on their feet; some also shouted;

Some wept, some wail'd,—all bow'd with reverence;

And Ops, uplifting her black folded veil, Show'd her pale cheeks, and all her forehead wan,

115 Her eyebrows thin and jet, and hollow
 eyes.

There is a roaring in the bleak-grown pines When Winter lifts his voice; there is a noise

Among immortals when a God gives sign,
 With hushing finger, how he means to load

120 His tongue with the full weight of utter-less thought,

With thunder, and with music, and with pomp:

Such noise is like the roar of bleak-grown
 pines:

Which, when it ceases in this mountain'd
 world,

125 No other sound succeeds; but ceasing here, Among these fallen, Saturn's voice therefrom

Grew up like organ, that begins anew

Its strain, when other harmonies, stopt
 short,

Leave the dunn'd air vibrating silverly.

Thus grew it up—"Not in my own sad
 breast,

130 Which is its own great judge and searcher
 out,

Can I find reason why ye should be thus:
 Not in the legends of the first of days,

Studied from that old spirit-leaved book Which starry Uranus with finger bright

135 Sav'd from the shores of darkness, when the waves

Low-ebb'd still hid it up in shallow gloom;—

And the which book ye know I ever kept For my firm-based footstool.—Ah, infirm!

Not there, nor in sign, symbol, or portent
 Of element, earth, water, air, and fire,—

At war, at peace, or inter-quarreling

¹ The war of the Giants against the Olympian gods. The Giants clothed themselves in the skins of beasts and birds.

- One against one, or two, or three, or all Each several one against the other three,
As fire with air loud warring when rain-floods
145 Drown both, and press them both against earth's face,
Where, finding sulphur, a quadruple wrath Unhinges the poor world;—not in that
strife,
Wherefrom I take strange lore, and read it deep,
Can I find reason why ye should be thus.
150 No, nowhere can unriddle, though I search,
And pour on Nature's universal scroll Even to swooning, why ye, Divinities,
The first-born of all shap'd and palpable
Gods,
Should cower beneath what, in comparison, 155 Is untremendous might. Yet ye are here, O'erwhelm'd, and spurn'd, and batter'd, ye are here!
O Titans, shall I say, 'Arise!'—Ye groan Shall I say 'Crouch!'—Ye groan. What can I then?
O Heaven wide! O unseen parent dear!
160 What can I? Tell me, all ye brethren Gods, How we can war, how engine¹ our great wrath!
O speak your counsel now, for Saturn's ear Is all a-hunger'd. Thou, Oceanus, Ponderest high and deep; and in thy face 165 I see, astonished, that severe content Which comes of thought and musing: give us help!"
- So ended Saturn, and the God of the Sea,
Soplist and sage, from no Athenian grove,
But cogitation in his watery shades, 170 Arose, with locks not oozy, and began,
In murmurs, which his first-endeavoring
tongue
Caught infant-like from the far-foamed
sands.
"O ye, whom wrath consumes! who,
passion-stung,
Writhe at defeat, and nurse your agonies!
175 Shut up your senses, stifle up your ears,
My voice is not a bellows unto ire.
Yet listen, ye who will, whilst I bring proof
How ye, perforce, must be content to stoop:
And in the proof much comfort will I give, 180 If ye will take that comfort in its truth.
We fall by course of Nature's law, not force
Of thunder, or of Jove. Great Saturn, thou
Hast sifted well the atom-universe;
- But for this reason, that thou art the King, 185 And only blind from sheer supremacy,
One avenue was shaded from thine eyes,
Through which I wandered to eternal truth.
And first, as thou wast not the first of powers,
So art thou not the last; it cannot be:
190 Thou are not the beginning nor the end From chaos and parental darkness came Light, the first fruits of that intestine broil.
That sullen ferment, which for wondrous ends
Was ripening in itself. The ripe hour
came,
195 And with it light, and light, engendering Upon its own producer, forthwith touch'd
The whole enormous matter into life.
Upon that very hour, our parentage, The Heavens and the Earth, were manifest:
200 Then thou first-born, and we the giant-race, Found ourselves ruling new and beauteous realms.
Now comes the pain of truth, to whom 'tis
pain;
O folly! for to bear all naked truths,
And to envisage circumstance, all calm, 205 That is the top of sovereignty. Mark well!
As Heaven and Earth are fairer, fairer far Than Chaos and blank Darkness, though once chiefs;
And as we show beyond that Heaven and
Earth
In form and shape compact and beautiful, 210 In will, in action free, companionship, And thousand other signs of purer life;
So on our heels a fresh perfection treads,
A power more strong in beauty, born of us
And fated to excel us, as we pass 215 In glory that old Darkness nor are we Thereby more conquer'd, than by us the rule
Of shapeless Chaos. Say, doth the dull soil Quarrel with the proud forests it hath fed,
And feedeth still, more comely than itself?
220 Can it deny the chiefdom of green groves?
Or shall the tree be envious of the dove Because it cooeth, and hath snowy wings
To wander wherewithal and find its joys?
We are such forest-trees, and our fair
boughs
225 Have bred forth, not pale solitary doves, But eagles golden-feather'd, who do tower Above us in their beauty, and must reign
In right thereof; for 'tis the eternal law That first in beauty should be first in might:¹

¹ plan, execute¹ See Keats's Ode on a Grecian Urn, 49-50 (p. 828); also his letter to Bailey (p. 862a, 1.)

230 Yea, by that law, another race may drive
Our conquerors to mourn as we do now Have ye beheld the young God of the Seas,¹

My disposessor? Have ye seen his face?
Have ye beheld his chariot, foam'd along 235 By noble winged creatures he hath made?
I saw him on the calmed waters scud,
With such a glow of beauty in his eyes,
That it enforc'd me to bid sad farewell To all my empire: farewell sad I took, 240 And hither came, to see how dolorous fate Had wrought upon ye; and how I might best

Gave consolation in this woe extreme.
Receive the truth, and let it be your balm."

Whether through poz'd² conviction, or dusdaim, 245 They guarded silence, when Oceanus Left murmuring, what deepest thought can tell?

But so it was, none answer'd for a space.
Save one whom none regarded, Clymene.
And yet she answer'd not, only com-plain'd,

250 With hectic lips, and eyes up-looking mild, Thus wounding timidly among the fierce
"O Father, I am here the simplest voice.
And all my knowledge is that joy is gone,
And thus thing woe crept in among our hearts,

255 There to remain forever, as I fear:
I would not bode of evil, if I thought So weak a creature could turn off the help Which by just right should come of mighty
Gods,

Yet let me tell my sorrow, let me tell 260 Of what I heard, and how it made me weep, And know that we had parted from all hope.

I stood upon a shore, a pleasant shore, Where a sweet clime was breathed from a land
Of fragrance, quietness, and trees, and flowers

265 Full of calm joy it was, as I of grief;
Too full of joy, and soft delicious warmth;
So that I felt a movement in my heart To chide, and to reproach that solitude
With songs of misery, music of our woes.

270 And sat me down, and took a mouthed shell³

And murmur'd into it, and made melody—
O melody no more! for while I sang,
And with poor skill let pass into the breeze

The dull shell's echo, from a bowery strand 275 Just opposite, an island of the sea, There came enchantment with the shifting
wind,
That did both brown and keep alive my ears.

I threw my shell away upon the sand,
And a wave fill'd it, as my sense was fill'd 280 With that new blissful golden melody.
A living death was in each gush of sounds,
Each family of rapturous hurried notes,
That fell, one after one, yet all at once, Like pearl beads dropping sudden from their string:

285 And then another, then another strain, Each like a dove leaving its olive perch,
With music wing'd instead of silent
plumes,

To hover round my head, and make me sick
Of joy and grief at once. Grief overcame, 290 And I was stopping up my frantic ears, When, past all hindrance of my trembling
hands,

A voice came sweeter, sweeter than all tune,
And still it cried, 'Apollo! young Apollo!
Themorning-bright Apollo! young Apollo!'

295 I fled, it follow'd me, and cried 'Apollo!' O Father, and O Brethren, had ye felt Those pains of mine; O Saturn, hadst thou felt,
Ye would not call this too-indulged tongue Presumptuous, in thus venturing to be heard."

300 So far her voice flow'd on, like timorous brook

That, lingering along a pebbled coast, Doth fear to meet the sea: but sea it met,
And shudder'd; for the overwhelming
voice

Of huge Enceladus swallow'd it in wrath.
305 The ponderous syllables, like sullen waves
In the half-glutted hollows of reef-rocks, Came booming thus, while still upon his arm

He lean'd; not rising, from supreme contempt.

"Or shall we listen to the over-wise, 310 Or to the over-foolish, giant Gods?
Not thunderbolt on thunderbolt, till all That rebel Jove's whole armory were spent, Not world on world upon these shoulders
piled,

Could agonize me more than baby-words 315 In midst of this dethronement horrible Speak! roar! shout! yell! ye sleepy Titans
all

Do ye forget the blows, the buffets vile?
Are ye not smitten by a youngling arm?

³ lyre (The first lyre is said to have been made from a tortoise shell)

Dost thou forget, sham Monarch of the Waves,
320 Thy scalding in the seas? What! have I rous'd
Your spleens with so few simple words as these?

O joy! for now I see ye are not lost:
O joy! for now I see a thousand eyes Wide-glaring for revenge!"—As this he
said,

325 He lifted up his stature vast, and stood, Still without intermission speaking thus:
"Now ye are flames, I'll tell you how to burn,

And purge the ether¹ of our enemies, How to feed fierce the crooked stings of
fire,

330 And singe away the swollen clouds of Jove, Stifling that puny essence in its tent
O let him feel the evil he hath done;
For though I scorn Oceanus's lore, Much pain have I for more than loss of realms:

335 The days of peace and slumberous calm are fled;

Those days, all innocent of scathing war,
When all the fair Existences of heaven Came open-eyed to guess what we would
speak:—

That was before our brows were taught to
frown,

340 Before our lips knew else but solemn sounds;

That was before we knew the winged thing,
Victory, might be lost, or might be won.
And be ye mindful that Hyperion,

Our brightest brother, still is undisgraced—345 Hyperion, lo! his radiance is here!"

All eyes were on Enceladus's face,
And they beheld, while still Hyperion's
name

Flew from his lips up to the vaulted rocks,
A pallid gleam across his features stern:

350 Not savage, for he saw full many a God Wroth as himself. He look'd upon them
all,

And in each face he saw a gleam of light, But splendor in Saturn's, whose hoar
locks

Shone like the bubbling foam about a keel

355 When the prow sweeps into a midnight cove.

In pale and silver silence they remain'd, Till suddenly a splendor, like the morn, Pervaded all the beetling gloomy steeps,
All the sad spaces of oblivion,

360 And every gulf, and every chasm old,

¹ upper regions

And every height, and every sullen depth, Voiceless, or hoarse with loud tormented
streams:

And all the everlasting cataracts,
And all the headlong torrents far and
near,

365 Mantled before in darkness and huge
shade,

Now saw the light and made it terrible.

It was Hyperion:—a granite peak

His bright feet touch'd, and there he stay'd to view

The misery his brilliance had betray'd

370 To the most hateful seeing of itself.

Golden his hair of short Numidian curl,

Regal his shape majestic, a vast shade

In midst of his own brightness, like the bulk

Of Memnon's image at the set of sun

375 To one who travels from the dusking East Sighs, too, as mournful as that Memnon's harp,¹

He utter'd, while his hands contemplative

He press'd together, and in silence stood

Despondence seiz'd again the fallen Gods

380 At sight of the dejected King of Day,

And many hid their faces from the light

But fierce Enceladus sent forth his eyes

Among the brotherhood; and, at their glare,

Uprose Iapetus, and Creüs too,

385 And Phorus, sea-born, and together strode

To where he towered on his eminence

There those four shouted forth old Sat-urn's name;

Hyperion from the peak loud answered,

"Saturn!"

Saturn sat near the Mother of the Gods,²

390 In whose face was no joy, though all the Gods

Gave from their hollow throats the name of "Saturn!"

BOOK III

Thus in alternate uproar and sad peace,

Amazed were those Titans utterly.

O leave them, Muse! O leave them to their woes;

For thou art weak to sing such tumultdire:

5 A solitary sorrow best befits

Thy lips, and antheming a lonely grief

Leave them, O Muse! for thou anon wilt

- Many a fallen old Divinity Wandering in vain about bewildered shores.
- 10 Meantime touch piously the Delphic harp,
And not a wind of heaven but will breathe
In aid soft warble from the Dorian flute, For lo! 'tis for the Father of all verse.
Flush every thing that hath a vermeil hue,
- 15 Let the rose glow intense and warm the air,
And let the clouds of even and of morn Float in voluptuous fleeces o'er the hills;
Let the red wine within the goblet boil, Cold as a bubbling well, let faint-lipp'd
shells,
- 20 On sands, or in great deeps, vermilion turn Through all their labyrinths, and let the maid
Blush keenly, as with some warm kiss surpris'd.
Chief isle of the embowered Cyclades, Rejoice, O Delos, with thine olives green,
- 25 And poplars, and lawn-shading palms, and beech,
In which the Zephyr breathes the loudest
song,
And hazels thick, dark-stemm'd beneath the shade:
Apollo is once more the golden theme!
Where was he, when the Giant of the Sun¹
- 30 Stood bright, amid the sorrow of his peers?
Together had he left his mother fair
And his twin-sister sleeping in their bower,
And in the morning twilight wandered
forth
Beside the osiers² of a rivulet,
- 35 Full ankle-deep in lilies of the vale.
The nightingale had ceas'd, and a few stars Were lingering in the heavens, while the thrush
Began calm-throated. Throughout all the isle
There was no covert, no retired cave
- 40 Unhaunted by the murmurous noise of
waves,
Though scarcely heard in many a green
recess.
He listen'd, and he wept, and his bright
tears Went trickling down the golden bow he held
Thus with half-shut suffused eyes he stood,
- 45 While from beneath some cumbrous boughs hard by
With solemn step an awful Goddess came,
And there was purport in her looks for
him,
Which he with eager guess began to read Perplex'd, the while melodiously he said.
- 50 "How cam'st thou over the unfooted sea?
Or hath that antique mien and robed form Mov'd in these vales invisible till now?" Sure I have heard those vestments sweeping o'er
The fallen leaves, when I have sat alone In cool mid-forest. Surely I have traced
- 55 The rustle of those ample skirts about These grassy solitudes, and seen the flowers Lift up their heads, as still the whisper
pass'd
Goddess! I have beheld those eyes before, 60 And their eternal calm, and all that face, Or I have dream'd."—"Yes," said the supreme shape,
"Thou hast dream'd of me; and awaking
up Didst find a lyre all golden by thy side, Whose strings touch'd by thy fingers, all

Listen'd in pain and pleasure at the birth Of such new tuneful wonder. Is't not strange
That thou shouldst weep, so gifted? Tell me, youth,
What sorrow thou canst feel; for I am sad
- 70 When thou dost shed a tear—explain thy griefs
To one who in this lonely isle hath been The watcher of thy sleep and hours of life,
From the young day when first thy infant
hand Pluck'd witless the weak flowers, till thine aim

Show thy heart's secret to an ancient
Power
Who hath forsaken old and sacred thrones
For prophecies of thee, and for the sake Of loveliness new born."—Apollo then,
- 80 With sudden scrutiny and gloomless eyes, Thus answer'd, while his white melodious throat Throbb'd with the syllables—"Mnemoyne!
Thy name is on my tongue, I know not
how;
Why should I tell thee what thou so well
seest?
- 85 Why should I strive to show what from thy
lips
Would come no mystery? For me, dark,
dark,
And painful vile oblivion seals my eyes:
I strive to search wherefore I am so sad, Until a melancholy numbs my limbs;

- 90 And then upon the grass I sit, and moan, Like one who once had wings.—O why should I Feel curs'd and thwarted, when the liegeless air
 Yields to my step aspirant? why should I Spurn the green turf as hateful to my feet?
- 95 Goddess benign, point forth some unknown
 thing:
 Are there not other regions than this isle?
 What are the stars? There is the sun, the
 sun!
 And the most patient brilliance of the
 moon!
 And stars by thousands! Point me out the way
- 100 To any one particular beauteous star,
 And I will fit into it with my lyre,
 And make its silvery splendor pant with

 I have heard the cloudy thunder: Where is power?
- Whose hand, whose essence, what divinity 105 Makes this alarm in the elements, While I here idle listen on the shores
 In fearless yet in aching ignorance?
 O tell me, lonely Goddess, by thy harp,
 That waileth every morn and eventide,
- 110 Tell me why thus I rave, about these groves!
 Mute thou remainest—mute! yet I can read A wondrous lesson in thy silent face:
 Knowledge enormous makes a God of me Names, deeds, gray legends, dire events, rebellions,

 Creations and destroyings, all at once Pour into the wide hollows of my brain,
 And deify me, as if some blithe wine Or bright elixir peerless I had drunk,
 And so become immortal."—Thus the God, 120 While his enkindling eyes, with level glance Beneath his white soft temples, steadfast kept Trembling with light upon Mnemosyne.
 Soon wild commotions shook him, and made flush
- 125 All the immortal fairness of his limbs;
 Most like the struggle at the gate of death;
 Or liker still to one who should take leave Of pale immortal death, and with a pang As hot as death's is chill, with fierce convulse
- 130 Die into life: so young Apollo anguish'd:
 His very hair, his golden tresses famed Kept undulation round his eager neck.
 During the pain Mnemosyne upheld Her arms as one who prophesied.— At length
- 135 Apollo shriek'd;—and lo! from all his limbs

 Or by a cider-press, with patient look, Thou watchest the last oozings hours

- Where are the songs of Spring? Ay, where are they?
 Think not of them, thou hast thy music

TO FANNIE³
1819 1848

I cry your mercy—pity—love!—aye, love!
Merciful love that tantalizes not,
One-thoughted, never-wandering, guileless
love,
Unmask'd, and being seen—without a blot!
5 O! let me have thee whole,—all—all—be mine!
That shape, that fairness, that sweet minor zest
Of love, your kiss,—those hands, those eyes
divine,
That warm, white, lucent, million-pleasur'd
breast,— 10 Yourself—your soul—in pity give me all, Withhold no atom's atom or I die,
Or living on perhaps, your wretched thrall, Forget, in the mist of idle misery, Life's purposes,—the palate of my mind Losing its gust, and my ambition blind!

BRIGHT STAR, WOULD I WERE STEADFAST AS THOU ART
1820 1848

Bright star, would I were steadfast as thou art!
Not in lone splendor hung aloft the night,
And watching, with eternal lids apart,
Like Nature's patient, sleepless eremite,⁴ 5 The moving waters at their priestlike task Of pure ablution round earth's human
shores,
Or gazing on the new soft-fallen mask Of snow upon the mountains and the moors:
No—yet still steadfast, still unchangeable, 10 Pillow'd upon my fair love's ripening
breast,
To feel forever its soft fall and swell,
Awake forever in a sweet unrest.
Still, still to hear her tender-taken breath,
And so live ever—or else swoon to death.

FROM KEATS'S LETTERS
1816-20 1848-91

TO BENJAMIN BAILEY

[BURFORD BRIDGE, November 22, 1817.]

My dear Bailey—I will get over the first part of this (unsaid) letter as soon as possible, for it relates to the affairs of poor Cripps.—To a man of your nature such a 5 letter as Haydon's must have been extremely cutting— What occasions the greater part of the world's quarrels?— simply this—two minds meet, and do not understand each other time enough to prevent any shock or surprise at the conduct of either party—10 As soon as I had known Haydon three days, I had got enough of his character not to have been surprised at such a letter as he has hurt you with. Nor, when I knew it, was it a principle with me to drop his acquaint-15 ance; although with you it would have been an imperious feeling

I wish you knew all that I think about genius and the heart—and yet I think that you are thoroughly acquainted with my innermost breast in that respect, or you could not have known me even thus long, and still hold me worthy to be your dear friend. In passing, however, I must say one thing that has pressed upon me lately, and increased my humility and capability of sub-25 mission—and that is this truth—men of genius are great as certain ethereal chemicals operating on the mass of neutral intellect—30 but they have not any individuality, any determined character—I would call the top and head of those who have a proper self,¹ men of power.

But I am running my head into a subject which I am certain I could not do justice to under five years' study, and 3 vols. octavo —and, moreover, I long to be talking about the imagination—so my dear Bailey, do not think of this unpleasant affair, if possible do not—I defy any harm to come of it—I defy. I shall write to Cripps this week, and request him to tell me all his goings-on from time to time by letter wherever I may be. It will go on well—so don't because you have suddenly discovered a coldness in Haydon suffer yourself to be teased—Do not my dear fellow—O! I wish I was as certain of the end of all your troubles as that of your momentary start about the authenticity of the imagination. I am cer-50 tain of nothing but of the holiness of the heart's affections, and the truth of imagination. What the imagination seizes as ¹ That is, those who have an individuality beauty must be truth¹—whether it existed before or not,—for I have the same idea of all our passions as of love: they are all, in their sublime, creative of essential beauty. In a word, you may know my favorite speculation by my first Book, and the little Song² I sent in my last, which is a representation from the fancy of the probable mode of operating in these matters. The imagination may be compared to Adam's dream,—he awoke and found it truth:³—I am more zealous in this affair, because I have never yet been able to perceive how anything can be known for truth by consecutive reasoning—and yet it must be. Can it be that even the greatest philosopher ever arrived at his goal without putting aside numerous objections? However it may be, O for a life of sensations rather than of thoughts! It is "a vision in the form of youth," a shadow of reality to come—And this consideration has further convinced me,—for it has come as auxiliary to another favorite speculation of mine,—that we shall enjoy ourselves hereafter by having what we called happiness on earth repeated in a finer tone—And yet such a fate can only befall those who delight in sensation, rather than hunger as you do after truth. Adam's dream will do here, and seems to be a conviction that imagination and its empyreal reflection, is the same as human life and its spiritual repetition. But, as I was saying, the simple imaginative mind may have its reward in the repetition of its own silent working coming continually on the spirit with a fine suddenness—to compare great things with small, have you never by being surprised with an old melody, in a delicious place by a delicious voice, felt over again your very speculations and surmises at the time it first operated on your soul?—do you not remember forming to yourself the singer's face—more beautiful than it was possible, and yet with the elevation of the moment you did not think so? Even then you were mounted on the wings of imagination, so high that the prototype must be hereafter—that delicious face you will see. What a time! I am continually running away from the subject. Sure this cannot be exactly the case with a complex mind—one that is imaginative, and at the same time careful of its fruits,—who would exist partly on sensation, partly on thought—to whom it is necessary that years should bring the philosophic mind?⁴ Such a one I consider yours, and therefore it is necessary to your eternal happiness that you not only drink this old wine of heaven, which I shall call the redigestion of our most ethereal musings upon earth, but also increase in knowledge and know all things. I am glad to hear that you are in a fair way for Easter. You will soon get through your unpleasant reading, and then!—but the world is full of troubles, and I have not much reason to think myself pestered with many.

Your affectionate friend,

JOHN KEATS

TO JOHN HAMILTON REYNOLDS

HAMPSTEAD, [February 3, 1818]

My dear Reynolds—I thank you for your dish of filberts⁵—would I could get a basket of them by way of dessert every day for the sum of twopence. Would we were a sort of ethereal pigs, and turned loose to feed upon spiritual mast and acorns—which would be merely being a squirrel and feeding upon filberts, for what is a squirrel but an airy pig, or a filbert but a sort of arch-angelical acorn? About the nuts being worth cracking, all I can say is, that where there are a throng of delightful images ready drawn, simplicity is the only thing. The first is the best on account of the first line, and the "arrow, foil'd of its antler'd food," and moreover (and this is the only word or two I find fault with, the more because I have had so much reason to shun it as a quicksand) the last has "tender and true." We must cut this, and not be rattled into any more of the like. It may be said that we ought to read our contemporaries, that Wordsworth, etc., should have their due from us. But, for the sake of a few fine imaginative or domestic passages, are we to be bullied into a certain philosophy engendered in the whims of an egotist? Every man has his speculations, but every man does not brood and peacock over them till he makes a false coinage and deceives himself. Many a man can travel to the very bourne of heaven, and yet want confidence to put down his half-seeing. Sancho will invent a journey heavenward as well as anybody. We hate poetry that has a palpable design upon us, and, if we do not agree, seems to put its hand into its breeches pocket. Poetry should be great and unobtrusive, a thing which enters into one's soul, and does not startle or amaze it with itself—but with its subject. How beautiful are the retired flowers!—how would they lose their beauty were they to throng into the highway, crying out, "Admire me, I am a violet! Dote upon me, I am a primrose!" Modern poets differ from the Elizabethans in this: each of the moderns like an Elector of Hanover governs his petty state and knows how many straws are swept daily from the causeways in all his dominions, and has a continual itching that all the housewives should have their coppers well scoured: the ancients were emperors of vast provinces, they had only heard of the remote ones and scarcely cared to visit them. I will cut all this—I will have no more of Wordsworth or Hunt in particular—Why should we be of the tribe of Manasseh, when we can wander with Esau?¹ Why should we kick against the pricks,² when we can walk on roses? Why should we be owls, when we can be eagles? Why be teased with "nice-eyed wagtails," when we have in sight "the Cherub Contemplation"?³ Why with Wordsworth's "Matthew with a bough of wilding in his hand,"⁴ when we can have Jacques "under an oak,"⁵ etc.? The secret of the bough of wilding will run through your head faster than I can write it. Old Matthew spoke to him some years ago on some nothing, and because he happens in an evening walk to imagine the figure of the old man, he must stamp it down in black and white, and it is henceforth sacred. I don't mean to deny Wordsworth's grandeur and Hunt's merit, but I mean to say we need not be teased with grandeur and merit when we can have them uncontaminated and unobtrusive. Let us have the old poets and Robin Hood. Your letter and its sonnets gave me more pleasure than will the Fourth Book of Childe Harold and the whole of anybody's life and opinions. In return for your dish of filberts, I have gathered a few catkins,¹ I hope they'll look pretty.

Your sincere friend and co-scribbler,
JOHN KEATS.

TO JOHN TAYLOR

[HAMPTSTEAD, February 27, 1818.]

10 My dear Taylor—

. It is a sorry thing for me that any one should have to overcome prejudices in reading my verses—that affects me more than any hypercriticism on any particular passage—In Endymion, I have most likely but moved into the go-cart from the leading-strings—In poetry I have a few axioms, and you will see how far I am from their centre.

20 1st. I think poetry should surprise by a fine excess, and not by singularity; It should strike the reader as a wording of his own highest thoughts, and appear almost a remembrance.

25 2d. Its touches of beauty should never be half-way, thereby making the reader breathless, instead of content. The rise, the progress, the setting of imagery should, like the sun, come natural to him, shine over him, and set soberly, although in magnificence, leaving him in the luxury of twilight. But it is easier to think what poetry should be, than to write it—And this leads me to 35 Another axiom—That if poetry comes not as naturally as the leaves to a tree, it had better not come at all.—However it may be with me, I cannot help looking into new countries with "O for a Muse of Fire to ascend!"² If Endymion serves me as a pioneer, perhaps I ought to be content—I have great reason to be content, for thank God I can read, and perhaps understand Shakspeare to his depths; and I have I am sure many friends, who, if I fail, will attribute any change in my life and temper to humbleness rather than pride—to a cowering under the wings of great poets, rather than to a bitterness that I am not appreciated.

Your sincere and obliged friend,
JOHN KEATS.

¹ That is, why should we dwell in cities when we can roam the fields? See Genesis, 25 27; Numbers, 32-33 ff. Wordsworth's unfriendly attitude toward the paganism expressed in Keats's "Hymn to Pan," in Endymion, l. 232-306 (p. 770), may account for Keats's estimate of Wordsworth expressed in this letter. Keats had recited the Hymn to Wordsworth.

TO JAMES AUGUSTUS HESSEY

My dear Hessey—You are very good in sending me the letters from *The Chronicle*¹—and I am very bad in not acknowledging such a kindness sooner—pray forgive me. It has so chanced that I have had that paper every day—I have seen today's. I cannot but feel indebted to those gentlemen who have taken my part—As for the rest, I begin to get a little acquainted with my own strength and weakness.—Praise or blame has but a momentary effect on the man whose love of beauty in the abstract makes him a severe critic on his own works. My own domestic criticism has given me pain without comparison beyond what Blackwood or *The Quarterly*² could possibly inflict—and also when I feel I am right, no external praise can give me such a glow as my own solitary re-perception and ratification of what is fine. J. S.³ is perfectly right in regard to the slipshod Endymion. That it is so is no fault of mine. No!—though it may sound a little paradoxical. It is as good as I had power to make it—by myself—Had I been nervous about its being a perfect piece, and with that view asked advice, and trembled over every page, it would not have been written, for it is not in my nature to fumble⁴—I will write independently.—I have written independently without judgment. I may write independently, and with judgment, hereafter. The genius of poetry must work out its own salvation in a man. It cannot be matured by law and precept, but by sensation and watchfulness in itself—That which is creative must create itself—In Endymion, I leaped headlong into the sea, and thereby have become better acquainted with the soundings, the quicksands, and the rocks, than if I had stayed upon the green shore, and piped a silly pipe, and took tea and comfortable advice. I was never afraid of failure; for I would sooner fail than not be among the greatest—But I am nigh getting into a rant. So, with remembrances to Taylor and Woodhouse, etc., I am

TO GEORGE AND GEORGIANA KEATS

[HAMPTSTEAD, October 25, 1818.]

My dear George—

. . . . I shall in a short time write you as far as I know how I intend to pass my life—I cannot think of those things now 5 Tom¹ is so-unwell and weak. Notwithstanding your happiness and your recommendation I hope I shall never marry. Though the most beautiful creature were waiting for me at the end of a journey or a walk; though the carpet were of silk, the curtains of the morning clouds; the chairs and sofa stuffed with cygnet's² down; the food manna, the wine beyond claret, the window opening on Winander mere, I should not 10 feel—or rather my happiness would not be so fine, as my solitude is sublime. Then instead of what I have described, there is a sublimity to welcome me home—The roaring of the wind is my wife and the stars through the window pane are my children. The mighty abstract idea I have of beauty in all things stifles the more divided and minute domestic happiness—an amiable wife and sweet children I contemplate as 15 a part of that beauty, but I must have a thousand of those beautiful particles to fill up my heart. I feel more and more every day, as my imagination strengthens, that I do not live in this world alone but in a thousand worlds—No sooner am I alone than shapes of epic greatness are stationed around me, and serve my spirit the office which is equivalent to a king's bodyguard—then "Tragedy with sceptred pall comes 20 sweeping by."³ According to my state of mind I am with Achilles shouting in the trenches,⁴ or with Theocritus in the vales of Sicily. Or I throw my whole being into Troilus, and repeating those lines, "I wander like a lost soul upon the stygian banks staying for waftage,"⁵ I melt into the air with a voluptuousness so delicate that I am content to be alone. These things, combined with the opinion I have of the generality of women—who appear to me as children to whom I would rather give a sugar plum than my time, form a barrier against matrimony which I rejoice in.

I have written this that you might see I have my share of the highest pleasures, and that though I may choose to pass my days alone I shall be no solitary. You see there is nothing spleenical in all this. The only thing that can ever affect me personally for more than one short passing day, is any doubt about my powers for poetry—I seldom have any, and I look with hope to the nighting time when I shall have none. I am as happy as a man can be—that is, in myself I should be happy if Tom was well, and I knew you were passing pleasant days. Then I should be most enviable—with the yearning passion I have for the beautiful, connected and made one with the ambition of my intellect. Think of my pleasure in solitude in comparison of my commerce with the world—there I am a child—there they do not know me, not even my most intimate acquaintance—I give in to their feelings as though I were refraining from irritating a little child. Some think me middling, others silly, others foolish—every one thinks he sees my weak side against my will, when in truth it is with my will—I am content to be thought all this because I have in my own breast so great a resource. This is one great reason why they like me so; because they can all show to advantage in a room and eclipse from a certain tact one who is reckoned to be a good poet. I hope I am not here playing tricks “to make the angels weep”:¹ I think not for I have not the least contempt for my species, and though it may sound paradoxical, my greatest elevations of soul leave me every time more humbled—Enough of this—though in your love for me you will not think it enough

Believe me, my dear brother and sister,

Your anxious and affectionate Brother,

JOHN

WINCHESTER, August 25, [1819]

My dear Reynolds—By this post I write to Rice, who will tell you why we have left Shanklin; and how we like this place. I have indeed scarcely anything else to say, leading so monotonous a life, except I was to give you a history of sensations, and day-nightmares. You would not find me at all unhappy in it, as all my thoughts and feelings which are of the selfish nature, home speculations, every day continue to make me more iron—I am convinced more and more, every day, that fine writing is, next to fine doing, the top thing in the world; the Paradise Lost becomes a greater wonder. The more I know what my diligence may in time probably effect, the more does my heart distend with pride and obstinacy—I feel it in my power to become a popular writer—I feel it in my power to refuse the poisonous suffrage of a public. My own being which I know to be becomes of more consequence to me than the crowds of shadows in the shape of men and women that inhabit a kingdom. The soul is a world of itself, and has enough to do in its own home. Those whom I know already, and who have grown as it were a part of myself, I could not do without: but for the rest of mankind, they are as much a dream to me as Milton's Hierarchies.¹ I think if I had a free and healthy and lasting organization of heart, and lungs as strong as an ox's so as to be able to bear unhurt the shock of extreme thought and sensation without weariness, I could pass my life very nearly alone though it should last eighty years. But I feel my body too weak to support me to the height, I am obliged continually to check myself, and be nothing. It would be vain for me to endeavor after a more reasonable manner of writing to you. I have nothing to speak of but myself, and what can I say but what I feel? If you should have any reason to regret this state of excitement in me, I will turn the tide of your feelings in the right channel, by mentioning that it is the only state for the best sort of poetry—that is all I care for, all I live for. Forgive me for not filling up the whole sheet; letters become so irksome to me, that the next time I leave London I shall petition them all to be spared me. To give me credit for constancy, and at the same time waive letter writing will be the highest indulgence I can think of.

Ever your affectionate friend,

JOHN KEATS.

TO PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

[HAMPTREAD, August, 1820]

My dear Shelley—I am very much gratified that you, in a foreign country, and with a mind almost over-occupied, should write to me in the strain of the letter beside me. If I do not take advantage of your invitation, it will be prevented by a circumstance. I have very much at heart to prophesy. There is no doubt that an English winter would put an end to me, and do so in a lingering, hateful manner. Therefore, I must either voyage or journey to Italy, as a soldier marches up to a battery. My nerves at present are the worst part of me, ¹ The three divisions into which the nine orders of angels were divided. See Paradise Lost, I, 737.

¹ Measure for Measure, II, 2, 117.

yet they feel soothed that, come what extreme may, I shall not be destined to remain in one spot long enough to take a hatred of any four particular bedposts. I am glad 5 you take any pleasure in my poor poem, which I would willingly take the trouble to unwrite, if possible, did I care so much as I have done about reputation. I received a copy of The Cenci, as from yourself, from 10 Hunt. There is only one part of it I am judge of—the poetry and dramatic effect, which by many spirits nowadays is considered the Mammon. A modern work, it is said, must have a purpose, which may be 15 the God. An artist must serve Mammon; he must have “self-concentration”—selfishness, perhaps. You, I am sure, will forgive me for sincerely remarking that you might curb your magnanimity, and be more of an 20 artist, and load every rift of your subject with ore. The thought of such discipline must fall like cold chains upon you, who perhaps never sat with your wings furled for six months together. And is not this 25 extraordinary talk for the writer of Endymion, whose mind was like a pack of scattered cards? I am picked up and sorted to a pip.¹ My imagination is a monastery, and I am its monk. I am in expectation of 30 *Prometheus*² every day. Could I have my own wish effected, you would have it still in manuscript, or be but now putting an end to the second act. I remember you advising me not to publish my first blights, on 35 Hampstead Heath. I am returning advice upon your hands. Most of the poems in the volume I send you have been written above two years, and would never have been published but for hope of gain; so you see 40 I am inclined enough to take your advice now. I must express once more my deep sense of your kindness, adding my sincere thanks and respects for Mrs Shelley.

In the hope of soon seeing you, I remain 45 most sincerely yours,

JOHN KEATS

JAMES HENRY LEIGH HUNT

THE STORY OF RIMINI
 1812-16 1816

240 A noble range it was, of many a rood, Wall'd and tree-girt, and ending in a wood
 A small sweet house o'erlook'd it from a nest

² Shelley's drama, Prometheus Unbound

Of pines:—all wood and garden was the rest, Lawn, and green lane, and covert:—and it had 245 A winding stream about it, clear and glad, With here and there a swan, the creature born

To be the only graceful shape of scorn.¹
 The flower-beds all were liberal of delight.
 Roses in heaps were there, both red and white,

250 Lilies angelical, and gorgeous glooms
 Of wall-flowers, and blue hyacinths, and blooms

Hanging thick clusters from light boughs;
 in short,
 All the sweet cups to which the bees resort,
 With plots of grass, and leafier walks between 255 Of red geraniums, and of jessamine,

 And orange, whose warm leaves so finely suit,

And look as if they shade a golden fruit,
 And midst the flow'rs, turf'd round beneath a shade

Of darksome pines, a babbling fountain play'd,

260 And 'twixt their shafts you saw the water bright,

Which through the tops glimmer'd with show'ring light

So now you stood to think what odors best Made the air happy in that lovely nest,
 And now you went beside the flowers, with eyes

265 Earnest as bees, restless as butterflies, And then turn'd off into a shadier walk,
 Close and continuous, fit for lovers' talk,
 And then pursued the stream, and as you trod

Onward and onward o'er the velvet sod, 270 Felt on your face an air, watery and sweet,
 And a new sense in your soft-lighting feet
 At last you enter'd shades indeed, the wood,

Broken with glens and pits, and glades far-view'd,

Through which the distant palace now and then 275 Look'd lordly forth with many-window'd ken;

A land of trees,—which reaching round about

In shady blessing stretch'd their old arms out;

With spots of sunny openings, and with nooks

¹ Born to express scorn and grace at the same time.

To lie and read in, sloping into brooks, 280 Where at her drink you startled the slim
 deer,
 Retreating lightly with a lovely fear.
 And all about, the birds kept leafy house,
 And sung and darted in and out the
 boughs,
 And all about, a lovely sky of blue 285 Clearly was felt, or down the leaves laugh'd through.
 And here and there, in ev'ry part, were seats,
 Some in the open walks, some in retreats,— With bow'ring leaves o'erhead, to which the eye Look'd up half sweetly and half awfully,— 290 Places of nestling green, for poets made,
 Where, when the sunshine struck a yellow
 shade,
 The rugged trunks, to inward peeping
 sight,
 Throng'd in dark pillars up the gold green
 light

But 'twixt the wood and flowery walks, half-way.
 295 And form'd of both, the loveliest portion
 lay,— A spot, that struck you like enchanted
 ground:—
 It was a shallow dell, set in a mound Of sloping orchards,—fig, and almond
 trees,
 Cherry and pine, and some few cypresses, 300 Down by whose roots, descending darkly
 still,
 (You saw it not, but heard) there gush'd a rill,
 Whose low sweet talking seem'd as if it
 said,
 Something eternal to that happy shade.
 The ground within was lawn, with fruits and flowers 305 Heap'd towards the centre, half of citron
 bowers;
 And in the middle of those golden trees,
 Half seen amidst the globy oranges, Lurk'd a rare summer-house, a lovely
 sight,—
 Small, marble, well-proportion'd, creamy
 white, 310 Its top with vine-leaves sprinkled,—but no
 more,—
 And a young bay-tree either side the
 door.
 The door was to the wood, forward and square,
 The rest was domed at top, and circular;

And through the dome the only light came
 in,
 315 Ting'd as it enter'd by the vine-leaves thin
 It was a beauteous piece of ancient skill.
 Spar'd from the rage of war, and perfect
 still;
 By some suppos'd the work of fairy
 hands,— Fam'd for luxurious taste, and choice of lands,
 320 Alcina or Morgana,—who from fights And errant¹ fame inveigled amorous knights,
 And liv'd with them in a long round of blisses, Feasts, concerts, baths, and bower-en-shaded kisses.
 But 'twas a temple, as its sculpture told, 325 Built to the Nymphs that haunted there of old;
 For o'er the door was carv'd a sacrifice
 By girls and shepherds brought, with reverent eyes,
 Of sylvan drinks and foods, simple and
 sweet,
 And goats with struggling horns and planted feet.
 330 And round about ran, on a line with this,
 In like relief, a world of pagan bliss,
 That show'd, in various scenes, the nymphs
 themselves;
 Some by the water-side, on bowery shelves—Leaning at will,—some in the stream at
 play,— 335 Some pelting the young Fauns with bud-of May,— Or half asleep pretending not to see The latter in the brakes² come creepingly.
 While from their careless urns, lying aside
 In the long grass, the struggling water-glide.
 340 Never, be sure, before or since was seen A summer-house so fine in such a nest of green.

MAHMOUD
1823

There came a man, making his hasty
moan
Before the Sultan Mahmoud on his throne,
And crying out—"My sorrow is my right,
And I will see the Sultan, and tonight." 5 "Sorrow," said Mahmoud, "is a reverend thing.
I recognize its right, as king with king; Speak on."—"A fiend has got into my house," Exclaim'd the staring man, "and tortures
us
One of thine officers;—he comes, the ah-horr'd, 10 And takes possession of my house, my board, My bed:—I have two daughters and a wife,
And the wild villain comes, and makes me mad with life."
"Is he there now?" said Mahmoud—
"No;—he left
The house when I did, of my wits bereft; 15 And laugh'd me down the street, because I vow'd I'd bring the prince himself to lay him in his shroud.
I'm mad with want—I'm mad with misery,
And, oh thou Sultan Mahmoud, God cries out for thee!"

The Sultan comforted the man, and said, 20 "Go home, and I will send thee wine and bread,"

¹ Cleopatra.

(For he was poor) "and other comforts.
Go;
And, should the wretch return, let Sultan Mahmoud know."

In three days' time, with haggard eyes and beard,
And shaken voice, the suitor reappear'd, 25 And said, "He's come"—Mahmoud said not a word,
But rose and took four slaves, each with a sword,
And went with the vex'd man. They reach the place,
And hear a voice, and see a woman's face,
That to the window flutter'd in affright 30 "Go in," said Mahmoud, "and put out
the light;
But tell the females first to leave the room;
And when the drunkard follows them, we
come."

The man went in There was a cry, and hark!
A table falls, the window is struck dark.
35 Forth rush the breathless women, and
behind
With curses comes the fiend in desperate
mind
In vain the sabres soon cut short the
strife,
And chop the shrieking wretch, and drink his bloody life

"Now light the light," the Sultan cried aloud.
40 'Twas done, he took it in his hand, and bow'd
Over the corpse, and look'd upon the face.
Then turn'd, and knelt, and to the throne of grace
Put up a prayer, and from his lips there crept
Some gentle words of pleasure, and he wept
45 In reverent silence the beholders wait.
Then bring him at his call both wine and meat.
And when he had refresh'd his noble
heart,
He bade his host be blest, and rose up to depart.

The man amaz'd, all mildness now, and
tears,
50 Fell at the Sultan's feet with many prayers,

And begg'd him to vouchsafe to tell his slave
The reason first of that command he gave About the light; then, when he saw the
face,
Why he knelt down; and, lastly, how it
was

The Sultan said, with a benignant eye,
"Since first I saw thee come, and heard

I could not rid me of a dread, that one
By whom such daring villainies were done,

For this I had the light put out; but when I saw the face, and found a stranger slain.

And then I rose and was refresh'd with

SONG OF FAIRIES ROBBING ORCHARD 1830 1830

We the fairies blithe and antic,
Of dimensions not gigantic,
Though the moonshine mostly keep us Off in orchards frisk and peep us

5 Stolen sweets are always sweeter, Stolen kisses much completer;
Stolen looks are nice in chapels, Stolen, stolen be your apples.

When to bed the world are bobbing, 10 Then's the time for orchard-robbing:
Yet the fruit were scarce worth peeling Were it not for stealing, stealing

ABOU REN ADHEM AND THE ANGEL 1834 1844

Abou Ren Adhem (may his tribe increase)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom, 5 An angel writing in a book of gold:—

- Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold, And to the presence in the room he said,
 "What writest thou?"—The vision rais'd its head.
 And with a look made of all sweet accord, 10 Answer'd, "The names of those who love the Lord."
 "And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
 Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low, But cheerly still; and said, "I pray thee
 then,
 "Write me as one that loves his fellow
 men." 15 The angel wote, and vanish'd The next night
 It came again with a great wakening light,
 And show'd the names whom love of God had bless'd,
 And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest

THE GLOVE AND THE LIONS 1836 1836

- King Francis² was a hearty king, and loved a royal sport, And one day, as his lions fought, sat looking on the court
 The nobles filled the benches, with the ladies in their pride.
 And 'mongst them sat the Count de Lorge, with one for whom he sighed.
 5 And truly 'twas a gallant thing to see that crowning show, Valor and love, and a king above, and the royal beasts below.

- Ramped and roared the lions, with horrid laughing jaws.
 They bit, they glared, gave blows like beams, a wind went with their paws, With wallowing might and stifled roar they rolled on one another, 10 Till all the pit with sand and mane was in a thunderous smother;
 The bloody foam above the bars came whisking through the air, Said Francis then, "Faith, gentlemen.
 we're better here than there."

De Lorge's love o'erheard the King, a beauteous lively dame, With smiling lips and sharp bright eyes, which always seemed the same,

- 15 She thought, the Count, my lover, is brave as brave can be,
 He surely would do wondrous things to show his love of me, King, ladies, lovers, all look on; the occasion is divine,
 I'll drop my glove, to prove his love; great glory will be mine.

- She dropped her glove, to prove his love, then looked at him and smiled.
 20 He bowed, and in a moment leaped among the lions wild,
 The leap was quick, return was quick, he has regained his place, Then threw the glove, but not with love, right in the lady's face
 "By Heaven," said Francis, "rightly done!" and he rose from where he sat;
 "No love," quoth he, "but vanity, sets love a task like that"

To Fish

- You strange, astonish'd-looking, angle-faced,
 Dreary-mouth'd, gaping wretches of the
 sea,
 Gulping salt-water everlastingly.
 Cold-blooded, though with red your blood be graced,
 5 And mute, though dwellers in the roaring
 waste,
 And you, all shapes beside, that fishy be.— Some round, some flat, some long, all devilry, Legless, unloving, infamously chaste.— O scaly, slippery, wet, swift, staring wights,¹

How do ye vary your vile days and nights?
 How pass your Sundays? Are ye still but

 In ceaseless wash? Still nought but gapes and bites,
 And drinks, and stares, diversified with boggles?²

- 15 Amazing monster! that, for aught I know, With the first sight of thee didst make our race Forever stare! Oh flat and shocking face, Grimly divided from the breast below!
 Thou that on dry land horribly dost go

 Prong after prong, disgracer of all grace, Long-useless-finned, hair'd, upright, un-

HEARING MUSIC
 1857

- When lovely sounds about my ears
 Like winds in Eden's tree-tops rise,
 And make me, though my spirit hears,
 For very luxury close my eyes, 5 Let none but friends be round about Who love the smoothing joy like me,
 That so the charm be felt throughout,
 And all be harmony.
 And when we reach the close divine, 10 Then let the hand of her I love Come with its gentle palm on mine,
 As soft as snow or lighting dove;
 And let, by stealth, that more than friend Look sweetness in my opening eyes, 15 For only so such dreams should end,
 Or wake in Paradise.

THE OLD LADY
 1816

- If the Old Lady is a widow and lives alone, the manners of her condition and time of life are so much the more apparent.
 She generally dresses in plain silks, that make a gentle rustling as she moves about the silence of her room, and she wears a nice cap with a lace border, that comes under the chin. In a placket at her side is an old enamelled watch, unless it is locked up in a drawer of her toilet, for fear of accidents.
 Her waist is rather tight and trim than otherwise, as she had a fine one when young, and she is not sorry if you see a pair of her stockings on a table, that you may be aware of the neatness of her leg and foot. Con-15 tented with these and other evident indications of a good shape, and letting her young friends understand that she can afford to obscure it a little, she wears pockets, and 20 uses them well too. In the one is her handkerchief, and any heavier matter that is not likely to come out with it, such as the change of a sixpence; in the other is a miscellaneous assortment, consisting of a pocket-book, a 25 bunch of keys, a needle-case, a spectacle-case, crumbs of biscuit, a nutmeg and grater, a smelling-bottle, and, according to the season, an orange or apple, which after many days she draws out, warm and glossy, 30 to give some little child that has well behaved itself. She generally occupies two rooms, in the neatest condition possible. In the chamber is a bed with a white coverlet, built up high and round, to look well, and with curtains of a pastoral pattern, consisting alternately of large plants, and shepherds and shepherdesses. On the mantelpiece are more shepherds and shepherdesses, with dot-eyed sheep at their feet, all in colored ware the man, perhaps, in a pink jacket and knots of ribbons at his knees and shoes, holding his crook lightly in one hand, and with the other at his breast, turning his toes out and looking tenderly at the shepherdess; the woman holding a crook, also, and modestly returning his look, with a gipsy-hat jerked up behind, a very slender waist, with petticoat and hips to counteract, and the petticoat pulled up through the pocket-holes, in order to show the trimness of her ankles. But these patterns, of course, are various. The toilet¹ is ancient, carved at the edges, and tied about with a snow-white drapery of muslin. Beside it are various boxes, mostly Japan; and the set of drawers are exquisite things for a little girl to rummage, if ever little girl be so bold,—containing ribbons and laces of various kinds; linen smelling of lavender, of the flowers of which there is always dust in the corners, a heap of pocket-books for a series of years; and pieces of dress long gone by, such as head-fronts, stomachers, and flowered satin shoes, with enormous heels. The stock of letters are under especial lock and key. So much for the bedroom. In the sitting-room is rather a spare assortment of shining old mahogany furniture, or carved arm-chairs equally old, with chintz draperies down to the ground; a folding or other screen, with Chinese figures, their round, little-eyed, meek faces perking sideways; a stuffed bird, perhaps in a glass case (a living one is too much for her); a portrait of her husband over the mantelpiece, in a coat with frog-buttons, and a delicate frilled hand lightly inserted in the waistcoat; and opposite him on the wall, is a piece of embroidered literature, framed and glazed, containing some moral distich or maxim, worked in angular capital letters, with two trees or parrots below, in their proper colors; the whole concluding with an ABC and numerals, and the name of the fair industrious, expressing it to be “her work, Jan. 14, 1762.” The rest of the furniture consists of a looking-glass with carved edges, perhaps a settee, a hassock for the feet, a mat for the little dog, and a small set of shelves, in which are The Spec- tator and Guardian, The Turkish Spy, a Bible and Prayer Book, Young's Night Thoughts with a piece of lace in it to flatten, Mrs. Rowe's Devout Exercises of the Heart, Mrs. Glasse's Cookery, and perhaps Sir Charles Grandison, and Clarissa. John Bunce is in the closet among the pickles and preserves. The clock is on the landing-place between the two room doors, where it ticks audibly but quietly, and the landing-place, as well as the stairs, is carpeted to a nicety. The house is most in character, and properly coeval, if it is in a retired suburb, and strongly built, with wainscot rather than paper inside, and lockers in the windows. Before the windows should be some quivering poplars. Here the Old Lady receives a few quiet visitors to tea, and perhaps an early game at cards: or you may see her going out on the same kind of visit herself, with a light umbrella running up into a stick and crooked ivory handle, and her little dog, equally famous for his love to her and captious antipathy to strangers. Her grand-children dislike him on holidays, and the boldest sometimes ventures to give him a sly kick under the table. When she returns at night, she appears, if the weather happens to be doubtful, in a calash²; and her servant in pattens³, follows half behind and half at her side, with a lantern

Her opinions are not many nor new. She thinks the clergyman a nice man. The Duke of Wellington, in her opinion, is a very great man; but she has a secret preference for the Marquis of Granby. She thinks the young women of the present day too forward, and the men not respectful enough; but hopes her grandchildren will be better; though she differs with her daughter in several points respecting their management. She sets little value on the new accomplishments; is a great though delicate connoisseur in butcher's meat and all sorts of housewifery, and if you mention waltzes, expatiates on the grace and fine breeding of the minuet. She longs to have seen one danced by Sir Charles Grandison, whom she almost considers as a real person. She likes a walk of a summer's evening, but avoids the new streets, canals, etc., and sometimes goes through the churchyard, where her children and her husband lie buried, serious, but not melancholy. She has had three great epochs in her life,—her marriage, her having beer at court to see the King and Queen and Royal Family, and a compliment on her figure she once received, in passing, from Mr. Wilkes, whom she describes as a sad, loose man, but engaging. His plainness she thinks much exaggerated. If anything takes her at a distance from home, it is still the court; but she seldom stirs, even for that. The last time but one that she went, was to see the Duke of Wirtemberg; and most probably for the last time of all, to see the Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold. From this beatific vision she returned with the same admiration as ever for the fine comely appearance of the Duke of York and the rest of the family, and great delight at having had a near view of the Princess, whom she speaks of with smiling pomp and lifted mittens, clasping them as passionately as she can together, and calling her, in a transport of mixed loyalty and self-love, a fine royal young creature, and "Daughter of England."

GETTING UP ON COLD MORNINGS 1820

An Italian author, Giulio Cordara, a Jesuit, has written a poem upon insects, which he begins by insisting, that those troublesome and abominable little animals were created for our annoyance, and that they were certainly not inhabitants of Paradise. We of the North may dispute this piece of theology; but on the other hand, it is as clear as the snow on the house-tops, that Adam was not under the necessity of shaving; and that when Eve walked out of her delicious bower, she did not step upon ice three inches thick.

Some people say it is a very easy thing to get up of a cold morning. You have only, they tell you, to take the resolution; and the thing is done. This may be very true, just as a boy at school has only to take a flogging, and the thing is over. But we have not at all made up our minds upon it; and we find it a very pleasant exercise to discuss the matter, candidly, before we get up. This, at least, is not idling, though it may be lying. It affords an excellent answer to those who ask how lying in bed can be indulged in by a reasoning being,—a rational creature. How? Why, with the argument calmly at work in one's head, and the clothes over one's shoulder. Oh—it is a fine way of spending a sensible, impartial half-hour.

If these people would be more charitable they would get on with their argument better. But they are apt to reason so ill, and to assert so dogmatically, that one could wish to have them stand round one's bed, of a bitter morning, and lie before their faces. They ought to hear both sides of the bed, the inside and out. If they cannot entertain themselves with their own thoughts for half-an-hour or so, it is not the fault of those who can.

Candid inquiries into one's decumbency¹, besides the greater or less privileges to be allowed a man in proportion to his ability of keeping early hours, the work given his faculties, etc., will at least concede their due merits to such representations as the following. In the first place, says the injured but calm appealer, I have been warm all night, and find my system in a state perfectly suitable to a warm-blooded animal. To get out of this state into the cold, besides the inharmonious and uncritical abruptness of the transition, is so unnatural to such a creature, that the poets, refining upon the tortures of the damned, make one of their greatest agonies consist in being suddenly transported from heat to cold, from fire to ice. They are "haled" out of their "beds," says Milton, by "harpy-footed furies,"²—fellows who come to call them. On my first movement towards the anticipation of getting up I find that such parts of the sheets and bolsters as are exposed to the air of the room are stone-cold. On opening my eyes, the first thing that meets them is my own breath rolling forth, as if in the open air, like smoke out of a chimney. Think of this symptom. Then I turn my eyes sideways and see the window all frozen over. Think of that. Then the servant comes in. "It is very cold this morning, is it not?"—"Very cold, sir."—"Very cold indeed, isn't it?"—"Very cold indeed, sir."—"More than usually so, isn't it, even for this weather?" (Here the servant's wit and good-nature are put to a considerable test, and the inquirer lies on thorns for the answer.) "Why, sir—I think it is." (Good creature! There is not a better or more truth-telling servant going.) "I must rise, however—get me some warm water."—Here comes a fine interval between the departure of the servant and the arrival of the hot water, during which, of course, it is of "no use" to get up. The hot water comes. "Is it quite hot?"—"Yes, sir."—"Perhaps too hot for shaving: I must wait a little?"—"No, sir; it will just do." (There is an over-nice propriety sometimes, an officious zeal of virtue, a little troublesome.) "Oh—the shirt—you must air my clean shirt;—linen gets very damp this weather."—"Yes, sir." Here another delicious five minutes. A knock at the door. "Oh, the shirt—very well. My stockings—I think the stockings had better be aired too."—"Very well, sir."—Here another interval. At length everything is ready, except myself. I now, continues our incumbent (a happy word, by-the-bye, for a country vicar)—I now cannot help thinking a good deal—who can?—upon the unnecessary and villainous custom of shaving: it is a thing so unmanly (here I nestle closer)—so effeminate (here I recoil from an unlucky step into the colder part of the bed).—No wonder that the Queen of France¹ took part with the rebels against that degenerate King, her husband, who first affronted her smooth visage with a face like her own. The Emperor Julian never showed the luxury of his genius to better advantage than in reviving the flowing beard. Look at Cardinal Bembo's picture—at Michael Angelo's—at Titian's—at Shakespeare's—at Fletcher's—at Spenser's—at Chaucer's—at Alfred's—at Plato's—I could name a great man for every tick of my watch.—Look at the Turks, a grave and otiose² people—Think of Haroun Al Raschid and Bed-ridden Hassan.—Think of Wortley Montague, the worthy son of his mother, above the prejudice of his time.—Look at the Persian gentlemen, whom one is ashamed of meeting about the suburbs, their dress and appearance are so much finer than our own.—Lastly, think of the razor itself—how totally opposed to every sensation of bed—how cold, how edgy, how hard! how utterly different from anything like the warm and circling amplitude, which

Sweetly recommends itself

Add to this, benumbed fingers, which may help you to cut yourself, a quivering body, a frozen towel, and a ewer full of ice; and he that says there is nothing to oppose in all this, only shows that he has no merit in opposing it.

used to lie in bed till noon, because he said he had no motive in getting up. He could imagine the good of rising; but then he could also imagine the good of lying still; and his exclamation, it must be allowed, was made upon summer-time, not winter. We must proportion the argument to the individual character. A money-getter may be drawn out of his bed by three or four pence; but this will not suffice for a student. A proud man may say, "What shall I think of myself, if I don't get up?" but the more humble one will be content to waive this prodigious notion of himself out of respect to his kindly bed. The mechanical man shall get up without any ado at all; and so shall the barometer. An ingenious her-in-bed will find hard matter of discussion even on the score of health and longevity. He will ask us for our proofs and precedents of the ill effects of lying later in cold weather; and sophisticate much on the advantages of an even temperature of body, of the natural propensity (pretty universal) to have one's way, and of the animals that roll themselves up and sleep all the winter. As to longevity, he will ask whether the longest is of necessity the best, and whether Holborn is the handsomest street in London⁵

FROM ON THE REALITIES OF IMAGINATION 1820

There is not a more unthinking way of talking than to say such and such pains and pleasures are only imaginary, and therefore to be got rid of or undervalued accordingly. There is nothing imaginary in the common acceptance of the word. The logic of Moses in The Vicar of Wakefield is good argument here:—"Whatever is, is." Whatever touches us, whatever moves us, does touch and does move us. We recognize the reality of it, as we do that of a hand in the dark. We might as well say that a sight which makes us laugh, or a blow which brings tears into our eyes, is imaginary, as that anything else is imaginary which makes us laugh or weep. We can only judge of things by their effects. Our perception constantly deceives us, in things with which we suppose ourselves perfectly conversant; but our reception of their effect is a different matter. Whether we are materialists or immaterialists, whether things be about us or within us, whether we think the sun is a substance, or only the image of a divine thought, an idea, a thing imaginary, we are equally agreed as to the notion of its warmth. But on the other hand, as this warmth is felt differently by different temperaments, so what we call imaginary things affect different minds. What we have to do is not to deny their effect, because we do not feel in the same proportion, or whether we even feel it at all; but to see whether our neighbors may not be moved. If they are, there is, to all intents and purposes, a moving cause. But we do not see it? No;—neither perhaps do they. They only feel it; they are only sentient,—a word which implies the sight given to the imagination by the feelings. But what do you mean, we may ask in return, by seeing? Some rays of light come in contact with the eye; they bring a sensation to it; in a word, they touch it; and the impression left by this touch we call sight. How far does this differ in effect from the impression left by any other touch, however mysterious? An ox knocked down by a butcher, and a man knocked down by a fit of apoplexy, equally feel themselves compelled to drop. The tickling of a straw and of a comedy equally move the muscles about the mouth. The look of a beloved eye will so thrill the frame, that old philosophers have had recourse to a doctrine of beams and radiant particles flying from one sight to another. In fine, what is contact itself, and why does it affect us? There is no one cause more mysterious than another, if we look into it.

Nor does the question concern us like moral causes. We may be content to know the earth by its fruits; but how to increase and improve them is a more attractive study. If, instead of saying that the causes which moved in us this or that pain or pleasure were imaginary, people were to say that the causes themselves were removable, they would be nearer the truth. When a stone trips us up, we do not fall to disputing its existence: we put it out of the way. In like manner, when we suffer from what is called an imaginary pain, our business is not to canvass the reality of it. Whether there is any cause or not in that or any other perception, or whether everything consists not in what is called effect, it is sufficient for us that the effect is real. Our sole business is to remove those second causes, which always accompany the original idea. As in deliriums, for instance, it would be idle to go about persuading the patient that he did not behold the figures he says he does. He might reasonably ask us, if he could, how we know anything about the matter; or how we can be sure that in the infinite wonders of the universe certain realities may not become apparent to certain eyes, whether diseased or not. Our business would be to put him into that state of health in which human beings are not diverted from their offices and comforts by a liability to such imaginations. The best reply to his question would be, that such a morbidity is clearly no more a fit state for a human being than a disarranged or incomplete state of works is for a watch; and that seeing the general tendency of nature to this completeness or state of comfort, we naturally conclude that the imaginations in question, whether substantial or not, are at least not of the same lasting or prevailing description.

We do not profess metaphysics. We are indeed so little conversant with the masters of that art, that we are never sure whether we are using even its proper terms. All that we may know on the subject comes to us from some reflection and some experience; and this all may be so little as to make a metaphysician smile; which, if he be a true one, he will do good-naturedly. The pretender will take occasion, from our very confession, to say that we know nothing. Our faculty, such as it is, is rather instinctive than reasoning; rather physical than metaphysical; rather sentient because it loves much, than because it knows much; rather calculated by a certain retention of boyhood, and by its wanderings in the green places of thought, to light upon a piece of the old golden world, than to tire ourselves, and conclude it unattainable, by too wide and scientific a search. We pretend to see farther than none but the worldly and the malignant. And yet those who see farther may not see so well. We do not blind our eyes with looking upon the sun in the heavens. We believe it to be there, but we find its light upon earth also; and we would lead humanity, if we could, out of misery and coldness into the shine of it. Pain might still be there; must be so, as long as we are mortal;

For oft we still must weep, since we are human;

but it should be pain for the sake of others, which is noble; not unnecessary pain inflicted by or upon them, which it is absurd not to remove. The very pains of mankind struggle towards pleasures; and such pains as are proper for them have this inevitable accompaniment of true humanity, —that they cannot but realize a certain gentleness of enjoyment. Thus the true bearer of pain would come round to us; and he would not grudge us a share of his burden, though in taking from his trouble it might diminish his pride. Pride is but a bad pleasure at the expense of others. The great object of humanity is to enrich everybody. If it is a task destined not to succeed, it is a good one from its very nature; and fulfills at least a glad destiny of its own. To look upon it austere is in reality the reverse of austerity. It is only such an impatience of the want of pleasure as leads us to grudge it in others; and this impatience itself, if the sufferer knew how to use it, is but another impulse, in the general yearning, towards an equal wealth of enjoyment.

But we shall be getting into other discussions.—The ground-work of all happiness is health. Take care of this ground, and the doleful imaginations that come to warn us against its abuse will avoid it. Take care of this ground, and let as many glad imaginations throng to it as possible. Read the magical works of the poets, and they will come. If you doubt their existence, ask yourself whether you feel pleasure at the idea of them; whether you are moved into delicious smiles, or tears as delicious. If you are, the result is the same to you, whether they exist or not. It is not mere words to say that he who goes through a rich man's park, and sees things in it which never bless the mental eyesight of the possessor, is richer than he. He is richer. More results of pleasure come home to him. The ground is actually more fertile to him: the place haunted with finer shapes. He has more servants to come at his call, and administer to him with full hands. Knowledge, sympathy, imagination, are all divining-rods, with which he discovers treasure. Let a painter go through the grounds, and he will see not only the general colors of green and brown, but their combinations and contrasts, and the modes in which they might again be combined and contrasted. He will also put figures in the landscape if there are none there, flocks and herds, or a solitary spectator, or Venus lying with her white body among the violets and primroses. Let a musician go through, and he will hear "differences discreet" in the notes of the birds and the lapsing of the water-fall. He will fancy a serenade of wind instruments in the open air at a lady's window, with a voice rising through it; or the horn of the hunter; or the musical cry of the hounds,

Matched in mouth-like bells,
Each under each;¹

or a solitary voice in a bower, singing for an expected lover; or the chapel organ, waking up like the fountain of the winds. Let a poet go through the grounds and he will heighten and increase all these sounds and images. He will bring the colors from heaven, and put an unearthly meaning into the voice. He will have stories of the sylvan inhabitants, will shift the population through infinite varieties; will put a sentiment upon every sight and sound; will be human, romantic, supernatural; will make all nature send tribute into that spot²

We may say of the love of nature what Shakespeare says of another love, that it Adds a precious seeing to the eye³

And we may say also, upon the like principle, that it adds a precious hearing to the ear. This and imagination, which ever follows upon it, are the two purifiers of our sense, which rescue us from the deafening babble of common cares, and enable us to hear all the affectionate voices of earth and heaven. The starry orbs, lapsing about in their smooth and sparkling dance, sing to us. The brooks talk to us of solitude. The birds are the animal spirits of nature, carolling in the air, like a careless lass.

The gentle gales,
Fanning their odoriferous wings, dispense Native perfumes; and whisper whence they stole

Those balmy spoils.—Paradise Lost, 4, 156-9

The poets are called creators, because with their magical words they bring forth to our eyesight the abundant images and beauties of creation. They put them there, if the reader pleases; and so are literally creators. But whether put there or discovered, whether created or invented (for invention means nothing but finding out), there they are. If they touch us, they exist to as much purpose as anything else which touches us. If a passage in King Lear brings the tears into our eyes, it is real as the touch of a sorrowful hand. If the flow of a song of Anacreon's intoxicates us, it is as true to a pulse within us as the wine he drank. We hear not their sounds with ears, nor see their sights with eyes; but we hear and see both so truly, that we are moved with pleasure, and the advantage, nay even the test, of seeing and hearing, at any time, is not in the seeing and hearing, but in the ideas we realize, and the pleasure we derive. Intellectual objects, therefore, inasmuch as they come home to us, are as true a part of the stock of nature as visible ones; and they are infinitely more abundant. Between the tree of a country clown and the tree of a Milton or Spenser, what a difference in point of productiveness! Between the plodding of a sexton through a church-yard and the walk of a Gray, what a difference! What a difference between the Bermudas of a ship-builder and the Bermoothes of Shakespeare! the isle the isle of elves and fairies, that chased the tide to and fro on the sea-shore, of coral-bones and the knell of sea-nymphs; of spirits dancing on the sands, and singing amidst the hushes of the wind; of Caliban, whose brute nature enchantment had made poetical; of Ariel, who lay in cowslip bells, and rode upon the bat; of Miranda, who wept when she saw Ferdinand work so hard, and begged him to let her help; telling him,

I am your wife if you will marry me;
If not, I'll die your maid To be your fellow
You may deny me, but I'll be your servant, Whether you will or no.²

Such are the discoveries which the poets make for us, worlds to which that of Columbus was but a handful of brute matter America began to be richer for us the other day, when Humboldt came back and told us of its luxuriant and gigantic vegetation; of the myriads of shooting lights, which revel at evening in the southern sky; and of that grand constellation, at which Dante seems to have made so remarkable a guess (Purgatorio, cant., 1, 5, 22) The natural warmth of the Mexican and Peruvian genius, set free from despotism, will soon do all the rest of it; awaken the sleeping riches of its eyesight, and call forth the glad music of its affections

The moon is Homer's and Shakespeare's moon, as well as the one we look at The sun comes out of his chamber in the east, with a sparkling eye, "rejoicing like a bridegroom."² The commonest thing becomes like Aaron's rod, that budded.³ Pope called up the spirits of the cabala⁴ to wait upon a lock of hair,⁵ and justly gave it the honors of a constellation; for he has hung it, sparkling forever in the eyes of posterity. A common meadow is a sorry thing to a ditcher or a coxcomb; but by the help of its dues from imagination and the love of nature, the grass brightens for us, the air soothes us, we feel as we did in the daisied hours of childhood Its verdures, its sheep, its hedge-row elms—all these, and all else which sight, and sound, and associations can give it, are made to furnish a treasure of pleasant thoughts. Even brick and mortar are vivified, as of old, at the harp of Orpheus. A metropolis becomes no longer a mere collection of houses or of trades. It puts on all the grandeur of its history, and its literature; its towers, and rivers; its art, and jewelry, and foreign wealth; its multitude of human beings all intent upon excitement, wise or yet to learn; the huge and sullen dignity of its canopy of smoke by day, the wide gleam upwards of its lighted lustre at night-time; and the noise of its many chariots, heard at the same hour, when the wind sets gently towards some quiet suburb.

DESCRIPTIVE OF A HOT DAY
1820

Now the rosy- (and lazy-) fingered Aurora, issuing from her saffron house, calls up the moist vapors to surround her, and goes veiled with them as long as she can; till Phœbus, coming forth in his power, looks everything out of the sky, and holds sharp, uninterrupted empire from his throne of beams. Now the mower begins to make his sweeping cuts more slowly, and resorts oftener to the beer. Now the carter sleeps a-top of his load of hay, or plods with double slouch of shoulder, looking out with eyes winking under his shading hat, and with a hitch upward of one side of his month. Now the little girl at her grandmother's cottage-door watches the coaches that go by, with her hand held up over her sunny forehead. Now laborers look well resting in their white shirts at the doors of rural ale-houses. Now an elm is fine there, with a seat under it; and horses drink out of the trough, stretching their yearning necks with loosened collars; and the traveller calls for his glass of ale, having been without one for more than ten minutes; and his horse stands wincing at the flies, giving sharp shivers of his skin, and moving to and fro his ineffectual docked tail; and now Miss Betty Wilson, the host's daughter, comes streaming forth in a flowered gown and earrings, carrying with four of her beautiful fingers the foaming glass, for which, after the traveller has drank it, she receives with an indifferent eye, looking another way, the lawful twopence. Now grasshoppers "fry," as Dryden says.¹ Now cattle stand in water, and ducks are envied. Now boots, and shoes, and trees by the road-side, are thick with dust; and dogs, rolling in it, after issuing out of the water, into which they have been thrown to fetch sticks, come scattering horror among the legs of the spectators. Now a fellow who finds he has three miles further to go in a pair of tight shoes is in a pretty situation. Now rooms with the sun upon them become intolerable; and the apothecary's apprentice, with a bitterness beyond aloes, thinks of the pond he used to bathe in at school. Now men with powdered heads² (especially if thick) envy those that are unpowdered, and stop to wipe them up hill, with countenances that seem to expostulate with destiny. Now boys assemble round the village pump with a ladle to it, and delight to make a forbidden splash and get wet through the shoes. Now also they make suckers of leather, and bathe all day long in rivers and ponds, and make mighty fishings for "tittle-bats."³ Now the bee, as he hums along, seems to be talking heavily of the heat. Now doors and brick-walls are burning to the hand; and a walled lane, with dust and broken bottles in it, near a brick-field, is a thing not to be thought of. Now a green lane, on the contrary, thick-set with hedge-row elms, and having the noise of a brook "rumbling in pebble-stone,"⁴ is one of the pleasantest things in the world.

Now, in town, gossips talk more than ever to one another, in rooms, in door-ways, and out of window, always beginning the conversation with saying that the heat is overpowering. Now blinds are let down, and doors thrown open, and flannel waistcoats left off, and cold meat preferred to hot, and wonder expressed why tea continues so refreshing, and people delight to shiver lettuces into bowls, and apprentices water door-ways with tin canisters that lay several atoms of dust. Now the water-cart, jumbling along the middle of the street, and jolting the showers out of its box of water, really does something. Now fruiterers' shops and dairies look pleasant, and ices are the only things to those who can get them. Now ladies loiter in baths; and people make presents of flowers; and wine is put into ice, and the after-dinner lounge recreates his head with applications of perfumed water out of long-necked bottles. Now the lounge, who cannot resist riding his new horse, feels his boots burn him. Now buck-skins are not the lawn of Cos.¹ Now jockeys, walking in great-coats to lose flesh, curse inwardly. Now five fat people in a stage-coach hate the sixth fat one who is coming in, and think he has no right to be so large. Now clerks in office do nothing but drink soda-water and spruce-beer, and read the newspaper. Now the old-clothesman drops his solitary cry more deeply into the areas on the hot and forsaken side of the street, and bakers look vicious; and cooks are aggravated; and the steam of a tavern-kitchen catches hold of us like the breath of Tartarus. Now delicate skins are beset with gnats; and boys make their sleeping companion start up, with playing a burning-glass on his hand; and blacksmiths are super-carbonated; and cobblers in their stalls almost feel a wish to be transplanted; and butter is too easy to spread; and the dragoons wonder whether the Romans liked their helmets, and old ladies, with their lappets unpinned, walk along in a state of dilapidation; and the servant maids are afraid they look vulgarly hot; and the author, who has a plate of strawberries brought him, finds that he has come to the end of his writing.

SHAKING HANDS

Among the first things which we remember noticing in the manners of people, were two errors in the custom of shaking hands. Some we observed, grasped everybody's hand alike,—with an equal fervor of grip. You would have thought that Jenkins was the best friend they had in the world; but

on succeeding to the squeeze, though a slight acquaintance, you found it equally flattering to yourself, and on the appearance of somebody else (whose name, it turned out, the operator had forgotten), the crush was no less complimentary.—the face was as earnest and beaming, the “glad to see you” as syllabical and sincere, and the shake as close, as long, and as rejoicing, as if the semi-unknown was a friend come home from the Deserts

On the other hand, there would be a gentleman, now and then, as coy of his hand, as if he were a prude, or had a whitlow¹ It was in vain that your pretensions did not go beyond the “civil salute” of the ordinary shake, or that being introduced to him in a friendly manner, and expected to shake hands with the rest of the company, you could not in decency omit his His fingers, half coming out and half retreating, seemed to think that you were going to do them a mischief, and when you got hold of them, the whole shake was on your side, the other hand did but proudly or pensively acquiesce—there was no knowing which, you had to sustain it, as you might a lady’s, in handing her to a seat, and it was an equal perplexity to know whether to shake or to let it go The one seemed a violence done to the patient, the other an awkward responsibility brought upon yourself. You did not know, all the evening, whether you were not an object of dislike to the person; till, on the party’s breaking up, you saw him behave like an equally ill-used gentleman to all who practiced the same unthinking civility

Both these errors, we think, might as well be avoided, but, of the two, we must say we prefer the former If it does not look so much like particular sincerity, it looks more like general kindness; and if those two virtues are to be separated (which they assuredly need not be, if considered without spleen), the world can better afford to dispense with an unpleasant truth than a gratuitous humanity Besides, it is more difficult to make sure of the one than to practice the other, and kindness itself is the best of all truths. As long as we are sure of that, we are sure of something, and of something pleasant It is always the best end, if not in every instance the most logical means

This manual shyness is sometimes attributed to modesty, but never, we suspect, with justice, unless it be that sort of modesty whose fear of committing itself is grounded in pride. Want of address is a better reason, but this particular instance of it would be grounded in the same feeling. It always implies a habit either of pride or mistrust We have met with two really kind men¹ who evinced this soreness of hand. Neither of them, perhaps, thought himself inferior to anybody about him, and both had good reason to think highly of themselves, but both had been sanguine men contradicted in their early hopes. There was a plot to meet the hand of one of them with a fish-slice, in order to show him the disadvantage to which he put his friends by that flat mode of salutation; but the conspirator had not the courage to do it Whether he heard of the intention we know not, but shortly afterwards he took very kindly to a shake. The other was the only man of a warm set of politicians, who remained true to his first hopes of mankind He was impatient at the change of his companions, and at the folly and inattention of the rest; but though his manner became cold, his consistency remained warm, and this gave him a right to be as strange as he pleased.

I THE DEMANDS OF POETRY

I have not been in the habit of making memorandums for my verses Such verse as I could write I have written at once. But the older I grow, the more reverent notions I entertain of poetry, and as I cannot aspire to put anything into verse, and pretend to call it poetry, without shaping it in the best manner of which I am capable (for poetry, without the fit sculpture of verse, is no more to be called poetry, than beauty conceived is beauty accomplished), so I have neither leisure to pay it the requisite attention, nor can I afford the spirit and emotion necessary for this task above all others. The greatest of all poets (who, according to Plato,² is God) uttered the planets in his energy, and they went singing around him,³ perfect. Milton (not to speak it with profaneness,⁴ after that unreachably instance) could pour forth his magnificent verses,

¹ The second of these men was Haslitt; the first has not been identified

² See Plato’s Ion, § 14 (Jowett’s translation, 1, 224). The same thought is expressed by Mrs Browning in Hymn to Pan, st. 36, and by Browning in Paracelsus, 2, 648.

mighty and full of music, like a procession towards a temple of glory. We conceive of Shakespeare, that he had a still easier might, and that the noblest verses to him were no greater difficulty than talking. He dispensed them as Nature does the summer showers and the thunder. Alas! to us petty men, who are not sure that we have even the right of being.

Proud to be less,¹ but of that godlike race, to us and our inferior natures there are sometimes toils in life less voluntary and more exhausting than poetry, in reposing from which it is not always possible for us to labor even with the minor energies necessary to throw out the forms within our capacity. We cannot wrestle to fit purpose even with that pettier god within us. We cannot condense those lighter vapors of inspiration into their most vigorous and graceful shape, and feel a right to say to the world, "Behold!"

A poet's hand should be like the energy within the oak, to make strong; and like the wind that bends its foliage, to make various. Without concentration, and without variety, there is neither strength of imagination, nor beauty of verse. Alas! I could no more look to making verses with an ambition of this sort, wearied as I am at present, than I could think of looking through burning glasses for eyes, or hewing the solid rock into a dance of the Graces.

But I have the wish to be a poet, and thoughts will arise within me as painful not to express as a lover's. I therefore write memorandums for verse;—thoughts that might perhaps be worthy of putting into that shape, if they could be properly developed;—hints and shadows of something poetical, that have the same relationship to actual poetry as the little unborn spirits that perish by the waters of Lethe have to the souls that visit us, and become immortal.

II. MY BOWER

I seek not for grand emotions when I muse. My life has had enough of them. I seek for enjoyment and repose; and, thanks to the invincible youthfulness of my heart, I find them with as much ease in my green world as giant sorrows have found me in the world of strife.

Woods and meadows are to me an enchanted ground, of which a knight-errantry of a new sort has put me in possession.

In the indulgence of these effusions I lay my head as on the pillow before I sleep, as on the grass in summer, as on the lap that soothes us. O lovers of books and of nature, lovers of one another, lovers of love, rest with me under my bowers; and the shadows of pleasant thoughts shall play upon your eyelids.

III. ON A BUST OF BACCHUS

Gigantic, earnest, luxuriant, his head a very bower of hair and ivy;¹ his look a mixture of threat, and reassurance, and the giving of pleasure; the roughness of wine in his eyes, and the sweetness of it on his lips. Annibal Caracci would have painted such a face, and grown jealous when his mistress looked at it.

To those shoulders belong the bands that lifted the satyr² by the nape of the neck, and played with the lion's mouth as with a dog's³.

Cannot you see the glow in the face, even though sculptured? a noontide of the south in its strength? with dark wells in the eyes, under shining locks and sunny leaves? The genialty of his father Jove is in it, with the impetuosity of wine; but it is the lord, not the servant, of wine; the urger of the bowl among the divinities, when the pulses of heaven are in movement with song and dance, and goddess by the side of god looks downward.

Such did he appear when Ariadne turned pale with loving him; and he said, with divine insolence in his eyes, "Am I not then better than a mortal?"

OF THE SIGHT OF SHOPS

From PART II
1838

In the general glance that we have taken at shops, we found ourselves unwillingly compelled to pass some of them too quickly. It is the object, therefore, of the present article to enter into those more attractive thresholds, and look a little about us. We imagine a fine day, time, about noon; scene, any good brilliant street. The ladies are abroad in white and green; the beaux lounging, conscious of their waists and neck-cloths; the busy pushing onward, conscious of their bills.

¹ The forehead of Bacchus was crowned with vine-leaves or ivy.

² Probably Silenus, who was a boon companion of Bacchus.

³ A portion of the frieze of The Monument of Lycrates represents Bacchus with his hand on the face of a lion.

To begin, then, where our shopping experience began, with the toy-shop—

Visions of glory, spare our aching sight!
Ye just-breech'd ages,¹ crowd not on our soul!

We still seem to have a lively sense of the smell of that gorgeous red paint which was on the handle of our first wooden sword! The pewter guard also—how beautifully fretted and like silver did it look! How did we hang it round our shoulder by the proud belt of an old ribbon,—then feel it well suspended; then draw it out of the sheath, eager to cut down four savage men for ill-using ditto of damsels! An old muff made an excellent grenadier's cap, or one's hat and feather, with the assistance of three surreptitious large pins, became fiercely modern and military. There it is, in that corner of the window—the same identical sword, to all appearance, which kept us awake the first night behind our pillow. We still feel ourselves little boys while standing in this shop; and for that matter, so we do on other occasions. A field has as much merit in our eyes, and ginger-bread almost as much in our mouths, as at that daisy-plucking and cake-eating period of life. There is the trigger-rattling gun, fine of its kind, but not so complete a thing as the sword. Its memories are not so ancient for Alexander or St George did not fight with a musket. Neither is it so true a thing; it is not "like life." The trigger is too much like that of a cross-bow; and the pea which it shoots, however hard, produces, even to the imaginative faculties of boyhood, a humiliating flash of the mock-heroic. It is difficult to fancy a dragon killed with a pea—but the shape and appurtenances of the sword being genuine, the whole sentiment of massacre is as much in its wooden blade as if it were steel of Damascus. The drum is still more real, though not so heroic. In the corner opposite are battle-axes and shuttle-cocks, which have their maturer beauties; balls, which possess the additional zest of the danger of breaking people's windows;—ropes, good for swinging and skipping, especially the long ones which others turn for you, while you run in a masterly manner up and down, or skip in one spot with an easy and endless exactitude of toe, looking alternately at their conscious faces,—blood-allies, with which the possessor of a crisp finger and thumb-knuckle causes the smitten marbles to vanish out of the ring, kites, which must appear to more vital birds a ghastly kind of fowl, with their grim, long, white faces, no bodies, and endless tails,—cricket-bats, manly to handle,—trap-bats,² a genteel inferiority,—swimming-cocks, despicable;—horses on wheels, an imposition on the infant public;—rocking-horses, too much like Pegasus, ardent yet never getting on,—Dutch toys, so like life, that they ought to be better;—Jacob's ladders, flapping down one over another with tintinnabulary³ shutters;—dissected maps, from which the infant statesmen may learn how to dovetail provinces and kingdoms;—paper posture-makers, who hitch up their knees against their shoulder-blades, and dangle their legs like an opera dancer, —Lilliputian plates, dishes, and other household utensils, in which a grand dinner is served up out of half an apple;—boxes of paints, to color engravings with, always beyond the outline,—ditto of bricks, a very sensible and lasting toy, which we except from a grudge we have against the gravity of infant geometries,—whips, very useful for cutting people's eyes unawares,—hoops, one of the most ancient as well as excellent of toys;—sheets of pictures, from A apple-pie up to farming, military, and zoological exhibitions, always taking care that the Fly is as large as the Elephant, and the letter X exclusively appropriated to Xerxes;—musical deal-boxes,⁴ rather complaining than sweet, and more like a peal of bodkins than bells,—penny trumpets, awful at Bartlemy-tide,⁵—jews' harps, that thrill and breathe between the lips like a metal tongue,—cats—carriages—hobby-horses, upon which the infant equestrian prances about proudly on his own feet;—in short, not to go through the whole representative body of existence—dolls, which are so dear to the maternal instincts of little girls. We protest, however, against that abuse of them, which makes them full-dressed young ladies in body, while they remain infant in face; especially when they are of frail wax. It is cultivating finery instead of affection. We prefer good, honest, plump limbs of cotton and sawdust, dressed in baby-linen; or even our ancient young friends, with their staring dotted eyes, red varnished faces, triangular noses, and Rosinante¹ wooden limbs—not, it must be confessed, excessively shapely or feminine, but the reverse of fragile beauty, and prepared against all disasters.

The next step is to the Pastry-cook's, where the plain bun is still the pleasantest thing in our eyes, from its respectability in those of childhood. The pastry, less patronized by judicious mothers, is only so much elegant indigestion yet it is not easy to forget the pleasure of nibbling away the crust all around a raspberry or currant tart, in order to enjoy the three or four delicious semicircular bites at the fruity plenitude remaining. There is a custard with a wall of paste round it, which provokes a siege of this kind; and the cheese-cake has its amenities of approach. The acid flavor is a relief to the mawkishness of the biffin² or pressed baked apple, and an addition to the ghb and quivering lightness of the jelly. Twelfth Cake,³ which, when cut, looks like the side of a rich pit of earth covered with snow, is pleasant from warmer associations. Confectionery does not seem in the same request as of old, its paint has hurt its reputation. Yet the school-boy has still much to say for its humbler suavities. Kisses are very amiable and allegorical. Eight or ten of them, judiciously wrapped up in pieces of letter-paper, have saved many a loving heart the trouble of a less eloquent billet-doux. Candied citron we look upon to be the very acme and atticism⁴ of confectionery grace. Preserves are too much of a good thing, with the exception of the jams that retain their fruit-skins. "Jam satis"⁵ They qualify the cloying. Yet marmalade must not be passed over in these times, when it has been raised to the dignity of the peerage. The other day there was a Duke of Marmalade in Hayti, and a Count of Lemonade,⁶—so called, from places in which those eminent relishes are manufactured. After all, we must own that there is but one thing for which we care much at a pastry-cook's, except our old acquaintance the bun; especially as we can take up that and go on. It is an ice. Fancy a very hot day; the blinds down; the loungers unusually languid; the pavement burning one's feet; the sun, with a strong outline in the street, baking one whole side of it like a brick-kiln; so that everybody is crowding on the other, except a man going to intercept a creditor bound for the Continent. Then think of a heaped-up ice, brought upon a salver with a spoon. What statesman, of any warmth of imagination, would not pardon the Neapolitans in summer, for an insurrection on account of the want of ice? Think of the first sidelong dip of the spoon in it, bringing away a well-sliced lump; then of the sweet wintry refreshment, that goes lengthening down one's throat, and lastly, of the sense of power and satisfaction resulting from having had the ice.

Not heaven itself can do away that slice;
But what has been, has been, and I have had

PROEM TO SELECTION FROM KEATS'S POETRY

1844

Keats was born a poet of the most poetical kind. All his feelings came to him through a poetical medium, or were speedily colored by it. He enjoyed a jest as heartily as any one, and sympathized with the lowliest commonplace; but the next minute his thoughts were in a garden of enchantment with nymphs, and fauns, and shapes of exalted humanity;

Elysian beauty, melancholy grace¹

It might be said of him that he never beheld an oak tree without seeing the Dryad. His fame may now forgive the critics who disliked his politics, and did not understand his poetry. Repeated editions of him in England, France, and America attest his triumphant survival of all obloquy; and there can be no doubt that he has taken a permanent station among the British poets, of a very high, if not thoroughly mature, description.

Keats's early poetry, indeed, partook plentifully of the exuberance of youth; and even in most of his later, his sensibility, sharpened by mortal illness, tended to a morbid excess. His region is "a wilderness of sweets"²—flowers of all hue, and "weeds of glorious feature,"³—where, as he says, the luxuriant soil brings

The pipy hemlock to strange overgrowth.⁴

² Paradise Lost, 5, 294

³ Spenser, Mulopotamus, 213

⁴ Keats, Endymion, 1, 241 (p. 770).

But there also is the "rain-scented eglantine,"¹ and bushes of May-flowers, with bees, and myrtle, and bay,—and endless paths into forests, haunted with the loveliest as well as gentlest beings; and the gods live in the distance, amid notes of majestic thunder. I do not need to say that no "surfeit" is ever there, but I do, that there is no end of the "nectared sweets."² In what other English poet (however superior to him in other respects) are you so certain of never opening a page without lighting upon the loveliest imagery and the most eloquent expressions? Name one Compare any succession of their pages at random, and see if the young poet is not sure to present his stock of beauty; crude it may be, in many instances; too indiscriminate in general; never, perhaps, thoroughly perfect in cultivation; but there it is, exquisite of its kind, and filling envy with despair. He died at five-and-twenty; he had not revised his earlier works, nor given his genius its last pruning. His Endymion,³ in resolving to be free from all critical trammels, had no versification; and his last noble fragment, Hyperion,⁴ is not faultless,—but it is nearly so. *The Eve of St. Agnes*⁵ betrays morbidity only in one instance (noticed in the comment).⁶ Even in his earliest productions, which are to be considered as those of youth just emerging from boyhood, are to be found passages of as masculine a beauty as ever were written. Witness the Sonnet on Reading Chapman's Homer,⁷—epical in the splendor and dignity of its images, and terminating with the noblest Greek simplicity. Among his finished productions, however, of any length, The Eve of St. Agnes still appears to me the most delightful and complete specimen of his genius. It stands midway between his most sensitive ones (which, though of rare beauty, occasionally sink into feebleness) and the less generally characteristic majesty of the fragment of Hyperion. Doubtless his greatest poetry is to be found in Hyperion; and had he lived, there is as little doubt he would have written chiefly in that strain; rising superior to those languishments of love which made the critics so angry, and which they might so easily have pardoned at his time of life. But The Eve of St. Agnes had already bid most of them adieu, —exquisitely loving as it is. It is young, but full-grown poetry of the rarest description; graceful as the beardless Apollo; glowing and gorgeous with the colors of romance. I have therefore reprinted the whole of it in the present volume, together with the comment alluded to in the Preface; especially as, in addition to felicity of treatment, its subject is in every respect a happy one, and helps to "paint" this our bower of "poetry with delight." Melancholy, it is true, will "break in" when the reader thinks of the early death of such a writer; but it is one of the benevolent provisions of nature that all good things tend to pleasure in the recollection, when the bitterness of their loss is past, their own sweetness embalm them.

While writing this paragraph, a hand-organ out-of-doors has been playing one of the mournfullest and loveliest airs of Bellini—another genius who died young. The sound of music always gives a feeling either of triumph or tenderness to the state of mind in which it is heard, in this instance it seemed like one departed spirit come to bear testimony to another, and to say how true indeed may be the union of sorrowful and sweet recollections.

Keats knew the youthful faults of his poetry as well as any man, as the reader may see by the Preface to Endymion,² and its touching though manly acknowledgment of them to critical candor. I have this moment read it again, after a lapse of years, and have been astonished to think how anybody could answer such an appeal to the mercy of strength, with the cruelty of weakness. All the good for which Mr. Gifford³ pretended to be zealous, he might have effected with pain to no one, and glory to himself; and therefore all the evil he mixed with it was of his own making. But the secret at the bottom of such unprovoked censure is exasperated inferiority. Young poets, upon the whole,—at least very young poets,—had better not publish at all. They are pretty sure to have faults; and jealousy and envy are as sure to find them out, and wreak upon them their own disappointments. The critic is often an unsuccessful author, almost always an inferior one to a man of genius, and possesses his sensibility neither to beauty nor to pain. If he does,—if by any chance he is a man of genius himself (and such things have been), sure and certain will be his regret, some day, for having given pains which he might have turned into noble pleasures; and nothing will console him but that very charity towards himself, the grace of which can only be secured to us by our having denied it to no one.

Let the student of poetry observe that in all the luxury of The Eve of St. Agnes there is nothing of the conventional craft of artificial writers; no heaping up of words or similes for their own sakes or the rhyme's sake; no gaudy commonplaces, no borrowed airs of earnestness; no tricks of inversion; no substitution of reading or of ingenious thoughts for feeling or spontaneity; no irrelevancy or unfitness of any sort. All flows out of sincerity and passion. The writer is as much in love with the heroine as his hero is; his description of the painted window, however gorgeous, has not an untrue or superfluous word; and the only speck of fault in the whole poem arises from an excess of emotion.

FRANCIS JEFFREY (1773-1850)

From CRABBE'S POEMS¹
1808 1808

We receive the proofs of Mr. Crabbe's poetical existence, which are contained in this volume,² with the same sort of feeling that would be excited by tidings of an ancient friend, whom we no longer expected to hear of in this world. We rejoice in his resurrection, both for his sake and for our own; but we feel also a certain movement of self-condemnation, for having been remiss in our inquiries after him, and somewhat too negligent of the honors which ought, at any rate, to have been paid to his memory.

It is now, we are afraid, upwards of twenty years since we were first struck with the vigor, originality, and truth of description of The Village,³ and since, we regretted that an author who could write so well should have written so little. From that tune to the present, we have heard little of Mr. Crabbe, and fear that he has been in a great measure lost sight of by the public, as well as by us. With a singular, and scarcely pardonable indifference to fame, he has remained, during this long interval, in patient or indolent repose; and, without making a single movement to maintain or advance the reputation he had acquired, has permitted others to usurp the attention which he was sure of commanding, and allowed himself to be nearly forgotten by a public, which reckons upon being reminded of all the claims which the living have on its favor. His former publications, though of distinguished merit, were perhaps too small in volume to remain long the objects of general attention, and seem, by some accident, to have been jostled aside in the crowd of more clamorous competitors.

Yet, though the name of Crabbe has not hitherto been very common in the mouths of our poetical critics, we believe there are few real lovers of poetry to whom some of his sentiments and descriptions are not secretly familiar. There is a truth and force in many of his delineations of rustic life, which is calculated to sink deep into the memory; and, being confirmed by daily observation, they are recalled upon innumerable occasions, when the ideal pictures of more fanciful authors have lost all their interest. For ourselves at least, we profess to be indebted to Mr. Crabbe for many of these strong impressions; and have known more than one of our unpoetical acquaintances, who declared they could never pass by a parish workhouse without thinking of the description of it they had read at school in the Poetical Extracts. The volume before us will renew, we trust, and extend many such impressions. It contains all the former productions of the author, with about double their bulk of new matter, most of it in the same taste and manner of composition with the former, and some of a kind of which we had no previous example in this author. The whole, however, is of no ordinary merit, and will be found, we have little doubt, a sufficient warrant for Mr. Crabbe to take his place as one of the most original, nervous, and pathetic poets of the present century.

His characteristic, certainly, is force, and truth of description, joined for the most part to great selection and condensation of expression,—that kind of strength and originality which we meet with in Cowper, and that sort of diction and versification which we admire in The Deserted Village of Goldsmith, or The Vanity of Human Wishes of Johnson. If he can be said to have imitated the manner of any author, it is Goldsmith, indeed, who has been the object of his imitation; and yet his general train of thinking, and his views of society, are so extremely opposite, that, when The Village was first published, it was commonly considered as an antidote or an answer to the more captivating representations of The Deserted Village. Compared with this celebrated author, he will be found, we think, to have more vigor and less delicacy; and while he must be admitted to be inferior in the fine finish and uniform beauty of his composition, we cannot help considering him superior, both in the variety and the truth of his pictures. Instead of that uniform tint of pensive tenderness which overspreads the whole poetry of Goldsmith, we find in Mr. Crabbe many gleams of gaiety and humor. Though his habitual views of life are more gloomy than those of his rival, his poetical temperament seems far more cheerful; and when the occasions of sorrow and rebuke are gone by, he can collect himself for sarcastic pleasantry or unbend in innocent playfulness. His diction, though generally pure and powerful, is sometimes harsh, and sometimes quaint; and he has occasionally admitted a couplet or two in a state so unfinished as to give a character of inelegance to the passages in which they occur. With a taste less disciplined and less fastidious than that of Goldsmith, he has, in our apprehension, a keener eye for observation, and a readier hand for the delineation of what he has observed. There is less poetical keeping in his whole performance; but the groups of which it consists are conceived, we think, with equal genius, and drawn with greater spirit as well as far greater fidelity.

It is not quite fair, perhaps, thus to draw a detailed parallel between a living poet, and one whose reputation has been sealed by death, and by the immutable sentence of a surviving generation. Yet there are so few of his contemporaries to whom Mr. Crabbe bears any resemblance that we can scarcely explain our opinion of his merit without comparing him to some of his predecessors. There is one set of writers, indeed, from whose works those of Mr. Crabbe might receive all that elucidation which results from contrast, and from an entire opposition in all points of taste and opinion. We allude now to the Wordsworths, and the Southey's, and Coleridges, and all that ambitious fraternity, that, with good intentions and extraordinary talents, are laboring to bring back our poetry to the fantastical oddity and puling childishness of Withers, Quails, or Marvel. These gentlemen write a great deal about rustic life, as well as Mr. Crabbe; and they even agree with him in dwelling much on its discomforts, but nothing can be more opposite than the views they take of the subject, or the manner in which they execute their representations of them.

Mr. Crabbe exhibits the common people of England pretty much as they are, and as they must appear to every one who will take the trouble of examining into their condition, at the same time that he renders his sketches in a very high degree interesting and beautiful by selecting what is most fit for description, by grouping them into such forms as must catch the attention or awake the memory, and by scattering over the whole such traits of moral sensibility, of sarcasm, and of deep reflection, as every one must feel to be natural, and own to be powerful. The gentlemen of the new school, on the other hand, scarcely ever condescend to take their subjects from any description of persons at all known to the common inhabitants of the world; but invent for themselves certain whimsical and unheard-of beings, to whom they impute some fantastical combination of feelings, and then labor to excite our sympathy for them, either by placing them in incredible situations, or by some strained and exaggerated moralization of a vague and tragical description. Mr. Crabbe, in short, shows us something which we have all seen, or may see, in real life; and draws from it such feelings and such reflections as every human being must acknowledge that it is calculated to excite. He delights us by the truth, and vivid and picturesque beauty of his representations, and by the force and pathos of the sensations with which we feel that they are connected. Mr. Wordsworth and his associates, on the other hand, introduce us to beings whose existence was not previously suspected by the acutest observers of nature; and excite an interest for them—where they do excite any interest—more by an eloquent and refined analysis of their own capricious feelings, than by any obvious or intelligible ground of sympathy in their situation.

Those who are acquainted with the Lyrical Ballads, or the more recent publications of Mr. Wordsworth, will scarcely deny the justice of this representation; but in order to vindicate it to such as do not enjoy that advantage, we must beg leave to make a few hasty references to the former, and by far the least exceptionable of those productions.

A village schoolmaster, for instance, is a pretty common poetical character. Goldsmith has drawn him imitably,¹ so has Shenstone, with the slight change of sex;² and Mr. Crabbe, in two passages, has followed their footsteps.³ Now, Mr. Wordsworth has a village schoolmaster also, a personage who makes no small figure in three or four of his poems.⁴ But by what traits is this worthy old gentleman delineated by the new poet? No pedantry, no innocent vanity of learning, no mixture of indulgence with the pride of power, and of poverty with the consciousness of rare acquirements. Every feature which belongs to the situation, or marks the character in common apprehension, is scornfully discarded by Mr. Wordsworth, who represents his gray-haired rustic pedagogue as a sort of half crazy, sentimental person, overrun with fine feelings, constitutional merriment, and a most humorous melancholy. Here are the two stanzas in which this consistent and intelligible character is portrayed. The diction is at least as new as the conception.

The sighs which Matthew heav'd were sighs
Of one tir'd out with fun and madness;
The tears which came to Matthew's eyes Were tears of light—the oil of gladness

Yet sometimes, when the secret cup Of still and serious thought went round
He seem'd as if he drank it up,
He felt with spirit so profound.
Thou soul of God's best earthly mould,⁵ etc.

A frail damsel again is a character common enough in all poems, and one upon which many fine and pathetic lines have been expended. Mr. Wordsworth has written more than three hundred on the subject; but, instead of new images of tenderness, or delicate representation of intelligible feelings, he has contrived to tell us nothing whatever of the unfortunate fair one, but that her name is Martha Ray, and that she goes up to the top of a hill, in a red cloak, and cries, "O misery!" All the rest of the poem⁶ is filled with a description of an old thorn and a pond, and of the silly stories which the neighboring old women told about them.

The sports of childhood, and the untimely death of promising youth, is also a common topic of poetry. Mr. Wordsworth has made some blank verse about it, but, instead of the delightful and picturesque sketches with which so many authors of modern talents have presented us on this inviting subject, all that he is pleased to communicate of his rustic child is, that he used to amuse himself with shouting to the owls, and hearing them answer. To make amends for this brevity, the process of his mimicry is most accurately described.

—With fingers interwoven, both hands Press'd closely palm to palm, and to his mouth Uplifted, he, as through an instrument, Blew mimic hootings to the silent owls,
That they might answer him.¹

This is all we hear of him, and for the sake of this one accomplishment, we are told that the author has frequently stood mute, and gazed on his grave for half an hour together!

Love, and the fantasies of lovers, have afforded an ample theme to poets of all ages. Mr. Wordsworth, however, has thought fit to compose a piece, illustrating this copious subject by one single thought. A lover trots away to see his mistress one fine evening, gazing all the way on the moon; when he comes to her door,

O mercy! to myself I cried,
If Lucy should be dead!²

And there the poem ends!

Now, we leave it to any reader of common candor and discernment to say whether these representations of character and sentiment are drawn from that eternal and universal standard of truth and nature, which every one is knowing enough to recognize, and no one great enough to depart from with impunity; or whether they are not formed, as we have ventured to allege, upon certain fantastic and affected peculiarities in the mind or fancy of the author, into which it is most improbable that many of his readers will enter, and which cannot, in some cases, be comprehended without much effort and explanation. Instead of multiplying instances of these wide and wilful aberrations from ordinary nature, it may be more satisfactory to produce the author's own admission of the narrowness of the plan upon which he writes, and of the very extraordinary circumstances which he himself sometimes thinks it necessary for his readers to keep in view, if they would wish to understand the beauty or propriety of his delineations.

A pathetic tale of guilt or superstition may be told, we are apt to fancy, by the poet himself, in his general character of poet, with full as much effect as by any other person. An old nurse, at any rate, or a monk or parish clerk, is always at hand to give grace to such a narration. None of these, however, would satisfy Mr. Wordsworth. He has written a long poem of this sort,¹ in which he thinks it indispensably necessary to apprise the reader, that he has endeavored to represent the language and sentiments of a particular character—of which character, he adds, “the reader will have a general notion, if he has ever known a man, a captain of a small trading vessel, for example, who being past the middle age of life, has retired upon an annuity, or small independent income, to some village or country town, of which he was not a native, or in which he had not been accustomed to live.”²

Now, we must be permitted to doubt whether, among all the readers of Mr. Wordsworth (few or many), there is a single individual who has had the happiness of knowing a person of this very peculiar description; or who is capable of forming any sort of conjecture of the particular disposition and turn of thinking such a combination of attributes would be apt to produce. To us, we will confess, the announcement appears as ludicrous and absurd as it would be in the author of an ode or an epic to say, “Of this piece the reader will necessarily form a very erroneous judgment unless he is apprised that it was written by a pale man in a green coat—sitting cross-legged on an oaken stool—with a scratch on his nose, and a spelling dictionary on the table.”³

⁴ “Some of our readers may have a curiosity to know in what manner this old annuitant captain does actually express himself in the village of his adoption. For their gratification, we annex the two first stanzas of his story, in which, with all the attention we have been able to bestow, we have been utterly unable to detect any traits that can be supposed to characterise either a seaman, an annuitant, or a stranger in a country town. It is a style, on the contrary, which we should ascribe, without hesitation, to a certain poetical fraternity in the west of England, and which, we verily believe, never was, and never will be, used by anyone out of that fraternity.”

From these childish and absurd affectations, we turn with pleasure to the manly sense and correct picturing of Mr. Crabbe; and, after being dazzled and made giddy with the elaborate raptures and obscure originalities of these new artists, it is refreshing to meet again with the spirit and nature of our old masters, in the nervous pages of the author now before us.

From ALISON'S ESSAYS ON THE NATURE AND PRINCIPLES OF TASTE

It is unnecessary, however, to pursue these criticisms,¹ or, indeed, this hasty review of the speculation of other writers, any farther. The few observations we have already made, will enable the intelligent reader, both to understand in a general way what has been already done on the subject, and in some degree prepare him to appreciate the merits of that theory, substantially the same with Mr. Alison's, which we shall now proceed to illustrate somewhat more in detail.

The basis of it is, that the beauty which we impute to outward objects is nothing more than the reflection of our own inward emotions, and is made up entirely of certain little portions of love, pity, or other affections, which have been connected with these objects, and still adhere, as it were, to them, and move us anew whenever they are pre-

There is a thorn—it looks so old,
In truth you'd find it hard to say How it could ever have been young!
It looks so old and gray
Not higher than a two-years' child.
It stands erect, this aged thorn.
No leaves it has, no thorny points,
It is a mass of knotted joints,
A wretched thing forlorn,
It stands erect, and like a stone,
With lichens it is overgrown.

Like rock or stone, it is o'ergrown
With lichens,—to the very top,
And hung with heavy tufts of moss
A melancholy crop
Up from the earth these mosses creep,
And this poor thorn, they clasp it round
So close, you'd say that they were bent With plain and manifest intent!
To drag it to the ground;
And all had joined in one endeavor To bury this poor thorn forever.

And this, it seems, is Nature, and Pathos, and Poetry!—Jeffrey

¹ Jeffrey has pointed out the objections to the most important theories of beauty from the earliest times to his own day. He has given especial attention to the theories advanced by Dugald Stewart (1753-1828) in his Philosophical Essays, and by Richard Payne Knight (1750-1824) in his Analytical Inquiry Into the Nature and Principles of Taste.

sented to our observation. Before proceeding to bring any proof of the truth of this proposition, there are two things that it may be proper to explain a little more distinctly. First, What are the primary affections, by the suggestion of which we think the sense of beauty is produced? And, secondly, What is the nature of the connection by which we suppose that the objects we call beautiful are enabled to suggest these affections?

With regard to the first of these points, it fortunately is not necessary either to enter into any tedious details, or to have recourse to any nice distinctions. All sensations that are not absolutely indifferent, and are, at the same time, either agreeable when experienced by ourselves, or attractive when contemplated in others, may form the foundation of the emotions of sublimity or beauty. The love of sensation seems to be the ruling appetite of human nature, and many sensations, in which the painful may be thought to predominate, are consequently sought for with avidity, and recollected with interest, even in our own persons. In the persons of others, emotions still more painful are contemplated with eagerness and delight: and therefore we must not be surprised to find that many of the pleasing sensations of beauty or sublimity resolve themselves ultimately into recollections of feelings that may appear to have a very opposite character. The sum of the whole is, that every feeling which it is agreeable to experience, to recall, or to witness, may become the source of beauty in external objects, when it is so connected with them as that their appearance reminds us of that feeling. Now, in real life, and from daily experience and observation, we know that it is agreeable, in the first place, to recollect our own pleasurable sensations, or to be enabled to form a lively conception of the pleasures of other men, or even of sentient beings of any description. We know likewise, from the same sure authority, that there is a certain delight in the remembrance of our past, or the conception of our future emotions, even though attended with great pain, provided the pain be not forced too rudely on the mind, and be softened by the accompaniment of any milder feeling. And finally, we know, in the same manner, that the spectacle or conception of the emotions of others, even when in a high degree painful, is extremely interesting and attractive, and draws us away, not only from the consideration of indifferent objects, but even from the pursuit of light or frivolous enjoyments. All these are plain and familiar facts, of the existence of which, however they may be explained, no one can entertain the slightest doubt—and into which, therefore, we shall have made no inconsiderable progress, if we can resolve the more mysterious fact of the emotions we receive from the contemplation of sublimity or beauty.

Our proposition then is, that these emotions are not original emotions, nor produced directly by any material qualities in the objects which excite them; but are reflections, or images, of the more radical and familiar emotions to which we have already alluded; and are occasioned, not by any inherent virtue in the objects before us, but by the accidents, if we may so express ourselves, by which these may have been enabled to suggest or recall to us our past sensations or sympathies. We might almost venture, indeed, to lay it down as an axiom, that, except in the plain and palpable case of bodily pain or pleasure, we can never be interested in anything but the fortunes of sentient beings;—and that everything partaking of the nature of mental emotion, must have for its object the feelings, past, present, or possible, of something capable of sensation. Independent, therefore, of all evidence, and without the help of any explanation, we should have been apt to conclude that the emotions of beauty and sublimity must have for their objects the sufferings or enjoyments of sentient beings;—and to reject, as intrinsically absurd and incredible, the supposition that material objects, which obviously do neither hurt nor delight the body, should yet excite, by their mere physical qualities, the very powerful emotions which are sometimes excited by the spectacle of beauty.

Of the feelings, by their connection with which external objects become beautiful, we do not think it necessary to speak more minutely;—and, therefore, it only remains, under this preliminary view of the subject, to explain the nature of that connection by which we conceive this effect to be produced. Here, also, there is but little need for minuteness, or fulness of enumeration. Almost every tie, by which two objects can be bound together in the imagination, in such a manner as that the presentment of the one shall recall the memory of the other;—or, in other words, almost every possible relation which can subsist between such objects, may serve to connect the things we call sublime and beautiful, with feelings that are interesting or delightful. It may be useful, however, to class these bonds of association between mind and matter in a rude and general way

It appears to us, then, that objects are sublime or beautiful, first, when they are the natural signs and perpetual concomitants of pleasurable sensations, or, at any rate, of some lively feeling of emotion in ourselves or in some other sentient beings; or, secondly, when they are the arbitrary or accidental concomitants of such feelings; or, thirdly, when they bear some analogy or fanciful resemblance to things with which these emotions are necessarily connected. In endeavoring to illustrate the nature of these several relations, we shall be led to lay before our readers some proofs that appear to us satisfactory of the truth of the general theory.

The most obvious and the strongest association that can be established between inward feelings and external objects is where the object is necessarily and universally connected with the feeling by the law of nature, so that it is always presented to the senses when the feeling is impressed upon the mind—as the sight or the sound of laughter, with the feeling of gaiety—of weeping, with distress—of the sound of thunder, with ideas of danger and power. Let us dwell for a moment on the last instance.—Nothing, perhaps, in the whole range of nature, is more strikingly and universally sublime than the sound we have just mentioned; yet it seems obvious that the sense of sublimity is produced, not by any quality that is perceived by the ear, but altogether by the impression of power and of danger that is necessarily made upon the mind, whenever that sound is heard. That it is not produced by any peculiarity in the sound itself, is certain, from the mistakes that are frequently made with regard to it. The noise of a cart rattling over the stones, is often mistaken for thunder; and as long as the mistake lasts, this very vulgar and insignificant noise is actually felt to be prodigiously sublime. It is so felt, however, it is perfectly plain, merely because it is then associated with ideas of prodigious power and undefined danger;—and the sublimity is accordingly destroyed, the moment the association is dissolved, though the sound itself and its effect on the organ, continue exactly the same. This, therefore, is an instance in which sublimity is distinctly proved to consist, not in any physical quality of the object to which it is ascribed, but in its necessary connection with that vast and uncontrolled Power which is the natural object of awe and veneration.

Hitherto we have spoken of the beauty of external objects only. But the whole difficulty of the theory consists in its application to them. If that be once adjusted, the beauty of immaterial objects can occasion no perplexity. Poems and other compositions in words are beautiful in proportion as they are conversant with beautiful objects—or as they suggest to us, in a more direct way, the moral and social emotions on which the beauty of all objects depends. Theorems and demonstrations, again, are beautiful according as they excite in us emotions of admiration for the genius and intellectual power of their inventors, and images of the magnificent and beneficial ends to which such discoveries may be applied;—and mechanical contrivances are beautiful when they remind us of similar talents and ingenuity, and at the same time impress us with a more direct sense of their vast utility to mankind, and of the great additional conveniences with which life is consequently adorned. In all cases, therefore, there is the suggestion of some interesting conception or emotion associated with a present perception, in which it is apparently confounded and embodied—and thus, according to the whole of the preceding deduction, is the distinguishing characteristic of beauty.

Having now explained, as fully as we think necessary, the grounds of that opinion as to the nature of beauty which appears to be most conformable to the truth, we have only to add a word or two as to the necessary consequences of its adoption upon several other controversies of a kindred description.

In the first place, then, we conceive that it establishes the substantial identity of the sublime, the beautiful, and the picturesque; and consequently puts an end to all controversy that is not purely verbal, as to the difference of those several qualities. Every material object that interests us, without actually hurting or gratifying our bodily feelings, must do so, according to this theory, in one and the same manner,—that is, by suggesting or recalling some emotion or affection of ourselves or some other sentient being, and presenting, to our imagination at least, some natural object of love, pity, admiration, or awe. The interest of material objects, therefore, is always the same; and arises, in every case, not from any physical qualities they may possess, but from their association with some idea of emotion. But though material objects have but one means of exciting emotion, the emotions they do excite are infinite. They are mirrors that reflect all shades and all colors, and, in point of fact, do seldom reflect the same hues twice. No two interesting objects, perhaps, whether known by the name of beautiful, sublime, or picturesque, ever produced exactly the same emotion in the beholder; and no object, it is most probable, ever moved any two persons to the very same conceptions. As they may be associated with all the feelings and affections of which the human mind is susceptible, so they may suggest those feelings in all their variety, and, in fact, do daily excite all sorts of emotions—running through every gradation, from extreme gaiety and elevation to the borders of horror and disgust.

Now it is certainly true that all the variety of emotions raised in this way on the single basis of association may be classed, in a rude way, under the denominations of sublime, beautiful, and picturesque, according as they partake of awe, tenderness, or admiration; and we have no other objection to this nomenclature except its extreme imperfection, and the delusions to which we know that it has given occasion. If objects that interest by their association with ideas of power and danger and terror are to be distinguished by the peculiar name of the sublime, why should there not be a separate name also for objects that interest by associations of mirth and gaiety—another for those that please by suggestions of softness and melancholy—another for such as are connected with impressions of comfort and tranquillity—and another for those that are related to pity and admiration and love and regret and all the other distinct emotions and affections of our nature? These are not in reality less distinguishable from each other than from the emotions of awe and veneration that confer the title of sublime on their representatives; and while all the former are confounded under the comprehensive appellation of beauty, this partial attempt at distinction is only apt to mislead us into an erroneous opinion of our accuracy, and to make us believe, both that there is a greater conformity among the things that pass under the same name, and a greater difference between those that pass under different names, than is really the case. We have seen already that the radical error of almost all preceding inquirers has lain in supposing that everything that passed under the name of beautiful must have some real and inherent quality in common with everything else that obtained that name. And it is scarcely necessary for us to observe that it has been almost as general an opinion that sublimity was not only something radically different from beauty, but actually opposed to it; whereas the fact is, that it is far more nearly related to some sorts of beauty than many sorts of beauty are to each other; and that both are founded exactly upon the same principle of suggesting some past or possible emotion of some sentient being.

Upon this point we are happy to find our opinions confirmed by the authority of Mr. Stewart, who, in his Essay on the Beautiful, already referred to, has observed, not only that there appears to him to be no inconsistency or impropriety in such expressions as the sublime beauties of nature, or of the sacred Scriptures,—but has added in express terms that “to oppose the beautiful to the sublime or to the picturesque strikes him as something analogous to a contrast between the beautiful and the comic—the beautiful and the tragic—the beautiful and the pathetic—or the beautiful and the romantic.”

The only other advantage which we shall specify as likely to result from the general adoption of the theory we have been endeavoring to illustrate is, that it seems calculated to put an end to all these perplexing and vexatious questions about the standard of taste, which have given occasion to so much impertinent and so much elaborate discussion. If things are not beautiful in themselves, but only as they serve to suggest interesting conceptions to the mind, then everything which does in point of fact suggest such a conception to any individual, is beautiful to that individual; and it is not only quite true that there is no room for disputing about tastes, but that all tastes are equally just and correct, in so far as each individual speaks only of his own emotions. When a man calls a thing beautiful, however, he may indeed mean to make two very different assertions;—he may mean that it gives him pleasure by suggesting to him some interesting emotion; and, in this sense, there can be no doubt that, if he merely speak truth, the thing is beautiful; and that it pleases him precisely in the same way that all other things please those to whom they appear beautiful. But if he mean farther to say that the thing possesses some quality which should make it appear beautiful to every other person, and that it is owing to some prejudice or defect in them if it appear otherwise, then he is as unreasonable and absurd as he would think those who should attempt to convince him that he felt no emotion of beauty.

All tastes, then, are equally just and true, in so far as concerns the individual whose taste is in question, and what a man feels distinctly to be beautiful, is beautiful to him, whatever other people may think of it. All this follows clearly from the theory now in question: but it does not follow, from it that all tastes are equally good or desirable, or that there is any difficulty in describing that which is really the best, and the most to be envied. The only use of the faculty of taste is to afford an innocent delight, and to assist in the cultivation of a finer morality; and that man certainly will have the most delight from this faculty, who has the most numerous and most powerful perceptions of beauty. But, if beauty consist in the reflection of our affections and sympathies, it is plain that he will always see the most beauty whose affections are the warmest and most exercised—whose imagination is the most powerful, and who has most accustomed himself to attend to the objects by which he is surrounded. In so far as mere feeling and enjoyment are concerned, therefore, it seems evident that the best taste must be that which belongs to the best affections, the most active fancy, and the most attentive habits of observation. It will follow pretty exactly, too, that all men's perceptions of beauty will be nearly in proportion to the degree of their sensibility and social sympathies; and that those who have no affections towards sentient beings, will be as certainly insensible to beauty in external objects, as he, who cannot hear the sound of his friend's voice, must be deaf to its echo.¹

In so far as the sense of beauty is regarded as a mere source of enjoyment, this seems to be the only distinction that deserves to be attended to; and the only cultivation that taste should ever receive, with a view to the gratification of the individual, should be through the indirect channel of cultivating the affections and powers of observation. If we aspire, however, to be creators, as well as observers of beauty, and place any part of our happiness in ministering to the gratification of others—as artists, or poets, or authors of any sort—then, indeed, a new distinction of tastes, and a far more laborious system of cultivation, will be necessary. A man who pursues only his own delight, will be as much charmed with objects that suggest powerful emotions in consequence of personal and accidental associations, as with those that introduce similar emotions by means of associations that are universal and indestructible. To him, all objects of the former class are really as beautiful as those of the latter—and for his own gratification, the creation of that sort of beauty is just as important an occupation: but if he conceive the ambition of creating beauties for the admiration of others, he must be cautious to employ only such objects as are the natural signs, or the inseparable concomitants of emotions, of which the greater part of mankind are susceptible, and his taste will then deserve to be called bad and false, if he obtrude upon the public, as beautiful, objects that are not likely to be associated in common minds with any interesting impressions.

For a man himself, then, there is no taste that is either bad or false; and the only difference worthy of being attended to, is that between a great deal and a very little. Some who have cold affections, sluggish imaginations, and no habits of observation, can with difficulty discern beauty in anything; while others, who are full of kindness of sensibility, and who have been accustomed to attend to all the objects around them, feel it almost in everything. It is no matter what other people may think of the objects of their admiration; nor ought it to be any concern of theirs that the public would be astonished or offended, if they were called upon to join in that admiration. So long as no such call is made, this anticipated discrepancy of feeling need give them no uneasiness; and the suspicion of it should produce no contempt in any other persons. It is a strange aberration indeed of vanity that makes us despise persons for being happy—for having sources of enjoyment in which we cannot share—and yet this is the true source of the ridicule which is so generally poured upon individuals who seek only to enjoy their peculiar tastes unmolested:—for, if there be any truth in the theory we have been expounding, no taste is bad for any other reason than because it is peculiar—as the objects in which it delights must actually serve to suggest to the individual those common emotions and universal affections upon which the sense of beauty is everywhere founded. The misfortune is, however, that we are apt to consider all persons who make known their peculiar reli-5 shes, and especially all who create any objects for their gratification, as in some measure dictating to the public, and setting up an idol for general adoration; and hence 10 this intolerant interference with almost all peculiar perceptions of beauty, and the unsparing derision that pursues all deviations from acknowledged standards. This intolerance, we admit, is often provoked by some-15 thing of a spirit of proselytism and arrogance, in those who mistake their own casual associations for natural or universal relations; and the consequence is, that mortified 20 vanity ultimately dries up, even for them, the fountain of their peculiar enjoyment; and disenchant, by a new association of general contempt or ridicule, the scenes that 25 had been consecrated by some innocent but accidental emotion.

As all men must have some peculiar associations, all men must have some peculiar notions of beauty, and, of course, to a certain extent, a taste that the public would be 30 entitled to consider as false or vitiated. For those who make no demands on public admiration, however, it is hard to be obliged to sacrifice this source of enjoyment; and, even for those who labor for applause, the 35 wisest course, perhaps, if it were only practicable, would be to have two tastes—one to enjoy, and one to work by—one founded upon universal associations, according to which they finished those performances for 40 which they challenged universal praise—and another guided by all casual and individual association, through which they might still look fondly upon nature, and upon the 45 objects of their secret admiration.

From WORDSWORTH'S THE EXCURSION¹

This will never do! It bears no doubt the stamp of the author's heart and fancy; but unfortunately not half so visibly as that of his peculiar system. His former poems were intended to recommend that system, and to 50 bespeak favor for it by their individual merit; but this, we suspect, must be recommended by the system, and can only expect to succeed where it has been previously established. It is longer, weaker, and tamer than any of Mr. Wordsworth's other productions, with less boldness of originality, and less even of that extreme simplicity and 5 lowliness of tone which wavered so prettily, in the Lyrical Ballads, between silliness and pathos. We have imitations of Cowper, and even of Milton here, engrafted on the natural drawl of the Lakers¹—and all diluted into harmony by that profuse and irre-10 pressible wordiness which deluges all the blank verse of this school of poetry, and lubricates and weakens the whole structure of their style.

15 Though it fairly fills four hundred and twenty good quarto pages, without note, vignette, or any sort of extraneous assistance, it is stated in the title—with something of an imprudent candor—to be but 20 "a portion" of a larger work; and in the preface, where an attempt is rather unsuccessfully made to explain the whole design, it is still more rashly disclosed that it is but 25 "a part of the second part, of a long and laborious work"—which is to consist of three parts!

What Mr. Wordsworth's ideas of length are, we have no means of accurately judging. But we cannot help suspecting that 30 they are liberal, to a degree that will alarm the weakness of most modern readers. As far as we can gather from the preface, the entire poem—or one of them (for we really are not sure whether there is to be one or 35 two) is of a biographical nature, and is to contain the history of the author's mind, and of the origin and progress of his poetical powers, up to the period when they were sufficiently matured to qualify him for 40 the great work on which he has been so long employed. Now, the quarto before us contains an account of one of his youthful rambles in the vales of Cumberland, and occupies precisely the period of three days!
 45 So that, by the use of a very powerful calculus, some estimate may be formed of the probable extent of the entire biography.

This small specimen, however, and the statements with which it is prefaced, have 50 been sufficient to set our minds at rest in one particular. The case of Mr. Wordsworth, we perceive, is now manifestly hopeless; and we give him up as altogether incurable, and beyond the power of criticism.
 55 We cannot indeed altogether omit taking precautions now and then against the spreading of the malady; but for himself, though we shall watch the progress of his symptoms as a matter of professional curiosity and instruction, we really think it right not to harass him any longer with nauseous remedies, but rather to throw in cordials and lenitives, and wait in patience for the natural termination of the disorder. In order to justify this desertion of our patient, however, it is proper to state why we despair of the success of a more active practice.

A man who has been for twenty years at work on such matter as is now before us, and who comes complacently forward with a whole quarto of it, after all the admonitions he has received, cannot reasonably be expected to "change his hand, or check his pride," upon the suggestion of far weightier monitors than we can pretend to be. Inveterate habits must now have given a kind of sanctity to the errors of early taste, and the very powers of which we lament the perversion, have probably become incapable of any other application. The very quantity, too, that he has written, and is at this moment working up for publication upon the old pattern, makes it almost hopeless to look for any change of it. All this is so much capital already sunk in the concern, which must be sacrificed if that be abandoned; and no man likes to give up for lost the time and talent and labor which he has embodied in any permanent production. We were not previously aware of these obstacles to Mr. Wordsworth's conversion; and, considering the peculiarities of his former writings merely as the result of certain wanton and capricious experiments on public taste and indulgence, conceived it to be our duty to discourage their repetition by all the means in our power. We now see clearly, however, how the case stands; and, making up our minds, though with the most sincere pain and reluctance, to consider him as finally lost to the good cause of poetry, shall endeavor to be thankful for the occasional gleams of tenderness and beauty which the natural force of his imagination and affections must still shed over all his productions, and to which we shall ever turn with delight, in spite of the affectation and mysticism and prolixity, with which they are so abundantly contrasted.

Long habits of seclusion, and an excessive ambition of originality, can alone account for the disproportion which seems to exist between this author's taste and his genius; or for the devotion with which he has sacrificed so many precious gifts at the shrine of those paltry idols which he has set up for himself among his lakes and his mountains. Solitary musings, amidst such scenes, might no doubt be expected to nurse up the mind to the majesty of poetical conception, (though it is remarkable that all the greater poets lived, or had lived, in the full current of society); but the collision of equal minds—the admonition of prevailing impressions—seems necessary to reduce its redundancies, and repress that tendency to extravagance or puerility, into which the self-indulgence and self-admiration of genius is so apt to be betrayed, when it is allowed to wanton, without awe or restraint, in the triumph and delight of its own intoxication. That its flights should be graceful and glorious in the eyes of men, it seems almost to be necessary that they should be made in the consciousness that men's eyes are to behold them, and that the inward transport and vigor by which they are inspired should be tempered by an occasional reference to what will be thought of them by those ultimate dispensers of glory. An habitual and general knowledge of the few settled and permanent maxims which form the canon of general taste in all large and polished societies—a certain tact, which informs us at once that many things, which we still love, and are moved by in secret, must necessarily be despised as childish, or derided as absurd, in all such societies—though it will not stand in the place of genius, seems necessary to the success of its exertions, and though it will never enable any one to produce the higher beauties of art, can alone secure the talent which does produce them from errors that must render it useless. Those who have most of the talent, however, commonly acquire this knowledge with the greatest facility; and if Mr. Wordsworth, instead of confining himself almost entirely to the society of the dalesmen and cottagers, and little children, who form the subjects of his book, had condescended to mingle a little more with the people that were to read and judge of it, we cannot help thinking that its texture might have been considerably improved. At least it appears to us to be absolutely impossible that any one who had lived or mixed familiarly with men of literature and ordinary judgment in poetry (of course we exclude the coadjutors and disciples of his own school) could ever have fallen into such gross faults, or so long mistaken them for beauties. His first essays¹ we looked upon in a good degree as poetical paradoxes,—maintained experimentally, in order to display talent, and court notoriety;—and so maintained, with no more serious belief in their truth than is usually generated by an ingenious and animated defence of other paradoxes. But when we find that he has been for twenty years exclusively employed upon articles of this very fabric, and that he has still enough of raw material on hand to keep him so employed for twenty years to come, we cannot refuse him the justice of believing that he is a sincere convert to his own system, and must ascribe the peculiarities of his composition, not to any transient affectation, or accidental caprice of imagination, but to a settled perversity of taste or understanding, which has been fostered, if not altogether created, by the circumstances to which we have alluded.

The volume before us, if we were to describe it very shortly, we should characterize as a tissue of moral and devotional ravings, in which innumerable changes are rung upon a very few simple and familiar ideas—but with such an accompaniment of long words, long sentences, and unwieldy phrases, and such a hubbub of strained raptures and fantastical sublimities, that it is often difficult for the most skilful and attentive student to obtain a glimpse of the author's meaning—and altogether impossible for an ordinary reader to conjecture what he is about. Moral and religious enthusiasm, though undoubtedly poetical emotions, are at the same time but dangerous inspirers of poetry, nothing being so apt to run into interminable dulness or mellifluous extravagance without giving the unfortunate author the slightest intimation of his danger. His laudable zeal for the efficacy of his preachments, he very naturally mistakes for the ardor of poetical inspiration; and, while dealing out the high words and glowing phrases which are so readily supplied by themes of this description, can scarcely avoid believing that he is eminently original and impressive. All sorts of commonplace notions and expressions are sanctified in his eyes by the sublime ends for which they are employed; and the mystical verbiage of the Methodist pulpit is repeated till the speaker entertains no doubt that he is the chosen organ of divine truth and persuasion. But if such be the common hazards of seeking inspiration from those potent fountains, it may easily be conceived what chance Mr. Wordsworth had of escaping their enchantment, with his natural propensities to wordiness, and his unlucky habit of debasing pathos with vulgarity. The fact accordingly is, that in this production he is more obscure than a Pindaric poet¹ of the seventeenth century; and more verbose "than even himself of yore;" while the wilfulness with which he persists in choosing his examples of intellectual dignity and tenderness exclusively from the lowest ranks of society, will be sufficiently apparent, from the circumstance of his having thought fit to make his chief prolocutor² in this poetical dialogue, and chief advocate of Providence and Virtue, an old Scotch Pedlar, retired indeed from business, but still rambling about in his former haunts, and gossiping among his old customers, without his pack on his shoulders. The other persons of the drama are a retired military chaplain, who has grown half an atheist and half a misanthrope, the wife of an unprosperous weaver, a servant girl with her natural child, a parish pauper, and one or two other personages of equal rank and dignity.

The character of the work is decidedly didactic; and more than nine-tenths of it are occupied with a species of dialogue, or rather a series of long sermons or harangues which pass between the pedlar, the author, the old chaplain, and a worthy vicar, who entertains the whole party at dinner on the last day of their excursion. The incidents which occur in the course of it are as few and trifling as can well be imagined; and those which the different speakers narrate in the course of their discourses, are introduced rather to illustrate their arguments or opinions, than for any interest they are supposed to possess of their own. The doctrine which the work is intended to enforce, we are by no means certain that we have discovered. In so far as we can collect, however, it seems to be neither more nor less than the old familiar one, that a firm belief in the providence of a wise and beneficent Being must be our great stay and support under all afflictions and perplexities upon earth; and that there are indications of his power and goodness in all the aspects of the visible universe, whether living or inanimate, every part of which should therefore be regarded with love and reverence, as exponents of those great attributes. We can testify, at least, that these salutary and important truths are inculcated at far greater lengths, and with more repetitions, than in any ten volumes of sermons that we ever perused. It is also maintained, with equal conciseness and originality, that there is frequently much good sense, as well as much enjoyment, in the humbler conditions of life; and that, in spite of great vices and abuses, there is a reasonable allowance both of happiness and goodness in society at large. If there be any deeper or more recondite doctrines in Mr. Wordsworth's book, we must confess that they have escaped us, and, convinced as we are of the truth and soundness of those to which we have alluded, we cannot help thinking that they might have been better enforced with less parade and prolixity. His effusions on what may be called the physiognomy of external nature, or its moral and theological expression, are eminently fantastic, obscure, and affected. It is quite time, however, that we should give the reader a more particular account of this singular performance.

It opens with a picture of the author toiling across a bare common in a hot summer day, and reaching at last a ruined hut surrounded with tall trees, where he meets by appointment with a hale old man, with an iron-pointed staff lying beside him. Then follows a retrospective account of their first acquaintance—formed, it seems, when the author was at a village school, and his aged friend occupied "one room—the fifth part of a house"—in the neighborhood. After this, we have the history of this reverend person at no small length. He was born, we are happy to find, in Scotland—among the hills of Athol; and his mother, after his father's death, married the parish schoolmaster—so that he was taught his letters betimes. But then, as it is here set forth with much solemnity,

From his sixth year, the boy of whom I speak,
In summer tended cattle on the hills!¹

And again, a few pages after, that there may be no risk of mistake as to a point of such essential importance—

From early childhood, even, as hath been said,
From his sixth year, he had been sent abroad,
In summer—to tend herds! Such was his task!²

In the course of this occupation it is next recorded that he acquired such a taste for rural scenery and the open air, that when he was sent to teach a school in a neighboring village, he found it "a misery to him,"³ and determined to embrace the more romantic occupation of a pedlar—or, as Mr. Wordsworth more musically expresses it,

A vagrant merchant, bent beneath his load,⁴ —and in the course of his peregrinations had acquired a very large acquaintance, which, after he had given up dealing, he frequently took a summer ramble to visit.

The author, on coming up to this interesting personage, finds him sitting with his eyes half shut,—and not being quite sure whether he is asleep or awake, stands "some minutes' space"⁵ in silence beside him.—"At length," says he, with his own delightful simplicity—

At length I hail'd him—seeing that his hat
Was moist with water-drops, as if the brim Had newly scoop'd a running stream!—

* * * * *

—"Tis," said I, "a burning day!

My lips are parched with thirst;—but you, I guess,

Have somewhere found relief!"⁶

Upon this, the benevolent old man points him out, not a running stream, but a well in a corner, to which the author repairs, and after minutely describing its situation, beyond a broken wall, and between two alders that "grew in a cold damp nook,"⁷ he thus faithfully chronicles the process of his return:—

My thirst was slak'd, and from the cheerless spot

Withdrawing, straightway to the shade re-
turn'd,

Where sat the old man on the cottage bench.⁸

The Pedlar then gives an account of the last inhabitants of the deserted cottage beside them. These were a good industrious weaver and his wife and children. They were very happy for awhile, till sickness and want of work came upon them, and then the father enlisted as a soldier, and the wife pined in that lonely cottage—growing every year more careless and desponding, as her anxiety and fears for her absent husband, of whom no tidings ever reached her, accumulated. Her children died and left her cheerless and alone; and, at last she died also; and the cottage fell to decay. We must say that there is very considerable pathos in the telling of this simple story, and that they who can get over the repugnance excited by the triteness of its incidents, and the lowness of its objects, will not fail to be struck with the author's knowledge of the human heart, and the power he possesses of stirring up its deepest and gentlest sympathies. His prolixity, indeed, it is not so easy to get over. This little story fills about twenty-five quarto pages, and abounds, of course, with mawkish sentiment and details of preposterous minuteness. When the tale is told, the travellers take their staffs and end their first day's journey, without further adventure, at a little inn.

The Second Book sets them forward betimes in the morning. They pass by a Village Wake,¹ and as they approach a more solitary part of the mountains, the old man tells the author that he is taking him to see an old friend of his who had formerly been chaplain to a Highland regiment—had lost a beloved wife—been roused from his dejection by the first enthusiasm of the French Revolution—had emigrated, on its miscarriage, to America—and returned disgusted to hide himself in the retreat to which they were now ascending. That retreat is then most tediously described—a smooth green valley in the heart of the mountain, without trees, and with only one dwelling. Just as they get sight of it from the ridge above, they see a funeral train proceeding from the solitary abode, and hurry on with some apprehension for the fate of the amiable misanthrope, whom they find, however, in very tolerable condition at the door, and learn that the funeral was that of an aged pauper who had been boarded out by the parish in that cheap farmhouse, and had died in consequence of long exposure to heavy rain. The old chaplain, or, as Mr Wordsworth is pleased to call him, the Solitary, tells his dull story at prodigious length, and after giving an inflated description of an effect of mountain mists in the evening sun, treats his visitors with a rustic dinner—and they walk out to the fields at the close of the Second Book.

The Third makes no progress in the excursion. It is entirely filled with moral and religious conversation and debate, and with a more ample detail of the Solitary's past life than had been given in the sketch of his friend. The conversation is, in our judgment, exceedingly dull and mystical, and the Solitary's confessions insufferably diffuse. Yet there is occasionally very considerable force of writing and tenderness of sentiment in this part of the work.

The Fourth Book is also filled with dialogues, ethical and theological, and, with the exception of some brilliant and forceful expressions here and there, consists of an exposition of truisms, more cloudy, wordy, and inconceivably prolix, than anything we ever met with.

In the beginning of the Fifth Book, they leave the solitary valley, taking its pensive inhabitant along with them, and stray on to where the landscape sinks down into milder features, till they arrive at a church which stands on a moderate elevation in the centre of a wide and fertile vale. Here they meditate for awhile among the monuments, till the Vicar comes out and joins them, and recognizing the Pedlar for an old acquaintance, mixes graciously in the conversation, which proceeds in a very edifying manner till the close of the book.

The Sixth contains a choice obituary, or characteristic account of several of the persons who lie buried before this group of moralizers;—an unsuccessful lover, who had found consolation in natural history—a miner, who had worked on for twenty years, in despite of universal ridicule, and at last found the vein he had expected—two political enemies reconciled in old age to each other—an old female miser—a seduced damsel—and two widowers, one who had devoted himself to the education of his daughters, and one who had preferred marrying a prudent middle-aged woman to take care of them.

In the beginning of the Eighth Book, the worthy Vicar expresses, in the words of Mr Wordsworth's own epitome,¹ "his apprehension that he had detained his auditors too long—invites them to his house—Solitary, disciplined to comply, rallies the Wanderer, and somewhat playfully draws a comparison between his itinerant profession and that of a knight-errant—which leads to the Wanderer giving an account of changes in the country, from the manufacturing spirit—Its favorable effects—The other side of the picture," etc., etc. After these very poetical themes are exhausted, they all go into the house, where they are introduced to the Vicar's wife and daughter; and while they sit chatting in the parlor over a family dinner, his son and one of his companions come in with a fine dish of trouts piled on a blue slate, and after being caressed by the company, they are sent to dinner in the nursery.— This ends the Eighth Book.

The Ninth and last is chiefly occupied with a mystical discourse of the Pedlar, who maintains that the whole universe is animated by an active principle, the noblest seat of which is in the human soul; and, moreover, that the final end of old age is to train and enable us

To hear the mighty stream of Tendency Uttering, for elevation of our thought, with other matters as luminous and emphatic. The hostess at length breaks off the harangue by proposing that they should make a little excursion on the lake,—and they embark accordingly, and after navigating for some time along its shores, and drinking tea on a little island, land at last on a remote promontory, from which they see the sun go down,—and listen to a solemn and pious, but rather long, prayer from the Vicar. Then they walk back to the parsonage door, where the author and his friend propose to spend the evening,—but the Solitary prefers walking back in the moonlight to his own valley, after promising to take another ramble with them—

If time, with free consent, be yours to give,
And season favors—²

—And here the publication somewhat abruptly closes.

Our abstract of the story has been so extremely concise that it is more than usually necessary for us to lay some specimens of the work itself before our readers. Its grand staple, as we have already said, consists of a kind of mystical morality: and the chief characteristics of the style are that it is prolix, and very frequently unintelligible and though we are sensible that no great gratification is to be expected from the exhibition of those qualities, yet it is necessary to give our readers a taste of them, both to justify the sentence we have passed, and to satisfy them that it was really beyond our power to present them with any abstract or intelligible account of those long conversations which we have had so much occasion to notice in our brief sketch of its contents. We need give ourselves no trouble, however, to select passages for this purpose. Here is the first that presents itself to us on opening the volume, and if our readers can form the slightest guess at its meaning, we must give them credit for a sagacity to which we have no pretension.

But by the storms of circumstance unshaken,
And subject neither to eclipse or wane,
Duty exists,—immutably survive,
For our support, the measures and the forms,
Which an abstract Intelligence supplies, Whose kingdom is where Time and Space are
not

Of other converse, which mind, soul, and heart,
Do, with united urgency, require,
What more, that may not perish?

'Tis, by comparison, an easy task Earth to despise, but to converse with Heav'n, This is not easy—to relinquish all We have, or hope, of happiness and joy,— And stand in freedom loosen'd from this world,

I deem not arduous—but must needs confess That 'tis a thing impossible to frame Conceptions equal to the Soul's desires.²

This is a fair sample of that rapturous mysticism which eludes all comprehension, and fills the despairing reader with painful giddiness and terror. The following, which we meet with on the very next page, is in the same general strain, though the first part of it affords a good specimen of the author's talent for enveloping a plain and trite observation in all the mock majesty of solemn verbosity. A reader of plain understanding, we suspect, could hardly recognize the familiar remark that excessive grief for our departed friends is not very consistent with a firm belief in their immortal felicity, in the first twenty lines of the following passage. In the succeeding lines we do not ourselves pretend to recognize anything.

From this infirmity of mortal kind Sorrow proceeds, which else were not,—at least,

If grief be something hallow'd and ordain'd,
If, in proportion, it be just and meet,
Through this, 'tis able to maintain its hold,
In that excess which conscience disapproves For who could sink and settle to that point Of selfishness, so senseless who could be In framing estimates of loss and gain,
As long and perseveringly to mourn
For any object of his love, remov'd
From this unstable world, if he could fix
A satisfying view upon that state Of pure, imperishable blessedness, Which reason promises, and Holy Writ

Ensures to all believers!—Yet mistrust Is of such incapacity, methinks, No natural branch; despondency far less.
—And if there be whose tender frames have droop'd

Ev'n to the dust; apparently, through weight Of anguish unreliev'd, and lack of power
An agonizing sorrow to transmute; Infer not hence a hope from those withheld
When wanted most, a confidence impair'd So pitifully, that, having ceas'd to see With bodily eyes, they are borne down by love
Of what is lost, and perish through regret!
Oh! no, full oft the innocent Sufferer sees Too clearly, feels too vividly, and longs To realize the vision with intense And overconstant yearning—There—there lies The excess, by which the balance is destroy'd Too, too contractured are these walls of flesh, This vital warmth too cold, these visual orbs, Though inconceivably endow'd, too dim For any passion of the soul that leads To ecstasy! and, all the crooked paths Of time and change disclaiming, takes its course

Along the line of limitless desires.
I, speaking now from such disorder free,
Nor sleep, nor craving, but in settled peace,
I cannot doubt that they whom you deplore Are glorified."¹

If any farther specimen be wanted of the learned author's propensity to deal out the most familiar truths as the oracles of his own inspired understanding, the following wordy paraphrase of the ordinary remark that the best consolation in distress is to be found in the exercises of piety and the testimony of a good conscience, may be found on turning the leaf.

"What then remains!—To seek Those helps, for his occasions ever near,
Who lacks not will to use them; vows, renew'd
On the first motion of a holy thought!
Vigils of contemplation; praise; and pray'r, A stream, which, from the fountain of the
heart,

Issuing however feebly, nowhere flows Without access of unexpected strength.
But, above all, the victory is most sure For him who, seeking faith by virtue strives To yield entire submission to the law Of conscience; conscience reverenc'd and obey'd

As God's most intimate presence in the soul,
And his most perfect image in the world"²

There is no beauty, we think, it must be admitted, in these passages, and so little either of interest or curiosity in the incidents they disclose, that we can scarcely conceive that any man to whom they had actually occurred should take the trouble

to recount them to his wife and children by his idle fireside; but that man or child should think them worth writing down in blank verse and printing in magnificent quarto, we should certainly have supposed altogether impossible, had it not been for the ample proofs which Mr. Wordsworth has afforded to the contrary.

Sometimes their silliness is enhanced by a paltry attempt at effect and emphasis, as in the following account of that very touching and extraordinary occurrence of a lamb bleating among the mountains. The poet would actually persuade us that he thought the mountains themselves were bleating, and that nothing could be so grand or impressive. "List!" cries the old Pedlar, suddenly breaking off in the middle of one of his daintiest ravings—

—"List!—I heard, From yon huge breast of rock, a solemn bleat!

Sent forth as if it were the mountain's voice!
As if the visible mountain made the cry!

Again!"—The effect upon the soul was such As he express'd; for, from the mountain's
heart

The solemn bleat appear'd to come! There
was

No other—and the region all around Stood silent, empty of all shape of life

—It was a Lamb—left somewhere to itself!"

What we have now quoted will give the reader a notion of the taste and spirit in which this volume is composed: and yet if it had not contained something a good deal better, we do not know how we should have been justified in troubling him with any account of it. But the truth is that Mr.
Wordsworth, with all his perversities, is a person of great powers; and has frequently a force in his moral declamations, and a tenderness in his pathetic narratives, which neither his prolixity nor his affectation can altogether deprive of their effect. We shall venture to give some extracts from the simple tale of the Weaver's solitary cottage.³ Its heroine is the deserted wife, and its chief interest consists in the picture of her despairing despondence and anxiety after his disappearance. The Pedlar, recurring to the well to which he had directed his companion, observes,

—"As I stoop'd to drink,
Upon the slumy foot-stone I espied
The useless fragment of a wooden bowl, Green with the moss of years! a pensive sight
That mov'd my heart!—recalling former days

³ Book 4, 402-11.

⁴ In Book 1 (pp. 274 &.).

When I could never pass that road but she Who liv'd within these walls, at my approach, A daughter's welcome gave me; and I lov'd
 her
 As my own child! O sir! the good die first!
 And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust Burn to the socket."¹

—"By some especial care
 Her temper had been fram'd, as if to make A being—who by adding love to peace Might live on earth a life of happiness "²

The bliss and tranquillity of these prosperous years is well and copiously described;—but at last came sickness and want of employment,—and the effect on the kindhearted and industrious mechanic is strikingly delineated.

—"At his door he stood,
 And whistl'd many a snatch of merry tunes
 That had no mirth in them! or with his knife Carv'd uncouth figures on the heads of sticks—Then, not less idly, sought, through every nook
 In house or garden, any casual work Of use or ornament "³

"One while he would speak lightly of his babes,
 And with a cruel tongue at other times
 He toss'd them with a false unnat'ral joy,
 And 'twas a rueful thing to see the looks Of the poor innocent children."⁴

At last he steals from his cottage and enlists as a soldier, and when the benevolent Pedlar comes, in his rounds, in hope of a cheerful welcome, he meets with a scene of despair.

—"Having reach'd the door I knock'd,—and, when I enter'd with the hope
 Of usual greeting, Margaret look'd at me
 A little while, then turn'd her head away Speechless,—and sitting down upon a chair Wept bitterly! I wist not what to do, Or how to speak to her Poor wretch! at last She rose from off her seat, and then,—O sir!
 I cannot tell how she pronounced my name—
 With fervent love, and with a face of grief Unutterably helpless;"⁵

Hope, however, and native cheerfulness were not yet subdued; and her spirit still bore up against the pressure of this desolation.

—"Long we had not talk'd Ere we built up a pile of better thoughts,

And with a brighter eye she look'd around
 As if she had been shedding tears of joy.
 We parted.—'Twas the time of early spring;
 I left her busy with her garden tools,
 And well remember, o'er that fence she look'd,
 And, while I paced along the footway path, Called out, and sent a blessing after me,
 With tender cheerfulness, and with a voice That seem'd the very sound of happy thoughts "⁶

The gradual sinking of the spirit under the load of continued anxiety, and the destruction of all the finer springs of the soul by a course of unvarying sadness, are very feelingly represented in the sequel of this simple narrative.

—"I journey'd back this way Towards the wane of summer, when the wheat Was yellow, and the soft and bladed grass Springing afresh had o'er the hay-field spread Its tender verdure. At the door arriv'd, I found that she was absent In the shade,
 Where now we sit, I waited her return.
 Her cottage, then a cheerful object, wore Its customary look,—only, I thought,
 The honeysuckle, crowding round the porch, Hung down in heavier tufts, and that bright
 weed,
 The yellow stone-crop,⁷ suffer'd to take root Along the window's edge, profusely grew, Blinding the lower panes I turn'd aside
 And stroll'd into her garden. It appear'd
 To lag behind the season, and had lost Its pride of neatness "⁸

"The sun was sinking in the west; and now I sat with sad impatience From within Her solitary infant cried aloud;
 Then, like a blast that does away self-still'd
 The voice was silent."⁹

The desolate woman had now an air of still and listless, though patient, sorrow.

—"Evermore
 Her eyelids droop'd, her eyes were downward
 cast;
 And, when she at her table gave me food,
 She did not look at me! Her voice was low,
 Her body was subdu'd. In ev'ry act Pertaining to her house affairs, appear'd
 The careless stiltiness of a thinking mind Self-occupied, to which all outward things Are like an idle matter Still she sigh'd, But yet no motion of the breast was seen,
 No heaving of the heart. While by the fire
 We sat together, signs came on my ear, I know not how, and hardly whence they came."¹⁰

Ere on its bank the primrose flow'r Peep'd forth, to give an earnest of the spring,

No tidings of her husband; if he liv'd

Bespake a sleepy hand of negligence"—

—'Her infant babe

And sigh'd among its playthings!'"

Returning seasons only deepened this gloom, and confirmed this neglect Her child died, and she spent her weary days in roaming over the country, and repeating her fond and vain inquiries to every passer-by.

"Meantime her house by frost, and thaw, and rain,

Was sapp'd, and while she slept, the nightly

The story of the old Chaplain, though a little less lowly, is of the same mournful cast, and almost equally destitute of incidents,—for Mr. Wordsworth delineates only feelings—and all his adventures are of the heart The narrative which is given by the sufferer himself is, in our opinion, the most spirited and interesting part of the poem He begins thus, and addressing himself, after a long pause, to his ancient countryman and friend, the Pedlar—

"You never saw, your eyes did never look On the bright form of her whom once I lov'd!—

Her silver voice was heard upon the earth,
A sound unknown to you; else, honor'd friend,
Your heart had borne a pitiable share
Of what I suffer'd, when I wept that loss!
And suffer now, not seldom, from the thought That I remember—and can weep no more!"

The following account of his marriage and early felicity is written with great sweetness—a sweetness like that of Mas-singer, in his softer, more mellifluous passages.

—'This fair bride—

In the devotedness of youthful love, Preferring me to parents, and the choir Of gay companions, to the natal roof,
And all known places and familiar sights, (Beign'd with sadness gently weighing down Her trembling expectations, but no more Than did to her due honor, and to me Yielded, that day, a confidence sublime In what I had to build upon)—this bride, Young, modest, meek, and beautiful, I led To a low cottage in a sunny bay,
Where the salt sea innocuously breaks,
And the sea breeze as innocently breathes,
On Devon's leafy shores,—a shelter'd hold,
In a soft clime, encouraging the soil
To a luxuriant bounty!—As our steps Approach the embower'd abode, our chosen
seat,
See, rooted in the earth, its kindly bed,
The unendanger'd myrtle, deck'd with flowers," etc

—'Wild were our walks upon those lonely downs

* * * * *

Whence, unmolested wanderers, we beheld
The shining giver of the day diffuse
His brightness, o'er a tract of sea and land Gay as our spirits, free as our desires, As our enjoyments boundless—From these heights

We dropp'd at pleasure into sylvan combs, Where arbores of impenetrable shade,
And mossy seats detain'd us, side by side With hearts at ease, and knowledge in our hearts

'That all the grove and all the day was ours '"

There, seven years of unmolested happiness were blessed with two lovely children.

"And on these pillars rested, as on air, Our solitude '"

Suddenly a contagious malady swept off both the infants.

"Calm as a frozen lake when ruthless winds Blow fiercely, agitating earth and sky,
The mother now remain'd."

—'Yet, stealing slow, Dimness o'er this clear luminary crept Insensibly!—The immortal and divine Yielded to mortal reflux, her pure glory,
As from the pinnacle of worldly state Wretched ambition drops astounded, fell Into a gulf obscure of silent grief,
And keen heart-anguish—of itself asham'd, Yet obstinately cherishing itself

And, so consum'd, she melted from my arms!
And left me, on this earth, disconsolate."¹

The agony of mind into which the survivor was thrown is described with a powerful eloquence, as well as the doubts and distracting fears which the skeptical speculations of his careless days had raised in his spirit. There is something peculiarly grand and terrible to our feelings in the imagery of these three lines—

"By pain of heart, now check'd, and now impell'd, The intellectual power, through words and things, Went sounding on,—a dim and perilous way!"²

At last he is roused from his dejected mood by the glorious promises which seemed held out to human nature by the first dawn of the French Revolution,—and it indicates a fine perception of the secret springs of character and emotion, to choose a being so circumstanced as the most ardent votary of that far-spread enthusiasm.

"Thus was I reconverted to the world' Society became my glittering bride,
And airy hopes my children! * * * If busy men

In sober conclave met, to weave a web
Of amity, whose living threads should stretch Beyond the seas, and to the farthest pole, There did I sit assisting. If, with noise And acclamation, crowds in open air Express'd the tumult of their minds, my voice
There mingled, heard or not. The powers of song

I left not uninvok'd, and, in still groves, Where mild enthusiasts tun'd a pensive lay Of thanks and expectation, in accord With their belief, I sang Saturnian rule Return'd,—a progeny of golden years Permitted to descend, and bless mankind."³

On the disappearance of that bright vision, he was inclined to take part with the desperate party who still aimed at establishing universal regeneration, though by more questionable instruments than they had originally assumed. But the military despotism which ensued soon closed the scene against all such exertions; and, disgusted with men and Europe, he sought for shelter in the wilds of America. In the calm of the voyage, Memory and Conscience awoke him to a sense of his misery.

The vengeful Furies.¹ Beautiful regards Were turn'd on me—the face of her I lov'd!

Tender reproaches, insupportable!"²

5 His disappointment, and ultimate seclusion in England, have been already sufficiently detailed

Besides those more extended passages of interest or beauty, which we have quoted, and omitted to quote, there are scattered up and down the book, and in the midst of its most repulsive portions, a very great number of single lines and images, that sparkle like gems in the desert, and startle us by an intimation of the great poetic powers that lie buried in the rubbish that has been heaped around them. It is difficult to pick up these, after we have once passed them by; but we shall endeavor to light upon one or two. The beneficial effect of intervals of relaxation and pastime on youthful minds is finely expressed, we think, in a single line, when it is said to be—

The following image of the bursting forth of a mountain spring seems to us also to be conceived with great elegance and beauty

30 And a few steps may bring us to the spot, Where haply crown'd with flow'rets and green herbs,
The mountain Infant to the Sun comes forth, Like human life from darkness!"⁴

The ameliorating effects of song and music on the minds which most delight in them are likewise very poetically expressed.

—And when the stream
Which overflow'd the soul was pass'd away,
A consciousness remained that it had left, 40 Deposited upon the silent shore Of memory, images and precious thoughts,
That shall not die, and cannot be destroy'd.⁵

Nor is anything more elegant than the representation of the graceful tranquility occasionally put on by one of the author's favorites, who, though gay and airy, in general—

50 Was graceful, when it pleased him, smooth and still As the mute swan that floats adown the stream,
Or on the waters of th' unruffled lake Anchors her placid beauty. Not a leaf

More winningly reserv'd.¹

Nor are there wanting morsels of a sterner and more majestic beauty, as when, assuming the weightier diction of Cowper, he says, in language which the hearts of all readers of modern history must have responded—

—Earth is sick

And Heav'n is weary of the hollow words Which States and Kingdoms utter when they
speak

Of Truth and Justice.²

These examples, we perceive, are not very well chosen—but we have not leisure to improve the selection; and, such as they are, they may serve to give the reader a notion of the sort of merit which we meant to illustrate by their citation. When we look back to them, indeed, and to the other passages which we have now extracted, we feel half inclined to rescind the severe sentence which we passed on the work at the beginning; but when we look into the work itself, we perceive that it cannot be rescinded. Nobody can be more disposed to do justice to the great powers of Mr. Wordsworth than we are; and, from the first time that he came before us, down to the present moment, we have uniformly testified in their favor, and assigned indeed our high sense of their value as the chief ground of the bitterness with which we resented their perversion. That perversion, however, is now far more visible than their original dignity; and while we collect the fragments, it is impossible not to mourn over the ruins from which we are condemned to pick them. If any one should doubt of the existence of such a perversion, or be disposed to dispute about the instances we have hastily brought forward, we would just beg leave to refer him to the general plan and character of the poem now before us. Why should Mr. Wordsworth have made his hero a superannuated pedlar?
What but the most wretched affectation, or provoking perversity of taste, could induce any one to place his chosen advocate of wisdom and virtue in so absurd and fantastic a condition? Did Mr. Wordsworth really imagine that his favorite doctrines were likely to gain anything in point of effect or authority by being put into the mouth of a person accustomed to higgie about tape or brass sleeve-buttons? Or is it not plain that, independent of the ridicule and disgust which such a personification must excite in many of his readers, its adoption exposes his work throughout to the charge of revolting incongruity and utter disregard of probability or nature? For, after he has thus wilfully debased his moral teacher by a low occupation, is there one word that he puts into his mouth, or one sentiment of which he makes him the organ, that has the most remote reference to that occupation?

Is there anything in his learned, abstract and logical harangues that savors of the calling that is ascribed to him? Are any of their materials such as a pedlar could possibly have dealt in? Are the manners, the diction, the sentiments in any, the very smallest degree, accommodated to a person in that condition? or are they not eminently and conspicuously such as could not by possibility belong to it? A man who went about selling flannel and pocket-handkerchiefs in this lofty diction would soon frighten away all his customers, and would infallibly pass either for a madman or for some learned and affected gentleman, who, in a frolic, had taken up a character which he was peculiarly ill qualified for supporting.

The absurdity in this case, we think, is palpable and glaring, but it is exactly of the same nature with that which infects the whole substance of the work, a puerile ambition of singularity engrafted on an unlucky predilection for truisms, and an affected passion for simplicity and humble life, most awkwardly combined with a taste for mystical refinements, and all the gorgeousness of obscure phraseology. His taste for simplicity is evinced by sprinkling up and down his interminable declamations a few descriptions of baby-houses, and of old hats with wet brims; and his amiable partiality for humble life, by assuring us that a wordy rhetorician, who talks about Thebes, and allegorizes all the heathen mythology, was once a pedlar—and making him break in upon his magnificent orations with two or three awkward notices of something that he had seen when selling winter raiment about the country—or of the changes in the state of society, which had almost annihilated his former calling

From WORDSWORTH'S THE WHITE DOE OF BYLSTONE
1815 1815

This, we think, has the merit of being the very worst poem we ever saw imprinted in a quarto volume; and though it was scarcely to be expected, we confess that Mr. Wordsworth, with all his ambition, should so soon have attained to that distinction, the wonder may perhaps be diminished when we state that it seems to us to consist of a happy union of all the faults, without any of the beauties, which belong to his school of poetry. It is just such a work, in short, as some wicked enemy of that school might be supposed to have devised, on purpose to make it ridiculous; and when we first took it up we could not help suspecting that some ill-natured critic had actually taken this harsh method of instructing Mr. Wordsworth, by example, in the nature of those errors against which our precepts had been so often directed in vain. We had not gone far, however, till we felt intimately that nothing in the nature of a joke could be so insupportably dull; and that this must be the work of one who earnestly believed it to be a pattern of pathetic simplicity, and gave it out as such to the admiration of all intelligent readers. In this point of view the work may be regarded as curious at least, if not in some degree interesting; and, at all events, it must be instructive to be made aware of the excesses into which superior understandings may be betrayed, by long self-indulgence, and the strange extravagances into which they may run, when under the influence of that intoxication which is produced by unrestrained admiration of themselves. This poetical intoxication, indeed, to pursue the figure a little farther, seems capable of assuming as many forms as the vulgar one which arises from wine; and it appears to require as delicate a management to make a man a good poet by the help of the one as to make him a good companion by means of the other. In both cases, a little mistake as to the dose or the quality of the inspiring fluid may make him absolutely outrageous, or lull him over into the most profound stupidity, instead of brightening up the hidden stores of his genius, and truly we are concerned to say that Mr. Wordsworth seems hitherto to have been unlucky in the choice of his liquor—or of his bottle-holder. In some of his odes and ethic exhortations he was exposed to the public in a state of incoherent rapture and glorious delirium, to which we think we have seen a parallel among the humbler lovers of jollity. In the Lyrical Ballads he was exhibited, on the whole, in a vein of very pretty deliriation;¹ but in the poem before us he appears in a state of low and maudlin imbecility, which would not have misbecome Master Silence himself, in the close of a social day. Whether this unhappy result is to be ascribed to any adulteration of his Castalian cups,¹ or to the unlucky choice of his company over them, we cannot presume to say. It may be that he has dashed his Hippocrene with too large an infusion of lake water, or assisted its operation too exclusively by the study of the ancient historical ballads of “the north countrie”² That there are palpable imitations of the style and manner of those venerable compositions in the work before us is indeed undeniable, but it unfortunately happens that while the hobbling versification, the mean diction, and flat stupidity of these models are very exactly copied, and even improved upon, in this imitation, their rude energy, manly simplicity, and occasional felicity of expression have totally disappeared; and, instead of them, a large allowance of the author’s own metaphysical sensibility and mystical wordiness is forced into an unnatural combination with the borrowed beauties which have just been mentioned.

The story of the poem, though not capable of furnishing out matter for a quarto volume, might yet have made an interesting ballad, and, in the hands of Mr Scott or Lord Byron, would probably have supplied many images to be loved, and descriptions to be remembered. The incidents arise out of the short-lived Catholic insurrection of the Northern counties, in the reign of Elizabeth, which was supposed to be connected with the project of marrying the Queen of the Scots to the Duke of Norfolk; and terminated in the ruin of the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, by whom it was chiefly abetted. Among the victims of this rash enterprise was Richard Norton of Rylstone, who comes to the array with a splendid banner, at the head of eight tall sons, but against the will and advice of a ninth, who, though he refused to join the host, yet follows unarmed in its rear, out of anxiety for the fate of his family; and, when the father and his gallant progeny are made prisoners, and led to execution at York, recovers the fatal banner, and is slain by a party of the Queen’s horse near Bolton Priory, in which place he had been ordered to deposit it by the dying voice of his father. The stately halls and pleasant bowers of Rylstone are then wasted, and fall into desolation, while the heroic daughter, and only survivor of the house, is sheltered among its faithful retainers, and wanders about for many years in its neighborhood, accompanied by a beautiful white doe, which had formerly been a pet in the family, and continues, long after the death of this sad survivor, to repair every Sunday to the churchyard of Bolton Priory, and there to feed and wander among the graves, to the wonder and delight of the rustic congregation that came there to worship.

¹ That is, source of poetic inspiration. Castalia was a fountain on Mount Parnassus, sacred to Apollo and the Muses. Hippocrene was a similar fountain on Mount Helicon.

² The scene of many of the old ballads of England and Scotland is in “the north countrie, the traditional dwelling, place of fairies, demons, giants, etc.”

This, we think, is a pretty subject for a ballad, and, in the author's better day, might have made a lyrical one of considerable interest. Let us see, however, how he deals with it, since he has bethought him of publishing in quarto.

The First Canto merely contains the description of the doe coming into the churchyard on Sunday, and of the congregation wondering at her. She is described as being as white as a lily—or the moon—or a ship in the sunshine, and this is the style in which Mr. Wordsworth marvels and moralizes about her through ten quarto pages.

The Seventh and last Canto contains the history of the desolated Emily¹ and her faithful doe, but so discreetly and cautiously written, that we will engage that the most tender-hearted reader shall peruse it without the least risk of excessive emotion. The poor lady runs about indeed for some years in a very disconsolate way, in a worsted gown and flannel nightcap, but at last the old white doe finds her out, and takes again to following her—whereupon Mr. Wordsworth breaks out into this fine and natural rapture

Oh, moment ever blest! O pair!
Below'd of Heaven, Heaven's choicest care!
This was for you a precious greeting,— For both a bounteous, fruitful meeting Join'd are they, and the sylvan doe Can she depart? Can she forego
The lady, once her playful peer?
* * * * *

That day, the first of a reunion
Which was to teem with high communion,
That day of balmy April weather,
They tarried in the wood together.²

¹ Emily Norton, whose relatives had been killed in the uprising which they had promoted ² Canto 7, 115-88.

What follows is not quite so intelligible.

When Emily by morning light Went forth, the doe was there in sight
She shrunk:—with one frail shock of pain, Received and followed by a prayer,
Did she behold—saw once again,
Shun will she not, she feels, will bear,—
But wheresoever she look'd round
All now was trouble-haunted ground.³

It certainly is not easy to guess what was in the mind of the author when he penned these four last inconceivable lines, but we are willing to infer that the lady's loneliness was cheered by this mute associate; and that the doe, in return, found a certain comfort in the lady's company—

Communication, like the ray
Of a new morning, to the nature
And prospects of the inferior creature!⁴

In due time the poor lady dies, and is laid beside her mother, and the doe continues to haunt the places which they had frequented together, and especially to come and pasture every Sunday upon the fine grass in Bolton churchyard, the gate of which is never opened but on occasion of the weekly service—in consequence of all which, we are assured by Mr. Wordsworth, that she "is approved by earth and sky, in their benignity,"⁵ and moreover, that the old Priory itself takes her for a daughter of the Eternal Prime—which we have no doubt is a very great compliment, though we have not the good luck to know what it means.

And aye, methinks, this hoary pile, Subdued by outrage and decay,
Looks down upon her with a smile,
A gracious smile that seems to say,
"Thou, thou art not a child of Time, But daughter of the Eternal Prime!"⁶

CANTO THE THIRD
1818 1816

If the finest poetry be that which leaves the deepest impression on the minds of its readers—and this is not the worst test of its excellence—Lord Byron, we think, must be allowed to take precedence of all his distinguished contemporaries. He has not the variety of Scott, nor the delicacy of Campbell, nor the absolute truth of Crabbe, nor the polished sparkling of Moore; but in force of diction, and inextinguishable energy of sentiment, he clearly surpasses them all. "Words that breathe, and thoughts that burn," are not merely the ornaments, but the common staple of his poetry, and he is not inspired or impressive only in some happy passages, but through the whole body and tissue of his composition. It was an unavoidable condition, perhaps, of this higher excellence, that his scene should be narrow, and his persons few. To compass such ends as he had in view, it was necessary to reject all ordinary agents, and all trivial combinations. He could not possibly be amusing, or ingenious or playful; or hope to maintain the requisite pitch of interest by the recitation of sprightly adventures, or the opposition of common characters. To produce great effects, in short, he felt that it was necessary to deal only with the greater passions—with the exaltations of a daring fancy, and the errors of a lofty intellect—with the pride, the terrors, and the agonies of strong emotion—the fire and air alone of our human elements.²

In this respect, and in his general notion of the end and means of poetry, we have sometimes thought that his views fell more in with those of the Lake poets,³ than of any other existing party in the poetical commonwealth; and, in some of his later productions especially, it is impossible not to be struck with his occasional approaches to the style and manner of this class of writers. Lord Byron, however, it should be observed, like all other persons of a quick sense of beauty, and sure enough of their own originality to be in no fear of paltry imitations, is a great mimic of styles and manners, and a great borrower of external character. He and Scott, accordingly, are full of imitations of all the writers from whom they have ever derived gratification; and the two most original writers of the age might appear, to superficial observers, to be the most deeply indebted to their predecessors. In this particular instance, we have no fault to find with Lord Byron. For undoubtedly the finer passages of Wordsworth and Southey have in them wherewithal to lend an impulse to the utmost ambition of rival genius, and their diction and manner of writing is frequently both striking and original. But we must say that it would afford us still greater pleasure to find these tuneful gentlemen returning the compliment which Lord Byron has here paid to their talents, and forming themselves on the model rather of his imitations, than of their own originals. In those imitations they will find that, though he is sometimes abundantly mystical, he never, or at least very rarely, indulges in absolute nonsense, never takes his lofty flights upon mean or ridiculous occasions, and, above all, never dilutes his strong conceptions, and magnificent imaginations, with a flood of oppressive verbosity. On the contrary, he is, of all living writers, the most concise and condensed; and, we would fain hope, may go far, by his example, to redeem the great reproach of our modern literature—its intolerable prolixity and redundancy. In his nervous and manly lines, we find no elaborate amplification of common sentiments, no ostentatious polishing of pretty expressions, and we really think that the brilliant success which has rewarded his disdain of those paltry artifices, should put to shame forever that puling and self-admiring race, who can live through half a volume on the stock of a single thought, and expatiate over divers folio quarto pages with the details of one tedious description. In Lord Byron, on the contrary, we have a perpetual stream of thick-coming fancies,⁴ an eternal spring of fresh-blown images, which seem called into existence by the sudden flash of those glowing thoughts and overwhelming emotions that struggle for expression through the whole flow of his poetry, and impart to a diction that is often abrupt and irregular a force and a charm which frequently realize all that is said of inspiration.

With all these undoubted claims to our admiration, however, it is impossible to deny that the noble author before us has still something to learn, and a good deal to correct. He is frequently abrupt and careless, and sometimes obscure. There are marks, occasionally, of effort and straining after an emphasis which is generally spontaneous, and above all, there is far too great a monotony in the moral coloring of his pictures, and too much repetition of the same sentiments and maxims. He delights too exclusively in the delineation of a certain morbid exaltation of character and feeling, a sort of demoniacal sublimity, not without some traits of the ruined Archangel. He is haunted almost perpetually with the image of a being feeding and fed upon by violent passions, and the recollections of the catastrophes they have occasioned; and, though worn out by their past indulgence, unable to sustain the burden of an existence which they do not continue to animate:—full of pride, and revenge, and obduracy—disdaining life and death, and mankind and himself—and trampling, in his scorn, not only upon the falsehood and formality of polished life, but upon its tame virtues and slavish devotion; yet envying, by fits, the very beings he despises, and melting into mere softness and compassion, when the helplessness of childhood or the frailty of woman make an appeal to his generosity. Such is the person with whom we are called upon almost exclusively to sympathize in all the greater productions of this distinguished writer,—in Childe Harold—in The Corsair—in Lara—in The Siege of Corinth—in Parisina, and in most of the smaller pieces.

It is impossible to represent such a character better than Lord Byron has done in all these productions; or indeed to represent anything more terrible in its anger, or more attractive in its relenting. In point of effect, we readily admit that no one character can be more poetical or impressive, but it is really too much to find the scene perpetually filled by one character, not only in all the acts of each several drama, but in all the different dramas of the series. and, grand and impressive as it is, we feel at last that these very qualities make some relief more indispensable, and oppress the spirits of ordinary mortals with too deep an impression of awe and repulsion. There is too much guilt in short, and too much gloom, in the leading character; and though it be a fine thing to gaze, now and then, on stormy seas, and thunder-shaken mountains, we should prefer passing our days in sheltered valleys, and by the murmur of calmer waters.¹

We are aware that these metaphors may be turned against us, and that, without metaphor, it may be said that men do not pass their days in reading poetry, and that, as they may look into Lord Byron only about as often as they look abroad upon tempests, they have no more reason to complain of him for being grand and gloomy, than to complain of the same qualities in the glaciers and volcanoes which they go so far to visit. Painters, too, it may be said, have often gained great reputation by their representations of tigers and other ferocious animals, or of caverns and banditti; and poets should be allowed, without reproach, to indulge in analogous exercises. We are far from thinking that there is no weight in these considerations; and feel how plausibly it may be said that we have no better reason for a great part of our complaint than that an author, to whom we are already very greatly indebted, has chosen rather to please himself than us, in the use he makes of his talents.

This, no doubt, seems both unreasonable and ungrateful. But it is nevertheless true that a public benefactor becomes a debtor to the public, and is, in some degree, responsible for the employment of those gifts which seem to be conferred upon him, not merely for his own delight, but for the delight and improvement of his fellows through all generations. Independent of this, however, we think there is a reply to the analogy. A great living poet is not like a distant volcano, or an occasional tempest. He is a volcano in the heart of our land, and a cloud that hangs over our dwellings; and we have some reason to complain, if, instead of genial warmth and grateful shade, he voluntarily darkens and inflames our atmosphere with perpetual fiery explosions and pitchy vapors. Lord Byron's poetry, in short, is too attractive and too famous to lie dormant or inoperative, and, therefore, if it produce any painful or pernicious effects, there will be murmurs, and ought to be suggestions of alteration. Now, though an artist may draw fighting tigers and hungry lions in as lively or natural a way as he can, without giving any encouragement to human ferocity, or even much alarm to human fear, the case is somewhat different when a poet represents men with tiger-like dispositions; and yet more so when he exhausts the resources of his genius to make this terrible being interesting and attractive, and to represent all the lofty virtues as the natural allies of his ferocity. It is still worse when he proceeds to show that all these precious gifts of dauntless courage, strong affection, and high imagination, are not only akin to guilt, but the parents of misery; and that those only have any chance of tranquillity or happiness in this world whom it is the object of his poetry to make us shun and despise.

These, it appears to us, are not merely errors in taste, but perversions of morality; and, as a great poet is necessarily a moral teacher, and gives forth his ethical lessons, in general with far more effect and authority than any of his graver brethren, he is peculiarly liable to the censures reserved for those who turn the means of improvement to purposes of corruption.

It may no doubt be said that poetry in general tends less to the useful than the splendid qualities of our nature, that a character poetically good has long been distinguished from one that is morally so, and that, ever since the time of Achilles, our sympathies, on such occasions, have been chiefly engrossed by persons whose deportment is by no means exemplary, and who, in many points, approach to the temperament of Lord Byron's ideal hero. There is some truth in this suggestion also. But other poets, in the first place, do not allow their favorites so outrageous a monopoly of the glory and interest of the piece, and sin less, therefore, against the laws either of poetical or distributive justice. In the second place, their heroes are not, generally, either so bad or so good as Lord Byron's, and do not indeed very much exceed the standard of truth and nature, in either of the extremes. His, however, are as monstrous and unnatural as centaurs¹ and hippocgriffs,² and must ever figure in the eye of sober reason as so many bright and hateful impossibilities. But the most important distinction is, that the other poets who deal in peccant heroes, neither feel nor express that ardent affection for them which is visible in the whole of this author's delineations, but merely make use of them as necessary agents in the extraordinary adventures they have to detail, and persons whose mingled vices and virtues are requisite to bring about the catastrophe of their story. In Lord Byron, however, the interest of the story, where there happens to be one, which is not always the case, is uniformly postponed to that of the character itself, into which he enters so deeply, and with so extraordinary a fondness, that he generally continues to speak in its language, after it has been dismissed from the stage, and to inculcate, on his own authority, the same sentiments which had been previously recommended by its example. We do not consider it as unfair, therefore, to say that Lord Byron appears to us to be the zealous apostle of a certain fierce and magnificent misanthropy, which has already saddened his poetry with too deep a shade, and not only led to a great misapplication of great talents, but contributed to render popular some very false estimates of the constituents of human happiness and merit. It is irksome, however, to dwell upon observations so general, and we shall probably have better means of illustrating these remarks, if they are really well founded, when we come to speak of the particular publications by which they have now been suggested.

We had the good fortune, we believe, to be among the first who proclaimed the rising of a new luminary, on the appearance of Childe Harold on the poetical horizon, and we pursued his course with due attention through several of the constellations. If we have lately omitted to record his progress with the same accuracy, it is by no means because we have regarded it with more indifference, or supposed that it would be less interesting to the public, but because it was so extremely conspicuous as no longer to require the notices of an official observer. In general, we do not think it necessary, nor indeed quite fair, to oppress our readers with an account of works which are as well known to them as to ourselves, or with a repetition of sentiments in which all the world is agreed. Wherever a work, therefore, is very popular, and where the general opinion of its merits appears to be substantially right, we think ourselves at liberty to leave it out of our chronicle, without incurring the censure of neglect or inattention. A very rigorous application of this maxim might have saved our readers the trouble of reading what we now write—and, to confess the truth, we write it rather to gratify ourselves, than with the hope of giving them much information. At the same time, some short notice of the progress of such a writer ought, perhaps, to appear in his contemporary journals, as a tribute due to his eminence; and a zealous critic can scarcely set about examining the merits of any work, or the nature of its reception by the public, without speedily discovering very urgent cause for his admonitions, both to the author and his admirers

The most considerable of [the author's recent publications] is the Third Canto of Childe Harold, a work which has the disadvantage of all continuations, in admitting of little absolute novelty in the plan of the work or the cast of its character, and must, besides, remind all Lord Byron's readers

² Fabulous winged monsters, part man, part lion, and part eagle of the extraordinary effect produced by the sudden blazing forth of his genius, upon their first introduction to that title. In spite of all this, however, we are persuaded that this Third Part of the poem will not be pronounced inferior to either of the former, and, we think, will probably be ranked above them by those who have been most delighted with the whole. The great success of this singular production, indeed, has always appeared to us an extraordinary proof of its merits; for, with all its genius, it does not belong to a sort of poetry that rises easily to popularity. It has no story or action, very little variety of character, and a great deal of reasoning and reflection of no very attractive tenor. It is substantially a contemplative and ethical work, diversified with fine description, and adorned or overshadowed by the perpetual presence of one emphatic person, who is sometimes the author, and sometimes the object, of the reflections on which the interest is chiefly rested. It required, no doubt, great force of writing, and a decided tone of originality to recommend a performance of this sort so powerfully as this has been recommended to public notice and admiration, and those high characteristics belong perhaps still more eminently to the part that is now before us, than to any of the former. There is the same stern and lofty disdain of mankind, and their ordinary pursuits and enjoyments, with the same bright gaze on nature, and the same magic power of giving interest and effect to her delineations—but mixed up, we think, with deeper and more matured reflections, and a more intense sensibility to all that is grand or lovely in the external world. Harold, in short, is somewhat older since he last appeared upon the scene;¹ and while the vigor of his intellect has been confirmed, and his confidence in his own opinions increased, his mind has also become more sensitive; and his misanthropy, thus softened over by habits of calmer contemplation, appears less active and impatient, even although more deeply rooted than before. Undoubtedly the finest parts of the poem before us are those which thus embody the weight of his moral sentiments; or disclose the lofty sympathy which binds the despiser of Man to the glorious aspects of Nature. It is in these, we think, that the great attractions of the work consist, and the strength of the author's genius is seen. The narrative and mere description are of far inferior interest. With reference to the sentiments and opinions, however, which thus give its distinguishing character to the piece, we must say, that it seems no longer possible to ascribe them to the ideal person whose name it bears, or to any other than the author himself. Lord Byron, we think, has formerly complained of those who identified him with his hero, or supposed that Harold was but the expositor of his own feelings and opinions; and in noticing the former portions of the work, we thought it unbecoming to give any countenance to such a supposition. In this last part, however, it is really impracticable to distinguish them. Not only do the author and his hero travel and reflect together, but, in truth, we scarcely ever have any distinct intimation to which of them the sentiments so energetically expressed are to be ascribed; and in those which are unequivocally given as those of the noble author himself, there is the very same tone of misanthropy, sadness, and scorn, which we were formerly willing to regard as a part of the assumed costume of the Childe. We are far from supposing, indeed, that Lord Byron would disavow any of these sentiments, and though there are some which we must ever think it most unfortunate to entertain, and others which it appears improper to have published, the greater part are admirable, and cannot be perused without emotion, even by those to whom they may appear erroneous.

The poem opens with a burst of grand poetry and lofty and impetuous feeling, in which the author speaks undissimulatedly in his own person.

Once more upon the waters! Yet once more!
And the waves bound beneath me, as a steed That knows his rider. Welcome, to their roar!
Swift be their guidance, where'er it lead!
Though the strain'd mast should quiver as a reed,
And the rent canvas fluttering strew the gale,
Still must I on; for I am as a weed, Flung from the rock, on Ocean's foam, to sail Where'er the surge may sweep, the tempest's breath prevail.

[3]

In my youth's summer, did I sing of one,
The wand'ring outlaw of his own dark mind;
Again I seize the theme then but begun,
And bear it with me, as the rushing wind Bears the cloud onwards. In that tale I find The furrows of long thought, and dried-up
tears,
Which, ebbing, leave a sterile track behind,

O'er which all heavily the journeying years Plod the last sands of life,—where not a flower appears

[4]

Since my young days of passion—joy, or pain, Perchance my heart and harp have lost a string,

And both may jar. It may be that in vain
I would essay, as I have sung, to sing Yet, though a dreary strain, to this I cling;
So that it wean me from the weary dream
Of selfish grief or gladness!—so it fling Forgetfulness around me—it shall seem,
To me, though to none else, a not ungrateful
theme.

After a good deal more in the same strain,
he proceeds,

[7]

Yet must I think less wildly:—I have thought Too long and darkly, till my brain became In its own eddy boiling and o'erwrought, A whirling gulf of phantasy and flame
And thus, untaught in youth my heart to tame, My springs of life were poison'd—Something too much of this—but now 'tis
past,

And the spell closes with its silent seal!
Long absent Harold reappears at last.

The character and feelings of this un-joyous personage are then depicted with great force and fondness;—and at last he is placed upon the plain of Waterloo.

[18]

In "pride of place" where late the eagle flew,
Then tore with bloody talon the rent plain, Pierc'd by the shaft of branded nations through!

[19]

Fit retribution! Gaul may champ the bit
And foam in fetters;—but is earth more free?
Did nations combat to make one submit;
Or league to teach all kings true sovereignty?
What! shall reviving thralldom again be The patch'd-up idol of enlighten'd days?
Shall we, who struck the lion down, shall we Pay the wolf homage!—

[20]

If not, o'er one fall'n despot boast no more!

There can be no more remarkable proof of the greatness of Lord Byron's genius than the spirit and interest he has contrived to communicate to his picture of the often-drawn and difficult scene of the breaking up from Brussels before the great battle. It is a trite remark, that poets generally fail in the representation of great events, when the interest is recent, and the particulars are consequently clearly and commonly known: and the reason is obvious; for as it is the object of poetry to make us feel for distant or imaginary occurrences nearly as strongly as if they were present and real, it is plain that there is no scope for her enchantments where the impressive reality, with all its vast preponderance of interest, is already before us, and where the concern we take in the gazette¹ far outgoes any emotion that can be conjured up in us by the help of fine descriptions. It is natural, however, for the sensitive tribe of poets to mistake the common interest which they then share with the unpoetical part of their countrymen, for a vocation to versify, and so they proceed to pour out the lukewarm distillations of their phantasies upon the unchecked effervescence of public feeling! All our hards, accordingly, great and small, and of all sexes, ages, and professions, from Scott and Southey down to hundreds without names or additions,² have ventured upon this theme—and failed in the management of it! And while they yielded to the patriotic impulse, as if they had all caught the inspiring summons—

Let those rhyme now who never rhym'd before,
And those who always rhyme, rhyme now the
more—

The result has been that scarcely a line to be remembered had been produced on a subject which probably was thought, of itself, a secure passport to immortality. It required some courage to venture on a theme beset with so many dangers, and deformed with the wrecks of so many former adventurers;—and a theme, too, which, in its general conception, appeared alien to the prevailing tone of Lord Byron's poetry.
See, however, with what easy strength he enters upon it, and with how much grace he gradually finds his way back to his own peculiar vein of sentiment and diction.

Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes look'd love to eyes which spake

And all went merry as a marriage bell; But hush! hark! a deep sound strikes like a rising knell!

[24]

Ah! then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears, and tremblings of distress,

And cheeks all pale, which but an hour ago Blush'd at the praise of their own loveliness;
And there were sudden partings; such as press
The life from out young hearts; and choking sighs

Which ne'er might be repeated:—who could guess

If ever more should meet those mutual eyes, Since upon nights so sweet such awful morn could rise!

[25]

And there was mounting in hot haste: the
steed,

The must'ring squadron, and the clatt'ring
car,

Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war,
And the deep thunder, peal on peal afar;
And near, the beat of the alarming drum Rous'd up the soldier ere the morning star,

[27]

And Ardennes waves above them her green
leaves,

Dewy with Nature's teardrops, as they pass!
Grieving, if aught inanimate e'er grieves,
Over the unreturning brave,—alas!

Ere evening to be trodden like the grass Which now beneath them, but above shall grow

In its next verdure! when this fiery mass
Of living valor, rolling on the foe

And burning with high hope, shall fall and moulder cold and low.

After some brief commemoration of the worth and valor that fell in that bloody field, the author turns to the many hopeless mourners that survive to lament their extinction; the many broken-hearted families, whose incurable sorrow is enhanced by the national exultation that still points, with importunate joy, to the scene of their destruction. There is a richness and energy in the following passage which is peculiar to Lord Byron, among all modern poets.— a throng of glowing images, poured forth at once, with a facility and profusion which must appear mere wastefulness to more economical writers, and a certain negligence and harshness of diction, which can belong only to an author who is oppressed with the exuberance and rapidity of his conceptions.

[32]

10 They mourn, but smile at length; and, smiling, mourn!

The tree will wither long before it fall;
The hull drives on, though mast and sail be torn!

The roof-tree sings, but moulders on the hall 15 in massy hoariness; the ruin'd wall Stand when its wind-worn battlements are
gone;

The bars survive the captive they enthrall,
The day drags through, though storms keep out the sun;

20 And thus the heart will break, yet brokenly live on:

[33]

Even as a broken mirror, which the glass In every fragment multiplies; and makes 25 A thousand images of one that was,

The same, and still the more, the more it breaks;

And thus the heart will do which not forsakes,
Living in shatter'd guise, and still, and cold,
And bloodless, with its sleepless sorrow aches, 30 Yet withers on till all without is old, Showing no visible sign,—for such things are untold.

There is next an apostrophe to Napoleon, graduating into a series of general reflections, expressed with infinite beauty and earnestness, and illustrated by another cluster of magical images,—but breathing the very essence of misanthropical disdain, and embodying opinions which we conceive not to be less erroneous than revolting. After noticing the strange combinations of grandeur and littleness which seemed to form the character of that greatest of all captains and conquerors, the author proceeds,

[39]

Yet well thy soul hath brook'd the turning tide

With that untaught innate philosophy,
Which, be it wisdom, coldness, or deep pride,
Is gall and wormwood to an enemy.

When the whole host of hatred stood hard by,
To watch and mock thee shrinking, thou hast
smil'd

With a sedate and all-enduring eye;—
When fortune fled her spoil'd and favorite child,

He stood unbow'd beneath the ills upon him pild.

[40]

Sager than in thy fortunes: For in them Ambition steel'd thee on too far to show That just habitual scorn which could condemn Men and their thoughts. 'Twas wise to feel;
not so
To wear it ever on thy lip and brow,
And spurn the instruments thou wert to use Till they were turn'd unto thine overthrow:
'Tis but a worthless world to win or lose!— So hath it prov'd to thee, and all such lot who choose.

[42]

But quiet to quick bosoms is a hell,
And there hath been thy bane! There is a fire And motion of the soul which will not dwell
In its own narrow being, but aspire Beyond the fitting medium of desire;
And, but once kindled, quenchless evermore, Preys upon high adventure; nor can tire
Of aught but rest; a fever at the core,
Fatal to him who bears, to all who ever bore.

[43]

This makes the madmen, who have made men
mad
By their contagion; conquerors and kings, Founders of sects and systems,—to whom add Sophists, bards, statemen, all unquiet things, Which stir too strongly the soul's secret
springs,
And are themselves the fools to those they fool;
Envi'd, yet how unenviable! What stings Are theirs! One breast laid open were a school
Which would unteach mankind the lust to shine or rule;

[44]

Their breath is agitation; and their life,
A storm whereupon they ride, to sink at last;
And yet so nurs'd and bigoted to strife,
That should their days, surviving perils past, Melt to calm twilight, they feel overcast
With sorrow and supineness, and so die!
Even as a flame unfed, which runs to waste With its own flickering; or a sword laid by Which eats into itself, and rusts ingloriously.

[45]

He who ascends to mountain-tops, shall find The loftiest peaks most wrapped in clouds and
snow;
He who surpasses or subdues mankind,
Must look down on the hate of those below.
Though high above the sun of glory glow,
And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
Round him are icy rocks; and loudly blow Contending tempests on his naked head, And thus reward the toils which to those summits led.

This is splendidly written, no doubt—but we trust it is not true; and as it is delivered with much more than poetical earnestness, and recurs, indeed, in other forms in various parts of the volume, we must really be allowed to enter our dissent somewhat at large. With regard to conquerors, we wish with all our hearts that this were as the noble author represents it:

but we greatly fear they are neither half so unhappy, nor half so much hated as they should be. On the contrary, it seems plain enough that they are very commonly idolized and admired, even by those on whom they trample; and we suspect, moreover, that in general they actually pass their time rather agreeably, and derive considerable satisfaction from the ruin and desolation of the world. From Macedonia's madman¹ to the Swede²—from Nimrod to Bonaparte, the hunters of men have pursued their sport with as much gaiety, and as little remorse, as the hunters of other animals—and have lived as cheerily in their days of action, and as comfortably in their repose, as the followers of better pursuits.
For this, and for the fame which they have generally enjoyed, they are obviously indebted to the great interests connected with their employment, and the mutual excitement which belongs to its hopes and hazards. It would be strange, therefore, if the other active, but more innocent spirits, whom Lord Byron has here placed in the same predicament, and who share all their sources of enjoyment, without the guilt and the hardness which they cannot fail of contracting, should be more miserable or more unfriended than those splendid curses of their kind—And it would be passing strange, and pitiful,³ if the most precious gifts of Providence should produce only unhappiness, and mankind regard with hostility their greatest benefactors.

We do not believe in any such prodigies.
Great vanity and ambition may indeed lead to feverish and restless efforts—to jeal-ousies, to hate, and to mortification—but these are only their effects when united to inferior abilities. It is not those, in short, who actually surpass mankind, that are unhappy; but those who struggle in vain to surpass them: and this moody temper, which eats into itself from within, and provokes fair and unfair opposition from without, is generally the result of pretensions which outgo the merits by which they are supported—and disappointments, that may be clearly traced, not to the excess of genius, but its defect.

It will be found, we believe, accordingly, that the master spirits of their age have always escaped the unhappiness which is here supposed to be the inevitable lot of extraordinary talents; and that this strange tax upon genius has only been levied from those who held the secondary shares of it. Men of truly great powers of mind have generally been cheerful, social, and indulgent, while a tendency to sentimental whining, or fierce intolerance, may be ranked among the surest symptoms of little souls and inferior intellects. In the whole list of our English poets, we can only remember Shenstone and Savage—two, certainly, of the lowest—who were querulous and discontented. Cowley, indeed, used to call himself melancholy;—but he was not in earnest; and, at any rate, was full of conceits and affectations; and has nothing to make us proud of him. Shakespeare, the greatest of them all, was evidently of a free and joyous temperament;—and so was Chaucer, their common master. The same disposition appears to have predominated in Fletcher, Jonson, and their great contemporaries. The genius of Milton partook something of the austerity of the party to which he belonged, and of the controversies in which he was involved; but even when fallen on evil days and evil tongues,¹ his spirit seems to have retained its serenity as well as its dignity; and in his private life, as well as in his poetry, the majesty of a high character is tempered with great sweetness, genial indulgences, and practical wisdom. In the succeeding age our poets were but too gay; and though we forbear to speak of living authors, we know enough of them to speak with confidence, that to be miserable or to be hated is not now, any more than heretofore, the common lot of those who excel.

If this, however, be the case with poets, confessedly the most irritable and fantastic of all men of genius—and of poets, too, bred and born in the gloomy climate of England, it is not likely that those who have surpassed their fellows in other ways, or in other regions, have been more distinguished for unhappiness. Were Socrates and Plato, the greatest philosophers of antiquity, remarkable for unsocial or gloomy tempers?—Was Bacon, the greatest in modern times?—Was Sir Thomas More—or

Erasmus—or Hume—or Voltaire?—Was Newton—or Fenelon?—Was Francis I., or Henry IV., the paragon of kings and conquerors?—Was Fox, the most ardent, and, in the vulgar sense, the least successful of statesmen? These, and men like these, are undoubtedly the lights and the boast of the world. Yet there was no alloy of misanthropy or gloom in their genius. They did not disdain the men they had surpassed, and neither feared nor experienced then hostility. Some detractors they might have, from envy or misapprehension; but, beyond all doubt, the prevailing sentiments in respect to them have always been those of gratitude and admiration, and the error of public judgment, where it has erred, has much oftener been to overrate than to undervalue the merits of those who had claims on their good opinion. On the whole, we are far from thinking that eminent men are actually happier than those who glide through life in peaceful obscurity: but it is their eminence, and the consequences of it, rather than the mental superiority by which it is obtained, that interferes with their enjoyment. Distinction, however won, usually leads to a passion for more distinction: and is apt to engage us in laborious efforts and anxious undertakings and those, even when successful, seldom repay, in our judgment, at least, the ease, the leisure, and tranquillity, of which they require the sacrifice: but it really surpasses our imagination to conceive that the very highest degrees of intellectual vigor, or fancy, or sensibility, should of themselves be productive either of unhappiness or general dislike.

In passing Ferney and Lausanne, there is a fine account of Voltaire and Gibbon;¹ but we have room for but one more extract, and must take it from the characteristic reflections with which the piece is concluded. These, like most of the preceding, may be thought to savor too much of egotism; but this is of the essence of such poetry, and if Lord Byron had only been happier, or even in better humor with the world, we should have been delighted with the confidence he has here reposed in his readers—as it is, it sounds too like the last disdainful address of a man who is about to quit a world which has ceased to have any attractions—like the resolute speech of Pierre—

For this vile world and I have long been jangling,
And cannot part on better terms than now.—1

The reckoning, however, is steadily and sternly made, and though he does not spare himself, we must say that the world comes off much the worst in the comparison. The passage is very singular, and written with much force and dignity.

[111]

Thus far I have proceeded in a theme Renew'd with no kind auspices.—To feel We are not what we might have been, and to deem

We are not what we should be;—and to steel
The heart against itself; and to conceal,
With a proud caution, love, or hate, or aught,—

Passion or feeling, purpose, grief or zeal,—
Which is the tyrant spirit of our thought,
Is a stern task of soul!—No matter!—it is taught

[113]

I have not lov'd the world—nor the world me!
I have not flatter'd its rank breath, nor bow'd
To its idolatries a patient knee,— Nor cou'd my cheek to smiles,—nor cried aloud

In worship of an echo In the crowd
They could not deem me one of such; I stood Among them, but not of them, etc.

[114]

I have not lov'd the world, nor the world me'
But let us part fair foes, I do believe, Though I have found them not, that there may be

Words which are things,—hopes which will not deceive

And virtues which are merciful, nor weave Snarers for the failing! I would also deem O'er others' griefs that some sincerely grieve;
That two or one, are almost what they seem,— That goodness is no name, and happiness no dream.

The closing stanzas of the poem are extremely beautiful,—but we are immovable in the resolution that no statement of ours shall ever give additional publicity to the subjects of which they treat—

JOHN WILSON CROKER (1780-1857)

ENDYMION A POETIC ROMANCE

BY JOHN KEATS
1818 1818

Reviewers have been sometimes accused of not reading the works which they affected to criticize. On the present occasion we

² Byron's family troubles

³ For text of Endymion, see pp 767 ff shall anticipate the author's complaint, and honestly confess that we have not read his work. Not that we have been wanting in our duty—far from it; indeed, we have made efforts almost as superhuman as the story itself appears to be, to get through it; but with the fullest stretch of our perseverance, we are forced to confess that we have not been able to struggle beyond the first of the four books of which this "Poetic Romance" consists. We should extremely lament this want of energy, or whatever it may be, on our parts, were it not for one consolation—namely, that we are no better acquainted with the meaning of the book through which we have so painfully toiled, than we are with that of the three which we have not looked into

It is not that Mr. Keats (if that be his real name, for we almost doubt that any man in his senses would put his real name to such a rhapsody), it is not, we say, that the author has not powers of language, rays of fancy, and gleams of genius—he has all these; but he is unhappily a disciple of the new school of what has been somewhere called Cockney poetry,¹ which may be defined to consist of the most incongruous ideas in the most uncouth language

Of this school, Mr. Leigh Hunt, as we observed in a former Number,² aspires to be the hierophant. Our readers will recollect the pleasant recipes for harmonious and sublime poetry which he gave us in his Preface to Rimini,³ and the still more facetious instances of his harmony and sublimity in the verses themselves, and they will recollect above all the contempt of Pope, Johnson, and such poetasters and pseudo-critics, which so forcibly contrasted itself with Mr Leigh Hunt's self-complacent approbation of —all the things itself had wrote,

Of special merit though of little note

This author is a copyist of Mr Hunt; but he is more unintelligible, almost as rugged, twice as diffuse, and ten times more tiresome and absurd than his prototype, who, though he impudently presumed to seat himself in the chair of criticism, and to measure his own poetry by his own standard, yet generally had a meaning. But Mr Keats had advanced no dogmas which he was bound to support by examples; his nonsense, therefore, is quite gratuitous; he writes it for its own sake; and, being bitten by Mr. Leigh Hunt's insane criticism, more than rivals the insanity of his poetry.

¹ A nickname applied by Lockhart and other English critics to the poetry of Leigh Hunt, Shelley, Keats, and others. See Blackwood Magazine, Oct and Nov. 1817 (Vol 2, 38-41, 194-201) July and Aug. 1818 (Vol 3, 453-56, 519-24)

Mr. Keats's Preface hints that his poem was produced under peculiar circumstances.¹

"Knowing within myself (he says) the manner in which this poem has been produced, it is not without a feeling of regret that I make it public.—What manner I mean, will be quite clear to the reader, who must soon perceive great inexperience, immaturity, and every error denoting a feverish attempt, rather than a deed accomplished."—Preface, p. vii.

We humbly beg his pardon, but this does not appear to us to be quite so clear—we really do not know what he means—but the next passage is more intelligible.

"The two first books, and indeed the two last, I feel sensible are not of such completion: as to warrant their passing the press."—Preface, p. vii.

Thus "the two first books" are, even in his own judgment, unfit to appear, and "the two last" are, it seems, in the same condition—and as two and two make four, and as that is the whole number of books, we have a clear and, we believe, a very just estimate of the entire work.

Mr. Keats, however, deprecates criticism on this "immature and feverish work" in terms which are themselves sufficiently feverish; and we confess that we should have abstained from inflicting upon him any of the tortures of the "fierce hell" of criticism, which terrify his imagination, if he had not begged to be spared in order that he might write more; if he had not observed in him a certain degree of talent which deserves to be put in the right way, or which, at least, ought to be warned of the wrong; and if, finally, he had not told us that he is of an age and temper which imperiously require mental discipline.

Of the story we have been able to make out but little; it seems to be mythological, and probably relates to the loves of Diana and Endymion; but of this, as the scope of the work has altogether escaped us, we cannot speak with any degree of certainty; and must therefore content ourselves with giving some instances of its diction and versification; and here again we are perplexed and puzzled. At first it appeared to us that

² perfection

Mr. Keats had been amusing himself and wearying his readers with an immeasurable game at bouts-rimés;¹ but, if we recollect rightly, it is an indispensable condition at this play, that the rhymes when filled up shall have a meaning; and our author, as we have already hinted, has no meaning. He seems to us to write a line at random, and then he follows not the thought excited by this line, but that suggested by the rhyme with which it concludes. There is hardly a complete couplet inclosing a complete idea in the whole book.² He wanders from one subject to another, from the association, not of ideas but of sounds, and the work is composed of hemistichs³ which, it is quite evident, have forced themselves upon the author by the mere force of the catchwords on which they turn.

We shall select, not as the most striking instance, but as that least liable to suspicion, a passage from the opening of the poem.⁴

—Such the sun, the moon, Trees old and young, sprouting a shady boon
For simple sheep; and such are daffodils
With the green world they live in; and clear rills
That for themselves a cooling covert make
'Gainst the hot season, the mid-forest brake,⁵ Rich with a sprinkling of fair musk-rose
blooms;
And such, too, is the grandeur of the dooms
We have imagined for the mighty dead; etc., etc. —[ll 13-21]

Here it is clear that the word, and not the idea, moon produces the simple sheep and their shady boon, and that "the doom" of the mighty dead" would never have intruded themselves but for the "fair musk-rose blooms."

Again.

For 'twas the morn: Apollo's upward fire
Made every eastern cloud a silvery pyre
Of brightness so unsullied, that therein
A melancholy spirit well might win
Oblivion, and melt out his essence fine
Into the winds: rain-scented eglantine
Gave temperate sweets to the well-wooling sun;
The lark was lost in him; cold springs had run
To warm their chilliest bubbles in the grass; Man's voice was on the mountains; and the
mass
Of nature's lives and wonders puls'd tenfold,
To feel this sun-rise and its glories old.

—[ll 95-106]

¹ rhiming words proposed to fill out verses

² The 18th century couplet usually expressed a complete thought.

³ incomplete lines

⁴ All of the quotations which follow are from Book 1 (pp. 767 ff.).

⁵ thicket

Here Apollo's fire produces a pyre, a silvery pyre of clouds, wherem a spirit might win oblivion and melt his essence fine, and scented eglantins gives sweets to the sun, and cold springs had run into the grass, and then the pulse of the mass pulsed tenfold to feel the glories old of the new-born day, etc.

One example more.

Be still the unimaginable lodge
For solitary thinkings, such as dodge Conception to the very bourns of heaven,
Then leave the naked brain: be still the leaven,
That spreading in this dull and clodded earth Gives it a touch ethereal—a new birth.

[IL 293-298]

Lodge, dodge—heaven, leaven—earth, birth; such, in six words, is the sum and substance of six lines.

We come now to the author's taste in versification. He cannot indeed write a sentence, but perhaps he may be able to spin a line. Let us see. The following are specimens of his prosodial notions of our English heroic metre.

Dear as the temple's self, so does the moon.
The passion poesy, glories infinite—[IL 28, 29]
So plenteously all weed-hidden roots.—[1 65]
Of some strange history, potent to send —[1 324]

Before the deep intoxication.—[1 502]
Her scarf into a fluttering pavilion.—[1. 628]
The stubborn canvas for my voyage prepared
—[1. 772]

"Endymion! the cave is secreter
Than the isle of Delos Echo hence shall stir
No sighs but sigh-warm kisses, or light noise Of thy combing hand, the while it travelling cloys
And trembles through my labyrinthine hair"
—[IL 965-969]

By this time our readers must be pretty well satisfied as to the meaning of his sentences and the structure of his lines. We now present them with some of the new words with which, in imitation of Mr. Leigh Hunt, he adorns our language.

We are told that "turtles passion their voices" [1. 248]; that an "arbor was nested" [1. 431]; and a lady's locks "gordian'd up" [1. 614]; and to supply the place of the nouns thus verbalized, Mr. Keats, with great fecundity, spawns new ones; such as "men-slugs and human serpentry" [1. 821]; the honey-feel of bliss" [1. 903]; "wives prepare needments" [1. 208]—and so forth.

Then he has formed new verbs by the process of cutting off their natural tails, the adverbs, and affixing them to their foreheads; thus, "the wine out-sparkled" [1. 154], the "multitude up-followed" [1. 164], and "night up-took" [1. 561]. "The wind up-blows" [1. 627]; and the "hours are down-sunken" [1. 708].

But if he sinks some adverbs in the verbs, he compensates the language with adverbs and adjectives which he separates from the parent stock. Thus, a lady "whispers pantingly and close" [1. 407], makes "hushing signs" [1. 409], and steers her skiff into a "rippy cove" [1. 430]; a shower falls "refreshfully" [1. 898]; and a vulture has a "spreaded tail" [1. 867].

But enough of Mr. Leigh Hunt and his simple neophyte. If any one should be bold enough to purchase this "Poetic Romance," and so much more patient than ourselves as to get beyond the first book, and so much more fortunate as to find a meaning, we entreat him to make us acquainted with his success; we shall then return to the task which we now abandon in despair, and endeavor to make all due amends to Mr. Keats and to our readers.

CHARLES LAMB (1775-1834)

THE MIDNIGHT WIND

1794 1796

O! I could laugh to hear the midnight
wind,
That, rushing on its way with careless
sweep,
Scatters the ocean waves And I could weep
Like to a child For now to my raised mind
On wings of winds comes wild-eyed Phantasy.

And her rude visions give severe delight.
O winged bark! how swift along the night Pass'd thy proud keel! nor shall I let go
by

Lightly of that drear hour the memory,
When wet and chilly on thy deck I stood, Unbonneted,¹ and gazed upon the flood, Even till it seemed a pleasant thing to die,—

To be resolv'd into the elemental wave, Or take my portion with the winds that rave.

WAS IT SOME SWEET DEVICE OF FAERY

1794 1797

Was it some sweet device of Faery
That mocked my steps with many a lonely glade,

And fancied wanderings with a fair-hair'd maid?¹

Have these things been? or what rare witchery,

⁵ Impregning with delights the charmed air, Enlighted up the semblance of a smile In those fine eyes? methought they spake the while

Soft soothing things, which might enforce
Despair

To drop the murdering knife, and let go by ¹⁰ His foul resolve. And does the lonely glade

Still court the footsteps of the fair-hair'd
maid?

Still in her locks the gales of summer sigh?
While I forlorn do wander reckless where.
And 'mid my wanderings meet no Anna

IF FROM MY LIPS SOME ANGRY ACCENTS FELL
1795 1797

If from my lips some angry accents fell, Peevish complaint, or harsh reproof un-
kind,

'Twas but the error of a sickly mind And troubled thoughts, clouding the purer
well,

⁵ And waters clear, of Reason, and for me Let this my verse the poor atonement be—My verse, which thou to praise wert e'er inclined

Too highly, and with a partial eye to see

No blemish Thou to me didst ever show ¹⁰ Kindest affection; and would oft-times lend An ear to the desponding love-sick lay, Weeping my sorrows with me, who repay
But ill the mighty debt of love I owe, Mary, to thee, my sister and my friend.

CHILDHOOD

1796 1797

In my poor mind it is most sweet to muse
Upon the days gone by, to act in thought Past seasons o'er, and be again a child,
To sit in fancy on the turf-clad slope,

⁵ Down which the child would roll; to pluck gay flowers,
Make posies in the sun, which the child's
hand

(Childhood offended soon, soon reconciled)

Would throw away, and straight take up
again,

Then fling them to the winds, and o'er the lawn

THE OLD FAMILIAR FACES
1798 1798

Where are they gone, the old familiar faces?

I had a mother, but she died, and left me,
Died prematurely in a day of horrors¹—
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

⁵ I have had playmates, I have had companions,
In my days of childhood, in my joyful school-days—
All, all are gone, the old familiar faces.

I have been laughing, I have been carous-
ing,
Drinking late, sitting late, with my bosom cronies—

¹⁰ All, all are gone, the old familiar faces

I loved a love once,² fairest among women.

'Closed are her doors on me, I must not see her—

All, all are gone, the old familiar faces

I have a friend,³ a kinder friend has no man.

¹⁵ Like an ingrate, I left my friend abruptly.
Left him, to muse on the old familiar faces

Ghost-like, I paced round the haunts of my childhood

Earth seemed a desert I was bound to traverse,

Seeking to find the old familiar faces

²⁰ Friend of my bosom,⁴ thou more than a brother!

Why wert not thou born in my father's dwelling?

So might we talk of the old familiar faces

For some they have died, and some they have left me,

And some are taken from me, all are departed;

HESTER¹
1803 1818

When maidens such as Hester die,
Their place ye may not well supply, Though ye among a thousand try,
With vain endeavor.

5 A month or more hath she been dead, Yet cannot I by force be led To think upon the wormy bed,
And her together.

A springy motion in her gait, 10 A rising step, did indicate Of pride and joy no common rate,
That flush'd her spirit.

I know not by what name beside I shall it call:—if 'twas not pride, 15 It was a joy to that allied,
She did inherit.

Her parents held the Quaker rule,
Which doth the human feeling cool,
But she was train'd in Nature's school, 20 Nature had blest her.

A waking eye, a prying mind,
A heart that stirs, is hard to bind,
A hawk's keen sight ye cannot blind,
Yet could not Hester.

25 My sprightly neighbor, gone before
To that unknown and silent shore, Shall we not meet, as heretofore,
Some summer morning,

When from thy cheerful eyes a ray 30 Hath struck a bliss upon the day,
A bliss that would not go away,
A sweet forewarning?

THE THREE GRAVES
1820

Close by the ever-burning brimstone beds Where Bedloe, Oates, and Judas hide their heads,

I saw great Satan like a sexton stand With his intolerable spade in hand,

5 Digging three graves Of coffin-shape
they were,

For those who, coffinless, must enter there With unblest rites. The shrouds were of that cloth

Which Clotho weaveth in her blackest wrath.

The dismal tint oppress'd the eye, that dwelt

10 Upon it long, like darkness to be felt The pillows to those baleful beds were loads,

Lamb had fallen in love in 1800. She died in 1803.

Large, living, livid, melancholy loads, Whose softness shock'd Worms of all monstrous size Crawl'd round, and one, upcoil'd, which never dies.

15 A doleful bell, maulcating despair,
Was always ringing in the heavy air.
And all about the detestable pit Strange headless ghosts, and quarter'd forms, did flit;
Rivers of blood, from dripping traitors spilt,

20 By treachery stung from poverty to guilt I ask'd the fiend for whom these rites were meant.

"These graves," quoth he, "when life's brief oil is spent,
When the dark night comes, and they're sinking bedwards,
I mean for Castles, Oliver, and Edwards."

THE GIPSY'S MALISON
1829

"Suck, baby, suck, mother's love grows by giving,

Drain the sweet founts that only thrive by wasting;

Black manhood comes, when riotous guilty living

Hands thee the cup that shall be death in tasting.

5 "Kiss, baby, kiss; mother's lips shine by kisses;

Choke the warm breath that else would fall in blessings

Black manhood comes, when turbulent guilty blisses

Tend thee the kiss that poisons 'mid caressings.

"Hang, baby, hang; mother's love loves such forces,

10 Strain the fond neck that bends still to thy clinging."

Black manhood comes, when violent lawless courses

Leave thee a spectacle in rude air swinging."

So sang a wither'd Beldam energetical.
And bann'd the ungiving door with lips prophetical

ON AN INFANT DYING AS SOON AS BORN¹

1827 1829

I saw where in the shroud did lurk
A curious frame of Nature's work

¹ This poem was inspired by the death of Thomas Hood's first child

A floweret crushed in the bud,
 A nameless piece of Babyhood, 5 Was in her cradle-coffin lying;
 Extinct, with scarce the sense of dying, So soon to exchange the imprisoning womb
 For darker closets of the tomb!
 She did but ope an eye, and put 10 A clear beam forth, then straight up shut

For the long dark ne'er more to see Through glasses of mortality.
 Riddle of destiny, who can show What thy short visit meant, or know 15 What thy errand here below?
 Shall we say, that Nature blind Checked her hand, and changed her mind, Just when she had exactly wrought
 A finished pattern without fault?
 20 Could she flag, or could she tire,
 Or lacked she the Promethean fire?
 (With her nine moons' long workings sickened)
 That should thy little limbs have quickened?

Limbs so firm, they seemed to assure 25 Life of health, and days mature.
 Woman's self in miniature!
 Limbs so fair, they might supply (Themselves now but cold imagery)
 The sculptor to make Beauty by.
 30 Or did the stern-eyed Fate descry,
 That babe, or mother, one must die,
 So in mercy left the stock,
 And cut the branch; to save the shock Of young years widowed; and the pain, 35 When Single State comes back again To the lone man who, reft of wife, Thenceforward drags a maimed life?
 The economy of Heaven is dark;
 And wisest clerks¹ have missed the mark, 40 Why human buds, like this, should fall,
 More brief than fly ephemeral,
 That has his day; while shrivelled crones Stiffen with age to stocks and stones;
 And crabbéd use the conscience sears 45 In sinners of an hundred years Mother's prattle, mother's kiss, Baby fond, thou ne'er wilt miss.
 Rites, which custom does impose, Silver bells and baby clothes;
 50 Coral redder than those lips,
 Which pale death did late eclipse;
 Music framed for infant's glee, Whistle never tuned for thee; Though thou want'st not, thou shalt have
 them,

LETTER TO WORDSWORTH

January 30, 1801

Thanks for your letter and present. I had already borrowed your second volume.² What most pleases me are the Song of *Lucy*³—*Simon's sickly daughter*⁴ in The 5 Sexton made me cry. Next to these are the description of the continuous echoes in the story of Joanna's laugh,⁵ where the mountains and all the scenery absolutely seem alive—and that fine Shakespearian charac-

—that creeps about the fields, Following his fancies by the hour, to bring Tears down his cheek, or solitary smiles Into his face, until the setting sun 15 *Write fool upon his forehead.*⁶

I will mention one more: the delicate and curious feeling in the wish for the Cumberland Beggar, that he may have about him the melody of birds, altho' he 20 hear them not.⁷ Here the mind knowingly passes a fiction upon herself, first substituting her own feelings for the Beggar's, and, in the same breath detecting the fallacy, will not part with the wish.—*The Poet's Epitaph*¹ is disfigured, to my taste, by the vulgar satire upon parsons and lawyers in the beginning, and the coarse epithet of pun-point in the 6th stanza. All the rest is eminently good, and your own. I will just add that it appears to me a fault in the Beggar that the instructions conveyed in it are too direct and like a lecture, they don't slide into the mind of the reader while he is imagining no such matter. An intelligent reader finds a sort of insult in being told: I will teach you how to think upon this subject. This fault, if I am right, is in a ten-thousandth worse degree to be found in Sterne and many, many novelists and modern poets, who continually put a sign post up to show where you are to feel. They set out with assuming their readers to be stupid. Very different from Robinson Crusoe, The Vicar of Wakefield, Roderick Random, and other beautiful bare narratives. There is implied an unwritten compact between author and reader: I will tell you a story, and I suppose you will understand it. Modern novels, *St Leon*s and the like, are full of such flowers as these: "Let not my reader suppose"—³⁰ "Imagine, if you can"—modest!—etc.—I will here have done with praise and blame I have written so much, only that you may not think I have passed over your book without observation.—I am sorry that Coleridge has christened his *Ancient Mariner*² "a Poet's Reverie"—it is as bad as Bottom the Weaver's declaration that he is not a lion but only the scenical representation of a lion.³ What new idea is gained by this title, but one subversive of all credit, which the tale should force upon us, of its truth? For me, I was never so affected with any human tale. After first reading it, I was totally possessed with it for many days—I dislike all the miraculous part of it, but the feelings of the man under the operation of such scenery dragged me along like Tom Piper's magic whistle.⁴ I totally differ from your idea that the Mariners should have had a character and profession.¹ This is a beauty in Gulliver's Travels, where the mind is kept in a placid state of little wonderments; but the Ancient Mariner undergoes such trials as overwhelm and bury all individuality or memory of what he was, like the state of a man in a bad dream, one terrible peculiarity of which is that all consciousness of personality is gone. Your other observation is, I think, as well a little unfounded: the Mariner from being conversant in supernatural events has acquired a supernatural and strange cast of phrase, eye, appearance, etc., which frighten the wedding-guest. You will excuse my remarks, because I am hurt and vexed that you should think it necessary with a prose apology to open the eyes of dead men that cannot see. To sum up a general opinion of the second vol.—I do not feel any one poem in it so forcibly as The Ancient Mariner, The Mad Mother,² and the Lanes at Tintern Abbey,³ in the first.⁴—I could, too, have wished the critical preface⁵ had appeared in a separate treatise. All its dogmas are true and just, and most of them new, as criticism. But they associate a diminishing idea with the poems which follow, as having been written for experiment on the public taste, more than having sprung (as they must have done) from living and daily circumstances.—I am prolix, because I am gratified in the opportunity of writing to you, and I don't well know when to leave off. I ought before this to have reply'd to your very kind invitation into Cumberland. With you and your sister I could gang⁶ anywhere; but I am afraid whether I shall ever be able to afford so desperate a journey. Separate from the pleasure of your company, I don't much care if I never see a mountain in my life. I have passed all my days in London, until I have formed as many and intense local attachments as any of you mountaineers can have done with dead Nature. The lighted shops of the Strand and Fleet Street; the innumerable trades, tradesmen and customers, coaches, wagons, playhouses; all the bustle and wickedness round about Covent Garden; the very women of the Town, the watchmen, drunken scenes, rattles; lie awake, if you awake, at all hours of the night, the impossibility of being dull in Fleet Street; the crowds, the very dirt and mud, the sun shining upon houses and pavements, the print shops, the old-book stalls, parsons cheap'ning¹ books, coffee-houses, steams of soups from kitchens, the pantomimes—London itself a pantomime and a masquerade—all these things work themselves into my mind, and feed me, without a power of satiating me. The wonder of these sights impels me into night-walks about her crowded streets, and I often shed tears in the motley Strand from fullness of joy at so much life. All these emotions must be strange to you, so are your rural emotions to me. But consider, what must I have been doing all my life, not to have lent great portions of my heart with usury to such scenes?

My attachments are all local, purely local. I have no passion (or have had none since I was in love, and then it was the spurious engendering of poetry and books) to groves and valleys. The rooms where I was born, the furniture which has been before my eyes all my life, a book-case which has followed me about (like a faithful dog, only exceeding him in knowledge), wherever I have moved, old chairs, old tables, streets, squares, where I have sunned myself, my old school,—these are my mistresses. Have I not enough, without your mountains? I do not envy you. I should pity you, did I not know that the mind will make friends of anything. Your sun, and moon, and skies, and hills, and lakes, affect me no more, or scarcely come to me in more venerable characters, than as a gilded room with tapestry and tapers, where I might live with handsome visible objects. I consider the clouds above me but as a roof beautifully painted,² but unable to satisfy my mind; and at last, like the pictures of the apartment of a connoisseur, unable to afford him any longer a pleasure. So fading upon me, from disuse, have been the beauties of Nature, as they have been confinedly called; so ever fresh, and green, and warm are all the inventions of men, and assemblies of men in this great city. I should certainly have laughed with dear Joanna.

Give my kindest love and my sister's to D¹ and yourself; and a kiss from me to little Barbara Lewthwaite.² Thank you for liking my play.³ C. L.

From CHARACTERS OF DRAMATIC WRITERS CONTEMPORARY WITH SHAKSPEARE⁴
1808-18

When I selected for publication, in 1808, Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakspeare, the kind of extracts which I was anxious to give were, not so much passages of wit and humor, though the old plays are rich in such, as scenes of passion, sometimes of the deepest quality, interesting situations, serious descriptions, that which is more nearly allied to poetry than to wit, and to tragic rather than to comic poetry. The plays which I made choice of were, with few exceptions, such as treat of human life and manners, rather than masques and Arcadian pastorals, with their train of abstractions, unimpassioned deities, passionate mortals—Claius, and Medorus, and Amintias, and Amarillis. My leading design was, to illustrate what may be called the moral sense of our ancestors. To show in what manner they felt, when they placed themselves by the power of imagination in trying circumstances, in the conflicts of duty and passion, or the strife of contending duties, what sort of loves and enmities theirs were, how their griefs were tempered, and their full-sworn joys abated; how much of Shakspeare shines in the great men his contemporaries, and how far in his divine mind and manners he surpassed them and all mankind. I was also desirous to bring together some of the most admired scenes of Fletcher and Massinger, in the estimation of the world the only dramatic poets of that age entitled to be considered after Shakspeare, and, by exhibiting them in the same volume with the more impressive scenes of old Marlowe, Heywood, Tourneur, Webster, Ford, and others, to show what we had slighted, while beyond all proportion we had been crying up one or two favorite names. From the desultory criticism which accompanied that publication, I have selected a few which I thought would best stand by themselves, as requiring least immediate reference to the play or passage by which they were suggested.

THOMAS HEYWOOD

A Woman Killed with Kindness Heywood is a sort of prose Shakspeare. His scenes are to the full as natural and affecting. But we miss the poet, that which in Shakspeare always appears out and above the surface of the nature. Heywood's characters in this play, for instance, his country gentlemen, etc., are exactly what we see, but of the best kind of what we see, in life. Shakspeare makes us believe, while we are among his lovely creations, that they are nothing but what we are familiar with, as in dreams new things seem old, but we awake, and sigh for the difference.

The English Traveller. Heywood's preface to this play is interesting, as it shows the heroic indifference about the opinion of posterity, which some of these great writers seem to have felt. There is a magnanimity in authorship as in everything else. His ambition seems to have been confined to the pleasure of hearing the players speak his lines while he lived. It does not appear that he ever contemplated the possibility of being read by after ages. What a slender pittance of fame was motive sufficient to the production of such plays as The English Traveller, The Challenge for Beauty, and The Woman Killed with Kindness! Posterity is bound to take care that a writer loses nothing by such a noble modesty.

JOHN WEBSTER

The Duchess of Malfy. All the several parts of the dreadful apparatus with which the death of the Duchess is ushered in, the waxen images which counterfeit death, the wild masque of madmen, the tomb-maker, the bellman, the living person's dirge, the mortification by degrees,—are not more remote from the conceptions of ordinary vengeance, than the strange character of suffering which they seem to bring upon their victim is out of the imagination of ordinary poets. As they are not like inflictions of this life, so her language seems not of this world. She has lived among horrors till she is become "native and endowed unto that element."¹ She speaks the dialect of despair, her tongue has a smatch² of Tartarus and the souls in bale.³ To move a horror skilfully, to touch a soul to the quick, to lay upon fear as much as it can bear, to wean and weary a life till it is ready to drop, and then step in with mortal instruments to take its last forfeit this only a Webster can do. Inferior geniuses may "upon horror's head horrors accumulate,"⁴ but they cannot do this. They mistake quantity for quality; they "terrify babes with painted devils;"⁵ but they know not how a soul is to be moved. Their terrors want dignity. their affrightments are without decorum.

JOHN FORD

The Broken Heart I do not know where to find, in any play, a catastrophe so grand, so solemn, and so surprising, as in this. This is indeed, according to Milton, to describe high passions and high actions.⁶ The fortitude of the Spartan boy, who let a beast gnaw out his bowels till he died without expressing a groan,⁷ is a faint bodily image of this dilaceration⁸ of the spirit, and exenteration⁹ of the inmost mind, which Calantha, with a holy violence against her nature, keeps closely covered, till the last duties of a wife and a queen are fulfilled. Stories of martyrdom are but of chains and the stake; a little bodily suffering. These torments

On the purest spirits prey,
As on the entrails, joints, and limbs,
With answerable pains, but more intense.¹⁰

What a noble thing is the soul in its strengths and in its weaknesses! Who would be less weak than Calantha? Who can be so strong? The expression of this transcendent scene almost bears us in imagination to Calvary and the Cross; and we seem to perceive some analogy between the scenical sufferings which we are here contemplating, and the real agonies of that final completion to which we dare no more than hint a reference. Ford was of the first order of poets. He sought for sublimity, not by parcels, in metaphors or visible images, but directly where she has her full residence in the heart of man; in the actions and sufferings of the greatest minds. There is a grandeur of the soul above mountains, seas, and the elements. Even in the poor perverted reason of Giovanni and Annabella, in the play¹ which stands at the head of the modern collection of the works of this author, we discern traces of that fiery particle, which, in the irregular starting from out the road of beaten action, discovers something of a right line even in obliquity, and shows hints of an improvable greatness in the lowest descents and degradations of our nature.

⁶ The story is told by Plutarch in his Life of Lycurgus, 18, to illustrate the power of endurance of the Spartan boys as well as their serious attitude toward stealing, training in which was a vital part of their education. A boy had stolen a fox, which he concealed under his cloak; but rather than have the theft detected the boy suffered death by allowing his bowels to be torn out by the fox

GEORGE CHAPMAN

Bussy D'Ambois, Byron's Conspiracy, Byron's Tragedy, etc., etc. Webster has happily characterized the "full and heightened style"² of Chapman, who, of all the English play-writers, perhaps approaches nearest to Shakspeare in the descriptive and didactic, in passages which are less purely dramatic. He could not go out of himself, as Shakspeare could shift at pleasure, to inform and animate other existences, but in himself he had an eye to perceive and a soul to embrace all forms and modes of being. He would have made a great epic poet, if indeed he has not abundantly shown himself to be one; for his Homer is not so properly a translation as the stories of Achilles and Ulysses rewritten. The earnestness and passion which he has put into every part of these poems, would be incredible to a reader of mere modern translations. His almost Greek zeal for the glory of his heroes can only be paralleled by that fierce spirit of Hebrew bigotry, with which Milton, as if personating one of the zealots of the old law, clothed himself when he sat down to paint the acts of Samson against the uncircumcised.³ The great obstacle to Chapman's translations being read is their unconquerable quaintness. He pours out in the same breath the most just and natural, and the most violent and crude expressions. He seems to grasp at whatever words come first to hand while the enthusiasm is upon him, as if all other must be inadequate to the divine meaning. But passion (the all in all in poetry) is everywhere present, raising the low, dignifying the mean, and putting sense into the absurd. He makes his readers glow, weep, tremble, take any affection which he pleases, be moved by words, or in spite of them, be disgusted and overcome their disgust.

FRANCIS BEAUMONT.—JOHN FLETCHER

Maid's Tragedy. One characteristic of the excellent old poets is their being able to bestow grace upon subjects which naturally do not seem susceptible of any. I will mention two instances. Zelmane in the Arcadia of Sidney, and Helena in the All's Well that Ends Well of Shakspeare. What can be more unpromising at first sight, than the idea of a young man disguising himself in women's attire, and passing himself off for a woman among women; and that for a long space of time? Yet Sir Philip has preserved so matchless a decorum, that neither does Pryceles' manhood suffer any stain for the effeminacy of Zelmane, nor is the respect due to the princesses at all diminished when the deception comes to be known. In the sweetly constituted mind of Sir Philip Sidney, it seems as if no ugly thought or unhandsome meditation could find a harbor. He turned all that he touched into images of honor and virtue. Helena in Shakspeare is a young woman seeking a man in marriage. The ordinary rules of courtship are reversed, the habitual feelings are crossed. Yet with such exquisite address this dangerous subject is handled, that Helena's forwardness loses her no honor; delicacy dispenses with its laws in her favor; and nature, in her single case, seems content to suffer a sweet violation. Aspatia, in The Maid's Tragedy, is a character equally difficult, with Helena, of being managed with grace. She too is a slighted woman, refused by the man who had once engaged to marry her. Yet it is artfully contrived that while we pity we respect her, and she descends without degradation. Such wonders true poetry and passion can do, to confer dignity upon subjects which do not seem capable of it. But Aspatia must not be compared at all points with Helena; she does not so absolutely predominate over her situation but she suffers some diminution, some abatement of the full lustre of the female character, which Helena never does. Her character has many degrees of sweetness, some of delicacy; but it has weakness, which, if we do not despise, we are sorry for. After all. Beaumont and Fletcher were but an inferior sort of Shakspeares and Sidneys.

From ON THE TRAGEDIES OF SHAKS-PEARE, CONSIDERED WITH REFER-ENCE TO THEIR FITNESS FOR STAGE REPRESENTATION
1811 1811

It may seem a paradox, but I cannot help being of opinion that the plays of Shakspeare are less calculated for performance on a stage, than those of almost any other dramatist whatever. Their distinguished excellence is a reason that they should be so. There is so much in them which comes not under the province of acting, with which eye, and tone, and gesture, have nothing to do.

The glory of the scenic art is to personate passion, and the turns of passion, and the more coarse and palpable the passion is, the more hold upon the eyes and ears of the spectators the performer obviously possesses. For this reason, scolding scenes, scenes where two persons talk themselves into a fit of fury, and then in a surprising manner talk themselves out of it again, have always been the most popular upon our stage. And the reason is plain, because the spectators are here most palpably appealed to; they are the proper judges in this war of words; they are the legitimate ring that should be formed round such "intellectual prize-fighters." Talking is the direct object of the imitation here. But in all the best dramas, and in Shakspeare above all, how obvious it is that the form of speaking, whether it be in soliloquy or dialogue, is only a medium, and often a highly artificial one, for putting the reader or spectator into possession of that knowledge of the inner structure and workings of mind in a character, which he could otherwise never have arrived at in that form of composition by any gift short of intuition. We do here as we do with novels written in the epistolary form. How many improprieties, perfect solecisms in letter-writing, do we put up with in Clarissa and other books, for the sake of the delight with which that form upon the whole gives us.

But the practice of stage representation reduces everything to a controversy of elocution. Every character, from the boisterous blasphemings of Bajazet to the shrinking timidity of womanhood, must play the orator. The love-dialogues of Romeo and Juliet, their silver-sweet sounds of lovers' tongues by night; the more intimate and sacred sweetness of nuptial colloquy between an Othello and a Posthumus with their married wives, all those delicacies which are so delightful in the reading, as when we read of those youthful dalliances in Paradise—

As besem'd
Fair couple link'd in happy nuptial league

by the inherent fault of stage representation, how are these things sullied and turned from their very nature by being exposed to a large assembly, when such speeches as Imogen addresses to her lord,² come drawing out of the mouth of a hired actress, whose courtship, though nominally addressed to the personated Posthumus, is manifestly aimed at the spectators, who are to judge of her endearments and her returns of love.

The character of Hamlet is perhaps that by which, since the days of Betterton, a succession of popular performers have had the greatest ambition to distinguish themselves. The length of the part may be one of their reasons. But for the character itself, we find it in a play, and therefore we judge it a fit subject of dramatic representation. The play itself abounds in maxims and reflections beyond any other, and therefore we consider it as a proper vehicle for conveying moral instruction. But Hamlet himself—what does he suffer meanwhile by being dragged forth as a public schoolmaster, to give lectures to the crowd? Why, nine parts in ten of what Hamlet does are transactions between himself and his moral sense, they are the effusions of his solitary musings, which he retires to holes and corners and the most sequestered parts of the palace to pour forth; or rather, they are the silent meditations with which his bosom is bursting, reduced to words for the sake of the reader, who must else remain ignorant of what is passing there. These profound sorrows, these light-and-noise-aborring ruminations, which the tongue scarce dares utter to deaf walls and chambers, how can they be represented by a gesticulating actor, who comes and mouths them out before an audience, making four hundred people his confidants at once? I say not that it is the fault of the actor so to do, he must pronounce them ore rotundo,³ he must accompany them with his eye, he must inuolate them into his auditory by some trick of the eye, tone, or gesture, or he fails. He must be thinking all the while of his appearance, because he knows that all the while the spectators are judging of it. And this is the way to represent the shy, negligent, retiring Hamlet.

³ In an orotund voice

It is true that there is no other mode of conveying a vast quantity of thought and feeling to a great portion of the audience, who otherwise would never earn it for themselves by reading, and the intellectual acquisition gained this way may, for aught I know, be inestimable, but I am not arguing that Hamlet should not be acted, but how much Hamlet is made another thing by being acted. I have heard much of the wonders which Garrick performed in this part; but as I never saw him, I must have leave to doubt whether the representation of such a character came within the province of his art. Those who tell me of him, speak of his eye, of the magic of his eye, and of his commanding voice: physical properties, vastly desirable in an actor, and without which he can never insinuate meaning into an auditory,—but what have they to do with Hamlet? what have they to do with intellect? In fact, the things aimed at in theatrical representation are to arrest the spectator's eye upon the form and the gesture, and so to gain a more favorable hearing to what is spoken—it is not what the character is, but how he looks, not what he says, but how he speaks it. I see no reason to think that if the play of Hamlet were written over again by some such writer as Banks or Lillo, retaining the process of the story, but totally omitting all the poetry of it, all the divine features of Shakspeare, his stupendous intellect, and only taking care to give us enough of passionate dialogue, which Banks or Lillo were never at a loss to furnish,—I see not how the effect could be much different upon an audience, nor how the actor has it in his power to represent Shakspeare to us differently from his representation of Banks or Lillo. Hamlet would still be a youthful accomplished prince, and must be gracefully personated; he might be puzzled in his mind, wavering in his conduct, seemingly-cruel to Ophelia; he might see a ghost, and start at it, and address it kindly when he found it to be his father; all this in the poorest and most homely language of the servilest creeper after nature that ever consulted the palate of an audience, without troubling Shakspeare for the matter and I see not but there would be room for all the power which an actor has, to display itself. All the passions and changes of passion might remain: for those are much less difficult to write or act than is thought; it is a trick easy to be attained; it is but rising or falling a note or two in the voice, a whisper with a significant foreboding look to announce its approach, and so contagious the counterfeit appearance of any emotion is that, let the words be what they will, the look and tone shall carry it off and make it pass for deep skill in the passions.

It is common for people to talk of Shakspeare's plays being so natural; that everybody can understand him. They are natural indeed; they are grounded deep in nature, so deep that the depth of them lies out of the reach of most of us. You shall hear the same persons say that George Barnwell is very natural, and Othello very natural, that they are both very deep; and to them they are the same kind of thing. At the one they sit and shed tears, because a good sort of young man is tempted by a naughty woman to commit a trifling peccadillo, the murder of an uncle or so,¹ that is all, and so comes to an untimely end, which is so moving; and at the other, because a blackamoor in a fit of jealousy kills his innocent white wife and the odds are that ninety-nine out of a hundred would willingly behold the same catastrophe happen to both the heroes, and have thought the rope more due to Othello than to Barnwell. For of the texture of Othello's mind, the inward construction marvellously laid open with all its strengths and weaknesses, its heroic confidences and its human misgivings, its agonies of hate springing from the depths of love, they see no more than the spectators at a cheaper rate, who pay their pennies apiece to look through the man's telescope in Leicester-fields, see into the inward plot and topography of the moon. Some dun thing or other they see, they see an actor personating a passion, of grief or anger, for instance, and they recognize it as a copy of the usual external effects of such passions; for at least as being true to that symbol of the emotion which passes current at the theatre for it, for it is often no more than that: but of the grounds of the passion, its correspondence to a great or heroic nature, which is the only worthy object of tragedy,—that common auditors know anything of this, or can have any such notions dinned into them by the mere strength of an actor's lungs,—that apprehensions foreign to them should be thus infused into them by storm, I can neither believe, nor understand how it can be possible.

We talk of Shakspeare's admirable observation of life, when we should feel, that not from a petty inquisition into those cheap and every-day characters which surrounded him, as they surround us, but from his own mind, which was, to borrow a phrase of Ben Jonson's the very "sphere of humanity,"¹ he fetched those images of virtue and of knowledge, of which every one of us recognizing a part, think we comprehend in our natures the whole, and oftentimes mistake the powers which he positively creates in us, for nothing more than indigenous faculties of our own minds which only waited the application of corresponding virtues in him to return a full and clear echo of the same.

To return to Hamlet.—Among the distinguishing features of that wonderful character, one of the most interesting (yet painful) is that soreness of mind which makes him treat the intrusions of Polonius with harshness, and that asperity which he puts on in his interviews with Ophelia. These tokens of an unhinged mind (if they be not mixed in the latter case with a profound artifice of love, to alienate Ophelia by affected discourtesies, so to prepare her mind for the breaking off of that loving intercourse, which can no longer find a place amidst business so serious as that which he has to do) are parts of his character, which to reconcile with our admiration of Hamlet, the most patient consideration of his situation is no more than necessary; they are what we forgive afterwards, and explain by the whole of his character, but at the time they are harsh and unpleasant. Yet such is the actor's necessity of giving strong blows to the audience, that I have never seen a player in this character who did not exaggerate and strain to the utmost these ambiguous features,—these temporary deformities in the character. They make him express a vulgar scorn at Polonius, which utterly degrades his gentility, and which no explanation can render palatable; they make him show contempt, and curl up the nose at Ophelia's father,—contempt in its very grossest and most hateful form, but they get applause by it: it is natural, people say, that is, the words are scornful, and the actor expresses scorn, and that they can judge of: but why so much scorn, and of that sort, they never think of asking.

So to Ophelia—All the Hamlets that I have ever seen, rant and rave at her as if she had committed some great crime, and the audience are highly pleased, because the words of the part are satirical, and they are enforced by the strongest expression of satirical indignation of which the face and voice are capable. But then, whether Hamlet is likely to have put on such brutal appearances to a lady whom he loved so dearly, is never thought on. The truth is that in all such deep affections as had subsisted between Hamlet and Ophelia, there is a stock of supererogatory love (if I may venture to use the expression), which in any great grief of heart, especially where that which preys upon the mind cannot be communicated, confers a kind of indulgence upon the grieved party to express itself, even to its heart's dearest object, in the language of a temporary alienation; but it is not alienation, it is a distraction purely, and so it always makes itself to be felt by that object: it is not anger, but grief assuming the appearance of anger,—love awkwardly counterfeiting hate, as sweet countenances when they try to frown but such sternness and fierce disgust as Hamlet is made to show is no counterfeit, but the real face of absolute aversion,—of irreconcilable alienation. It may be said he puts on the madman; but then he should only so far put on this counterfeit lunacy as his own real distraction will give him leave, that is, incompletely, imperfectly, not in that confirmed practiced way, like a master of his art, or, as Dame Quickly would say, "like one of those harlotry players."

The truth is, the characters of Shakspeare are so much the objects of meditation rather than of interest or curiosity as to their actions, that while we are reading any of his great criminal characters,—Macbeth, Richard, even Iago,—we think not so much of the crimes which they commit, as of the ambition, the aspiring spirit, the intellectual activity, which prompts them to overleap those moral fences. Barnwell is a wretched murderer; there is a certain fitness between his neck and the rope; he is the legitimate heir to the gallows; nobody who thinks at all can think of any alleviating circumstances in his case to make him a fit object of mercy. Or to take an instance from the higher tragedy, what else but a mere assassin is Glanvalon! Do we think of anything but of the crime which he commits, and the rack which he deserves? That is all which we really think about him. Whereas in corresponding characters in Shakespeare so little do the actions comparatively affect us, that while the impulses, the inner mind in all its perverted greatness, solely seems real and is exclusively attended to, the crime is comparatively nothing. But when we see these things represented, the acts which they do are comparatively everything, their impulses nothing. The state of sublime emotion into which we are elevated by those images of night and horror which Macbeth is made to utter, that solemn prelude with which he entertains the time till the bell shall strike which is to call him to murder Duncan,—when we no longer read it in a book, when we have given up that vantage-ground of abstraction which reading possesses over seeing, and come to see a man in his bodily shape before our eyes actually preparing to commit a murder, if the acting be true and impressive, as I have witnessed it in Mr. K.'s performance of that part, the painful anxiety about the act, the natural longing to prevent it while it yet seems unperpetrated, the too close pressing semblance of reality, give a pain and an uneasiness which totally destroy all the delight which the words in the book convey, where the deed doing never presses upon us with the painful sense of presence. It rather seems to belong to history,—to something past and inevitable, if it has anything to do with time at all. The sublime images, the poetry alone, is that which is present to our minds in the reading.

So to see Lear acted,—to see an old man tottering about the stage with a walking-stick, turned out of doors by his daughters in a rainy night, has nothing in it but what is painful and disgusting. We want to take him into shelter and relieve him. That is all the feeling which the acting of Lear ever produced in me. But the Lear of Shakespeare cannot be acted. The contemptible machinery by which they mimic the storm which he goes out in, is not more inadequate to represent the horrors of the real elements, than any actor can be to represent Lear: they might more easily propose to personate the Satan of Milton upon a stage, or one of Michael Angelo's terrible figures. The greatness of Lear is not in corporal dimension, but in intellectual: the explosions of his passion are terrible as a volcano: they are storms turning up and discharging to the bottom that sea, his mind, with all its vast riches. It is his mind which is laid bare. This case of flesh and blood seems too insignificant to be thought on; even as he himself neglects it. On the stage we see nothing but corporal infirmities and weakness, the impotence of rage, while we read it, we see not Lear, but we are Lear,—we are in his mind, we are sustained by a grandeur which baffles the malice of daughters and storms; in the aberrations of his reason, we discover a mighty irregular power of reasoning, unmethodized from the ordinary purposes of life, but exerting its powers, as the wind blows where it listeth,¹ at will upon the corruptions and abuses of mankind. What have looks, or tones, to do with that sublime identification of his age with that of the heavens themselves, when in his reproaches to them for conniving at the injustice of his children, he reminds them that "they themselves are old"?² What gesture shall we appropriate to this? What has the voice or the eye to do with such things? But the play is beyond all art, as the tamperings with it show: it is too hard and stony; it must have love-scenes, and a happy ending. It is not enough that Cordelia is a daughter; she must shine as a lover too. Tate has put his hook in the nostrils of this Leviathan, for Garrick and his followers, the showmen of the scene, to draw the mighty beast about more easily. A happy ending!—as if the living martyrdom that Lear had gone through,—the flaying of his feelings alive, did not make a fair dismissal from the stage of life the only decorous thing for him. If he is to live and be happy after, if he could sustain this world's burden after, why all this pudder and preparation,—why torment us with all this unnecessary sympathy? As if the childish pleasure of getting his gilt robes and sceptre again could tempt him to act over again his misused station,—as if at his years, and with his experience, anything was left but to die

THE SOUTH-SEA HOUSE
1820

Reader, in thy passage from the Bank—where thou hast been receiving thy half-yearly dividends (supposing thou art a lean annuitant¹ like myself)—to the Flower Pot, to secure a place for Dalston, or Shackwell, or some other thy suburban retreat northerly,—didst thou never observe a melancholy looking, handsome, brick and stone edifice, to the left—where Threadneedle-street abuts upon Bishopsgate? I dare say thou hast often admired its magnificent portals ever gaping wide, and disclosing to view a grave court, with cloisters and pillars, with few or no traces of goers-in or comers-out—a desolation something like Balcutha's.²

This was once a house of trade,—a centre of busy interests. The throng of merchants was here—the quick pulse of gain—and here some forms of business are still kept up, though the soul be long since fled. Here are still to be seen stately porticoes; imposing staircases; offices roomy as the state apartments in palaces—deserted, or thinly peopled with a few straggling clerks; the still more sacred interiors of court and committee rooms, with venerable faces of bea-dles,³ door-keepers—directors seated in form on solemn days (to proclaim a dead dividend) at long worm-eaten tables, that have been mahogany, with tarnished gilt-leather coverings, supporting massy silver ink-stands long since dry;—the oaken wainscots hung with pictures of deceased governors and sub-governors, of Queen Anne, and the two first monarchs of the Brunswick dynasty,⁴—huge charts, which subsequent discoveries have antiquated;—dusty maps of Mexico, dim as dreams,—and soundings of the Bay of Panama!—The long passages hung with buckets, appended in idle rows, to walls, whose substance might defy any, short of the last, conflagration;—with vast ranges of cellarage under all, where dollars and pieces of eight⁵ once lay, an “unsunned heap,”⁶ for Mammon to have solaced his solitary heart withal,—long since dissipated, or scattered into air at the blast of the breaking of that famous Bubble.⁷

⁷ The failure of the South Sea Company, in which great numbers of shareholders were ruined by the dishonesty of the managers.

Such is the South-Sea House. At least, such it was forty years ago, when I knew it,—a magnificent relief! What alterations may have been made in it since, I have had no opportunities of verifying. Time, I take for granted, has not freshened it. No wind has resuscitated the face of the sleeping waters. A thicker crust by this time stagnates upon it. The moths, that were then batten-¹⁰ ing upon its obsolete ledgers and day-books, have rested from their depredations, but other light generations have succeeded, making fine fretwork among their single and double entries. Layers of dust have accu-¹⁵ mulated (a superfotation¹ of dirt!) upon the old layers, that seldom used to be disturbed, save by some curious finger, now and then, inquisitive to explore the mode of bookkeeping, in Queen Anne's reign; or, with less hallowed curiosity, seeking to un-²⁰ veil some of the mysteries of that tremendous hoax, whose extent the petty speculators of our day look back upon with the same expression of incredulous admiration, and hopeless ambition of rivalry, as would be-²⁵ come the puny faces of modern conspiracy contemplating the Titan size of Vaux's superhuman plot.²

Peace to the manes³ of the Bubble! Silence and destitution are upon thy walls, proud house, for a memorial!

Situated as thou art, in the very heart of stirring and living commerce,—amid the fret and fever of speculation—with the Bank, and the 'Change, and the India-house about thee, in the hey-day of present prosper-³⁵ ity, with their important faces, as if were, insulting thee, their poor neighbor out of business—to the idle and merely contem-⁴⁰ plative,—to such as me, old house; there is a charm in thy quiet—a cessation—a coolness from business—an indolence almost cloistral—which is delightful! With what reverence have I paced thy great bare rooms and courts at eventide! They spoke of the⁴⁵ past:—the shade of some dead accountant, with visionary pen in ear, would flit by me, stiff as in life. Living accounts and account-⁵⁰ ants puzzle me. I have no skill in figuring But thy great dead tomes, which scarce three degenerate clerks of the present day could lift from their enshrining shelves—with their old fantastic flourishes and deco-⁵⁵ rative rubric interlacings⁴—their sums in triple columniations,¹ set down with formal superfluity of cyphers—with pious sentences at the beginning, without which our religious ancestors never ventured to open a book of business, or bill of lading—the costly vellum covers of some of them almost persuading us that we are got into some better library,—are very agreeable and edifying spectacles. I can look upon these defunct dragons with complacency. Thy heavy odd-shaped ivory-handled pen-knives (our ancestors had every thing on a larger scale than we have hearts for) are as good as anything from Herculeaneum. The pounce-boxes² of our days have gone retrograde.

The very clerks which I remember in the South-Sea House—I speak of forty years back—had an air very different from those in the public offices that I have had to do with since. They partook of the genius of the place!

They were mostly (for the establishment did not admit of superfluous salaries) bachelors. Generally (for they had not much to do) persons of a curious and speculative turn of mind. Old-fashioned, for a reason mentioned before. Humorists,³ for they were of all descriptions; and, not having been brought together in early life (which has a tendency to assimilate the members of corporate bodies to each other), but, for the most part, placed in this house in ripe or middle age, they necessarily carried into it their separate habits and oddities, unqualified, if I may so speak, as into a common stock. Hence they formed a sort of Noah's ark.⁴ Odd fishes. A lay-monastery. Domestic retainers in a great house, kept more for show than use. Yet pleasant fellows, full of chat—and not a few among them arrived at considerable proficiency on the German flute.

The cashier at that time was one Evans, a Cambro-Briton. He had something of the choleric complexion of his countrymen stamped on his visage, but was a worthy sensible man at bottom. He wore his hair, to the last, powdered and frizzed out, in the fashion which I remember to have seen in caricatures of what were termed, in my young days, Maccaronies. He was the last of that race of beaux. Melancholy as a gib-cat⁵ over his counter all the forenoon, I think I see him, making up his cash (as they call it) with tremulous fingers, as if he feared every one about him was a defaulter; in his hypochondry ready to imagine himself one; haunted, at least, with the idea of the possibilities of his becoming one: his tristful visage clearing up a little over his roast neck of veal at Anderton's at two (where his picture still hangs, taken a little before his death by desire of the master of the coffee-house, which he had frequented for the last five-and-twenty years), but not attaining the meridian of its animation till evening brought on the hour of tea and visiting. The simultaneous sound of his well-known rap at the door with the stroke of the clock announcing six, was a topic of never-failing mirth in the families which this dear old bachelor gladdened with his presence. Then was his forte, his glorified hour! How would he chirp, and expand, over a muffin! How would he dilate into secret history! His countryman, Pennant himself, in particular, could not be more eloquent than he in relation to old and new London—the site of old theatres, churches, streets gone to decay—where Rosamond's pond stood—the Mulberry-gardens—and the Conduit in Cheap—with many a pleasant anecdote, derived from paternal tradition, of those grotesque figures which Hogarth has immortalized in his picture of Noon,—the worthy descendants of those historic confessors,¹ who, flying to this country, from the wrath of Louis the Fourteenth and his dragoons, kept alive the flame of pure religion in the sheltering obscurities of Hoglane, and the vicinity of the Seven Dials!

Deputy, under Evans, was Thomas Tame. He had the air and stoop of a nobleman. You would have taken him for one, had you met him in one of the passages leading to Westminster-hall. By stoop, I mean that gentle bending of the body forwards, which, in great men, must be supposed to be the effect of an habitual condescending attention to the applications of their inferiors. While he held you in converse, you felt strained to the height² in the colloquy. The conference over, you were at leisure to smile at the comparative insignificance of the pretensions which had just awed you. His intellect was of the shallowest order. It did not reach to a saw or a proverb. His mind was in its original state of white paper. A sucking babe might have posed³ him. What was it then? Was he rich? Alas, no! Thomas Tame was very poor. Both he and his wife looked outwardly gentlefolks, when I fear all was not well at all times within. She had a neat meagre person, which it was evident she had not sinned in over-pampering; but in its veins was noble blood. She traced her descent, by some labyrinth of relationship, which I never thoroughly understood,—much less can explain with any heraldic certainty at this time of day,—to the illustrious, but unfortunate house of Derwentwater. This was the secret of Thomas's stoop. This was the thought—the sentiment—the bright solitary star of your lives,—ye mild and happy pair,—which cheered you in the night of intellect, and in the obscurity of your station! This was to you instead of riches, instead of rank, instead of glittering attainments: and it was worth them all together. You insulted none with it; but, while you wore it as a piece of defensive armor only, no insult likewise could reach you through it. Decus et solamen ¹

Of quite another stamp was the then accountant, John Tipp. He neither pretended to high blood, nor in good truth cared one fig about the matter. He "thought an accountant the greatest hero in the world, and himself the greatest accountant in it."² Yet John was not without his hobby. The fiddle relieved his vacant hours. He sang, certainly, with other notes than to the Orphean lyre.³ He did, indeed, scream and scrape most abominably. His fine suite of official rooms in Threadneedle-street, which without anything very substantial appended to them, were enough to enlarge a man's notions of himself that lived in them (I know not who is the occupier of them now),⁴ resounded fortnightly to the notes of a concert of "sweet breasts,"⁵ as our ancestors would have called them, culled from club-rooms and orchestras—chorus singers—first and second violoncellos—double basses—and clarionets—who ate his cold mutton, and drank his punch, and praised his ear. He sate like Lord Midas among them.¹ But at the desk Tipp was quite another sort of creature. Thence all ideas, that were purely ornamental, were banished. You could not speak of any thing romantic without rebuke. Politics were excluded. A newspaper was thought too refined and abstracted. The whole duty of man consisted in writing off dividend warrants. The striking of the annual balance in the company's book (which, perhaps, differed from the balance of last year in the sum of 25l. 1s. 6d.) occupied his days and nights for a month previous. Not that Tipp was blind to the deadness of things (as they call them in the city) in his beloved house, or did not sigh for a return of the old stirring days when South Sea hopes were young—(he was indeed equal to the wielding of any the most intricate accounts of the most flourishing company in these or those days):—but to a genuine accountant the difference of proceeds is as nothing. The fractional farthing is as dear to his heart as the thousands which stand before it. He is the true actor, who, whether his part be a prince or a peasant, must act it with like intensity. With Tipp form was everything. His life was formal. His actions seemed ruled with a ruler. His pen was not less erring than his heart. He made the best executor in the world: he was plagued with incessant executorships accordingly, which excited his spleen and soothed his vanity in equal ratios. He would swear (for Tipp swore) at the little orphans, whose rights he would guard with a tenacity like the grasp of the dying hand, that commended their interests to his protection. With all this there was about him a sort of timidity (his few enemies used to give it a worse name)—a something which, in reverence to the dead, we will place, if you please, a little on this side of the heroic. Nature certainly had been pleased to endow John Tipp with a sufficient measure of the principle of self-preservation. There is a cowardice which we do not despise, because it has nothing base or treacherous in its elements, it betrays itself, not you: it is mere temperament; the absence of the romantic and the enterprising; it sees a lion in the way,² and will not, with Fortinbras, "greatly find quarrel in a straw,"³ when some supposed honor is at stake. Tipp never mounted the Whom next shall we summon from the dusty dead,² in whom common qualities become uncommon? Can I forget thee, Henry Man, the wit, the polished man of letters, the author, of the South-Sea House? who never enteredst thy office in a morning, or quittedst it in mid-day (what didst thou in an office?)—without some quirk that left a sting! Thy gibes and thy jokes are now extinct, or survive but in two forgotten volumes,³ which I had the good fortune to rescue from a stall in Barbican, not three days ago, and found thee terse, fresh, epigrammatic, as alive. Thy wit is a little gone by in these fastidious days—they topics are staled by the “new-born gauds”⁴ of the time—but great thou used to be in Public Ledgers, and in Chronicles, upon Chatham, and Shelburne, and Rockingham, and Howe, and Burgoyne, and Clinton, and the war which ended in the tearing from Great Britain her rebellious colonies,—and Keppel, and Wilkes, and Sawbridge, and Bull, and Dunning, and Pratt, and Richmond,—and such small politics.

A little less facetious, and a great deal more obstreperous, was fine rattling, rattle-headed Plumer. He was descended,—not in a right line, reader, (for his lineal pretensions, like his personal, favored a little of the sinister bend⁵) from the Plumers of Hertfordshire. So tradition gave him out, and certain family features not a little sanctioned the opinion. Certainly old Walter Plumer (his reputed author) had been a rake in his days, and visited much in Italy, and had seen the world. He was uncle, bachelor-uncle, to the fine old whig⁶ still living, who has represented the county in so many successive parliaments, and has a fine old mansion near Ware. Walter flourished in George the Second’s days, and was the same who was summoned before the House of Commons about a business of franks,¹ with the old Duchess of Marlborough. You may read of it in Johnson’s Life of Cave. Cave came off cleverly in that business. It is certain our Plumer did nothing to discountenance the rumor. He rather seemed pleased whenever it was, with all gentleness, insinuated. But, besides his family pretensions, Plumer was an engaging fellow, and sang gloriously.

Not so sweetly sang Plumer as thou sangest, mild, childlike, pastoral M—;² a flute’s breathing less divinely whispering than thy Arcadian melodies, when, in tones worthy of Arden, thou didst chant that song sung by Amiens to the banished Duke,³ which proclaims the winter wind more lenient than for a man to be ungrateful. Thy sire was old surly M—, the unapproachable churchwarden of Bishopsgate. He knew not what he did, when he begat thee, like spring, gentle offspring of blustering winter:—only fortunate in thy ending, which should have been mild, conciliatory, swan-like.⁴

Much remains to sing. Many fantastic shapes rise up, but they must be mine in private:—already I have fooled the reader to the top of his bent,⁵—else could I omit that strange creature Woollett, who existed in trying the question, and bought litigations?—and still stranger, inimitable solemn Hepworth, from whose gravity Newton might have deduced the law of gravitation. How profoundly would he nib⁶ a pen—with what deliberation would he wet a wafer!⁷

But it is time to close—night’s wheels are rattling fast over me—it is proper to have done with this solemn mockery.

Reader, what if I have been playing with thee all this while—peradventure the very names, which I have summoned up before thee, are fantastic—insubstantial—like Henry Pimpernel, and old John Naps of Greece.—

Be satisfied that something answering to them has had a being. Their importance is from the past.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL FIVE AND THIRTY YEARS AGO
1820

In Mr. Lamb's "Works," published a year or two since, I find a magnificent eulogy on my old school,¹ such as it was, or now appears to him to have been, between the years 1782 and 1789. It happens, very oddly, that my own standing at Christ's was nearly corresponding with his; and, with all gratitude to him for his enthusiasm for the cloisters, I think he has contrived to bring together whatever can be said in praise of them, dropping all the other side of the argument most ingeniously.

I remember L. at school, and can well recollect that he had some peculiar advantages, which I and others of his school-fellows had not. His friends lived in town, and were near at hand; and he had the privilege of going to see them, almost as often as he wished, through some invidious distinction, which was denied to us. The present worthy sub-treasurer² to the Inner Temple can explain how that happened. He had his tea and hot rolls in a morning, while we were battenning upon our quarter of a penny loaf—our *crug*³—moistened with attenuated small beer, in wooden piggins,⁴ smacking of the pitched leathern jack it was poured from. Our Monday's milk porritch, blue and tasteless, and the pease soup of Saturday, coarse and choking, were enriched for him with a slice of "extraordinary bread and butter," from the hot-loaf of the Temple. The Wednesday's mess of millet, somewhat less repugnant (we had three banyan⁵ to four meat days in the week), was endeared to his palate with a lump of double-refined,⁶ and a smack of ginger (to make it go down the more glibly) or the fragrant cinnamon. In lieu of our half-pickled Sundays, or quite fresh boiled beef on Thursdays (strong as *caro equina*⁷), with detestable marigolds floating in the pail to poison the broth—our scanty mutton *crags*⁸ on Fridays—and rather more savory, but grudging, portions of the same flesh, rotten-roasted or rare, on the Tuesdays (the only dish which excited our appetites, and disappointed our stomachs, in almost equal proportion)—he had his hot plate of roast veal, or the more tempting griskin¹ (exotics unknown to our palates), cooked in the paternal kitchen (a great thing), and brought him daily by his maid or aunt!² I remember the good old relative (in whom love forbade pride) squatting down upon some odd stone in a by-nook of the cloisters, disclosing the viands (of higher regale than those cates³ which the ravens ministered to the Tishbite⁴); and the contending passions of L. at the unfolding. There was love for the bringer; shame for the thing brought, and the manner of its bringing, sympathy for those who were too many to share in it, and, at top of all, hunger (eldest, strongest of the passions⁵) predominant, breaking down the stony fences of shame, and awkwardness, and a troubling over-consciousness.

I was a poor friendless boy. My parents and those who should care for me, were far away. Those few acquaintances of theirs, which they could reckon upon being kind to me in the great city, after a little forced notice, which they had the grace to take of me on my first arrival in town, soon grew tired of my holiday visits. They seemed to them to recur too often, though I thought them few enough; and one after another they all failed me, and I felt myself alone among six hundred playmates.

O the cruelty of separating a poor lad from his early homestead! The yearnings which I used to have towards it in those unfledged years! How, in my dreams, would my native town (far in the west) come back, with its church, and trees, and faces! How I would wake weeping, and in the anguish of my heart exclaim upon sweet Calne in Wiltshire!

To this late hour of my life, I trace impressions left by the recollection of those friendless holidays. The long warm days of summer never return but they bring with them a gloom from the haunting memory of those whole-day-leaves, when, by some strange arrangement, we were turned out, for the live-long day, upon our own hands, whether we had friends to go to or none. I remember those bathing-excursions to the New-River, which L. recall with such relish, better, I think, than he can—for he was a home-seeking lad, and did not much care for such water-pastimes

How merrily we would sally forth into the fields; and strip under the first warmth of the sun; and wanton like young dace¹ in the streams; getting us appetites for noon, which those of us that were penniless (our scanty morning crust long since exhausted) had not the means of allaying—while the cattle, and the birds, and the fishes, were at feed about us, and we had nothing to satisfy our cravings—the very beauty of the day, and the exercise of the pastime, and the sense of liberty, setting a keener edge upon them!—How faint and languid, finally, we would return, towards nightfall, to our desired morsel, half-rejoicing, half-reluctant, that the hours of our uneasy liberty had expired!

It was worse in the days of winter, to go prowling about the streets objectless—shivering at cold windows of print-shops, to extract a little amusement; or haply, as a last resort, in the hope of a little novelty, to pay a fifty-times repeated visit (where our individual faces should be as well known to the warden as those of his own charges) to the Lions in the Tower—to whose levée² by courtesy immemorial, we had a prescriptive title to admission.

L.'s governor³ (so we called the patron who presented us to the foundation) lived in a manner under his paternal roof. Any complaint which he had to make was sure of being attended to. This was understood at Christ's, and was an effectual screen to him against the severity of masters, or worse tyranny of the monitors. The oppressions of these young brutes are heart-sickening to call to recollection. I have been called out of my bed, and waked for the purpose, in the coldest winter nights—and this not once, but night after night—in my shirt, to receive the discipline of a leathern thong, with eleven other sufferers, because it pleased my callow overseer, when there has been any talking heard after we were gone to bed, to make the six last beds in the dormitory, where the youngest children of us slept, answerable for an offense they neither dared to commit, nor had the power to hinder. The same execrable tyranny drove the younger part of us from the fires, when our feet were perishing with snow; and, under the cruellest penalties, forbade the indulgence of a drink of water, when we lay in sleepless summer nights, fevered with the season, and the day's sports.

There was one H——,¹ who, I learned, in after days was seen expiating some maturer offense in the hulks.² (Do I flatter myself in fancying that this might be the planter of that name, who suffered—at Nevis, I think, or St. Kitts,—some few years since? My friend Tobin was the benevolent instrument of bringing him to the gallows.) This petty Nero actually branded a boy, who had offended him, with a red hot iron; and nearly starved forty of us, with exacting contributions, to the one-half of our bread, to pamper a young ass, which, incredible as it may seem, with the connivance of the nurse's daughter (a young flame of his) he had contrived to smuggle in, and keep upon the leads³ of the ward, as they called our dormitories. This game went on for better than a week, till the foolish beast, not able to fare well but he must cry roast meat⁴—happier than Caligula's minion,⁵ could he have kept his own counsel—but, foolisher, alas! than any of his species in the fables—waxing fat, and kicking,⁶ in the fulness of bread,⁷ one unlucky minute would needs proclaim his good fortune to the world below; and, laying out his simple throat, blew such a ram's-horn blast, as (toppling down the walls of his own Jericho⁸) set concealment any longer at defiance. The client was dismissed, with certain attentions, to Smithfield; but I never understood that the patron underwent any censure on the occasion. This was in the stewardship of L.'s admired Perry.

Under the same facile administration, can L. have forgotten the cool impunity with which the nurses used to carry away openly, in open platters, for their own tables, one out of two of every hot joint, which the careful matron had been seeing scrupulously weighed out for our dinners? These things were daily practiced in that magnificent apartment, which L. (grown connoisseur since, we presume) praises so highly for the grand paintings "by Verrio, and others," with which it is "hung round and adorned."⁹ But the sight of sleek well-fed

To feed our mind with idle portraiture.³

L. has recorded the repugnance of the school to gags, or the fat of fresh beef boiled; and sets it down to some superstition. But these unctuous morsels are never grateful to young palates (children are universally fat-haters) and in strong, coarse, boiled meats, unsalted, are detestable. A gag-eater in our time was equivalent to a goul⁴ and held in equal detestation. —⁵ suffered under the imputation:

———— 'Twas said
He ate strange flesh.⁶

He was observed, after dinner, carefully to gather up the remnants⁷ left at his table (not many, nor very choice fragments, you may credit me)—and, in an especial manner, these disreputable morsels, which he would convey away and secretly stow in the settle that stood at his bed-side. None saw when he ate them. It was rumored that he privately devoured them in the night. He was watched, but no traces of such midnight practices were discoverable. Some reported that, on leave-days, he had been seen to carry out of the bounds a large blue check handkerchief, full of something. This then must be the accursed thing.⁸ Conjecture next was at work to imagine how he could dispose of it. Some said he sold it to the beggars. This belief generally prevailed. He went about moping. None spake to him. No one would play with him. He was excommunicated; put out of the pale of the school. He was too powerful a boy to be beaten, but he underwent every mode of that negative punishment, which is more grievous than many stripes. Still he persevered. At length he was observed by two of his schoolfellows, who were determined to get at the secret, and had traced him one leave-day for that purpose, to enter a large worn-out building, such as there exist specimens of in Chancery-lane, which are let out to various scales of pauperism with open door, and a common staircase. After him they silently slunk in, and followed by stealth up four flights, and saw him tap at a poor wicket, which was opened by an aged woman, meanly clad. Suspicion was now ripened into certainty. The informers had secured their victim. They had him in their toils. Accusation was formally preferred, and retribution most signal was looked for. Mr. Hathaway, the then steward (for this happened a little after my time), with that patient sagacity which tempered all his conduct, determined to investigate the matter, before he proceeded to sentence. The result was that the supposed mendicants, the receivers or purchasers of the mysterious scraps, turned out to be the parents of —, an honest couple come to decay,—whom this seasonable supply had, in all probability, saved from mendicancy; and that this young stork, at the expense of his own good name, had all this while been only feeding the old birds!—The governors on this occasion, much to their honor, voted a present relief to the family of —, and presented him with a silver medal. The lesson which the steward read upon RASH JUDGMENT, on the occasion of publicly delivering the medal to —, I believe, would not be lost upon his auditory. I had left school then, but I well remember —. He was a tall, shambling youth, with a cast in his eye, not at all calculated to conciliate hostile prejudices. I have since seen him carrying a baker's basket. I think I heard he did not do quite so well by himself, as he had done by the old folks.

I was a hypochondriac lad, and the sight of a boy in fetters, upon the day of my first putting on the blue clothes, was not exactly fitted to assuage the natural terrors of initiation. I was of tender years, barely turned of seven; and had only read of such things in books, or seen them but in dreams. I was told he had run away. This was the punishment for the first offence. As a novice I was soon after taken to see the dungeons. These were little, square, Bedlam cells, where a boy could just lie at his length upon straw and a blanket—a mattress, I think, was afterwards substituted—with a peep of light, let in askance, from a prison-orifice at top, barely enough to read by. Here the poor boy was locked in by himself all day, without sight of any but the porter who brought him his bread and water—who might not speak to him;—or of the beadle,¹ who came twice a week to call him out to receive his periodical chastisement, which was almost welcome, because it separated him for a brief interval from solitude:—and here he was shut by himself of nights, out of the reach of any sound, to suffer whatever horrors the weak nerves, and superstition incident to his time of life, might subject him to.² This was the penalty for the second offence.—Wouldst thou like, reader, to see what became of him in the next degree?

The culprit, who had been a third time an offender, and whose expulsion was at this time deemed irreversible, was brought forth, as at some solemn auto da fe,³ arrayed in uncouth and most appalling attire—all trace of his late "watchet weeds"⁴ carefully effaced, he was exposed in a jacket, resembling those which London lamplighters formerly delighted in, with a cap of the same. The effect of this divestiture was such as the ingenious devisers of it could have anticipated. With his pale and frightened features, it was as if some of those disfigurements in Dante⁵ had seized upon him. In this disfigurement he was brought into the hall (L's favorite state-room), where awaited him the whole number of his school-fellows, whose joint lessons and sports he was thenceforth to share no more, the awful presence of the steward, to be seen for the last time; of the executioner beadle, clad in his state robe for the occasion; and of two faces more, of direr import, because never but in these extremities visible. These were governors; two of whom, by choice, or charter, were always accustomed to officiate at these Ultima Supplicia,⁶ not to mitigate (so at least we understood it), but to enforce the uttermost stripe. Old Bamber Gascoigne, and Peter Aubert, I remember, were colleagues on one occasion, when the beadle turning rather pale, a glass of brandy was ordered to prepare him for the mysteries.⁷ The scourge-

ing was, after the old Roman fashion, long and stately. The hector¹ accompanied the criminal quite round the hall. We were generally too faint with attending to the previous disgusting circumstances, to make accurate report with our eyes of the degree of corporal punishment inflicted. Report, of course, gave out the back knotty and livid. After scourging, he was made over, in his San Benito,² to his friends, if he had any (but commonly such poor runagates were friendless), or to his parish officer, who, to enhance the effect of the scene, had his station allotted to him on the outside of the hall gate.

These solemn pageantries were not played off so often as to spoil the general mirth of the community. We had plenty of exercise and recreation after school hours, and, for myself, I must confess, that I was never happier, than in them. The Upper and Lower Grammar Schools were held in the same room; and an imaginary line only divided their bounds. Their character was as different as that of the inhabitants of the two sides of the Pyrenees. The Rev James Boyer was the Upper Master; but the Rev. Matthew Field presided over that portion of the apartment of which I had the good fortune to be a member. We lived a life as careless as birds. We talked and did just what we pleased, and nobody molested us. We carried an accidence, or a grammar, for form; but for any trouble it gave us, we might take two years in getting through the verbs deponent, and another two in forgetting all that we had learned about them. There was now and then the formality of saying a lesson, but if you had not learned it, a brush across the shoulders (just enough to disturb a fly) was the sole remonstrance. Field never used the rod; and in truth he wielded the cane with no great good will—holding it "like a dancer."³ It looked in his hands rather like an emblem than an instrument of authority; and an emblem, too, he was ashamed of. He was a good easy man, that did not care to ruffle his own peace, nor perhaps set any great consideration upon the value of juvenile time. He came among us, now and then, but often staid away whole days from us; and when he came, it made no difference to us—he had his private room to retire to, the short time he staid, to be out of the sound of our noise. Our mirth and uproar went on. We had classics of our own, without being beholden to "insolent Greece or haughty Rome,"¹ that passed current among us—Peter Wilkins—The Adventures of the Hon Capt Robert Boyle—The Fortunate Blue Coat Boy—and the like. Or we cultivated a turn for mechanic or scientific operations, making little sun-dials of paper; or weaving those ingenious parentheses, called cat-cradles, or making dry peas to dance upon the end of a tin pipe, or studying the art military over that laudable game "French and English,"² and a hundred other such devices to pass away the time—mixing the useful with the agreeable—as would have made the souls of Rousseau and John Locke chuckle to have seen us.³

Matthew Field belonged to that class of modest divines who affect to mix in equal proportion the gentleman, the scholar, and the Christian; but, I know not how, the first ingredient is generally found to be the predominating dose in the composition. He was engaged in gay parties, or with his courtly bow at some episcopal levée, when he should have been attending upon us. He had for many years the classical charge of a hundred children, during the four or five first years of their education; and his very highest form seldom proceeded further than two or three of the introductory fables of Phædrus. How things were suffered to go on thus, I cannot guess. Boyer, who was the proper person to have remedied these abuses, always affected, perhaps felt, a delicacy in interfering in a province not strictly his own. I have not been without my suspicions that he was not altogether displeased at the contrast we presented to his end of the school. We were a sort of Helots to his young Spartans.⁴ He would sometimes, with ironic deference, send to borrow a rod of the Under Master, and then, with sardonic grin, observe to one of his upper boys, "how neat and fresh the twigs looked." While his pale students were battering their brains over Xenophon and

Plato, with a silence as deep as that enjoined by the Samite,¹ we were enjoying ourselves at our ease in our little Goshen.² We saw a little into the secrets of his discipline, and the prospect did but the more reconcile us to our lot. His thunders rolled innocuous for us; his storms came near, but never touched us, contrary to Gideon's miracle, while all around were drenched, our fleece was dry.³ His boys turned out the better scholars; we, I suspect, have the advantage in temper. His pupils cannot speak of him without something of terror allaying their gratitude, the remembrance of Field comes back with all the soothing images of indolence, and summer slumbers, and work like play, and innocent idleness, and Elysian exemptions, and life itself a "playing holiday."⁴

Though sufficiently removed from the jurisdiction of Boyer, we were near enough (as I have said) to understand a little of his system. We occasionally heard sounds of the Uhlantes,⁵ and caught glances of Tartarus. B. was a rabid pedant. His English style was cramped to barbarism. His Easter anthems (for his duty obliged him to those periodical flights) were grating as scrannel pipes.⁷ He would laugh, ay, and heartily, but then it must be at Flaccus's quibble about *Res*⁸ — or at the tristis severitas in cultu,⁹ or inspicere in patinas,¹⁰ of Terence—thin jests, which at their first broaching could hardly have had us.¹¹

No comet expounded surer.²—J. B. had a heavy hand. I have known him double his knotty fist at a poor trembling child (the maternal milk hardly dry upon its lips) with a “Sirrah, do you presume to set your wits at me?”—Nothing was more common than to see him make a headlong entry into the schoolroom, from his inner recess, or library, and, with turbulent eye, singling out a lad, roar out, “Od’s my life,³ Sirrah” (his favorite adjuration), “I have a great mind to whip you,”—then, with as sudden a retracting impulse, fling back into his lair—and, after a cooling lapse of some minutes (during which all but the culprit had totally forgotten the context) drive headlong out again, piecing out his imperfect sense, as if it had been some Devil’s Latany, with the expletory yell—“and I will, too.”—In his gentler moods, when the *rabidus furor*⁴ was assuaged, he had resort to an ingenious method, peculiar, for what I have heard, to himself, of whipping the boy, and reading the Debates, at the same time; a paragraph, and a lash between; which in those times, when parliamentary oratory was most at a height and flourishing in these realms, was not calculated to impress the patient with a veneration for the diffuser graces of rhetoric.

THE TWO RACES OF MEN

1820

The human species, according to the best theory I can form of it, is composed of two distinct races, the men who borrow, and the men who lend. To these two original diversities may be reduced all those impertinent classifications of Gothic and Celtic tribes, white men, black men, red men. All the dwellers upon earth, “Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites,”¹ flock hither, and do naturally fall in with one or other of these primary distinctions. The infinite superiority of the former, which I choose to designate as the great race, is discernible in their figure, port, and a certain instinctive sovereignty. The latter are born degraded

Come, a handsome sacrifice! See how light he makes of it! Strain not courtesies with a noble enemy.

Reflections like the foregoing were forced upon my mind by the death of my old friend, Ralph Bigod, Esq., who departed this life on Wednesday evening, dying, as he had lived, without much trouble. He boasted himself a descendant from mighty ancestors of that name, who heretofore held ducal dignities in this realm. In his actions and sentiments he belied not the stock to which he pretended. Early in life he found himself invested with ample revenues, which, with that noble disinterestedness which I have noticed as inherent in men of the great race, he took almost immediate measures entirely to dissipate and bring to nothing: for there is something revolting in the idea of a king holding a private purse; and the thoughts of Bigod were all regal. Thus furnished, by the very act of disfurnishment, getting rid of the cumbersome luggage of riches, more apt (as one sings)

In his periegesis,⁵ or triumphant progress throughout this island, it has been calculated that he laid a tythe⁶ part of the inhabitants under contribution. I reject this estimate as greatly exaggerated:—but having had the honor of accompanying my friend, divers times, in his perambulations about this vast city, I own I was greatly struck at first with the prodigious number of faces we met who claimed a sort of respectful acquaintance with us. He was one day so obliging as to explain the phenomenon. It seems, these were his tributaries; feeders of his exchequer; gentlemen, his good friends (as he was pleased to express himself), to whom he had occasionally been beholden for a loan. no way disconcert him. He rather took a pride in numbering them; and, with Comus, seemed pleased to be "stocked with so fair a herd."¹

With such sources, it was a wonder how he contrived to keep his treasury always empty. He did it by force of an aphorism, which he had often in his mouth, that "money kept longer than three days stinks." So he made use of it while it was fresh. A good part he drank away (for he was an excellent toss-pot), some he gave away, the rest he threw away, literally tossing and hurling it violently from him—as boys do burrs, or as if it had been infectious,—into ponds, or ditches, or deep holes,—inscrutable cavities of the earth;—or he would bury it (where he would never seek it again) by a river's side under some bank, which (he would facetiously observe) paid no interest—but out away from him it must go peremptorily, as Hagar's offspring into the wilderness,² while it was sweet. He never missed it. The streams were perennial which fed his fisc.³ When new supplies became necessary, the first person that had the felicity to fall in with him, friend or stranger, was sure to contribute to the deficiency. For Bigod had an undeniable way with him. He had a cheerful, open exterior, a quick jovial eye, a bald forehead, just touched with gray (cuna fides!). He anticipated no excuse, and found none. And, waiving for a while my theory as to the great race, I would put it to the most untheorizing reader, who may at times have disposable coin in his pocket, whether it is not more repugnant to the kindness of his nature to refuse such a one as I am describing, than to say no to a poor petitionary rogue (your bastard borrower) who, by his mumbling visnomy,⁵ tells you, that he expects nothing better, and, therefore, whose preconceived notions and expectations you do in reality so much less shock in the refusal.

When I think of this man; his fiery glow of heart; his swell of feeling; how magnificent, how ideal he was; how great at the midnight hour; and when I compare with him the companions with whom I have associated since, I grudge the saving of a few idle ducats, and think that I am fallen into the society of leaders, and little men.

To one like Elia, whose treasures are rather cased in leather covers than closed in iron coffers, there is a class of alienators more formidable than that which I have touched upon; I mean your borrowers of books—those mutilators of collections, spoilers of the symmetry of shelves, and creators of odd volumes. There is Comberbatch, matchless in his depredations!

That foul gap in the bottom shelf facing you, like a great eye-tooth knocked out (you are now with me in my little back study in Bloomsbury, reader!), with the huge Switzer-like¹ tomes on each side (like the Guildhall giants,² in their reformed posture, guardant of nothing), once held the tallest of my folios, Opera Bonaventura,³ choice and massy divinity, to which its two supporters (school divinity also, but of a lesser calibre, — Bellarmine, and Holy Thomas), showed but as dwarfs,—itself an Ascapart!—that Comberbatch abstracted upon the faith of a theory he holds, which is more easy, I confess, for me to suffer by than to refute, namely, that "the title to property in a book (my Bonaventure, for instance) is in exact ratio to the claimant's powers of understanding and appreciating the same." Should he go on acting upon this theory, which of our shelves is safe?

The slight vacuum in the left-hand case—two shelves from the ceiling—scarcely distinguishable but by the quick eye of a loser—was whilom the commodious resting-place of Browne on Urn Burial. C will hardly allege that he knows more about that treatise than I do, who introduced it to him, and was indeed the first (of the moderns) to discover its beauties—but so have I known a foolish lover to praise his mistress in the presence of a rival more qualified to carry her off than himself.—Just below, Dodsley's dramas want their fourth volume, where Vittoria Corombona is! The remainder nine are as distasteful as Priam's refuse sons, when the Fates borrowed Hector.⁴ Here stood The Anatomy of Melancholy, in sober state.—There loitered The Complete Angler, quiet as in life, by some stream side.—In yonder nook.

One justice I must do my friend, that if he sometimes, like the sea, sweeps away a treasure, at another time, sea-like, he throws up as rich an equivalent to match it. I have a small under-collection of this nature (my friend's gatherings in his various calls), picked up, he has forgotten at what odd places, and deposited with as little memory at mine. I take in these orphans, the twice-deserted. These proselytes of the gate are welcome as the true Hebrews.² There they stand in conjunction; natives, and naturalized. The latter seem as little disposed to inquire out their true lineage as I am.—I charge no warehouse-room for these deodands,³ nor shall ever put myself to the ungentlemanly trouble of advertising a sale of them to pay expenses.

MRS BATTLE'S OPINIONS ON WHIST 1821

"A clear fire, a clean hearth,² and the rigor of the game." This was the celebrated wish of old Sarah Battle (now with God) who, next to her devotions, loved a good game at whist. She was none of your lukewarm gamblers, your half-and-half players, who have no objection to take a hand, if you want one to make up a rubber, who affirm that they have no pleasure in winning; that they like to win one game, and lose another; that they can while away an hour very agreeably at a card-table, but are indifferent whether they play or no; and will desire an adversary, who has slipt a wrong card, to take it up and play another.³ These innumerable triflers are the curse of a table. One of these flies will spoil a whole pot. Of such it may be said, that they do not play at cards, but only play at playing at them.

Sarah Battle was none of that breed. She detested them, as I do, from her heart and soul; and would not, save upon a striking emergency, willingly seat herself at the same table with them. She loved a thorough-paced partner, a determined enemy.

² "This was before the introduction of rugs, reader. You must remember the intolerable crash of the unwept cinders betwixt your foot and the marble."—Lamb.

³ "As if a sportsman should tell you he liked to kill a fox one day and lose him the next."—Lamb.

She took, and gave, no concessions. She hated favors. She never made a revoke,¹ nor ever passed it over in her adversary without exacting the utmost forfeiture. She fought a good fight:² cut and thrust. She held not her good sword (her cards) "like a dancer."³ She sat bolt upright, and neither showed you her cards, nor desired to see yours. All people have their blind side—their superstitions; and I have heard her declare, under the rose,⁴ that Hearts was her favorite suit.

I never in my life—and I knew Sarah Battle many of the best years of it—saw her take out her snuff-box when it was her turn to play; or snuff a candle in the middle of a game; or ring for a servant, till it was fairly over. She never introduced, or connived at, miscellaneous conversation during its process. As she emphatically observed, cards were cards: and if I ever saw unmingled distaste in her fine last-century countenance, it was at the airs of a young gentleman of a literary turn, who had been with difficulty persuaded to take a hand; and who, in his excess of candor, declared that he thought there was no harm in unbending the mind now and then, after serious studies, in recreations of that kind.⁵ She could not bear to have her noble occupation, to which she wound up her faculties, considered in that light. It was her business, her duty, the thing she came into the world to do,—and she did it. She unbent her mind afterwards—over a book.

Pope was her favorite author: his Rape of the Lock her favorite work. She once did me the favor to play over with me (with the cards) his celebrated game of ombre in that poem; and to explain to me how far it agreed with, and in what points it would be found to differ from, tradrille. Her illustrations were apposite and poignant; and I had the pleasure of sending the substance of them to Mr. Bowles, but I suppose they came too late to be inserted among his ingenious notes upon that author.

Quadrille,⁶ she has often told me, was her first love; but whist had engaged her maturer esteem. The former, she said, was showy and specious, and likely to allure young persons. The uncertainty and quick shifting of partners—a thing which the constancy of whist abhors;—the dazzling supremacy and regal investiture of Spa-dille¹—absurd, as she justly observed, in the pure aristocracy of whist, where his crown and garter gave him no proper power above his brother-nobility of the Aces,—the giddy vanity, so taking to the inexperienced, of playing alone²—above all, the overpowering attractions of a Sans Prendre Vole,³—to the triumph of which there is certainly nothing parallel or approaching, in the contingencies of whist;—all these, she would say, make quadrille a game of captivity to the young and enthusiastic. But whist was the solider game: that was her word. It was a long meal; not, like quadrille, a feast of snatches. One or two rubbers might co-extend in duration with an evening. They gave time to form rooted friendships, to cultivate steady enmities. She despised the chance-started, capricious, and ever fluctuating alliances of the other. The skirmishes of quadrille, she would say, reminded her of the petty ephemeral embroilments of the little Italian states, depicted by Machiavel;⁴ perpetually changing postures and connections; bitter foes today, sugared darling tomorrow; kissing and scratching in a breath;—but the wars of whist were comparable to the long, steady, deep-rooted, rational antipathies of the great French and English nations.

A grave simplicity was what she chiefly admired in her favorite game. There was nothing silly in it, like the nob⁴ in cribbage—nothing superfluous. No flushes—that most irrational of all pleas that a reasonable being can set up.—that any one should claim four by virtue of holding cards of the same mark and color, without reference to the playing of the game, or the individual worth or pretensions of the cards themselves! She held this to be a solecism; as pitiful an ambition at cards as alliteration is in authorship. She despised superficiality, and looked deeper than the colors of things.—Suits were soldiers, she would say, and must have a uniformity of array to distinguish them: but what should we say to a foolish squire, who should claim a merit from dressing up his tenantry in red jackets, that never were to be marshalled—never to take the field?—She even wished that whist were more simple than it is; and, in my mind, would have stript it of some appendages, which, in the state of human frailty, may be venially, and even commendably allowed of. She saw no reason for the deciding of the trump by the turn of the card. Why not one suit always trumps?—Why two colors, when the mark of the suits would have sufficiently distinguished them without it?—

"But the eye, my dear Madam, is agreeably refreshed with the variety. Man is not a creature of pure reason—he must have his senses delightfully appealed to. We see it in Roman Catholic countries, where the music and the paintings draw in many to worship, whom your quaker spirit of unsensualizing would have kept out.—You, yourself, have a pretty collection of paintings—but confess to me, whether, walking in your gallery at Sandham, among those clear Vandykes, or among the Paul Potters in the ante-room, you ever felt your bosom glow with an elegant delight, at all comparable to that you have it in your power to experience most evenings over a well-arranged assortment of the court cards?—the pretty antic habits, like heralds in a procession—the gay triumph-assuring scarlets—the contrasting deadly-killing sables—the 'hoary majesty of spades,'¹ Pam² in all his glory!—

"All these might be dispensed with; and, with their naked names upon the drab paste-board, the game might go on very well, picture-less. But the beauty of cards would be extinguished forever. Stripped of all that is imaginative in them, they must degenerate into mere gambling.—Imagine a dull deal board,³ or drum head, to spread them on, instead of that nice verdant carpet (next to nature's), fittest arena for those courtly combatants to play their gallant jousts and turneys in!—Exchange those delicately-turned ivory markers—(work of Chinese artist, unconscious of their symbol, —or as profanely slighting their true application as the arrantest Ephesian journeyman⁴ that turned out those little shrines for the goddess⁵)—exchange them for little bits of leather (our ancestors' money) or chalk and a slate!"—

The old lady, with a smile, confessed the soundness of my logic; and to her approbation of my arguments on her favorite topic that evening, I have always fancied myself indebted for the legacy of a curious cribbage board, made of the finest Sienna marble, which her maternal uncle (old Walter Plumer, whom I have elsewhere celebrated¹) brought with him from Florence:—this, and a trifle of five hundred pounds, came to me at her death.

The former bequest (which I do not least value) I have kept with religious care; though she herself, to confess a truth, was never greatly taken with cribbage. It was an essentially vulgar game, I have heard her say,—disputing with her uncle, who was very partial to it. She could never heartily bring her mouth to pronounce "go"—or "that's a go."² She called it an ungrammatical game. The pegging³ teased her. I once knew her to forfeit a rubber (a five dollar stake), because she would not take advantage of the turn-up knave, which would have given it her, but which she must have claimed by the disgraceful tenure of declaring "two for his heels." There is something extremely genteel in this sort of self-denial. Sarah Battle was a gentlewoman born.

Piquet she held the best game at the cards for two persons, though she would ridicule the pedantry of the terms—such as pique⁴—repique⁵—the capot⁶—they savored (she thought) of affectation. But games for two, or even three, she never greatly cared for. She loved the quadrate, or square. She would argue thus—Cards are warfare: the ends are gain, with glory. But cards are war, in disguise of a sport: when single adversaries encounter, the ends proposed are too palpable. By themselves, it is too close a fight; with spectators, it is not much bettered. No looker-on can be interested, except for a bet, and then it is a mere affair of money; he cares not for your luck sympathetically, or for your play.—Three are still worse; a mere naked war of every man against every man, as in cribbage, without league or alliance; or a rotation of petty and contradictory interests, a succession of heartless leagues, and not much more hearty infractions of them, as in tradrille.—But in square games (she meant whist) all that is possible to be attained in card-playing is accomplished. There are the incentives of profit with honor, common to every species—though the latter can be but very imperfectly enjoyed in those other games, where the spectator is only feebly a participator. But the parties in whist are spectators and principals too. They are a theatre to themselves, and a looker-on is not wanted. He is rather worse than nothing, and an impertinence. Whist abhors neutrality, or interests beyond its sphere. You glory in some surprising stroke of skill or fortune, not because a cold—or even an interested—by-stander witnesses it, but because your partner sympathizes in the contingency. You win for two. You triumph for two. Two are exalted. Two again are mortified, which divides their disgrace, as the conjunction doubles (by taking off the invidiousness) your glories. Two losing to two are better reconciled, than one to one in that close butchery. The hostile feeling is weakened by multiplying the channels. War becomes a civil game—By such reasonings as these the old lady was accustomed to defend her favorite pastime

No inducement could ever prevail upon her to play at any game, where chance entered into the composition, for nothing. Chance, she would argue—and here again, admire the subtlety of her conclusion!—chance is nothing, but where something else depends upon it. It is obvious, that cannot be glory. What rational cause of exultation could it give to a man to turn up size ace¹ a hundred times together by himself? or before spectators, where no stake was depending?—Make a lottery of a hundred thousand tickets with but one fortunate number—and what possible principle of our nature, except stupid wonderment, could it gratify to gain that number as many times successively, without a prize?—Therefore she disliked the mixture of chance in backgammon, where it was not played for money. She called it foolish, and those people idiots, who were taken with a lucky hit under such circumstances. Games of pure skill were as little to her fancy. Played for a stake, they were a mere system of over-reaching. Played for glory, they were a mere setting of one man's wit,—his memory, or combination-faculty rather—against another's; like a mock-engagement at a review, bloodless and profitless.—She could not conceive a game wanting the spritely infusion of chance,—the handsome excuses of good fortune. Two people playing at chess in a corner of a room, whilst whist was stirring in the centre, would inspire her with insufferable horror and ennui. Those well-cut similitudes of Castles, and Knights, the imagery of the board, she would argue

(and I think in this case justly), were entirely misplaced and senseless. Those hard head-contests can in no instance ally with the fancy. They reject form and color. A pencil and dry slate (she used to say) were the proper arena for such combatants.

To those puny objectors against cards, as nurturing the bad passions, she would retort that man is a gaming animal. He must be always trying to get the better in something or other—that this passion can scarcely be more safely expended than upon a game at cards, that cards are a temporary illusion; in truth, a mere drama, for we do but play at being mightily concerned, where a few idle shillings are at stake, yet, during the illusion, we are as mightily concerned as those whose stake is crowns and kingdoms. They are a sort of dream-fighting; much ado; great battling, and little bloodshed; mighty means for disproportioned ends, quite as diverting, and a great deal more innoxious, than many of those more serious games of life, which men play, without esteeming them to be such

With great deference to the old lady's judgment on these matters, I think I have experienced some moments in my life, when playing at cards for nothing has even been agreeable. When I am in sickness, or not in the best spirits, I sometimes call for the cards, and play a game at piquet for love with my cousin Bridget—Bridget Elia¹

I grant there is something sneaking in it, but with a tooth-ache, or a sprained ancle,—when you are subdued and humble,—you are glad to put up with an inferior spring of action.

There is such a thing in nature, I am convinced, as sick whist

I grant it is not the highest style of man—I deprecate the manes² of Sarah Battle—she lives not, alas! to whom I should apologize.

At such times, those terms which my old friend objected to, come in as something admissible—I love to get a tierce³ or a quatorze,⁴ though they mean nothing. I am subdued to an inferior interest. Those shadows of winning amuse me

That last game I had with my sweet cousin (I capotted⁵ her)—(dare I tell thee, how foolish I am?)—I wished it might have lasted forever, though we gained nothing, and lost nothing, though it was a mere

Bridget and I should be ever playing.

MACKERY END, IN HERTFORDSHIRE
1821

Bridget Elia² has been my housekeeper for many a long year. I have obligations to Bridget, extending beyond the period of memory. We house together, old bachelor and maid, in a sort of double singleness; with such tolerable comfort, upon the whole, that I, for one, find in myself no sort of disposition to go out upon the mountains, with the rash king's offspring,³ to bewail my celibacy. We agree pretty well in our tastes and habits—yet so, as “with a difference.”⁴ We are generally in harmony, with occasional bickerings—as it should be among near relations. Our sympathies are rather understood, then expressed; and once, upon my dissembling a tone in my voice more kind than ordinary, my cousin burst into tears, and complained that I was altered. We are both great readers in different directions. While I am hanging over (for the thousandth time) some passage in old Burton, or one of his strange contemporaries, she is abstracted in some modern tale, or adventure, whereof our common readable is daily fed with assiduously fresh supplies. Narrative teases me. I have little concern in the progress of events. She must have a story—well, ill, or indifferently told—so there be life stirring in it, and plenty of good or evil accidents. The fluctuations of fortune in fiction—and almost in real life—have ceased to interest, or operate but dully upon me. Out-of-the-way humors and opinions—heads with some diverting twist in them—the oddities of authorship please me most. My cousin has a native disrelish of anything that sounds odd or bizarre. Nothing goes down with her, that is quaint, irregular, or out of the road of common sympathy. She “holds Nature more clever.”⁵ I can pardon her blindness to the beautiful obliquities⁶ of the Religio Medici; but she must apologize to me for certain disrespectful insinuations, which she has been pleased to throw out latterly, touching the intellectuals of a dear favorite of mine, of the last century but one—the thrice noble, chaste, and virtuous,—but again somewhat fantastical, and original-brain'd, generous Margaret Newcastle.

It has been the lot of my cousin, oftener perhaps than I could have wished, to have had for her associates and mine, free-thinkers—leaders, and disciples, of novel philosophies and systems; but she neither wrangles with, nor accepts, their opinions. That which was good and venerable to her, when a child, retains its authority over her mind still. She never juggles or plays tricks with her understanding.

We are both of us inclined to be a little too positive; and I have observed the result of our disputes to be almost uniformly this,—that in matters of fact, dates, and circumstances, it turns out that I was in the right, and my cousin in the wrong. But where we have differed upon moral points; upon something proper to be done, or let alone, whatever heat of opposition, or steadiness of conviction, I set out with, I am sure always, in the long run, to be brought over to her way of thinking.

I must touch upon the foibles of my kinswoman with a gentle hand, for Bridget does not like to be told of her faults. She hath an awkward trick (to say no worse of it) of reading in company: at which times she will answer yes or no to a question, without fully understanding its purport—which is provoking, and derogatory in the highest degree to the dignity of the putter of the said question. Her presence of mind is equal to the most pressing trials of life, but will sometimes desert her upon trifling occasions. When the purpose requires it, and is a thing of moment, she can speak to it greatly; but in matters which are not stuff of the conscience,¹ she hath been known sometimes to let slip a word less seasonably.

Her education in youth was not much attended to; and she happily missed all that train of female garniture, which passeth by the name of accomplishments. She was tumbled early, by accident or design, into a spacious closet of good old English reading,² without much selection or prohibition, and browsed at will upon that fair and wholesome pasturage. Had I twenty girls, they should be brought up exactly in this fashion. I know not whether their chance in wedlock might not be diminished by it; but I can answer for it, that it makes (if the worst comes to the worst) most incomparable old maids.

In a season of distress, she is the truest comforter; but in the teasing accidents, and minor perplexities, which do not call out the will to meet them, she sometimes maketh matters worse by an excess of participation. If she does not always divide your trouble, upon the pleasanter occasions of life, she is sure always to treble your satisfaction. She is excellent to be at play with, or upon a visit; but best, when she goes a journey with you.

We made an excursion together a few summers since, into Hertfordshire, to beat up the quarters of some of our less-known relations in that fine corn¹ country.

The oldest thing I remember is Mackery End; or Mackerel End, as it is spelt, perhaps more properly, in some old maps of Hertfordshire; a farm-house,—delightfully situated within a gentle walk from Wheat-hampstead. I can just remember having been there, on a visit to a great-aunt, when I was a child, under the care of Bridget, who, as I have said, is older than myself by some ten years. I wish that I could throw into a heap the remainder of our joint existences, that we might share them in equal division. But that is impossible. The house was at that time in the occupation of a substantial yeoman, who had married my grandmother's sister. His name was Gladman. My grandmother was a Bruton, married to a Field. The Gladmans and the Brutons are still flourishing in that part of the county, but the Fields are almost extinct. More than forty years had elapsed since the visit I speak of; and, for the greater portion of that period, we had lost sight of the other two branches also. Who or what sort of persons inherited Mackery End—kindred or strange folk—we were afraid almost to conjecture, but determined some day to explore.

By somewhat a circuitous route, taking the noble park at Luton in our way from Saint Alban's, we arrived at the spot of our anxious curiosity about noon. The sight of the old farm-house, though every trace of it was effaced from my recollection, affected me with a pleasure which I had not experienced for many a year. For though I had forgotten it, we had never forgotten being there together, and we had been talking about Mackery End all our lives, till memory on my part became mocked with a phantom of itself, and I thought I knew the aspect of a place, which, when present, O how unlike it was to that, which I had conjured up so many times instead of it!

Still the air breathed balmily about it; the season was in the "heart of June,"² and I could say with the poet,

But thou, that didst appear so fair
To fond imagination, Dost rival in the light of day
Her delicate creation!:

Bridget's was more a waking bliss³ than mine, for she easily remembered her old acquaintance again—some altered features, of course, a little grugged at. At first, indeed, she was ready to disbelieve for joy, but the scene soon reconfirmed itself in her affections—and she traversed every out-post of the old mansion, to the wood-house, the orchard, the place where the pigeon-house had stood (house and birds were alike flown)—with a breathless impatience of recognition, which was more pardonable perhaps than decorous at the age of fifty odd. But Bridget in some things is behind her years.

The only thing left was to get into the house—and that was a difficulty which to me singly would have been insurmountable; for I am terribly shy in making myself known to strangers and out-of-date kinsfolk. Love, stronger than scruple, winged my cousin in without me; but she soon returned with a creature that might have sat to a sculptor for the image of Welcome. It was the youngest of the Gladmans, who, by marriage with a Bruton, had become mistress of the old mansion. A comely brood are the Brutons. Six of them, females, were noted as the handsomest young women in the county. But this adopted Bruton, in my mind, was better than they all—more comely. She was born too late to have remembered me. She just recollected in early life to have had her cousin Bridget once pointed out to her, climbing a stile. But the name of kindred, and of cousinship, was enough. Those slender ties, that prove slight as gossamer in the rending atmosphere of a metropolis, bind faster, as we found it, in hearty, homely, loving Hertfordshire. In five minutes we were as thoroughly acquainted as if we had been born and bred up together; were familiar, even to the calling each other by our Christian names. So Christians should call one another. To have seen Bridget, and her—it was like the meeting of the two scriptural cousins!¹ There was a grace and dignity, an amplitude of form, and stature, answering to her mind, in this farmer's wife, which would have shined in a palace—or so we thought it. We were made welcome by husband and wife equally—we, and our friend that was with us—I had almost forgotten him—but B F² will not so soon forget that meeting, if peradventure he shall read this on the far distant shores where the kangaroo haunts. The fatted calf was made ready, or rather was already so, as if in anticipation of our coming;³ and, after an appropriate glass of native wine, never let me forget with what honest pride this hospitable cousin made us proceed to Wheathampstead, to introduce us (as some new-found rarity) to her mother and sister Gladmans, who did indeed know something more of us, at a time when she almost knew nothing—With what corresponding kindness we were received by them also—how Bridget's memory, exalted by the occasion, warmed into a thousand half-obliterated recollections of things and persons, to my utter astonishment, and her own—and to the astonishment of B F., who sat by, almost the only thing that was a cousin there,—old effaced images, of more than half-forgotten names and circumstances still crowding back upon her, as words written in lemon come out upon exposure to a friendly warmth,—when I forget all this, then may my country cousins forget me; and Bridget no more remember, that in the days of weakling infancy I was her tender charge—as I have been her care in foolish manhood since—in those pretty pastoral walks, long ago, about Mackery End, in Hertfordshire.

DREAM-CHILDREN

A REVERIE
1822

Children love to listen to stories about their elders when they were children, to stretch their imagination to the conception of a traditionary great-uncle, or grandame whom they never saw. It was in this spirit that my little ones crept about me the other evening to hear about their great-grandmother Field who lived in a great house in

Norfolk¹ (a hundred times bigger than that in which they and papa lived) which had been the scene—so at least it was generally believed in that part of the country—of the tragic incidents which they had lately become familiar with from the ballad of The Children in the Wood. Certain it is that the whole story of the children and their cruel uncle was to be seen fairly carved out in wood upon the chimney-piece of the great hall, the whole story down to the Robin Red-breasts, till a foolish rich person pulled it down to set up a marble one of modern invention in its stead, with no story upon it. Here Alice put out one of her dear mother's looks, too tender to be called upbraiding. Then I went on to say how religious and how good their great-grandmother Field was, how beloved and respected by every body, though she was not indeed the mistress of this great house, but had only the charge of it (and yet in some respects she might be said to be the mistress of it too) committed to her by the owner, who preferred living in a newer and more fashionable mansion which he had purchased somewhere in the adjoining county, but still she lived in it in a manner as if it had been her own, and kept up the dignity of the great house in a sort while she lived, which afterwards came to decay, and was nearly pulled down, and all its old ornaments, stripped and carried away to the owner's other house, where they were set up, and looked as awkward as if some one were to carry away the old tombs they had seen lately at the Abbey, and stick them up in Lady C's tawdry gilt drawing-room. Here John smiled, as much as to say, "that would be foolish indeed." And then I told how, when she came to die, her funeral was attended by a concourse of all the poor, and some of the gentry too, of the neighborhood for many miles round, to show their respect for her memory, because she had been such a good and religious woman; so good indeed that she knew all the Psalter,² by heart, ay, and a great part of the Testament besides. Here little Alice spread her hands.³ Then I told what a tall, upright, graceful person their great-grandmother Field once was; and how in her youth she was esteemed the best dancer—here Alice's little right foot played an involuntary movement, till, upon my looking grave, it desisted—the best dancer, I was saying, in the county, till a cruel disease, called a cancer, came, and bowed her down with pain; but it could never bend her good spirits, or make them stoop, but they were still upright, because she was so good and religious. Then I told how she was used to sleep by herself in a lone chamber of the great lone house; and how she believed that an apparition of two infants¹ was to be seen at midnight gliding up and down the great staircase near where she slept, but she said “those innocents would do her no harm”, and how frightened I used to be, though in those days I had my maid to sleep with me, because I was never half so good or religious as she—and yet I never saw the infants. Here John expanded all his eye-brows and tried to look courageous. Then I told how good she was to all her grand-children, having us to the great-house in the holydays where I in particular used to spend many hours by myself, in gazing upon the old busts of the Twelve Cæsars, that had been Emperors of Rome, till the old marble heads would seem to live again, or I to be turned into marble with them; how I never could be tired with roaming about that huge mansion, with its vast empty rooms, with their worn-out hangings, fluttering tapestry, and carved oaken panels, with the gilding almost rubbed out—sometimes in the spacious old-fashioned gardens, which I had almost to myself, unless when now and then a solitary gardening man would cross me—and how the nectarines and peaches hung upon the walls, without my ever offering to pluck them, because they were forbidden fruit, unless now and then,—and because I had more pleasure in strolling about among the old melancholy-looking yew trees, or the firs, and picking up the red berries, and the fir apples, which were good for nothing but to look at—or in lying about upon the fresh grass, with all the fine garden smells around me—or basking in the orangery, till I could almost fancy myself ripening too along with the oranges and the limes in that grateful warmth—or in watching the dace that darted to and fro in the fish-pond, at the bottom of the garden, with here and there a great sulky pike hanging midway down the water in silent state, as if it mocked at their impertinent friskings.²—I had more pleasure in these busy-idle diversions than in all the sweet flavors of peaches, nectarines, oranges, and such like common baits of children.

Here John slyly deposited back upon the plate a bunch of grapes, which, not unobserved by Alice, he had meditated dividing with her, and both seemed willing to relinquish them for the present as irrelevant. Then in somewhat a more heightened tone, I told how, though their great-grandmother Field loved all her grand-children, yet in an especial manner she might be said to love their uncle, John L.—¹ because he was so handsome and spirited a youth, and a king to the rest of us; and, instead of moping about in solitary corners, like some of us, he would mount the most mettlesome horse he could get, when but an imp no bigger than themselves, and make it carry him half over the county in a morning, and join the hunters when there were any out—and yet he loved the old great house and gardens too, but had too much spirit to be always pent up within their boundaries—and how their uncle grew up to man’s estate as brave as he was handsome, to the admiration of every body, but of their great-grandmother Field especially; and how he used to carry me upon his back when I was a lame-footed boy—for he was a good bit older than me—many a mile when I could not walk for pain;—and how in after life he became lame-footed too, and I did not always (I fear) make allowances enough for him when he was impatient, and in pain, nor remember sufficiently how considerate he had been to me when I was lame-footed; and how when he died, though he had not been dead an hour, it seemed as if he had died a great while ago, such a distance there is betwixt life and death; and how I bore his death as I thought pretty well at first, but afterwards it haunted and haunted me; and though I did not cry or take it to heart as some do, and as I think he would have done if I had died, yet I missed him all day long, and knew not till then how much I had loved him. I missed his kindness, and I missed his crossness, and wished him to be alive again, to be quarrelling with him (for we quarrelled sometimes) rather than not have him again, and was as uneasy without him, as he their poor uncle must have been when the doctor took off his limb.² Here the children fell a-crying, and asked if their little mourning which they had on was not for uncle John, and they looked up, and prayed me not to go on about their uncle, but to tell them some stories about their pretty dead mother. Then I told how for seven long years, in hope sometimes, sometimes in despair, yet persisting ever, I courted the fair Alice W—n;¹ and, as much as children could understand, I explained to them what coyness, and difficulty, and denial meant in maidens—when suddenly, turning to Alice, the soul of the first Alice looked out at her eyes with such a reality of re-presentment, that I became in doubt which of them stood there before me, or whose that bright hair was; and while I stood gazing, both the children gradually grew fainter to my view, receding, and still receding till nothing at last but two mournful features were seen in the uttermost distance, which, without speech, strangely impressed upon me the effects of speech: "We are not of Alice, nor of thee, nor are we children at all. The children of Alice called Bartrum² father. We are nothing; less than nothing, and dreams. We are only what might have been, and must wait upon the tedious shores of Lethe³ millions of ages before we have existence, and a name!"—and immediately awaking, I found myself quietly seated in my bachelor arm-chair, where I had fallen asleep, with the faithful Bridget unchanged by my side—but John L. (or James Elia) was gone forever.

A DISSERTATION UPON ROAST PIG 1822

Mankind, says a Chinese manuscript, which my friend M.⁴ was obliging enough to read and explain to me, for the first seventy thousand ages ate their meat raw, clawing or biting it from the living animal, just as they do in Abyssinia to this day. This period is not obscurely hinted at by their great Confucius in the second chapter of his Mundane Mutations, where he designates a kind of golden age by the term Cho-fang, literally the Cooks' Holiday. The manuscript goes on to say, that the art of roasting, or rather broiling (which I take to be the elder brother) was accidentally discovered in the manner following. The swineherd, Ho-ti, having gone out into the woods one morning, as his manner was, to collect mast⁵ for his hogs, left his cottage in the care of his eldest son Bo-bo, a great lubberly boy, who being fond of playing with fire, as youngers of his age commonly are, let some sparks escape into a bundle of straw, which kindling quickly, spread the conflagration over every part of their poor mansion till it was reduced to ashes. Together with the cottage (a sorry antediluvian make-shift of a building, you may think it), what was of much more importance, a fine litter of new-farrowed pigs, no less than nine in number, perished. China pigs have been esteemed a luxury all over the East from the remotest periods that we read of. Bo-bo was in the utmost consternation, as you may think, not so much for the sake of the tenement, which his father and he could easily build up again with a few dry branches, and the labor of an hour or two, at any time, as for the loss of the pigs. While he was thinking what he should say to his father, and wringing his hands over the smoking remnants of one of those untimely sufferers, an odor assailed his nostrils, unlike any scent which he had before experienced. What could it proceed from? —not from the burnt cottage—he had smelt that smell before—indeed this was by no means the first accident of the kind which had occurred through the negligence of this unlucky young fire-brand. Much less did it resemble that of any known herb, weed, or flower. A premonitory moistening at the same time overflowed his nether lip. He knew not what to think. He next stooped down to feel the pig, if there were any signs of life in it. He burnt his fingers, and to cool them he applied them in his booby fashion to his mouth. Some of the crumbs of the scorched skin had come away with his fingers, and for the first time in his life (in the world's life indeed, for before him no man had known it) he tasted—*crackling!*¹ Again he felt and fumbled at the pig. It did not burn him so much now, still he licked his fingers from a sort of habit. The truth at length broke into his slow understanding, that it was the pig that smelt so, and the pig that tasted so delicious; and, surrendering himself up to the new-born pleasure, he fell to tearing up whole handfuls of the scorched skin with the flesh next it, and was cramming it down his throat in his beastly fashion, when his sire entered amid the smoking rafters, armed with retributory cudgel, and finding how affairs stood, began to rain blows upon the young rogue's shoulders, as thick as hail-stones, which Bo-bo heeded not any more than if they had been flies. The tickling pleasure, which he expected rienced in his lower regions, had rendered him quite callous to any inconveniences he might feel in those remote quarters. His father might lay on, but he could not beat him from his pig, till he had fairly made an end of it, when, becoming a little more sensible of his situation, something like the following dialogue ensued.

"You graceless whelp, what have you got there devouring? Is it not enough that you have burnt me down three houses with your dog's tricks, and be hanged to you, but you must be eating fire, and I know not what—what have you got there, I say?"

"O father, the pig, the pig, do come and taste how nice the burnt pig eats."

The ears of Ho-ti tingled with terror. He cursed his son, and he cursed himself that ever he should beget a son that should eat burnt pig.

Bo-bo, whose scent was wonderfully sharpened since morning, soon raked out another pig, and fairly rending it asunder, thrust the lesser half by main force into the fists of Ho-ti, still shouting out "Eat, eat, eat the burning pig, father, only taste—O Lord,"—with such-like barbarous ejaculations, cramming all the while as if he would choke

Ho-ti trembled in every joint while he grasped the abominable thing, wavering whether he should not put his son to death for an unnatural young monster, when the crackling scorching his fingers, as it had done his son's, and applying the same remedy to them, he in his turn tasted some of its flavor, which, make what sour mouths he would for a pretence, proved not altogether displeasing to him. In conclusion (for the manuscript here is a little tedious) both father and son fairly sat down to the mess, and never left off till they had despatched all that remained of the litter.

Bo-bo was strictly enjoined not to let the secret escape, for the neighbors would certainly have stoned them for a couple of abominable wretches, who could think of improving upon the good meat which God had sent them. Nevertheless, strange stories got about. It was observed that Ho-ti's cottage was burnt down now more frequently than ever. Nothing but fires from this time forward. Some would break out in broad day, others in the night-time. As often as the sow farrowed, so sure was the house of Ho-ti to be in a blaze; and Ho-ti himself, which was the more remarkable, instead of chastising his son, seemed to grow more indulgent to him than ever. At length they were watched, the terrible mystery discovered, and father and son summoned to take their trial at Pekin, then an inconsiderable assize town.¹ Evidence was given, the obnoxious food itself produced in court, and verdict about to be pronounced, when the foreman of the jury begged that some of the burnt pig, of which the culprits stood accused, might be handed into the box. He handled it, and they all handled it, and burning their fingers, as Bo-bo and his father had done before them, and nature prompting to each of them the same remedy, against the face of all the facts, and the clearest charge which judge had ever given—to the surprise of the whole court, townsfolk, strangers, reporters, and all present—without leaving the box, or any manner of consultation whatever, they brought in a simultaneous verdict of Not Guilty.

The judge, who was a shrewd fellow, winked at the manifest iniquity of the decision; and, when the court was dismissed, went privily, and bought up all the pigs that could be had for love or money. In a few days his Lordship's town house was observed to be on fire. The thing took wing, and now there was nothing to be seen but fires in every direction. Fuel and pigs grew enormously dear all over the district. The insurance offices one and all shut up shop. People built slaughter and slaughter every day, until it was feared that the very science of architecture would in no long time be lost to the world. Thus this custom of firing houses continued, till in process of time, says my manuscript, a sage arose, like our Locke, who made a discovery, that the flesh of swine, or indeed of any other animal, might be cooked (burnt, as they called it) without the necessity of consuming a whole house to dress it. Then first began the rude form of a gridiron. Roasting by the string, or spit, came in a century or two later; I forget in whose dynasty. By such slow degrees, concludes the manuscript, do the most useful and seemingly the most obvious arts, make their way among mankind.

Without placing too implicit faith in the account above given, it must be agreed, that if a worthy pretext for so dangerous an experiment as setting houses on fire (especially in these days) could be assigned in favor of any culinary object, that pretext and excuse might be found in ROASTED PIG.

Of all the delicacies in the whole mundus

¹ A county town in which judges held court edibilia,¹ I will maintain it to be the most delicate—princeps obsomorum.²

I speak not of your grown porkers—things between pig and pork—those hobbydeloys—but a young and tender suckling—under a moon old—guiltless as yet of the sty—with no original speck of the amor immunditie,³ the hereditary failing of the first parent, yet manifest—his voice as yet not broken, but something between a childish treble, and a grumble—the mild fore-runner, or preludium,⁴ of a grunt.

He must be roasted. I am not ignorant that our ancestors ate them seethed, or boiled—but what a sacrifice of the exterior tegument!

There is no flavor comparable, I will contend, to that of the crisp, tawny, well-watched, not over-roasted, crackling, as it is well called—the very teeth are invited to their share of the pleasure at this banquet in overcoming the coy, brittle resistance—with the adhesive oleaginous—O call it not fat—but an undefinable sweetness growing up to it—the tender blossoming of fat—fat cropped in the bud—taken in the shoot—in the first innocence—the cream and quintessence of the child-pig's yet pure food—the lean, no lean, but a kind of animal manna—or, rather, fat and lean (if it must be so) blended and running into each other, that both together make but one ambrosian result, or common substance.

Behold him, while he is doing—it seemeth rather a refreshing warmth, than a scorching heat, that he is so passive to. How equably he twirleth round the string!—Now he is just done. To see the extreme sensibility of that tender age, he hath wept out his pretty eyes—radiant jellies—shooting stars⁵—

See him in the dish, his second cradle, how meek he lieth!—wouldst thou have had this innocent grow up to the grossness and indocility which too often accompany maturer swinehood? Ten to one he would have proved a glutton, a sloven, an obstinate, disagreeable animal—wallowing in all manner of filthy conversation⁶—from these sins he is happily snatched away—his memory is odoriferous—no clown curs eth, while his stomach half rejecteth, the rank bacon—no coalheaver bolteth him in reeking sausages—he hath a fair sepulchre in the grateful stomach of the judicious epicure—and for such a tomb might be content to die.

He is the best of savors.¹ Pine-apple is great. She is indeed almost too transcendent—a delight, if not sinful, yet so like to sinning, that really a tender-conscienced person would do well to pause—too ravishing for mortal taste, she woundeth and excoriateth the lips that approach her—like lovers' kisses, she biteth—she is a pleasure bordering on pain from the fierceness and insanity of her relish—but she stoppeth at the palate—she meddleth not with the appetite—and the coarsest hunger might barter her consistently for a mutton chop.

Pig—let me speak his praise—is no less provocative of the appetite, than he is satisfactory to the criticalness of the censorious palate. The strong man may batten on him, and the weakling refuseth not his mild juices.

Unlike to mankind's mixed characters, a bundle of virtues and vices, inexplicably interwisted, and not to be unravelled without hazard, he is—good throughout. No part of him is better or worse than another. He helpeth, as far as his little means extend, all around. He is the least envious of banquets. He is all neighbors' fare.

I am one of those who freely and ungrudgingly impart a share of the good things of this life which fall to their lot (few as mine are in this kind), to a friend. I protest I take as great an interest in my friend's pleasures, his relishes, and proper satisfactions, as in mine own. "Presents," I often say, "endear Absents."² Hares, pheasants, partridges, snipes, barn-door chicken (those "game villatic³ fowl"), capons, plovers, brawn,⁴ barrels of oysters, I dispense as freely as I receive them. I love to taste them, as it were, upon the tongue of my friend. But a stop must be put somewhere. One would not, like Lear, "give everything"⁵ I make my stand upon pig. Methinks it is an ingratitude to the Giver of all good flavors, to extra-domiciliate, or send out of the house, slightly, (under pretext of friendship, or I know not what) a blessing so particularly adapted, predestined, I may say, to my individual taste.—It argues an insensibility.

I remember a touch of conscience in this kind at school. My good old aunt,¹ who never parted from me at the end of a holiday without stuffing a sweet-meat, or some nice thing, into my pocket, had dismissed me one evening with a smoking plum-cake, fresh from the oven. In my way to school (it was over London bridge) a gray-headed old beggar saluted me (I have no doubt at this time of day that he was a counterfeit) I had no pence to console him with, and in the vanity of self-denial, and the very coxcombry of charity, school-boy-like, I made him a present of—the whole cake! I walked on a little, buoyed up, as one is on such occasions, with a sweet soothing of self-satisfaction; but before I had got to the end of the bridge, my better feelings returned, and I burst into tears, thinking how ungrateful I had been to my good aunt, to go and give her good gift away to a stranger, that I had never seen before, and who might be a bad man for aught I knew, and then I thought of the pleasure my aunt would be taking in thinking that I—I myself, and not another—would eat her nice cake—and what should I say to her the next time I saw her—how naughty I was to part with her pretty present—and the odor of that spicy cake came back upon my recollection, and the pleasure and the curiosity I had taken in seeing her make it, and her joy when she sent it to the oven, and how disappointed she would feel that I had never had a bit of it in my mouth at last—and I blamed my impertinent spirit of alms-giving, and out-of-place hypocrisy of goodness, and above all I wished never to see the face again of that insidious, good-for-nothing, old gray impostor.

Our ancestors were nice in their methods of sacrificing these tender victims. We read of pigs whipt to death with something of a shock, as we hear of any other obsolete custom. The age of discipline² is gone by, or it would be curious to inquire (in a philosophical light merely) what effect this process might have towards intenerating and dulcifying³ a substance, naturally so mild and dulcet as the flesh of young pigs. It looks like refining a violet. Yet we should be cautious, while we condemn the inhumanity, how we censure the wisdom of the practice. It might impart a gusto—

I remember an hypothesis, argued upon by the young students, when I was at St. Omer's,⁴ and maintained with much learning and pleasantry on both sides, "Whether, supposing that the flavor of a pig who obtained his death by whipping (per flagellationem extremam)⁵ superadded a pleasure upon the palate of a man more intense than any possible suffering we can conceive in the animal, is man justified in using that method of putting the animal to death?" I forget the decision.

His sauce should be considered. Decidedly, a few bread crumbs, done up with his liver and brains, and a dash of mild sage But, banish, dear Mrs Cook, I beseech you, the whole onion tribe. Barbecue⁶ your whole hogs to your palate, steep them in shallots,⁴ stuff them out with plantations of the rank and guilty garlic; you cannot poison them, or make them stronger than they are—but consider, he is a weakling—a flower.

OLD CHINA 1823

I have an almost feminine partiality for old china. When I go to see any great house, I inquire for the china-closet, and next for the picture gallery. I cannot defend the order of preference, but by saying that we have all some taste or other, of too ancient a date to admit of our remembering distinctly that it was an acquired one I can call to mind the first play, and the first exhibition, that I was taken to, but I am not conscious of a time when china jars and saucers were introduced into my imagination.

I had no repugnance then—why should I now have?—to those little, lawless, azure-tinctured grotesques, that under the notion of men and women, float about, uncircumscribed by any element, in that world before perspective—a china tea-cup.

I like to see my old friends—whom distance cannot diminish—figuring up in the air (so they appear to our optics), yet on terra firma still—for so we must in courtesy interpret that speck of deeper blue, which the decorous artist, to prevent absurdity, has made to spring up beneath their sandals.

I love the men with women's faces, and the women, if possible, with still more womanish expressions.

Here is a young and courtly Mandarin, handing tea to a lady from a salver—two miles off. See how distance seems to set off respect! And here the same lady, or another—for likeness is identity on tea-cups—is stepping into a little fairy boat, moored on the hither side of this calm garden river, with a dainty mincing foot, which in a right angle of incidence (as angles go in our world) must infallibly land her in the midst of a flowery mead—a furlong off on the other side of the same strange stream!

I was pointing out to my cousin last evening, over our Hyson² (which we are old fashioned enough to drink unmixed still of an afternoon), some of these *speciosa miracula*³ upon a set of extraordinary old blue china (a recent purchase) which we were now for the first time using; and could not help remarking, how favorable circumstances had been to us of late years, that we could afford to please the eye sometimes with trifles of this sort—when a passing sentiment seemed to over-shade the brows of my companion.⁴ I am quick at detecting these summer clouds in Bridget.

"I wish the good old times would come again," she said, "when we were not quite so rich. I do not mean that I want to be poor; but there was a middle state;"—so she was pleased to ramble on,—“in which I am sure we were a great deal happier. A purchase is but a purchase, now that you have money enough and to spare. Formerly it used to be a triumph. When we coveted a cheap luxury (and, O! how much ado I had to get you to consent in those times!) we were used to have a debate two or three days before, and to weigh the for and against, and think what we might spare it out of, and what saving we could hit upon, that should be an equivalent. A thing was worth buying then, when we felt the money that we paid for it

"Do you remember the brown suit, which you made to hang upon you, till all your friends cried shame upon you, it grew so thread-bare—and all because of that folio Beaumont and Fletcher, which you dragged home late at night from Barker's in Covent-garden? Do you remember how we eyed it for weeks before we could make up our minds to the purchase, and had not come to a determination till it was near ten o'clock of the Saturday night, when you set off from Islington, fearing you should be too late—and when the old bookseller with some grumbling opened his shop, and by the twinkling taper (for he was setting bed-wards) lighted out the relic from his dusty treasures—and when you lugged it home, wishing it were twice as cumbersome—and when you presented it to me—and when we were exploring the perfectness of it (collating you called it)—and while I was repairing some of the loose leaves with paste, which your impatience would not suffer to be left till day-break—was there no pleasure in being a poor man? or can those neat black clothes which you wear now, and are so careful to keep brushed, since we have become rich and finical, give you half the honest vanity with which you flaunted it about in that over-worn suit—your old coibean!—for four or five weeks longer than you should have done, to pacify your conscience for the mighty sum of fifteen—or sixteen shillings was it?—a great affair we thought it then—which you had lavished on the old folio. Now you can afford to buy any book that pleases you, but I do not see that you ever bring me home any nice old purchases now.

"When you came home with twenty apologies for laying out a less number of shillings upon that print after Lionardo, which we christened the Lady Blanch;² when you looked at the purchase, and thought of the money—and thought of the money, and looked again at the picture—was there no pleasure in being a poor man? Now, you have nothing to do but to walk into Colnaghi's, and buy a wilderness of Lionardos. Yet do you?

"Then, do you remember our pleasant walks to Enfield, and Potter's Bar, and Waltham, when we had a holyday—holydays, and all other fun, are gone, now we are rich—and the little hand-basket in which I used to deposit our day's fare of savory cold lamb and salad—and how you would pry about at noon-tide for some decent house, where we might go in, and produce our store—only paying for the ale that you must call for—and speculate upon the looks of the landlady, and whether she was likely to allow us a table-cloth—and wish for such another honest hostess, as Izaak Walton has described¹ many a one on the pleasant banks of the Lea, when he went a-fishing—and sometimes they would prove obliging enough, and sometimes they would look grudgingly upon us—but we had cheerful looks still for one another, and would eat our plain food savorily, scarcely grudging Piscator his Trout Hall? Now, when we go out a day's pleasuring, which is seldom moreover, we ride part of the way—and go into a fine inn, and order the best of dinners, never debating the expense—which, after all, never has half the relish of those chance country snaps, when we were at the merry of uncertain usage, and a precarious welcome.

“You are too proud to see a play anywhere now but in the pit.² Do you remember where it was we used to sit, when we saw The Battle of Hexham, and The Surrender of Calais, and Bannister and Mrs. Bland in The Children in the Wood—when we squeezed out our shillings a-piece to sit three or four times in a season in the one-shilling gallery—where you felt all the time that you ought not to have brought me—and more strongly I felt obligation to you for having brought me—and the pleasure was the better for a little shame—and when the curtain drew up, what cared we for our place in the house, or what mattered it where we were sitting, when our thoughts were with Rosalind in Arden, or with Viola at the Court of Illyria? You used to say that the gallery was the best place of all for enjoying a play socially—that the relish of such exhibitions must be in proportion to the infrequency of going—that the company we met there, not being in general readers of plays, were obliged to attend the more, and did attend, to what was going on, on the stage—because a word lost would have been a chasm, which it was impossible for them to fill up. With such reflections we consoled our pride then—and I appeal to you, whether, as a woman, I met generally with less attention and accommodation than I have done since in more expensive situations in the house? The getting in indeed, and the crowding up those inconvenient staircases, was bad enough,—but there was still a law of civility to women recognized to quite as great an extent as we ever found in the other passages—and how a little difficulty overcome heightened the snug seat, and the play, afterwards! Now we can only pay our money, and walk in. You cannot see, you say, in the galleries now. I am sure we saw, and heard too, well enough then—but sight, and all, I think, is gone with our poverty

“There was pleasure in eating strawberries, before they became quite common—in the first dish of peas, while they were yet dear—to have them for a nice supper, a treat. What treat can we have now? If we were to treat ourselves now—that is, to have dainties a little above our means, it would be selfish and wicked. It is the very little more that we allow ourselves beyond what the actual poor can get at, that makes what I call a treat—when two people living together, as we have done, now and then indulge themselves in a cheap luxury, which both like; while each apologizes, and is willing to take both halves of the blame to his single share. I see no harm in people making much of themselves in that sense of the word. It may give them a hint how to make much of others. But now—what I mean by the word—we never do make much of ourselves. None but the poor can do it. I do not mean the veriest poor of all, but persons as we were, just above poverty.

“I know what you were going to say, that it is mighty pleasant at the end of the year to make all meet—and much ado we used to have every Thirty-first Night of December to account for our exceedings—many a long face did you make over your puzzled accounts, and in contriving to make it out how we had spent so much—or that we had not spent so much—or that it was impossible we should spend so much next year—and still we found our slender capital decreasing—but then, betwixt ways, and projects, and compromises of one sort or another, and talk of curtailing this charge, and doing without that for the future—and the hope that youth brings, and laughing spirits (in which you were never poor till now), we pocketed up our loss, and in conclusion, with ‘lusty brimmers’³ (as you used to quote it out of heartly cheerful Mr. Cotton, as you called him),² we used to welcome in the ‘coming guest.’³ Now we have no reckoning at all at the end of the old

Bridget is so sparing of her speech, on most occasions, that when she gets into a rhetorical vein, I am careful how I interrupt it. I could not help, however, smiling at the phantom of wealth which her dear imagination had conjured up out of a clear income of poor—hundred pounds a year. “It is true we were happier when we were poorer, but we were also younger, my cousin. I am afraid we must put up with the excess, for if we were to shake the superfluous into the sea, we should not much mend ourselves. That we had much to struggle with, as we grew up together, we have reason to be most thankful. It strengthened, and knit our compact closer. We could never have been what we have been to each other, if we had always had the sufficiency which you now complain of. The resisting power—those natural dilations of the youthful spirit, which circumstances cannot straiten—with us are long since passed away. Competence to age is supplementary youth; a sorry supplement indeed, but I fear the best that is to be had. We must ride, where we formerly walked—live better, and be softer—and shall be wise to do so—than we had means to do in those good old days you speak of. Yet could those days return—could you and I once more walk our thirty miles a day—could Bannister and Mrs Bland again be young, and you and I be young to see them—could the good old one-shilling gallery days return—they are dreams, my cousin, now—but could you and I at this moment, instead of this quiet argument, by our well-carpeted fire-side, sitting on this luxurious sofa—be once more struggling up those inconvenient stair-cases, pushed about, and squeezed, and elbowed by the poorest rabble of poor gallery scramblers—could I once more hear those anxious shrieks of yours—and the delicious Thank God, we are safe, which always followed when the topmost stair, conquered, let in the first light of the whole cheerful theatre down beneath us—I know not the fathom line that ever touched a descent so deep as I would be willing to bury more wealth in than Croesus had, or the great Jew R——¹ is supposed to have, to purchase it. And now do just look at that merry little Chinese waiter holding an umbrella, big enough for a bed-tester,² over the head of that pretty insipid

POOR RELATIONS

A poor relation is the most irrelevant thing in nature,—a piece of impertinent correspondency,—an odious approximation,—a haunting conscience,—a preposterous shadow, lengthening in the noontide of your prosperity,—an unwelcome remembrance,—a perpetually recurring mortification,—a drain on your purse,—a more intolerable dun upon your pride,—a drawback upon success,—a rebuke to you rising,—a stain in your blood,—a blot on your scutcheon,—a rent in your garment,—a death’s head at your banquet,—Agathocles’ pot,³—a Mordecai in your gate,⁴—a Lazarus at your door,⁵—a lion in your path,⁶—a frog in your chamber,⁷—a fly in your ointment,⁸—a mote in your eye,⁹—a triumph to your enemy,—an apology to your friends,—the one thing not needful,¹⁰—the hail in harvest,¹¹—the ounce of sour in a pound of sweet.¹²

He is known by his knock. Your heart telleth you “That is Mr. —.” A rap, between familiarity and respect, that demands, and at the same time, seems to despair of entertainment. He entereth smiling, and—embarrassed. He holdeth out his hand to you to shake, and—draweth it back again. He casually looketh in about dinner time—when the table is full. He offereth to go away, seeing you have company—but is induced to stay. He filleth a chair, and your visitor’s two children are accommodated at a side table. He never cometh upon open days, when your wife says with some complacency, “My dear, perhaps Mr. — will drop in today.” He remembereth birthdays—and professeth he is fortunate to have stumbled upon one. He declareth against fish, the turbot being small—yet suffereth himself to be importuned into a slice against his first resolution. He sticketh by the port—yet will be prevailed upon to empty the remainder glass of claret, if a stranger press

it upon him. He is a puzzle to the servants, who are fearful of being too obsequious, or not civil enough, to him. The guests think "they have seen him before." Every one speculateth upon his condition,¹ and the most part take him to be—a tide-waiter.² He calleth you by your Christian name, to imply that his other is the same with your own. He is too familiar by half, yet you wish he had less diffidence. With half the familiarity he might pass for a casual dependent, with more boldness he would be in no danger of being taken for what he is. He is too humble for a friend, yet taketh on him more state than befits a client.³ He is a worse guest than a country tenant, inasmuch as he bringeth up no rent—yet 'tis odds, from his garb and demeanor that your guests take him for one. He is asked to make one at the whist table; refuseth on the score of poverty, and—resents being left out. When the company breaks up, he proffereth to go for a coach—and lets the servant go. He recollects your grandfather; and will thrust in some mean, and quite unimportant anecdote of—the family. He knew it when it was not quite so flourishing as "he is blest in seeing it now." He reviveth past situations, to institute what he calleth—favorable comparisons. With a reflecting sort of congratulation, he will inquire the price of your furniture; and insults you with a special commendation of your window-curtains. He is of opinion that the urn is the more elegant shape, but, after all, there was something more comfortable about the old tea-kettle—which you must remember. He dare say you must find a great convenience in having a carriage of your own, and appealeth to your lady if it is not so. Inquireth if you have had your arms done on vellum yet; and did not know till lately that such-and-such had been the crest of the family. His memory is unreasonable; his compliments perverse; his talk a trouble; his stay pertinacious; and when he goeth away, you dismiss his chair into a corner, as precipitately as possible, and feel fairly rid of two nuisances.

There is a worse evil under the sun, and that is—a female Poor Relation. You may do something with the other; you may pass him off tolerably well; but your indigent she-relative is hopeless. "He is an old humorist," you may say, "and affects to go threadbare. His circumstances are better than folks would take them to be. You are fond of having a Character at your table, and truly he is one." But in the indications of female poverty there can be no disguise. No woman dresses below herself from caprice. The truth must out without shuffling. "She is plainly related to the L—s; or what does she at their house?" She is, in all probability, your wife's cousin. Nine times out of ten, at least, this is the case. Her garb is something between a gentlewoman and a beggar, yet the former evidently predominates. She is most provokingly humble and ostentatiously sensible to her inferiority. He may require to be repressed sometimes—*aliquando sufflaminandus erat*¹—but there is no raising her. You send her soup at dinner, and she begs to be helped—after the gentlemen. Mr. — requests the honor of taking wine with her; she hesitates between port and Madeira, and chooses the former—because he does. She calls the servant Sir; and insists on not troubling him to hold her plate. The housekeeper patronizes her. The children's governess takes upon her to correct her, when she has mistaken the piano for a harpsichord.

Richard Amlet, Esq., in the play,² is a notable instance of the disadvantages, to which this chimerical notion of affinity constituting a claim to acquaintance, may subject the spirit of a gentleman. A little foolish blood is all that is betwixt him and a lady of great estate. His stars are perpetually crossed by the malignant maternity of an old woman, who persists in calling him "her son Dick." But she has wherewithal in the end to recompense his indignities, and float him again upon the brilliant surface, under which it had been her seeming business and pleasure all along to sink him. All men, besides, are not of Dick's temperament. I knew an Amlet in real life, who, wanting Dick's buoyancy, sank indeed. Poor W—— was of my own standing at Christ's, a fine classic, and a youth of promise. If he had a blemish, it was too much pride; but its quality was inoffensive; it was not of that sort which hardens the heart, and serves to keep inferiors at a distance; it only sought to ward off derogation from itself. It was the principle of self-respect carried as far as it could go, without infringing upon that respect, which he would have every one else equally maintain for himself. He would have you to think alike with him on this topic. Many a quarrel have I had with him, when we were rather older boys, and our tallness¹ made us more obnoxious to observation in the blue clothes, because I would not thread the alleys and blind ways of the town with him to elude notice, when we have been out together on a holiday in the streets of this sneering and prying metropolis. W—— went, sore with these notions, to Oxford, where the dignity and sweetness of a scholar's life, meeting with the alloy of a humble introduction, wrought in him a passionate devotion to the place, with a profound aversion from the society. The servitor's gown² (worse than his school array) clung to him with Nessian venom.³ He thought himself ridiculous in a garb, under which Latimer⁴ would have walked erect; and in which Hooker⁵ in his young days, possibly flaunted in a vein of no discommendable vanity. In the depth of college shades, or in his lonely chamber, the poor student shrunk from observation. He found shelter among books, which insult not; and studies, that ask no questions of a youth's finances. He was lord of his library, and seldom cared for looking out beyond his domains. The healing influence of studious pursuits was upon him, to soothe and to abstract. He was almost a healthy man; when the waywardness of his fate broke out against him with a second and worse malignity. The father of W—— had hitherto exercised the humble profession of house-painter at N——, near Oxford. A supposed interest with some of the heads of the colleges had now induced him to take up his abode in that city, with the hope of being employed upon some public works which were talked of. From that moment I read in the countenance of the young man, the determination which at length tore him from academical pursuits forever. To a person unacquainted with our universities, the distance between the gownsmen and the townsmen, as they are called—the trading part of the latter especially—is carried to an excess that would appear harsh and incredible. The temperament of W——'s father was diametrically the reverse of his own. Old W—— was a little, busy, cringing tradesman, who, with his son upon his arm, would stand bowing and scraping, cap in hand, to anything that wore the semblance of a gown—insensible to the winks and opener remonstrances of the young man, to whose chamber-fellow, or equal in standing, perhaps, he was thus obsequiously and gratuitously ducking. Such a state of things could not last. W—— must change the air of Oxford or be suffocated. He chose the former; and let the sturdy moralist, who strains the point of the filial duties as high as they can bear, censure the dereliction; he cannot estimate the struggle. I stood with W——, the last afternoon I ever saw him, under the eaves of his paternal dwelling. It was in the fine lane leading from the High-street to the back of —— College, where W—— kept his rooms. He seemed thoughtful, and more reconciled. I ventured to rally him—finding him in a better mood—upon a representation of the Artist Evangelist,¹ which the old man, whose affairs were beginning to flourish, had caused to be set up in a splendid sort of frame over his really handsome shop, either as a token of prosperity, or badge of gratitude to his saint. W—— looked up at the Luke, and, like Satan, “knew his mounted sign—and fled.”² A letter on his father's table the next morning, announced that he had accepted a commission in a regiment about to embark for Portugal. He was among the first who perished before the walls of St. Sebastian.

I do not know how, upon a subject which I began with treating half-seriously, I should have fallen upon a recital so eminently painful; but this theme of poor relationship is replete with so much matter for tragic as well as comic associations, that it is difficult to keep the account distinct without blending. The earliest impressions which I received on this matter are certainly not attended with anything painful, or very humiliating, in the recalling. At my father's table (no very splendid one) was to be found, every Saturday, the mysterious figure of an aged gentleman, clothed in neat black, of a sad yet comely appearance. His deportment was of the essence of gravity; his words few or none; and I was not to make a noise in his presence. I had little inclination to have done so—for my cue was to admire in silence. A particular elbow chair was appropriated to him, which was in no case to be violated. A peculiar sort of sweet pudding, which appeared on no other occasion, distinguished the days of his coming. I used to think him a prodigiously rich man. All I could make out of him was, that he and my father had been school-fellows a world ago at Lincoln, and that he came from the Mint.¹ The Mint I knew to be a place where all the money was coined—and I thought he was the owner of all that money. Awful ideas of the Tower twined themselves about his presence. He seemed above human infirmities and passions. A sort of melancholy grandeur invested him. From some inexplicable doom I fancied him obliged to go about in an eternal suit of mourning; a captive—a stately being, let out of the Tower on Saturdays. Often have I wondered at the temerity of my father, who, in spite of an habitual general respect which we all in common manifested towards him, would venture now and then to stand up against him in some argument, touching their youthful days. The houses of the ancient city of Lincoln are divided (as most of my readers know) between the dwellers on the hill, and in the valley. This marked distinction formed an obvious division between the boys who lived above (however brought together in a common school) and the boys whose paternal residence was on the plain; a sufficient cause of hostility in the code of these young Grotiuses.² My father had been a leading Mountaineer; and would still maintain the general superiority, in skill and hardihood, of the Above Boys (his own faction) over the Below Boys (so were they called), of which party his contemporary had been a chieftain. Many and hot were the skirmishes on this topic—the only one upon which the old gentleman was ever brought out—and had blood bred; even sometimes almost to the recommencement (so I expected) of actual hostilities. But my father, who scorned to insist upon advantages, generally contrived to turn the conversation upon some adroit by-commendation of the old Minster, in the general preference of which, before all other cathedrals in the island, the dweller on the hill, and the plain-born, could meet on a conciliating level, and lay down their less important differences. Once only I saw the old gentleman really ruffled, and I remember with anguish the thought that came over me: "Perhaps he will never come here again." He had been pressed to take another plate of the viand, which I have already mentioned as the indispensable concomitant of his visits. He had refused, with a resistance amounting to rigor—when my aunt, an old Lincolnian, but who had something of this, in common with my cousin Bridget, that she would sometimes press civility out of season—uttered the following memorable application—"Do take another slice, Mr Billet, for you do not get pudding every day." The old gentleman said nothing at the time—but he took occasion in the course of the evening, when some argument had intervened between them, to utter with an emphasis which chilled the company, and which chills me now as I write it—"Woman, you are superannuated." John Billet did not survive long, after the digesting of this affront; but he survived long enough to assure me that peace was actually restored³ and, if I remember aright, another pudding was discreetly substituted in the place of that which had occasioned the offence. He died at the Mint (Anno 1781) where he had long held, what he accounted, a comfortable independence; and with five pounds, fourteen shillings, and a penny, which were found in his escrutoire after his decease, left the world, blessing God that he had enough to bury him, and that he had never been obliged to any man for a sixpence. This was—a Poor Relation.

SANITY OF TRUE GENIUS

So far from the position holding true, that great wit (or genius, in our modern way of speaking) has a necessary alliance with insanity, the greatest wits, on the contrary, will ever be found to be the sanest writers. It is impossible for the mind to conceive of a mad Shakspeare. The greatness of wit, by which the poetic talent is here chiefly to be understood, manifests itself in the admirable balance of all the faculties. Madness is the disproportionate straining or excess of any one of them "So strong a wit," says Cowley, speaking of a poetical friend,

"—did Nature to him frame,

As all things but his judgment overcame,
His judgment like the heavenly moon did show, Tempering that mighty sea below."⁴

¹ On the Death of Mr William Hervey, 97-100.

¹ The Mint was near the Tower of London, the state prison.

² Law students. Hugo Grotius (1583-1645) was the great Dutch authority on international law.

The ground of the mistake is that men, finding in the raptures of the higher poetry a condition of exaltation, to which they have no parallel in their own experience, besides the spurious resemblance of it in dreams and fevers, impute a state of dreaminess and fever to the poet. But the true poet dreams being awake. He is not possessed by his subject, but has dominion over it. In the groves of Eden he walks familiar as in his native paths. He ascends the empyrean heaven, and is not intoxicated. He treads the burning marl¹ without dismay; he wins his flight without self-loss through realms of chaos "and old night."² Or if, abandoning himself to that severer chaos of a "human mind untuned,"³ he is content awhile to be mad with Lear, or to hate mankind (a sort of madness) with Timon, neither is that madness, nor the misanthropy, so unchecked, but that,—never letting the reins of reason wholly go, while most he seems to do so,—he has his better genius still whispering at his ear, with the good servant Kent suggesting saner counsels,⁴ or with the honest steward Flavius recommending kindlier resolutions.⁵ Where he seems most to recede from humanity, he will be found the truest to it. From beyond the scope of Nature if he summon possible existences, he subjugates them to the law of her consistency. He is beautifully loyal to that sovereign directress, even when he appears most to betray and desert her. His ideal tribes submit to policy, his very monsters are tamed to his hand, even as that wild sea-brood, shepherded by Proteus. He tames, and he clothes them with attributes of flesh and blood, till they wonder at themselves, like Indian Islanders forced to submit to European vesture. Caliban, the Witches, are as true to the laws of their own nature (ours with a difference) as Othello, Hamlet, and Macbeth. Herein the great and little wits are differenced, that if the latter wander ever so little from nature or actual existence, they lose themselves and their readers. Their phantoms are lawless; their visions nightmares. They do not create, which implies shaping and consistency. Their imaginations are not active—for to be active is to call something into act and form—but passive, as men in sick dreams. For the super-natural, or something super-added to what we know of nature, they give you the plainly non-natural. And if this were all, and that these mental hallucinations were discoverable only in the treatment of subjects out of nature, or transcending it, the judgment might with some plea be pardoned if it ran riot, and a little wantonized.¹ but even in the describing of real and everyday life, that which is before their eyes, one of these lesser wits shall more deviate from nature—show more of that inconsequence, which has a natural alliance with frenzy,—than a great genius in his "maddest fits," as Wither somewhere calls them.² We appeal to any one that is acquainted with the common run of Lane's novels,—as they existed some twenty or thirty years back,—those scanty intellectual vands of the whole female reading public, till a happier genius³ arose, and expelled forever the innutritious phantoms,—whether he has not found his brain more "betossed,"⁴ his memory more puzzled, his sense of when and where more confounded, among the improbable events, the incoherent incidents, the inconsistent characters, or no-characters, of some third-rate love intrigue—where the persons shall be a Lord Glendamour and a Miss Rivers, and the scene only alternate between Bath and Bond-street—a more bewildering dreaminess induced upon him than he has felt wandering over all the fairy grounds of Spenser. In the productions we refer to, nothing but names and places is familiar, the persons are neither of this world nor of any other conceivable one; an endless string of activities without purpose, of purposes destitute of motive:—we meet phantoms in our known walks, *fantasques*⁵ only christened. In the poet we have names which announce fiction, and we have absolutely no place at all, for the things and persons of The Fairy Queen prate not of their "whereabout."⁶ But in their inner nature, and the law of their speech and actions, we are at home and upon acquainted ground. The one turns life into a dream; the other to the wildest dreams gives the sobrieties of everyday occurrences. By what subtle art of tracing the mental processes it is effected, we are not philosophers enough to explain, but in that wonderful episode of the cave of Mammon,⁷ in which the Money God appears first in the lowest form of a miser, is then a worker of metals, and becomes the god of all the treasures of the world; and has a daughter, Ambition, before whom all the world kneels for favors—with the Hesperian fruit,¹ the waters of Tantalus, with Pilate washing his hands vainly,² but not impertinently, in the same stream—that we should be at one moment in the cave of an old hoarder of treasures, at the next at the forge of the Cyclops, in a palace and yet in hell, all at once, with the shifting mutations of the most rambling dream, and our judgment yet all the time awake, and neither able nor willing to detect the fallacy,—is a proof of that hidden sanity which still guides the poet in his widest seeming-aberrations.

It is not enough to say that the whole episode is a copy of the mind's conceptions in sleep; it is, in some sort—but what a copy! Let the most romantic of us, that has been entertained all night with the spectacle of some wild and magnificent vision, recombine it in the morning, and try it by his waking judgment. That which appeared so shifting, and yet so coherent, while that faculty was passive, when it comes under cool examination, shall appear so reasonless and so unlinked, that we are ashamed to have been so deluded; and to have taken, though but in sleep, a monster for a god. But the transitions in this episode are every whit as violent as in the most extravagant dream, and yet the waking judgment ratifies them.

THE DEATH OF COLERIDGE

IN THE ALBUM OF MR KEYMER
1834 1835

When I heard of the death of Coleridge, it was without grief. It seemed to me that he long had been on the confines of the next world,—that he had a hunger for eternity. I grieved then that I could not grieve. But since, I feel how great a part he was³ of me. His great and dear spirit haunts me. I cannot think a thought, I cannot make a criticism on men or books, without an ineffectual turning and reference to him. He was the proof and touchstone of all my cogitations. He was a Grecian⁴ (or in the first form) at Christ's Hospital, where I was deputy Grecian; and the same subordination and deference to him I have preserved through a life-long acquaintance. Great in his writings, he was greatest in his conversation. In him was disproved that old maxim that we should allow every one his share of talk. He would talk from morn to dewy eve,¹ nor cease till far midnight, yet who ever would interrupt him,—who would obstruct that continuous flow of converse, fetched from Helicon or Zion? He had the tact of making the unintelligible seem plain. Many who read the abstruser parts of his Friend would complain that his words did not answer to his spoken wisdom. They were identical. But he had a tone in oral delivery, which seemed to convey sense to those who were otherwise imperfect recipients. He was my fifty-year-old friend without a dissension. Never saw I his likeness, nor probably the world can see again. I seemed to love the house he died at more passionately than when he lived. I love the faithful Gilmans² more than while they exercised their virtues towards him living. What was his mansion is consecrated to me a chapel.

² Coleridge was a frequent visitor at the home of the Gilmans, in Highgate. They cared for him at the time of his last illness and death.

- But that upon their towering heads they bore Each a huge stone, refulgent as the stars.
 Thus told she Dalica, then cried aloud,
 "If on your bosom laying down my head 30 I sobb'd away the sorrows of a child, If I have always, and Heav'n knows I have,
 Next to a mother's held a nurse's name, Succor this one distress, recall those days, Love me, tho' 'twere because you lov'd me then."
- 35 But whether confident in magic rites Or touch'd with sexual pride to stand implor'd, Dalica smiled, then spake—"Away those fears.
 Though stronger than the strongest of his kind,
 He falls; on me devolve that charge; he falls.
- 38 Rather than fly him, stoop thou to allure.
 Nay, journey to his tents. A city stood Upon that coast, they say, by Sidat built.
 Whose father Gad built Gadir; on this ground Perhaps he sees an ample room for war
- 35 Persuade him to restore the walls himself In honor of his ancestors, persuade—But wherefore this advice? young, unespoused, Charoba want persuasions' and a queen'"
 "O Dalica!" the shuddering maid exclaim'd,
- 40 Could I encounter that fierce frightful man?
 Could I speak? no, nor sigh"—"And canst thou reign?"
 Cried Dalica; "yield empire or comply" Unfix'd, though seeming fix'd, her eyes downcast,
 The wonted buzz and bustle of the court
- 45 From far through sculptured galleries met her ear, Then lifting up her head, the evening sun Pour'd a fresh splendor on her burnish'd throne.
 The fair Charoba, the young queen, complied.
 But Gebir, when he heard of her approach.
- 50 Laid by his orb'd shield; his vizor-helm,
 His buckler and his corset he laid by.
 And bade that none attend him: at his side
 Two faithful dogs that urge the silent course, Shaggy, deep-chested, crouch'd; the crocodile,
- 55 Crying, oft made them raise their flaccid ears
 And push their heads within their master's hand.
 There was a brightening paleness in his face,
 Such as Diana rising o'er the rocks Shower'd on the lonely Latmian; on his brow
- 60 Sorrow there was, yet nought was there severe.
 But when the royal damsel first he saw,
 Faint, hanging on her handmaid, and her knees Tottering, as from the motion of the ear, His eyes look'd earnest on her, and those eyes
- 65 Show'd, if they had not, that they might have, lov'd,
 For there was pity in them at that hour.
 With gentle speech, and more with gentle looks,
 He sooth'd her; but lest Pity go beyond And cross'd Ambition lose her lofty aim,
- 70 Bending, he kiss'd her garment, and retired.
 He went, nor slumber'd in the sultry noon,
 When viands, couches, generous wines, persuade,
 And slumber most refreshes; nor at night,
 When heavy dews are laden with disease;
- 75 And blindness waits not there for lingering age.
 Ere morning dawn'd behind him, he arrived At those rich meadows where young Tamar fed
 The royal flocks entrusted to his care.
 "Now," said he to himself, "will I repose
- 80 At least this burthen on a brother's breast."
 His brother stood before him: he, amazed, Reas'd suddenly his head, and thus began.
 "Is it thou, brother! Tamar, is it thou!
 Why, standing on the valley's utmost verge,
- 85 Lookest thou on that dull and dreary shore Where beyond sight Nile blackens all the sand?
 And why that sadness? When I pass'd our sheep
 The dew-drops were not shaken off the bar, Therefore if one be wanting, 'tis untold."
- 90 "Yes, one is wanting, nor is that untold," Said Tamar; "and this dull and dreary shore

- Is neither dull nor dreary at all hours." Whereon the tear stole silent down his cheek, Silent, but not by Gebir unobserv'd:
 95 Wondering he gazed awhile, and pitying spake.
 "Let me approach thee; does the morning light Scatter this wan suffusion o'er thy brow, This faint blue lustre under both thine eyes?"
 "O brother, is this pity or reproach?" 100 Cried Tamar, "cruel if it be reproach, If pity, O how vain!"—"Whate'er at be That grieves thee, I will pity, thou but speak, And I can tell thee, Tamar, pang for pang"
 "Gebir! then more than brothers are we now!
 105 Everything (take my hand) will I confess.
 I neither feed the flock nor watch the fold;
 How can I, lost in love? But, Gebir, why That anger which has risen to your cheek?
 Can other men? could you? what, no reply!
 110 And still more anger, and still worse conceal'd!
 Are these your promises? your pity this?"
 "Tamar, I well may pity what I feel—Mark me aright—I feel for thee—proceed—Relate me all"—"Then will I all relate, 115 Said the young shepherd, gladden'd from his heart
 " 'Twas evening, though not sunset, and the tide Level with these green meadows, seem'd yet higher:
 'Twas pleasant; and I loosen'd from my neck
 The pipe you gave me, and began to play 120 O that I ne'er had learnt the tuneful art!
 It always brings us enemies or love.
 Well, I was playing, when above the waves
 Some swimmer's head methought I saw ascend:
 I, sitting still, survey'd it, with my pipe 125 Awkwardly held before my lips half-closed, Gebir! it was a Nymph! a Nymph divine!
 I cannot wait describing how she came,
 How I was sitting, how she first assum'd
 The sailor; of what happen'd there remains 130 Enough to say, and too much to forget.
 The sweet deceiver stepp'd upon this bank Before I was aware, for with surprise Moments fly rapid as with love itself.
 Stooping to tune afresh the hoarsen'd
 reed,
 135 I heard a rustling, and where that arose
 My glance first lighted on her nimble feet.
 Her feet resembled those long shells¹ explored
 By him who to befriend his steed's dim sight Would blow the pungent powder in the eye 140 Her eyes too! O immortal Gods! her eyes Resembled—what could they resemble?
 what Ever resemble those? Even her attire
 Was not of wonted woof nor vulgar art:
 Her mantle show'd the yellow samphire-pod, 145 Her girdle the dove-color'd wave serene.
 'Shepherd,' said she, 'and will you wrestle now,
 And with the sailor's hardier race engage?'
 I was rejoiced to hear it, and contrived
 How to keep up contention: could I fall 150 By pressing not too strongly, yet to press?
 'Whether a shepherd, as indeed you seem,
 Or whether of the hardier race you boast,
 I am not daunted; no; I will engage.'
 'But first,' said she, 'what wager will you lay?' 155 'A sheep,' I answered: 'add whate'er you will'
 'I cannot,' she replied, 'make that return:
 Our hidèd vessels in their pitchy round Seldom, unless from rapine, hold a sheep
 But I have sinuous shells of pearly hue 160 Within, and they that lustre have imbibed
 In the sun's palace-porch, where when unyoked His chariot-wheel stands midway in the wave:
 Shake one and it awakens, then apply
 Its polish'd lips to your attentive ear, 165 And it remembers its august abodes, And murmurs as the ocean murmurs there.
 And I have others given me by the nymphs,
 Of sweeter sound than any pipe you have;²
 But we, by Neptune¹ for no pipe contend.
 170 This time a sheep I win, a pipe the next'
 Now came she forward eager to engage,
 But first her dress, her bosom then survey'd.

¹ White shells of cuttlefish² For a similar passage, see Wordsworth's The Excursion, 4 1172-40, and Byron's The Island 2 408 15

And heav'd it, doubting if she could deceive.
 Her bosom seem'd, melos'd in haze like heav'n, 175 To baffle touch, and rose forth undefined, Above her knee she drew the robe suc-cinet,¹ Above her breast, and just below her arms
 'This will preserve my breath when tightly
 bound,
 If struggle and equal strength should so constrain.'
 180 Thus, pulling hard to fasten it, she spake.
 And, rushing at me, closed. I thrill'd throughout
 And seem'd to lessen and shrink up with cold.
 Again with violent impulse gush'd my
 blood,
 And hearing nought external, thus ab-sorb'd, 185 I heard it, rushing through each turbid
 vein,
 Shake my unsteady swimming sight in air Yet with unyielding though uncertain arms
 I clung around her neck; the vest beneath Rustled against our shivery limbs entwined.
 190 Often mine springing with eluded force Started aside and trembled till replaced.
 And when I most succeeded, as I thought, My bosom and my throat felt so com-
 press'd
 That life was almost quivering on my lips.
 195 Yet nothing was there painful: these are signs
 Of secret arts and not of human might.
 What arts I cannot tell, I only know My eyes grew dizzy and my strength decay'd.
 I was indeed o'ercome—with what regret, 200 And more, with what confusion, when I reach'd
 The fold, and yielding up the sheep, she cried,
 'This pays a shepherd to a conquering
 maid'
 She smiled, and more of pleasure than disdain
 Was in her dimpled chin and liberal lip.
 205 And eyes that languish'd, lengthening, just like love
 She went away; I on the wicker gate Leant, and could follow with my eyes
 alone.
 The sheep she carried easy as a cloak;
 1 girded; tucked up

But when I heard its bleating, as I did, 210 And saw, she hastening on, its hinder
 feet
 Struggle, and from her snowy shoulder slip,
 One shoulder its poor efforts had unveil'd,
 Then all my passions mingling fell in
 tears;
 Restless then ran I to the highest ground 215 To watch her, she was gone, gone down
 the tide;
 And the long moon-beam on the hard wet
 sand Lay like a jasper column half up-rear'd."
 "But, Tamar! tell me, will she not return?"
 "She will return, yet not before the
 moon
 220 Again is at the full: she promis'd this, Tho' when she promis'd I could not reply."
 "By all the Gods I pity thee! go on, Fear not my anger, look not on my
 shame,
 For when a lover only hears of love 225 He finds his folly out, and is ashamed Away with watchful nights and lonely
 days, Contempt of earth and aspect up to
 heaven,
 With contemplation, with humility, A tatter'd cloak that pride wears when deform'd.
 230 Away with all that hides me from myself.
 Parts me from others, whispers I am
 From our own wisdom less is to be reap'd Than from the basest folly of our friend.
 Tamar! thy pastures, large and rich, afford 235 Flowers to thy bees and herbage to thy sheep,
 But, battered on too much, the poorest croft
 Of thy poor neighbor yields what thine denies."
 They hasten'd to the camp, and Gebir
 there
 Resolved his native country to forego, 240 And order'd from those ruins to the right
 They forthwith raise a city Tamar heard With wonder, tho' in passing 'twas half-fold.
 His brother's love, and sigh'd upon his own.

ROSE AYLMER
1808

Ah, what avails the sceptred race,¹ Ah, what the form divine!
 What every virtue, every grace!
 Rose Aylmer, all were thine.
 5 Rose Aylmer, whom these wakeful eyes May weep, but never see,
 A night of memories and of sighs
 I consecrate to thee.

CHILD OF A DAY, THOU KNOWEST
1831

Child of a day, thou knowest not The tears that overflow thine urn,
 The gushing eyes that read thy lot,
 Nor, if thou knewest, couldst return!
 5 And why the wish! the pure and blest Watch like thy mother o'er thy sleep
 O peaceful night! O envied rest!
 Thou wilt not ever see her weep

FOR AN EPITAPH AT FIESOLE
1831

Lo! where the four mimosas blend their
 shade
 In calm repose at last is Landor laid,
 For ere he slept he saw them planted here
 By her his soul had ever held most dear, 5 And he had lived enough when he had dried her tear

LYRICS, TO IANTHE
1808-63HOMAGE
1831

Away, my verse; and never fear,
 As men before such beauty do;
 On you she will not look severe,
 She will not turn her eyes from you 5 Some happier graces could I lend That in her memory you should live.
 Some little blemishes might blend,
 For it would please her to forgive.

ON THE SMOOTH BROW AND CLUSTERING
1846

On the smooth brow and clustering hair, Myrtle and rose!² your wreath combine,
 The duller olive I would wear,
 Its constancy, its peace, be mine.

¹ A reference to the titled Aylmer family ² The myrtle and the rose are emblems of love

HEART'S-EASE
1858

There is a flower I wish to wear,
 But not until first worn by you—Heart's-ease—of all earth's flowers most rare;
 Bring it; and bring enough for two

IT OFTEN COMES INTO MY HEAD 1846

It often comes into my head
 That we may dream when we are dead,
 But I am far from sure we do O that it were so! then my rest 5 Would be indeed among the blest;
 I should forever dream of you.

ALL TENDER THOUGHTS THAT E'ER POSSESS'D
1831

All tender thoughts that e'er possess'd
 The human brain or human breast, Centre in mine for thee—Excepting one—and that must thou 5 Contribute: come, confer it now.
Grateful I fain would be

'THOU HAST NOT RAISED, IANTHE, SUCH
1846

Thou hast not rais'd, Ianthé, such desire
 In any breast as thou hast rais'd in mine
 No wandering meteor now, no marshy fire.
 Leads on my steps, but lofty, but divine.
 5 And, if thou chillest me, as chill thou dost When I approach too near, too boldly
 gaze,
 So chills the blushing morn, so chills the host
 Of vernal stars, with light more chaste than day's

PLEASURE! WHY THUS DESERT THE HEART 1831

Pleasure! why thus desert the heart
 In its spring-tide?
 I could have seen her, I could part,
 And but have sigh'd!

5 O'er every youthful charm to stray,
 To gaze, to touch—
 Pleasure! why take so much away,
 Or give so much!

RENUNCIATION
1846

Lie, my fond heart at rest,
She never can be ours.
Why strike upon my breast
The slowly passing hours?
5 Ah! breathe not out the name,
That fatal folly stay!
Conceal the eternal flame,
And tortured ne'er betray

YOU SMILED, YOU SPOKE, AND I BELIEVED 1846

You smiled, you spoke, and I believed,
By every word and smile deceived.
Another man would hope no more;
Nor hope I what I hoped before.
5 But let not this last wish be vain;
Deceive, deceive me once again.

SO LATE REMOVED, FROM HIM SHE SWORE 1831

So late removed from him she swore,
With clasping arms and vows and tears,
In life and death she would adore,
While memory, fondness, bliss, endears.

5 Can she forswear? can she forget?
Strike, mighty Love! strike, Vengeance!
Soft!
Conscience must come and bring regret—
These let her feel!—nor these too oft!

I HELD HER HAND, THE PLEDGE OF BLISS
1831

I held her hand, the pledge of bliss,
Her hand that trembled and withdrew;
She bent her head before my kiss—
My heart was sure that hers was true.
5 Now I have told her I must part,
She shakes my hand, she bids adieu, Nor shuns the kiss—Alas, my heart!
Hers never was the heart for you.

ABSENCE
1831

Ianthe! you are call'd to cross the sea:¹
A path forbidden me!
Remember, while the Sun his blessing sheds Upon the mountain-heads, 5 How often we have watch'd him laying
down
His brow, and dropp'd our own Against each other's, and how faint and short

¹In 1815, a short time after her marriage with M de Molandé, Sophia Jane Swift, the Ianthe of these poems, went to live in Paris

And sliding the support!
What will succeed it now? Mine is unblest,
Ianthe! nor will rest But on the very thought that swells with
pain.

O bid me hope again!
O give me back what Earth, what (without you)
Not Heaven itself can do, 15 One of the golden days that we have past,
And let it be my last!
Or else the gift would be, however sweet, Fragile and incomplete.

FLOW, PRECIOUS TEARS! THUS SHALL MY RIVAL KNOW 1806

Flow, precious tears! thus shall my rival
know
For me, not him, ye flow.
Stay, precious tears! ah, stay! this jealous heart
Would bid you flow apart, 5 Lest he should see you rising o'er the brim,
And hope you rise for him.
Your secret cells, while he is absent, keep.
Nor, tho' I'm absent, weep.

MILD IS THE PARTING YEAR, AND SWEET 1831

Mild is the parting year, and sweet
The odor of the falling spray;
Life passes on more rudely fleet,
And harmless is its closing day.
5 I wait its close, I court its gloom, But mourn that never must there fall Or on my breast or on my tomb
The tear that would have sooth'd it all

PAST RUIN'D ILION HELEN LIVES
1831

Past ruin'd Ilion Helen lives,
Alcestis rises from the shades;
Verse calls them forth; 'tis verse that gives Immortal youth to mortal maids

5 Soon shall Oblivion's deepening veil Hide all the peopled hills you see,
The gay, the proud, while lovers hail These many summers you and me.

HERE EVER SINCE YOU WENT ABROAD
1846

Here, ever since you went abroad,
If there be change, no change I see.
I only walk our wonted road,
The road is only walk'd by me.

⁵ Yes; I forgot; a change there is,
Was it of that you bade me tell?
I catch at times, at times I miss The sight, the tone, I know so well

Only two months since you stood here!
¹⁰ Two shortest months! then tell me why Voices are harsher than they were,
And tears are longer ere they dry

YEARS AFTER 1840

"Do you remember me? or are you proud?"
Lightly advancing thro' her star-triumph'd
crowd,
Lanthe said, and look'd into my eyes
"A yes, a yes, to both for Memoir ⁵ Where you but once have been must ever
be,
And at your voice Pride from his throne must rise."

SHE I LOVE (ALAS IN VAIN!)
1846

She I love (alas in vain!)
Floats before my slumbering eyes
When she comes she lulls my pain,
When she goes what pangs arise!
⁵ Thou whom love, whom memory flies, Gentle Sleep! prolong thy reign!
If even thus she soothe my sighs,
Never let me wake again!

NO, MY OWN LOVE OF OTHER YEARS 1846

No, my own love of other years!
No, it must never be Much rests with you that yet endears.
Alas! but what with me?
⁵ Could those bright years o'er me revolve
So gay, o'er you so fair,
The pearl of life we would dissolve And each the cup might share
You show that truth can ne'er decay.
¹⁰ Whatever fate befalls;
I, that the myrtle and the bay!
Shoot fresh on ruin'd wall-

I WONDER NOT THAT YOUTH REMAINS 1853

I wonder not that Youth remains
With you, wherever else she flies Where could she find such fair domains, Where bask beneath such sunny eyes?

¹ The myrtle is an emblem of love; the bay, or laurel, an emblem of honor or victory

YOUR PLEASURES SPRING LIKE DAISIES IN THE GRASS
1846

Your pleasures spring like daisies in the grass,
'Cut down, and up again as blithe as ever,
From you, Lanthe, little troubles pass Like little ripples down a sunny river.

YEARS, MANY PARTI-COLORED YEARS
1853

Years, many parti-colored years,
Some have crept on, and some have flown Since first before me fell those tears
I never could see fall alone ⁵ Years, not so many, are to come,
Years not so varied, when from you One more will fall - when, carried home, I see it not, nor hear adieu

WELL I REMEMBER HOW YOU SMILED
1863

Well I remember how you smiled
To see me write your name upon The soft sea-sand "O! what a child!"
You think you're writing upon stone!"
⁵ I have since written what no tide Shall ever wash away, what men Unborn shall read o'er ocean wide And find Lanthe's name again

A FIESOLAN IDYL
1831

Here, where precipitate Spring with one light bound Into hot Summer's lusty arms expires, And where go forth at noon, at eve, at
night,
Soft airs that want the lute to play with
'em,
⁵ And softer sighs that know not what they want,
Aside a wall, beneath an orange-tree, Whose tallest flowers could tell the lower ones
Of sights in Fiesolè right up above
While I was gazing a few paces off ¹⁰ At what they seem'd to show me with their nods,
Then frequent whispers and their pointing
shoots,
A gentle maid came down the garden-steps
And gathered the pure treasure in her lap
I heard the branches rustle, and stepp'd
forth
¹⁵ To drive the ox away, or mule, or goat,

¹ Landor lived for some years in Fiesole, near Florence, Italy

Such I believed it must be. How could I Let beast o'erpower them? When hath wind or rain Borne hard upon weak plant that wanted
 me,
 And I (however they might bluster round) 20 Walk'd off? 'Twere most ungrateful: for sweet scents
 Are the swift vehicles of still sweeter
 thoughts,
 And nurse and pillow the dull memory
 That would let drop without them her best stores
 They bring me tales of youth and tones
 of love,
 25 And 'tis and ever was my wish and way
 To let all flowers live freely, and all die (Whene'er their Genius bids their souls depart)
 Among their kindred in their native place
 I never pluck the rose, the violet's head 30 Hath shaken with my breath upon its bank And not reproach'd me, the ever-sacred cup
 Of the pure lily hath between my hands Felt safe, unsoil'd, nor lost one grain of gold.
 I saw the light that made the glossy leaves 35 More glossy; the fair arm, the fairer cheek
 Warned by the eye intent on its pursuit,
 I saw the foot that, although half-erect From its gray slipper, could not lift her up
 To what she wanted: I held down a branch 40 And gather'd her some blossoms; since their hour
 Was come, and bees had wounded them, and flies
 Of harder wing were working their way thro'
 And scattering them in fragments under foot.
 So crisp were some, they rattled unevolved.
 45 Others, ere broken off, fell into shells,
 For such appear the petals when detach'd.
 Unbending, brittle, lucid, white like snow.
 And like snow not seen through, by eye or sun.
 Yet every one her gown received from me 50 Was fairer than the first. I thought not so.
 But so she praised them to reward my
 care.
 I said, "You find the largest."
 "This indeed," Cried she, "is large and sweet." She held one forth, Whether for me to look at or to take 55 She knew not, nor did I; but taking it Would best have solved (and this she felt) her doubt.

 I dared not touch it; for it seemed a part Of her own self; fresh, full, the most mature
 Of blossoms, yet a blossom; with a touch 60 To fall, and yet unfallen. She drew back The boon she tender'd, and then, finding
 not
 The ribbon at her waist to fix it in,
 Dropp'd it, as loth to drop it, on the rest.

From THE CITATION AND EXAMINATION OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE
 1834

THE MAID'S LAMENT

I loved him not, and yet now he is gone
 I feel I am alone
 I check'd¹ him while he spoke, yet could he speak,
 Alas! I would not check.
 5 For reasons not to love him once I sought,
 And wearied all my thought To vex myself and him: I now would give My love, could he but live Who lately lived for me, and when he found 10 'Twas vain, in holy ground
 He hid his face amid the shades of death
 I waste for him my breath
 Who wasted his for me but mine returns,
 And this lorn bosom burns 15 With stifling heat, heaving it up in sleep,
 And waking me to weep Tears that had melted his soft heart for years
 Wept he as bitter tears.
 Merciful God! such was his latest prayer, 20 These may she never share.
 Quieter is his breath, his breast more cold,
 Than daisies in the mould, Where children spell, athwart the churchyard gate,
 His name, and life's brief date 25 Pray for him, gentle souls, whoe'er you be,
 And, O! pray too for me

UPON A SWEET BRIAR

My briar that smelledst sweet When gentle spring's first heat Ran through thy quiet veins,— Thou that wouldst injure none,
 But wouldst be left alone, 5 Alone thou leavest me, and nought of thine remains

What! hath no poet's lyre O'er thee, sweet-breathing briar, ¹ rebuked

10 Hung fondly, ill or well?
And yet methinks with thee
A poet's sympathy,
Whether in weal or woe, in life or death, might dwell.

15 Hard usage both must bear, Few hands your youth will rear,
Few bosoms cherish you,
Your tender prime must bleed Ere you are sweet, but freed From life, you then are prized; thus prized are poets too.

20 And art thou yet alive?
And shall the happy hive Send out her youth to cull Thy sweets of leaf and flower.
And spend the sunny hour With thee, and thy faint heart with murmuring music lull?

25 Tell me what tender care, Tell me what pious prayer,
Bade thee arise and live.
The fondest-favored bee Shall whisper nought to thee 30 More loving than the song my grateful muse shall give.

CORINNA TO TANAGRA
FROM ATHENS

Tanagra! think not I forget Thy beautifully-storied streets,
Be sure my memory bathes yet In clear Thermodon, and yet greets 5 The blithe and liberal shepherd-boy, Whose sunny bosom swells with joy
When we accept his matted rushes Upheav'd with sylvan fruit: away he bounds, and blushes.

A gift I promise: one I see 10 Which thou with transport wilt receive,
The only proper gift for thee,
Of which no mortal shall bereave
In later times thy mouldering walls, Until the last old turret falls;
15 A crown, a crown from Athens won.
A crown no God can wear, beside Latona's son.

There may be cities who refuse To their own child the honors due.
And look ungently on the Muse:
20 But ever shall those cities rue

The dry, unyielding, niggard breast, Offering no nourishment, no rest,
To that young head which soon shall
rise Disdainfully, in might and glory, to the skies.

25 Sweetly where cavern'd Dirce flows Do white-arm'd maidens chant my lay, Flapping the while with laurel-rose
The honey-gathering tribes away;
And sweetly, sweetly Attic tongues 30 Lisp your Corinna's early songs;
To her with feet more graceful come The verses that have dwelt in kindred breasts at home.

O let thy children lean aslant Against the tender mother's knee, 35 And gaze into her face, and want To know what magic there can be In words that urge some eyes to dance, While others as in holy trance Look up to heaven: be such my praise!
40 Why linger? I must haste, or lose the Delphic bays.¹

I WILL NOT LOVE

I will not love!

—These sounds have often Burst from a troubled breast;
Rarely from one no sighs could soften, 5 Rarely from one at rest.

THE DEATH OF ARTEMIDORA

Artemidora! Gods invisible, While thou art lying faint along the couch,
Have tied the sandal to thy veined feet And stand beside thee, ready to convey 5 Thy weary steps where other rivers flow Refreaching shades will waft thy weariness Away, and voices like thy own come nigh Soliciting nor vainly thy embrace Artemidora sigh'd, and would have
press'd
10 The hand now pressing hers, but was too weak.
Fate's shears were over her dark hair
unseen
While thus Elpenor spake He look'd into Eyes that had given light and life ere-while
To those above them, those now dim with
tears

¹ A crown made of leaves or twigs of the bay or laurel, and given as a reward to conquerors and poets. Delphi was the seat of the oracle of Apollo, the god of poetry, to whom the laurel was sacred.

- 15 And watchfulness. Again he spake of joy Eternal. At that word, that sad word,
 joy,
 Faithful and fond her bosom heav'd once
 more:
 Her head fell back; one sob, one loud deep sob Swell'd through the darken'd chamber; 15
 'twas not hers.
- 20 With her that old boat incorruptible, Unwearied, undiverted in its course,
 Had plash'd the water up the farther strand.

LIFE PASSES NOT AS SOME MEN SAY

- Life passes not as some men say,
 If you will only urge his stay,
 And treat him kindly all the while.
 He flies the dizzy strife of towns, 5 Cowers before thunder-bearing frowns, But freshens up again at song and smile.
- Ardalia! we will place him here,
 And promise that nor sigh nor tear Shall ever trouble his repose
- 10 What precious seal will you impress
 To ratify his happiness?
 That rose! thro' which you breathe?
 Come, bring that rose.

LITTLE AGLAE

TO HER FATHER, ON HER STATUE BEING CALLED LIKE HER

Father! the little girl we see
 Is not, I fancy, so like me;
 You never hold her on your knee

- When she came home, the other day, 5 You kiss'd her; but I cannot say She kiss'd you first and ran away.

WE MIND NOT HOW THE SUN IN THE MID-SKY

- We mind not how the sun in the mid-sky
 Is hastening on; but when the golden orb Strikes the extreme of earth, and when the gulfs
 Of air and ocean open to receive him, 5 Dampness and gloom invade us; then we think Ah! thus is it with Youth. Too fast his feet
 Run on for sight; hour follows hour; fair
 maid Succeeds fair maid; bright eyes bestar his couch;
 The cheerful horn awakens him; the feast, 1 The rose is an emblem of love.

- 10 The revel, the entangling dance, allure,
 And voices mellow than the Muse's own Heave up his buoyant bosom on their wave.
 A little while, and then—Ah Youth!
 dear Youth!
 Listen not to my words—but stay with me!
 15 When thou art gone, Life may go too:
 the sigh
 That follows is for thee, and not for Life.

SAPPHO TO HESPERUS

I have beheld thee in the morning hour
 A solitary star, with thankful eyes, Ungrateful as I am! who bade thee rise When sleep all night had wandered from my bower.

- 5 Can it be true that thou art he Who shinest now above the sea Amid a thousand, but more bright?
 Ah yes! the very same art thou That heard me then, and hearest now—Thou seemst, star of love! to throb with light.

DICE

Stand close around, ye Stygian set,
 With Dice in one boat conveyed,
 Or Charon, seeing, may forget That he is old, and she a shade

ON SEEING A HAIR OF LUCRETIA BORGIA 1837

Borgia, thou once wert almost too august And high for adoration, now thou'rt dust.
 All that remains of thee these plaits unfold, ('alm hair, meandering in pellucid gold.

TO WORDSWORTH 1833 1837

- Those who have laid the harp aside
 And turn'd to idler things, From very restlessness have tried The loose and dusty strings, 5 And, catching back some favorite strain, Run with it o'er the chords again.
- But Memory is not a Muse, O Wordsworth! though 'tis said They all descend from her, and use 10 To haunt her fountain-head:
 That other men should work for me In the rich mines of Poesie,

Pleases me better than the toil
 Of smoothing under hardened hand, 15 With attic¹ emery and oil,
 The shining point for Wisdom's wand, Like those thou temperest 'mid the rills Descending from thy native hills.
 Without his governance, in vain, 20 Manhood is strong, and Youth is bold.

If oftentimes the o'er-piled strain, Clogs in the furnace and grows cold Beneath his pinions deep and froze,²
 And swells and melts and flows no more.
 25 That is because the heat beneath Pants in its cavern poorly fed.
 Life springs not from the couch of Death, Nor Muse nor Grace can raise the dead;
 Unturn'd then let the mass remain, 30 Intractable to sun or rain.

A marsh, where only flat leaves lie,
 And showing but the broken sky,
 Too surely is the sweetest lay That wins the ear and wastes the day, 35 Where youthful Fancy pouts alone And lets not Wisdom touch her zone³

He who would build his fame up high,
 The rule and plummet must apply.
 Nor say, "I'll do what I have plann'd," 40 Before he try if loam or sand Be still remaining in the place Delved for each polish'd pillar's base.
 With skilful eye and fit device Thou raisest every edifice, 45 Whether in sheltered vale it stand,
 Or overlook the Dardan⁴ strand, Amid the cypresses⁵ that mourn Laodameia's love forlorn

We both have run o'er half the space 50 Listed for mortal's earthly race;
 We both have cross'd life's fervid line,
 And other stars before us shine:
 May they be bright and prosperous
 As those that have been stars for us!
 55 Our course by Milton's light was sped,
 And Shakespeare shining overhead.
 Chatting on deck was Dryden too,
 The Bacon of the rhyming crew;
 None ever cross'd our mystic sea 60 More richly stored with thought than he;
 Tho' never tender nor sublime,
 He wrestles with and conquers Time

⁵ The cypress is an emblem of mourning. It is a common tree in graveyards

To learn my lore on Chancer's knee,
 I left much prouder company, 65 These gentle Spenser fondly led,
 But me he mostly sent to bed.

I wish them every joy above That highly blessed spirits prove,
 Save one: and that too shall be theirs,

 When 'mid their light thy light appears.

TO JOSEPH ABLETT

1834

1834-37

Lord of the Celtic dells, Where Clwyd listens as his minstrel tells Of Arthur, or Pendragon, or perchance
 The plumes of flashy France, 5 Or, in dark region far across the main,
 Far as Grenada in the world of Spain,

Warriors untold to Saxon ear,
 Until their steel-clad spirits reappear;
 How happy were the hours that held 10 Thy friend (long absent from his native
 home)
 Amid thy scenes with thee! how wide afield
 From all past cares and all to come!

What hath Ambition's feverish grasp, what hath Inconstant Fortune, panting Hope; 15 What Genius, that should cope With the heart-whispers in that path Winding so idly, where the idler stream Flings at the white-hair'd poplars gleam for gleam?

Ablett! of all the days 20 My sixty summers ever knew, Pleasant as there have been no few,
 Memory not one surveys Like those we spent together. Wisely spent
 Are they alone that leave the soul content

25 Together we have visited the men Whom Pictish pirates¹ vainly would have drown'd;
 Ah, shall we ever clasp the hand again That gave the British harp its truest
 sound?
 Live, Derwent's guest!² and thou by Gras

And live too thou for happier days Whom Dryden's force and Spenser's fays Have heart and soul possess'd:¹ (Growl in grim London he who will,

And swell with pride his sunburnt
breast.

Old Redi in his easy-chair
With varied chant awaits thee there,
And here are voices in the grove 40 Aside my house, that make me think Bacchus is coming down to drink To Ariadne's love.

But whither am I borne away
From thee, to whom began my lay?
45 Courage! I am not yet quite lost;
I stepp'd aside to greet my friends;
Believe me, soon the greeting ends, I know but three or four at most.

Deem not that Time hath borne too hard 50 Upon the fortunes of thy bard, Leaving me only three or four:
'Tis my old number, dost thou start At such a tale? in what man's heart Is there fireside for more?

I never courted friends or Fame;
She pouted at me long, at last she came,
And threw her arms around my neck and sail,
"Take what hath been for years delay'd.
And fear not that the leaves will fall 60 One hour the earlier from thy coronal."

Ablett! thou knowest with what even hand
I waved away the offer'd seat
Among the clambering, clattering, stilted

The rulers of our land;
65 Nor crowds nor kings can lift me up.
Nor sweeten Pleasure's purer cup

faces,
Yet there they sit, nor sigh for other places.

Few come across me, few too near;
Here all my wishes make their stand;
Here ask I no one's voice or hand;
Scornful of favor, ignorant of fear.

Comfort thee, O thou mourner, yet awhile!
Again shall Elia's smile Refresh thy heart, where heart can ache
no more
What is it we deplore?

5 He leaves behind him, freed from griefs and years,
Far worthier things than tears
The love of friends without a single foe:
Unequalled lot below!

His gentle soul, his genius, these are thine; 10 For these dost thou repine?
He may have left the lowly walks of men,
Left them he has; what then?

Are not his footsteps followed by the eyes Of all the good and wise?

ON HIS OWN AGAMEMNON AND IPHIGENEIA
1837

From eve to morn, from morn to parting
night,
Father and daughter stood before my sight I felt the looks they gave, the words they
said,
And reconducted each serenest shade 5 Ever shall these to me be well-spent days.
Sweet fell the tears upon them, sweet the praise
Far from the footstool of the tragic throne,
I am tragedian in this scene alone.

I CANNOT TELL, NOT I, WHY SHE 1846

I cannot tell, not I, why she Awhile so gracious, now should be So grave: I cannot tell you why
The violet hangs its head awry.
5 It shall be cull'd, it shall be worn,
In spite of every sign of scorn, Dark look, and overhanging thorn

YOU TELL ME I MUST COME AGAIN
1846

You tell me I must come again
Now buds and blooms appear, Ah! never fell one word in vain
Of yours on mortal ear.
5 You say the birds are busy now In hedgerow, brake,¹ and grove,
And slant their eyes to find the bough
That best conceals their love
How many warble from the spray!
10 How many on the wing!
"Yet, yet," say you, "one voice away I miss the sound of spring."
How little could that voice express, Belovèd, when we met!
15 But other sounds hath tenderness, Which neither shall forget

REMAIN, AH NOT IN YOUTH ALONE
1846

Remain, ah not in youth alone, Tho' youth, where you are, long will stay.
But when my summer days are gone,
And my autumnal haste away 5 "Can I be always by your side?"
¹ thicket

No; but the hours you can, you must,
Nor rise at Death's approaching stride, Nor go when dust is gone to dust.

"YOU MUST GIVE BACK," HER MOTHER SAID
1846

"You must give back," her mother said
To a poor sobbing little maid,
"All the young man has given you, Hard as it now may seem to do."
5 "'Tis done already, mother dear!"
Said the sweet girl, "So, never fear" Mother. Are you quite certain? Come, recount (There was not much) the whole amount Girl. The locket: the kid gloves.
Mother. Go on.
10 Girl. Of the kid gloves I found but one.
Mother. Never mind that. What else?
Proceed.
You gave back all his trash?
Girl. Indeed.
Mother. And was there nothing you would save?
Girl. Everything I could give I gave.
15 Mother. To the last tittle?
Girl. Even to that Mother. Freely?
Girl. My heart went pat-a-pat
At giving up—ah me! ah me!
I cry so I can hardly see—
All the fond looks and words that pass'd, 20 And all the kisses, to the last

THE MAID I LOVE NE'ER THOUGHT OF ME
1846

The maid I love ne'er thought of me
Amid the scenes of gaiety,
But when her heart or mine sank low,
Ah then it was no longer so 5 From the slant palm she rais'd her head, And kiss'd the cheek whence youth had
fled.
Angels! some future day for this,
Give her as sweet and pure a kiss.

VERY TRUE, THE LINNETS SING
1846

Very true, the linnets sing
Sweetest in the leaves of spring
You have found in all these leaves That which changes and deceives, 5 And, to pine by sun or star, Left them, false ones as they are.
But there be who walk beside Autumn's, till they all have died,
And who lend a patient ear 10 To low notes from branches sere.

TO A PAINTER
1846

Conceal not Time's misdeeds, but on my brow
Retrace his mark
Let the retiring hair be silvery now
That once was dark 5 Eyes that reflected images too bright Let clouds o'ercast,
And from the tablet be abolish'd quite The cheerful past Yet Care's deep lines should one from waken'd Mirth 10 Steal softly o'er, Perhaps on me the fairest of the Earth,
May glance once more

DULL IS MY VERSE · NOT EVEN THOU 1846

Dull is my verse not even thou
Who movest many cares away
From this lone breast and weary brow.
Canst make, as once, its fountain play.
5 No, nor those gentle words that now Support my heart to hear thee say
"The bird upon its lonely bough Sings sweetest at the close of day"

SWEET WAS THE SONG THAT YOUTH SANG ONCE
1846

Sweet was the song that Youth sang once,
And passing sweet was the response,
But there are accents sweeter far When Love leaps down our evening star, 5 Holds back the blighting wings of Time, Melts with his breath the crusty rime,
And looks into our eyes, and says,
"Come, let us talk of former days."

1846

Come, Sleep! but mind ye! if you come without
The little girl that struck me at the rout, By Jove! I would not give you half-a-crown
For all your poppy-heads and all your
down

WHY, WHY REPINE
1846

Why, why repine, my pensive friend,
At pleasures slipp'd away?
Some the stern Fates will never lend,
And all refuse to stay

5 I see the rainbow in the sky,
The dew upon the grass.

I see them, and I ask not why They glimmer or they pass.

With folded arms I linger not.
10 To call them back; 'twere vain,
In this, or in some other spot,
I know they'll shine again

MOTHER, I CANNOT MIND MY WHEEL.
1846

Mother, I cannot mind my wheel,
My fingers ache, my lips are dry Oh! if you felt the pain I feel!
But oh, who ever felt as I?
5 No longer could I doubt him true—
All other men may use deceit;
He always said my eyes were blue,
And often swore my lips were sweet

TO A BRIDE,¹ FEB 17, 1846
1846 1846

A still, serene, soft day, enough of sun
To wreath the cottage smoke like pine-tree snow, Whiter than those white flowers the bride-maids wore,
Upon the silent boughs the lissom² an 5 Rested; and, only when it went, they moved,
Nor more than under linnet springing off Such was the wedding morn the joyous
Year
Leapt over March and April up to May Regent of rising and of ebbing hearts, 10 Thyself borne on in cool serenity,
All heaven around and bending over thee, All earth below and watchful of thy course!
Well hast thou chosen, after long demur
To aspirations from more realms than one 15 Peace be with those thou leavest! peace with thee!
Is that enough to wish thee? not enough.
But very much for Love himself feels
pain,
While brighter plumage shoots, to shed last year's,
And one at home (how dear that one!) recalls 20 Thy name, and thou recallest one at home.
Yet turn not back thine eyes; the hour of
tears

Is over; nor believe thou that Romance Closes against pure Faith her rich domain Shall only blossoms flourish there? Arise,

Well hast thou chosen. I repeat the words, Adding as true ones, not untold before,
That incense must have fire for its ascent,
Else 'tis inert and can not reach the idol

ONE YEAR AGO MY PATH WAS
1846

- One year ago my path was green
My footstep light, my brow serene, Alas! and could it have been so
One year ago?
- 5 There is a love that is to last
When the hot days of youth are past Such love did a sweet maid bestow
One year ago.
- I took a leaflet from her braid 10 And gave it to another maid Love! broken should have been thy bow

- YES, I WRITE VERSES NOW AND
1846
- Yes; I write verses now and then.
But blunt and flaccid is my pen,
No longer talk'd of by young men
As rather clever
- 5 In the last quarter are my eyes,
You see it by their form and size,
Is it not time then to be wise?
Or now or never.
- Fairest that ever sprang from Eve!

Just look at me! would you believe
'Twas once a lover?
- I cannot clear the five-bar gate.
But, trying first its timbers' state, 15 Climb stiffly up, take breath, and wait To trundle over.
- Thro' gallopade! I cannot swing
The entangling blooms of Beauty's spring:
I cannot say the tender thing,

Be't true or false,
And am beginning to opine
Those girls are only half-divine Whose waists yon wicked boys entwine In giddy waltz.

I wish them wiser, graver, older, Sedater, and no harm if colder
And panting less Ah! people were not half so wild

The few late flowers have moisture in the eye,
So have I too.

The whole wood through

And all things sweet

THE PLACE WHERE SOON I THINK

1846

- The place where soon I think to lie,
In its old creviced nook hard-by Rears many a weed
If parties bring you there, will you
- 5 Drop shily in a gram or two Of wall-flower seed?
- I shall not see it, and (too sure!) I shall not ever hear that your Light step was there.
- 10 But the rich odor some fine day Will, what I cannot do, repay That little care

GIVE ME THE EYES THAT LOOK ON
1846

- Give me the eyes that look on mine,
And, when they see them dimly shine, Are moister than they were Give me the eyes that fain would find
- 5 Some relics of a youthful mind
Amid the wrecks of care.
Give me the eyes that catch at last A few faint glimpses of the past,

- And, like the arkite dove, - 10 Bring back a long-lost olive-bough,¹
 And can discover even now
 A heart that once could love.

TWENTY YEARS HENCE MY EYES MAY GROW
 1846

Twenty years hence my eyes may grow
 If not quite dim, yet rather so,
 Still yours from others they shall know Twenty years hence.

- 5 Twenty years hence tho' it may hap
 That I be call'd to take a nap
 In a cool cell where thunder-clap Was never heard,
 * There breathe but o'er my aich of grass 10 A not too sadly sigh'd Alas,
 And I shall catch, ere you can pass,
 That wingèd word

PROUD WORD YOU NEVER SPOKE 1846

Proud word you never spoke, but you will
 speak

Four not exempt from pride some future day

Resting on one white hand a warm wet
 cheek

- Over my open volume you will say, 5 "This man loved me!" then rise and trip away

ALAS, HOW SOON THE HOURS ARE
 1846

Alas, how soon the hours are over Counted us out to play the lover!
 And how much narrower is the stage Allotted us to play the sage!

- 5 But when we play the fool, how wide,
 The theatre expands! beside,
 How long the audience sits before us!
 How many prompters! what a chorus!

MY HOPES RETIRE, MY WISHES AS
 1846

My hopes retire; my wishes as before Struggle to find their resting-place in
 vain;

The ebbing sea thus beats against the
 shore;

The shore repels it, it returns again

VARIOUS THE ROADS OF LIFE; IN ONE 1846

Various the roads of life; in one
 All terminate, one lonely way
 We go; and "Is he gone?"
 Is all our best friends say.

IS IT NOT BETTER AT AN EARLY
 1846

Is it not better at an early hour
 In its calm cell to rest the weary head, While birds are singing and while blooms the bower,
 Than sit the fire out and go staid to
 bed?

PURSUITS! ALAS, I NOW HAVE NONE
 1846

- Pursuits! alas, I now have none,
 But idling where were once pursuits,
 Often, all morning quite alone,
 I sit upon those twisted roots 5 Which rise above the grass, and shield
 Our harebell, when the churchish year Catches her coming first afield,
 And she looks pale tho' spring is near;
 I chase the violets, that would hide 10 Their little prudish heads away,
 And argue with the wills, that chide
 When we discover them at play.

WITH AN ALBUM
 1846

- I know not whether I am proud,
 But this I know, I hate the crowd Therefore pray let me disengage
 My verses from the motley page.
 5 Where others far more sure to please Pour out their choral song with ease.

- And yet perhaps, if some should tire
 With too much froth or too much fire,
 There is an ear that may incline 10 Even to words so dull as mine

THE DAY RETURNS, MY NATAL DAY
 1846

The day returns, my natal day,
 Borne on the storm and pale with snow,
 And seems to ask me why I stay, Stricken by Time and bowed by Woe

- 5 Many were once the friends who came To wish me joy; and there are some

Who wish it now; but not the same;
They are whence friend can never come.

- Nor are they you my love watch'd o'er 10 Cradled in innocence and sleep;
You smile into my eyes no more,
Nor see the bitter tears they weep

HOW MANY VOICES GAILY SING 1846

- How many voices gaily sing,
"O happy morn, O happy spring Of life!" Meanwhile there comes o'er me A softer voice from Memory, 5 And says, "If loves and hopes have flown With years, think too what griefs are
gone!"

TO ROBERT BROWNING 1846

- There is delight in singing, tho' none hear Beside the singer; and there is delight In praising, tho' the praiser sit alone
And see the prais'd far off him, far above 5 Shakespeare is not our poet, but the world's,
Therefore on him no speech! and brief for
thee, Browning! Since Chaucer was alive and hale,
No man hath walked along our roads with step
So active, so inquiring eye, or tongue 10 So varied in discourse. But warmer climes!
Give brighter plumage, strong wing: the breeze
Of Alpine heights thou playest with, borne
on Beyond Sorrento and Amalfi, where The Siren waits thee, singing song for
song

From THE HELLENICS² 1846-59

ON THE HELLENICS 1847

- Come back, ye wandering Muses, come back home.
Ye seem to have forgotten where it lies Come, let us walk upon the silent sands Of Simois, where deep footmarks show long strides;
5 Thence we may mount, perhaps, to higher
ground,
Where Aphroditè from Athenè won
The golden apple, and from Herè too, Browning had just married Elisabeth Barrett.
and moved to Italy.
2 A group of poems by Landor on Greek topics.

And happy Ares shouted far below.
Or would ye rather choose the grassy vale

- 10 Where flows Anapos thro' anemones, Hyacinths, and narcissuses, that bend
To show their rival beauty in the stream?
Bring with you each her lyre, and each in turn Temper a graver with a lighter song.

THRASYMEDES AND EUNOE 1846

- Who will away to Athens with me? who Loves choral songs and maidens crown'd with flowers, Unenvious? mount the pinnace; hoist the sail.
I promise ye, as many as are here, 5 Ye shall not, while ye tarry with me, taste From unrinsed barrel the diluted wine
Of a low vineyard or a plant ill-pruned,
But such as anciently the Ægean isles Pour'd in libation at their solemn feasts:
10 And the same goblets shall ye grasp, emboss'd With no vile figures of loose languid boors, But such as gods have lived with and have led.
The sea smiles bright before us. What white sail Plays yonder? What pursues it? Like two hawks 15 Away they fly. Let us away in time To overtake them. Are they menaces We hear? And shall the strong repulse the weak, Enraged at her defender? Hippias!
Art thou the man? 'Twas Hippias. He had found 20 His sister borne from the Cecropian port!
By Thrasymedes. And reluctantly?
Ask, ask the maiden; I have no reply.
"Brother! O brother Hippias! O, if love, If pity, ever touch'd thy breast, forbear!
25 Strike not the brave, the gentle, the beloved,
My Thrasymedes, with his cloak alone Protecting his own head and mine from harm."
"Didst thou not once before," cried Hippias,
Regardless of his sister, hoarse with wrath 30 At Thrasymedes, "didst not thou, dog-eyed,
Dare, as she walk'd up to the Parthenon,
On the most holy of all holy days,
In sight of all the city, dare to kiss Her maiden cheek?"
1 Athens.

“Ay, before all the gods, 35 Ay, before Pallas, before Artemis, Ay, before Aphrodite, before Herè, I dared; and dare again. Arise, my spouse!
 Arise! and let my lips quaff purity From thy fair open brow.”

The sword was up, 40 And yet he kiss'd her twice. Some god withheld
 The arm of Hippia; his proud blood seeth'd slower
 And smote his breast less angrily; he laid His hand on the white shoulder, and spake
 thus:

“Ye must return with me. A second time 45 Offended, will our sire Pisistratos Pardon the affront? Thou shouldst have ask'd thyself

This question ere the sail first flapp'd the mast.”

“Already thou hast taken life from me.
 Put up thy sword,” said the sad youth,
 his eyes

50 Sparkling, but whether love or rage or grief
 They sparkled with, the gods alone could
 see

Piræus they re-entered, and their ship
 Drove up the little waves against the quay.
 Whence was thrown out a rope from one
 above,

55 And Hippia caught it. From the virgin's waist
 Her lover dropp'd his arm, and blush'd to think

He had retain'd it there in sight of rude Irreverent men: he led her forth, nor spake.

Hippia walked silent too, until they reach'd

60 The mansion of Pisistratos her sire.
 Serenely in his sternness did the prince Look on them both awhile: they saw not
 him,

For both had cast their eyes upon the ground

“Are these the pirates thou hast taken,
 son?”

65 Said he “Worse, father! worse than pirates they.

Who thus abuse thy patience, thus abuse Thy pardon, thus abuse the holy rites Twice over.”

“Well hast thou performed thy duty.”
 Firmly and gravely said Pisistratos

70 “Nothing then, rash young man! could turn thy heart
 From Eunoë, my daughter!”

“Nothing, sir,
 Shall ever turn it. I can die but once And love but once. O Eunoe! farewell!” “Nay, she shall see what thou canst bear for her.”

75 “O father! shut me in my chamber, shut
 me
 In my poor mother's tomb, dead or alive,
 But never let me see what he can bear.
 I know how much that is, when borne for
 me.”

“Not yet: come on. And lag not thou
 behind,

80 Pirate of virgin and of princely hearts!
 Before the people and before the goddess Thou hadst evinced the madness of thy passion,
 And now wouldst bear from home and plenteousness

To poverty and exile this my child.”

85 Then shuddered Thrasymedes, and exclaim'd,

“I see my crime; I saw it not before The daughter of Pisistratos was born Neither for exile nor for poverty, Ah! nor for me!” He would have wept, but one

90 Might see him, and weep worse. The prince unmoved

Strode on, and said, “Tomorrow shall the people,

All who beheld thy trespasses, behold

The justice of Pisistratos, the love

He bears his daughter, and the reverence

95 In which he holds the highest law of God.”
 He spake; and on the morrow they were
 one.

IPHIGENEIA AND AGAMEMNON 1846

Iphigeneia, when she heard her doom
 At Aulis, and when all beside the King Had gone away, took his right hand, and
 said,

“O father! I am young and very happy

5 I do not think the pious Calchas heard Distinctly what the goddess spake. Old-age

Obscures the senses. If my nurse, who knew

My voice so well, sometimes misunderstood While I was resting on her knee both arms

10 And hitting it to make her mind my words,
 And looking in her face, and she in mine,
 Might he not also hear one word amiss, Spoken from so far off, even from Olym-pus?”

The father placed his cheek upon her head, 15 And tears dropp'd down it, but the king

 of men
 Replied not. Then the maiden spake once
 more.
 "O father! sayst thou nothing? Hear'st thou not Me, whom thou ever hast, until this hour, Listen'd to fondly, and awaken'd me 20 To hear my voice amid the voice of birds,
 When it was inarticulate as theirs,
 And the down deadened it within the nest?"
 He moved her gently from him, silent
 still,
 And this, and this alone, brought tears
 from her,
 25 Altho' she saw fate nearer: then with sighs,
 "I thought to have laid down my hair
 before Benignant Artemis, and not have dimmed Her polish'd altar with my virgin blood;
 I thought to have selected the white flowers 30 To please the Nymphs, and to have ask'd of each
 By name, and with no sorrowful regret, Whether, since both my parents will'd the
 change,
 I might at Hymen's feet bend my clipp'd
 brow;
 And (after those who mind us girls the most) 35 Adore our own Athena,¹ that she would Regard me mildly with her azure eyes.
 But father! to see you no more, and see Your love, O father! go ere I am gone"— Gently he moved her off, and drew her back, 40 Bending his lofty head far over hers,
 And the dark depths of nature heaved and burst.
 He turn'd away; not far, but silent still She now first shudder'd; for in him, so
 nigh,
 So long a silence seem'd the approach of
 death, 45 And like it. Once again she rais'd her voice.
 "O father! if the ships are now detain'd,
 And all your vows move not the gods
 above,
 When the knife strikes me there will be one prayer
 The less to them: and purer can there
 be 50 Any, or more fervent than the daughter's prayer
 For her dear father's safety and success?"
¹ Athena was the patroness of Argos

A groan that shook him shook not his resolve.
 An aged man now enter'd, and without One word, stepp'd slowly on, and took the wrist 55 Of the pale maiden. She look'd up and saw
 The fillet of the priest and calm cold eyes.
 Then turn'd she where her parent stood,
 and cried,
 "O father! grieve no more: the ships can sail."

 THE HAMADRYAD¹
 1846 Rhaicos was born amid the hills wherefrom Gnidus the light of Caria is discern'd, And small are the white-crested that play
 near,
 And smaller onward are the purple waves.
 5 Thence festal choirs were visible, all crown'd
 With rose and myrtle if they were inborn;
 If from Pandion sprang they, on the coast Where stern Athenè raised her citadel, Then olive was intwined with violets 10 Cluster'd in bosses,² regular and large.
 For various men wore various coronals;
 But one was their devotion; 'twas to her Whose laws all follow, her whose smile withdraws
 The sword from Ares, thunderbolt from Zeus,
 15 And whom in his chill cave the mutable
 Of mind, Poseidon, the sea-king, reveres, And whom his brother, stubborn Dis, hath pray'd
 To turn in pity the averted cheek
 Of her he bore away,³ with promises.
 20 Nay, with loud oath before dread Styx itself,
 To give her daily more and sweeter flowers Than he made drop from her on Enna's
 dell

Rhaicos was looking from his father's door
 At the long trains that hastened to the town
 25 From all the valleys, like bright rivulets Gurgling with gladness, wave outrunning
 wave,
 And thought it hard he might not also go And offer up one prayer, and press one
 hand,

³ Proserpina.

- He knew not whose. The father call'd him in, 30 And said, "Son Rhaicos! those are idle games; Long enough I have lived to find them so." And ere he ended sighed, as old men do Always, to think how idle such games are. "I have not yet," thought Rhaicos in his heart, 35 And wanted proof. "Suppose thou go and help Echeion at the hill, to bark yon oak And lop its branches off, before we delve About the trunk and ply the root with axe:
 This we may do in winter "
- Rhaicos went,
- 40 For thence he could see farther, and see more Of those who hurried to the city-gate. Echeion he found there with naked arm Swart-hair'd, strong-sinew'd, and his eyes intent Upon the place where first the axe should fall.
 45 He held it upright. "There are bees about, Or wasps, or hornets," said the cautious eld, "Look sharp, O son of Thallinos!" The youth Inclined his ear, afar, and warily, And cavern'd in his hand. He heard a buzz 50 At first, and then the sound grew soft and clear.
 And then divided into what seem'd tune. And there were words upon it, plaintive words.
 He turn'd, and said, "Echeion! do not strike That tree: it must be hollow; for some god 55 Speaks from within. Come thyself near " Again Both turn'd toward it: and behold! there sat
 Upon the moss below, with her two palms Pressing it, on each side, a maid in form.
 Downcast were her long eyelashes, and pale 60 Her cheek, but never mountain-ash display'd Berries of color like her lip so pure, Nor were the anemones about her hair Soft, smooth, and wavering like the face beneath
 "What dost thou here?" Echeion, half-afraid, 65 Half-angry cried She lifted up her eyes, But nothing spake she Rhaicos drew one step
- Backward, for fear came likewise over him, But not such fear: he panted, gasp'd, drew in His breath, and would have turn'd it into words, 70 But could not into one. "O send away That sad old man!" said she. The old man went Without a warning from his master's son, Glad to escape, for sorely he now fear'd. And the axe shone behind him in their eyes.
- 75 Hamad. And wouldst thou too shed the most innocent Of blood? No vow demands it; no god wills
 The oak to bleed.
Rhaicos. Who art thou? whence? why here?
 And whither wouldst thou go? Among the robed In white or saffron, or the hue that most 80 Resembles dawn or the clear sky, is none Array'd as thou art. What so beautiful As that gray robe which clings about thee close.
 Like moss to stones adhering, leaves to trees,
 Yet lets thy bosom rise and fall in turn, 85 As, touch'd by zephyrus, fall and rise the boughs
 Of graceful platan¹ by the river-side?
Hamad. Lovest thou well thy father's house?
Rhaicos. Indeed I love it, well I love it, yet would leave For thine, where'er it be, my father's house, 90 With all the marks upon the door, that show
 My growth at every birthday since the third,
 And all the charms, o'erpowering evil eyes,
 My mother nail'd for me against my bed.
 And the Cydonian² bow (which thou shalt see) 95 Won in my race last spring from Euty-chos.
Hamad. Bethink thee what it is to leave a home Thou never yet hast left, one night, one day.

² of Cydonia (an ancient city on the coast of Crete, famous for its archers)

- Rhaicos.* No, 'tis not hard to leave it,
'tis not hard
To leave, O maiden, that paternal home, 100 If there be one on earth whom we may love First, last, forever; one who says that she
Will love forever too. To say which word, Only to say it, surely is enough—
It shows such kindness—if 'twere possible
- 105 We at the moment think she would indeed Hamad. Who taught thee all this folly at thy age?
Rhaicos. I have seen lovers and have learn'd to love
Hamad. But wilt thou spare the tree?
Rhaicos. My father wants The bark; the tree may hold its place awhile.
- 110 Hamad. Awhile! thy father numbers then my days?
Rhaicos. Are there no others where the moss beneath
Is quite as tufty? Who would send thee
forth
Or ask thee why thou tarest? Is thy flock Anywhere near?
Hamad. I have no flock. I kill
- 115 Nothing that breathes, that stirs, that feels
the air,
The sun, the dew Why should the beautiful (And thou art beautiful) disturb the source Whence springs all beauty? Hast thou never heard Of Hamadryads?
Rhaicos. Heard of them I have
- 120 Tell me some tale about them. May I sit Beside thy feet? Art thou not tired? The herbs
Are very soft; I will not come too nigh.
Do but sit there, nor tremble so, nor doubt.
Stay, stay an instant: let me first explore
- 125 If any acorn of last year be left Within it; thy thin robe too ill protects Thy dainty limbs against the harm one

Acorn may do Here's none Another day Trust me, till then let me sit opposite
- 130 Hamad. I sent me; be thou seated, and content.
Rhaicos. O sight for gods! ye men below! adore
The Aphrodite. Is she there below?
Or sits she here before me, as she sat Before the shepherd on those heights that shade
- 135 The Hellespont, and brought his kindred
woe?
- Hamad.* Reverence the higher Powers;
nor deem amiss
Of her who pleads to thee, and would repay—
Ask not how much—but very much. Rise
not;
No, Rhaicos, no! Without the nuptial vow 140 Love is unholy Swear to me that none Of mortal maids shall ever taste thy kiss, Then take thou mine; then take it, not
before.
Rhaicos. Harken, all gods above! O
Aphrodite!
O Herè! Let my vow be ratified!
- 145 But wilt thou come into my father's house?
Hamad. Nay; and of mine I cannot give thee part.
Rhaicos. Where is it?
Hamad. In this oak.
Rhaicos. Ay; now begins
The tale of Hamadryad; tell it through Hamad. Pray of thy father never to cut down
- 150 My tree; and promise him, as well thou mayst,
That every year he shall receive from me More honey than will buy him nine fat
sheep,
More wax than he will burn to all the gods Why fallest thou upon thy face? Some thorn
- 155 May scratch it, rash young man! Rise up;
for shame!
Rhaicos. For shame I can not rise O pity me!
I dare not sue for love—but do not hate!
Let me once more behold thee—not once
more,
But many days let me love on—unloved!
- 160 I aimed too high: on my head the bolt Falls back, and pierces to the very brain Hamad. Go—rather go, than make me say I love.
Rhaicos. If happiness is immortality, (And whence enjoy it else the gods above?) 165 I am immortal too: my vow is heard Hark! on the left—Nay, turn not from me now,
I claim my kiss
Hamad. Do men take first, then claim?
Do thus the seasons run their course with
them?
- Her lips were seal'd, her head sank on his breast 170 'Tis said that laughs were heard within the wood.
But who should hear them?—and whose laughs? and why?

Savory was the smell, and long past noon, Thallinos! in thy house. for marjoram, Basil and mint, and thyme and rosemary, 175 Were sprinkled on the kid's well roasted length, Awaiting Rhaicos. Home he came at last,
 Not hungry, but pretending hunger keen,
 With head and eyes just o'er the maple plate
 "Thou seest but badly, coming from the sun, 180 Boy Rhaicos!" said the father. "That oak's bark Must have been tough, with little sap between,
 It ought to run, but it and I are old."
 Rhaicos, although each morsel of the bread Increased by chewing, and the meat grew cold 185 And tasteless to his palate, took a draught Of gold-bright wine, which, thirsty as he was,
 He thought not of until his father fill'd
 The cup, averring water was amiss, But wine had been at all times pour'd on kid,— 190 It was religion
 He thus fortified
 Said, not quite boldly, and not quite abash'd,
 "Father, that oak is Zeus's own. that oak Year after year will bring thee wealth from wax And honey. There is one who fears the gods 195 And the gods love—that one" (He blush'd, nor said What one)
 "Has promis'd this, and may do more.
 Thou hast not many moons to wait until The bees have done their best: if then there come Nor wax nor honey, let the tree be hewn." 200 "Zeus hath bestow'd on thee a prudent mind," Said the glad sire; "but look thou often
 there,
 And gather all the honey thou canst find
 In every crevice, over and above What has been promis'd: would they reckon that?"
 205 Rhaicos went daily; but the nymph as oft,
 Invisible. To play at love, she knew, Stopping its breathings when it breathes most soft,
 Is sweeter than to play on any pipe

She play'd on his: she fed upon his sighs; 210 They pleased her when they gently waved
 her hair,
 Cooling the pulses of her purple veins,
 And when her absence brought them out, they pleased.
 Even among the fondest of them all,
 What mortal or immortal maid is more 215 Content with giving happiness than pain?
 One day he was returning from the wood Despondently. She pitied him, and said "Come back!" and twined her fingers in the hem
 Above his shoulder. Then she led his steps 220 To a cool rill that ran o'er level sand Through lentisk¹ and through oleander,²
 there
 Bathed she his feet, lifting them on her lap When bathed, and drying them in both her hands.
 He dared complain, for those who most are loved 225 Most dare it; but not harsh was his complaint
 "O thou inconstant!" said he, "if stern
 law
 Bind thee, or will, stronger than sternest
 law,
 O, let me know henceforward when to hope The fruit of love that grows for me but
 here."
 230 He spake; and pluck'd it from its plant stem.
 "Impatient Rhaicos! Why thus intercept
 The answer I would give? There is a bee Whom I have fed, a bee who knows my thoughts
 And executes my wishes. I will send 235 That messenger. If ever thou art false.
 Drawn by another, own it not, but drive
 My bee away; then shall I know my fate.
 And—for thou must be wretched—weep at
 thine.
 But often as my heart persuades to lav
 Its cares on thine and throb itself to rest, 240 Expect her with thee, whether it be morn Or eve, at any time when woods are safe."

Day after day the Hours beheld them
 blest,
 And season after season: years had past, 245 Blest were they still. He who asserts that Love
 Ever is sated of sweet things, the same Sweet things he fretted for in earlier days, Never, by Zeus! loved he a Hamadryad

¹ A kind of sweet shrub² A poisonous evergreen shrub with fragrant flowers

The night had now grown longer, and perhaps 250 The Hamadryads find them lone and dull Among their woods; one did, alas! She called Her faithful bee: 'twas when all bees should sleep,
And all did sleep but hers. She was sent forth
To bring that light which never wintry blast
255 Blows out, nor rain nor snow extinguishes, The light that shines from loving eyes upon Eyes that love back, till they can see no
more.

Rhaicos was sitting at his father's hearth.
Between them stood the table, not o'er-
spread 260 With fruits which autumn now profusely bore,
Nor anise cakes,¹ nor odorous wine; but
there
The draft-board was expanded, at which game Triumphant sat old Thallinos; the son Was puzzled, vex'd, discomfited, distraught 265 A buzz was at his ear up went his hand,
And it was heard no longer. The poor bee Return'd, (but not until the morn shone bright)
And found the Hamadryad with her head Upon her aching wrist, and showed one wing 270 Half-broken off, the other's meshes
marr'd,
And there were bruises which no eye could
see Saving a Hamadryad's.

At this sight
Down fell the languid brow, both hands fell down,
A shriek was carried to the ancient hall 275 Of Thallinos: he heard it not. his son Heard it, and ran forthwith into the wood No bark was on the tree, no leaf was green The trunk was riven through From that day forth
Nor word nor whisper sooth'd his ear, nor
sound
280 Even of insect wing, but loud laments
The woodmen and the shepherds one long
year Heard day and night; for Rhaicos would not quit

SHAKESPEARE AND MILTON 1853

The tongue of England, that which myriads Have spoken and will speak, were paralyzed
Hereafter, but two mighty men stand forth Above the flight of ages, two alone; 5 One crying out,
All nations spoke thro' me
The other:
True; and thro' this trumpet burst God's word; the fall of Angels, and the doom
First of immortal, then of mortal, Man Glory! be glory! not to me, to God.

TO YOUTH 1853

Where art thou gone, light-ankled Youth?
With wing at either shoulder,
And smile that never left thy mouth Until the Hours grew colder 5 Then somewhat seem'd to whisper near That thou and I must part;
I doubted it; I felt no fear,
No weight upon the heart.
10 If aught befell it, Love was by And roll'd it off again,
So, if there ever was a sigh,
'Twas not a sigh of pain
I may not call thee back; but thou Returnest when the hand 15 Of gentle Sleep waves o'er my brow His poppy-crested wand;
Then smiling eyes bend over mine, Then lips once press'd invite.
But sleep hath given a silent sign, 20 And both, alas! take flight

TO AGE 1853

Welcome, old friend! These many years Have we lived door by door.
The Fates have laid aside their shears Perhaps for some few more 5 I was indocile at an age When better boys were taught,
But thou at length hast made me sage,
If I am sage in aught.

- Little I know from other men, 10 Too little they from me,
 But thou hast pointed well the pen That writes these lines to thee.
- Thanks for expelling Fear and Hope,
 One vile, the other vain, 15 One's scourge, the other's telescope,
 I shall not see again:
- Rather what lies before my feet
 My notice shall engage—
 He who hath braved Youth's dizzy heat 20 Dreads not the frost of Age.

THE CHRYSOLITES¹ AND RUBIES BACCHUS BRINGS
 1853

- The chrysolites and rubies Bacchus brings To crown the feast where swells the broad-vein'd brow,
 Where maidens blush at what the minstrel
 sings,
 They who have coveted may covet now
- 6 Bring me, in cool alcove, the grape un-crush'd,
 The peach of pulpy cheek and down mature,
 Where every voice (but bird's or child's) is hush'd,
 And every thought, like the brook nigh, runs pure.

SO THEN, I FEEL NOT DEEPLY!
 1853

- So then, I feel not deeply! if I did, I should have seized the pen and pierced therewith
 The passive world!
 And thus thou reasonest?
 Well hast thou known the lover's, not so
 well
- 5 The poet's heart while that heart bleeds, the hand Presses it close. Grief must run on and pass
 Into near Memory's more quiet shade Before it can compose itself in song
 He who is agonized and turns to show 10 His agony to those who sit around Seizes the pen in vain thought, fancy.
 power,
 Rush back into his bosom; all the strength Of genius can not draw them into light From under mastering Grief; but Memory, 15 The Muse's mother, nurses, rears them up.
 Informs, and keeps them with her all her days.

ON MUSIC
 1853

- Many love music but for music's sake,
 Many because her touches can awake Thoughts that repose within the breast half-dead,
 And rise to follow where she loves to lead.
- 5 What various feelings come from days gone by!
 What tears from far-off sources dim the
 eye!
 Few, when light fingers with sweet voices
 play
 And melodies swell, pause, and melt away, Mind how at every touch, at every tone, 10 A spark of life hath glisten'd and hath
 gone

DEATH STANDS ABOVE ME
 1853

- Death stands above me, whispering low
 I know not what into my ear:
 Of his strange language all I know Is, there is not a word of fear

ON HIS SEVENTY-FIFTH BIRTHDAY
 1853

- I strove with none, for none was worth my strife,
 Nature I loved, and next to Nature, Art;
 I warmed both hands before the fire of life,
 It sinks, and I am ready to depart.

I ENTREAT YOU, ALFRED TENNYSON
 1853

- I entreat you, Alfred Tennyson,
 Come and share my haunch of venison.
 I have too a bin of claret,
 Good, but better when you share it.
- 5 Tho' 'tis only a small bin, There's a stock of it within And as sure as I'm a rhymist, Half a butt of Rudesheimer.
 Come, among the sons of men is one 10 Welcomer than Alfred Tennyson?

TO E. ARUNDELL
 1853

- Nature! thou mayest fume and fret, There's but one white violet;
 Scatter o'er the vernal ground Faint resemblances around, 5 Nature! I will tell thee yet There's but one white violet.

 1853

- Death, tho' I see him not, is near
 And grudges me my eightieth year.

Now, I would give him all these last For one that fifty have run past.
 Ah! he strikes all things, all alike,
 But bargains: those he will not strike.

TO HIS YOUNG ROSE AN OLD MAN
 1833

To his young Rose an old man said,
 "You will be sweet when I am dead:
 Where skies are brightest we shall meet,
 And there will you be yet more sweet, Leaving your winged company To waste an idle thought on me."

NAY, THANK ME NOT AGAIN FOR
 1853

Nay, thank me not again for those Camelias, that untimely rose;
 But if, whence you might please the more
 And win the few unwon before,
 I sought the flowers you loved to wear, O'erjoy'd to see them in your hair,
 Upon my grave, I pray you, set One primrose or one violet.
 —Stay—I can wait a little yet.

ONE LOVELY NAME ADORNS MY
 1853

One lovely name adorns my song,
 And, dwelling in the heart,
 Forever falters at the tongue,
 And trembles to depart!

SEPARATION
 1853

There is a mountain and a wood between
 us,
 Where the lone shepherd and late bird have seen us
 Morning and noon and even-tide repass Between us now the mountain and the wood Seem standing darker than last year they
 stood,
 And say we must not cross, alas! alas!

ALL IS NOT OVER WHILE THE SHADE
 1853

All is not over while the shade
 Of parting life, if now aslant, Rests on the scene whereon it play'd
 And taught a docile heart to pant.
 Autumn is passing by; his day Shines mildly yet on gather'd sheaves,
 And, tho' the grape be plucked away,
 Its color glows amid the leaves.

GOD SCATTERS BEAUTY AS HE SCATTERS FLOWERS
 1853

God scatters beauty as he scatters flowers O'er the wide earth, and tells us all are ours.
 A hundred lights in every temple burn,
 And at each shrine I bend my knee in turn.

THOU NEEDST NOT PITCH UPON MY
 1853

Thou needst not pitch upon my hat, Thou wither'd leaf! to show how near Is now the winter of my year; Alas! I want no hint of that.

Prythee, ah prythee, get along!
 Whisper as gently in the ear,
 I once could whisper in, to fear
 No change, but live for dance and song.

TO A CYCLAMEN
 1853

I come to visit thee again,
 My little flowerless cyclamen;
 To touch the hand, almost to press,
 That cheer'd thee in thy loneliness
 What could thy careful guardian find Of thee in form, of me in mind,
 What is there in us rich or rare,
 To make us claim a moment's care?
 Unworthy to be so caress'd,
 We are but withering leaves at best.

ON SOUTHEY'S DEATH
 1858

Friends! hear the words my wandering thoughts would say,
 And cast them into shape some other day.
 Southey, my friend of forty years, is gone,
 And, shattered by the fall, I stand alone.

THE THREE ROSES¹
 1858

When the buds began to burst, Long ago, with Rose the First,
 I was walking; joyous then Far above all other men, Till before us up there stood Britonferry's oaken wood, Whispering, "Happy as thou art, Happiness and thou must part."
 Many summers have gone by Since a Second Rose and I (Rose from that same stem) have told This and other tales of old

- She upon her wedding-day Carried home my tenderest lay:¹ 15 From her lap I now have heard Gleeful, chirping, Rose the Third,
Not for her this hand of mine Rhyme with nuptial wreath shall twine, Cold and torpid it must lie, 20 Mute the tongue and closed the eye

LATELY OUR SONGSTERS LOITER'D IN GREEN LANES
1863

- Lately our songsters loiter'd in green lanes,
Content to catch the ballads of the plains,
I fancied I had strength enough to climb
A loftier station at no distant time, 5 And might securely from intrusion doze, Upon the flowers thro' which Ilissus flows
In those pale olive grounds all voices cease, And from afar dust fills the paths of Greece.
My slumber broken, and my doublet torn, 10 I find the laurel² also bears a thorn

THESEUS AND HIPPOLYTA

- Hippolyta* Eternal hatred I have sworn against
The persecutor of my sisterhood,
In vain, proud son of Ægeus, hast thou snapped
Their arrows and derided them; in vain 15 Leadest thou me a captive; I can die, And die I will.
Theseus. Nay; many are the years Of youth and beauty for Hippolyta.
Hippolyta. I scorn my youth, I hate my beauty Go!
Monster! of all the monsters in these wilds 10 Most frightful and most odious to my sight.
Theseus. I boast not that I saved thee from the bow
Of Scythian.
Hippolyta And for what? To die disgraced Strong as thou art, yet thou art not so strong
As Death is, when we call him for support 15 Theseus Him too will I ward off; he strikes me first,
Hippolyta, long after, when these eyes Are closed, and when the knee that suppli-cates
Can bend no more.

² The laurel is an emblem of honor or victory.

- Hippolyta*. Is the man mad?
Theseus. He is.
Hippolyta. So, thou canst tell one truth, however false
In other things.
20 Theseus. What other? Thou dost pause,
And thine eyes wander over the smooth turf
As if some gem (but gem thou wear'st
not)
Had fallen from the remnant of thy hair.
Hippolyta! speak plainly, answer me, 25 What have I done to raise thy fear or hate?
Hippolyta. Fear I despise, perfidy I abhor.
Unworthy man! did *Herae*les delude
The maids who trusted him?
Theseus. Did ever I?
Whether he did or not, they never told me:
30 I would have chided him.
Hippolyta. Thou chide him! thou!
The Spartan mothers well remember thee Theseus. Scorn adds no beauty to the beautiful.
*Herae*les was beloved by Omphale,
He never parted from her, but obey'd 35 Her slightest wish, as Theseus will Hip-polyta's.
Hippolyta Then leave me, leave me instantly, I know
The way to my own country.
Theseus. This command.
And only this, my heart must disobey.
My country shall be thine, and there thy state 40 Regal.
Hippolyta. Am I a child? Give me my
own,
And keep for weaker heads thy diadems Thermodon I shall never see again, Brightest of rivers, into whose clear depth My mother plunged me from her warmer
breast,
45 And taught me early to divide the waves With arms each day more strong, and soon to chase
And overtake the father swan, nor heed
His hoarser voice or his uplifted wing.
Where are my sisters? are there any left?
Theseus. I hope it.
50 Hippolyta. And I fear it: theirs may be
A fate like mine; which, O ye Gods, forbid!
Theseus. I pity thee, and would assuage thy grief.
Hippolyta. Pity me not: thy anger I could bear.

Theseus. There is no place for anger where thou art.

- 55 Commiseration even men may feel For those who want it: even the fiercest beasts
Lick the sore-wounded of a kindred race.
Hearing their cry, albeit they may not help.

Hippolyta This is no falsehood and can he be false

- 60 Who speaks it?

I remember not the time
When I have wept, it was so long ago.
Thou forestest tears from me, because—because—
I cannot hate thee as I ought to do.

THEY ARE SWEET FLOWERS THAT ONLY BLOW BY NIGHT
1863

They are sweet flowers that only blow by
night,
And sweet tears are there that avoid the
light;
No mortal sees them after day is born.
They, like the dew, drop trembling from their thorn

MEMORY 1863

The Mother of the Muses, we are taught.
Is Memory: she has left me, they remain.
And shake my shoulder, urging me to sing
About the summer days, my loves of old.

- 5 Alas! alas! is all I can reply.
Memory has left with me that name¹ alone, Harmonious name, which other bards² may
sing,
But her bright image in my darkest hour Comes back, in vain comes back, call'd or uncall'd

- 10 Forgotten are the names of visitors
Ready to press my hand but yesterday.
Forgotten are the names of earlier friends Whose genial converse and glad countenance

- Are fresh as ever to mine ear and eye.
15 To these, when I have written and besought Remembrance of me, the word Dear alone Hangs on the upper verge, and waits in vain.

- A blessing wert thou, O oblivion, If thy stream carried only weeds away.
20 But vernal and autumnal flowers alike
It hurries down to wither on the strand

² Byron and Shelley, both of whom had used the name Ianthe in their poetry.—Shelley in Queen Mab (1813), and Byron in the Dedication of Onilde Harold's Pilgrimage (1812).

AN AGED MAN WHO LOVED TO DOZE AWAY 1863

An aged man who loved to doze away
An hour by daylight, for his eyes were dum,
And he had seen too many suns go down And rise again, dreamed that he saw two forms

- 5 Of radiant beauty, he would clasp them
both,
But both flew stealthily away. He cried
In his wild dream,

"I never thought, O youth,
That thou, altho' so cherished, would'st
return,

But I did think that he who came with
thee,

- 10 Love, who could swear more sweetly than birds sing,
Would never leave me comfortless and lone."

A sigh broke through his slumber, not the last.

TO MY NINTH DECADE 1863

To my ninth decade I have totter'd on,
And no soft arm bends now my steps to steady;
She, who once led me where she would, is gone,¹
So when he calls me, Death shall find me ready.

TIBERIUS AND VIPSANIA 1828

Tiberius Vipsania, my Vipsania, whither art thou walking?

Vipsania. Whom do I see?—my Tiberius?

Tiberius. Ah! no, no, no! but thou seest the father of thy little Drusus. Press him to thy heart the more closely for this meeting, and give him—

Vipsania. Tiberius! the altars, the gods, the destinies, are all between us—I will take it from this hand; thus, thus shall he receive it.

- Tiberius*. Raise up thy face, my beloved!
I must not shed tears. Augustus, Livia, ye shall not extort them from me. Vipsania!
15 I may kiss thy head—for I have saved it

¹ Probably a reference to Landor's mother, who died in 1829. Landor always regarded her with the tenderest affection

Thou sayest nothing. I have wronged thee, ay?

Vipsania. Ambition does not see the earth she treads on; the rock and the herbage are of one substance to her. Let me excuse you to my heart, O Tiberius. It has many wants; this is the first and greatest.

Tiberius. My ambition, I swear by the immortal gods, places not the bar of severance between us. A stronger hand, the hand that composes Rome and sways the world—

Vipsania. Overawed Tiberius. I know it; Augustus willed and commanded it.

Tiberius. And overawed Tiberius! Power bent, Death terrified, a Nero! What is our race, that any should look down on us and spurn us? Augustus, my benefactor, I have wronged thee! Livia, my mother, this one cruel deed was thine! To reign, forsooth, is a lovely thing. O womanly appetite! Who would have been before me, though the palace of Cæsar cracked and split with emperors, while I, sitting in idleness on a cliff of Rhodes, eyed the sun as he swung his golden censer athwart the heavens, or his image as it overstrode the sea? I have it before me; and, though it seems falling on me, I can smile on it—just as I did from my little favorite skiff, painted round with the marriage of Thetis, when the sailors drew their long shaggy hair across their eyes, many a stadium¹ away from it, to mitigate its effulgence.

These, too, were happy days—days of happiness like these I could recall and look back upon with unaching brow.

O land of Greece! Tiberius blesses thee, bidding thee rejoice and flourish!

Why cannot one hour, Vipsania, beautiful and light as we have led, return?

Vipsania. Tiberius! is it to me that you were speaking? I would not interrupt you, but I thought I heard my name as you walked away and looked up toward the East. So silent!

Tiberius. Who dared to call thee? Thou wert mine before the gods—do they deny it? Was it my fault—

Vipsania. Since we are separated, and forever, O Tiberius, let us think no more on the cause of it. Let neither of us believe that the other was to blame: so shall separation be less painful.

Tiberius. O mother! and did I not tell thee what she was?—patient in injury, proud in innocence, serene in grief!

Vipsania. Did you say that too? But I think it was so. I had felt little. One vast wave has washed away the unpression of smaller from my memory. Could Livia, could your mother, could she who was so kind to me—

Tiberius. The wife of Cæsar did it. But hear me now; hear me: be calm as I am. No weaknesses are such as those of a mother who loves her only son immoderately; and none are so easily worked upon from without. Who knows what impulses she received? She is very, very kind: but she regards me only, and that which at her bidding is to encompass and adorn me. All the weak look after Power, protectress of weakness. Thou art a woman, O Vipsania! is there nothing in thee to excuse my mother? So good she ever was to me! so loving.

Vipsania. I quite forgive her: be tranquil, O Tiberius!

Tiberius. Never can I know peace—never can I pardon—anyone. Threaten me with thy exile, thy separation, thy seclusion! Remind me that another climate might endanger thy health!—There death met me and turned me round. Threaten me to take our son from us—our one boy, our helpless little one—him whom we made cry because we kissed him both together! Rememberest thou? Or dost thou not hear? turning thus away from me!

Vipsania. I hear; I hear! Oh cease, my sweet Tiberius! Stamp not upon that stone: my heart lies under it.

Tiberius. Ay, there again death, and more than death, stood before me. Oh, she maddened me, my mother did, she maddened me—she threw me to where I am at one breath. The gods cannot replace me where I was, nor atone to me, nor console me, nor restore my senses. To whom can I fly; to whom can I open my heart; to whom speak plainly? There was upon the earth a man I could converse with, and fear nothing; there was a woman, too, I could love, and fear nothing. What a soldier, what a Roman, was my father, O my young bride! How could those who never saw him have discoursed so rightly upon virtue!

Vipsania. These words cool my breast like pressing his urn against it. He was brave: shall Tiberius want courage?

Tiberius. My enemies scorn me. I am a garland dropped from a triumphal car, and taken up and looked on for the place I occupied; and tossed away and laughed at. Senators! laugh, laugh! Your merits may be yet rewarded—be of good cheer! Counsel me, in your wisdom, what services I can render you, conscript fathers!¹

Vipsania This seems mockery: Tiberius did not smile so, once.

Tiberius. They had not then congratulated me

Vipsania. On what?

Tiberius. And it was not because she was beautiful, as they thought her, and virtuous, as I know she is; but because the flowers on the altar were to be tied together by my heart-string. On this they congratulated me. Their day will come. Their sons and daughters are what I would wish them to be: worthy to succeed them.

Vipsania. Where is that quietude, that resignation, that sanctity, that heart of true tenderness?

Tiberius. Where is my love?—my love?

Vipsania. Cry not thus aloud, Tiberius! there is an echo in the place. Soldiers and slaves may burst in upon us.

Tiberius. And see my tears? There is no echo, Vipsania; why alarm and shake me so? We are too high here for the echoes: the city is below us. Methinks it trembles and totters: would it did! from the marble quays of the Tiber to this rock. There is a strange buzz and murmur in my brain; but I should listen so intensely, I should hear the rattle of its roofs, and shout with joy.

Vipsania. Calm, O my life! calm this horrible transport.

Tiberius. Spake I so loud? Did I indeed then send my voice after a lost sound, to bring it back, and thou fanciest it an echo? Wilt not thou laugh with me, as thou were wont to do, at such an error? What was I saying to thee, my tender love, when I commanded—I know not whom—to stand back, on pain of death? Why staringst thou on me in such agony? Have I hurt thy fingers, child? I loose them; now let me look! Thou turnest thine eyes away from me. Oh! oh! I hear my crime! Immortal gods! I cursed them audibly, and before the sun, my mother!

MARCELLUS AND HANNIBAL 1828

Hannibal. Could a Numidian horseman ride no faster? Marcellus! oh! Marcellus! He moves not—he is dead. Did he not stir his fingers? Stand wide, soldiers—wide, forty paces—give him air—bring water—halt! Gather those broad leaves, and all the rest, growing under the brushwood—unbrace his armor. Loose the helmet first—his breast rises. I fancied his eyes were fixed on me—they have rolled back again. Who presumeth to touch my shoulder? This horse? It was surely the horse of Marcellus! Let no man mount him! Ha! ha! the Romans, too, sink into luxury. Here is gold about the charger.

Gaulish Chieftain. Execrable thief! The golden chain of our king under a beast's grinders! The vengeance of the gods hath overtaken the impure—

Hannibal. We will talk about vengeance when we have entered Rome, and about purity among the priests, if they will hear us. Sound for the surgeon. That arrow may be extracted from the side, deep as it is.—The conqueror of Syracuse lies before me.—Send a vessel off to Carthage. Say Hannibal is at the gates of Rome.—Marcellus, who stood alone between us, fallen. Brave man! I would rejoice and cannot.—How awfully serene a countenance! Such as we hear are in the Islands of the Blessed.¹ And how glorious a form and stature! Such too was theirs! They also once lay thus upon the earth wet with their blood—few other enter there. And what plain armor!

Gaulish Chieftain. My party slew him—indeed I think I slew him myself. I claim the chain: it belongs to my king; the glory of Gaul requires it. Never will she endure to see another take it.

Hannibal. My friend, the glory of Marcellus did not require him to wear it. When he suspended the arms of your brave king in the temple, he thought such a trinket unworthy of himself and of Jupiter. The shield he battered down, the breast-plate he pierced with his sword—these he showed to the people and to the gods; hardly his wife and little children saw this, ere his horse wore it.

Gaulish Chieftain. Hear me, O Hannibal!

Hannibal. What! when Marcellus lies before me? when his life may perhaps be recalled? when I may lead him in triumph to Carthage? when Italy, Sicily, Greece, Asia, wait to obey me? Content thee! I will give thee mine own bridle, worth ten such.

Gaulish Chieftain. For myself?

Hannibal. For thyself

¹ Mythical islands said to lie in the Western Ocean, where the favorites of the gods dwell after death, in eternal joy. See Hesiod's Works and Days, 100

Gaulish Chieftain. And these rubies and emeralds, and that scarlet—— Hannibal. Yes, yes.

Gaulish Chieftain. O glorious Hannibal! unconquerable hero! O my happy country! to have such an ally and defender. I swear eternal gratitude—yes, gratitude, love, devotion, beyond eternity.

Hannibal. In all treaties we fix the time I could hardly ask a longer. Go back to thy station—I would see what the surgeon is about, and hear what he thinks. The life of Marcellus! the triumph of Hannibal! what else has the world in it? Only Rome and Carthage these follow.

Marcellus. I must die then? The gods be praised! The commander of a Roman army is no captive.

Hannibal (to the Surgeon). Could not he bear a sea-voyage. Extract the arrow.

Surgeon. He expires that moment.

Marcellus. It pains me: extract it

Hannibal. Marcellus, I see no expression of pain on your countenance, and never will I consent to hasten the death of an enemy in my power. Since your recovery is hopeless, you say truly you are no captive.

(To the Surgeon.) Is there nothing, man, that can assuage the mortal pain? for, suppress the signs of it as he may, he must feel it. Is there nothing to alleviate and allay it?

Marcellus. Hannibal, give me thy hand—thou hast found it and brought it me, compassion.

(To the Surgeon.) Go, friend, others want thy aid, several fell around me

Hannibal. Recommend to your country, O Marcellus, while time permits it, reconciliation and peace with me, informing the Senate of my superiority in force, and the impossibility of resistance. The tablet is ready: let me take off this ring—try to write, to sign it, at least. Oh, what satisfaction I feel at seeing you able to rest upon the elbow, and even to smile!

Marcellus. Within an hour or less, with how severe a blow would Minos say to me, "Marcellus, is this thy writing?"

Rome loses one man—she hath lost many such, and she still hath many left.

Hannibal. Afraid as you are of falsehood, say you this? I confess in shame the ferocity of my countrymen. Unfortunately, too, the nearer posts are occupied by Gauls, infinitely more cruel. The Numidians are so in revenge: the Gauls both in revenge and in sport. My presence is required at a distance, and I apprehend the barbarity of one or other, learning, as they must do, your refusal to execute my wishes for the common good, and feeling that by this refusal you deprive them of their country, after so long an absence

Marcellus. Hannibal, thou art not dying Hannibal. What then? What mean you?

Marcellus. That thou mayest, and very justly, have many things yet to apprehend. I can have none. The barbarity of thy soldiers is nothing to me. mine would not dare be cruel. Hannibal is forced to be absent, and his authority goes away with his horse. On the turf lies defaced the semblance of a general, but Marcellus is yet the regulator of his army. Dost thou abdicate a power conferred on thee by thy nation? Or wouldst thou acknowledge it to have become, by thy own sole fault, less plenary than thy adversary's?

I have spoken too much: let me rest, this mantle oppresses me

Hannibal. I placed my mantle on your head when the helmet was first removed, and while you were lying in the sun. Let me fold it under, and then replace the ring

Marcellus. Take it, Hannibal. It was given me by a poor woman who flew to me at Syracuse, and who covered it with her hair, torn off in desperation that she had no other gift to offer. Little thought I that her gift and her words should be mine. How suddenly may the most powerful be in the situation of the most helpless! Let that ring and the mantle under my head be the exchange of guests at parting. The time may come, Hannibal, when thou (and the gods alone know whether as conqueror or conquered) mayest sit under the roof of my children, and in either case it shall serve thee. In thy adverse fortune, they will remember on whose pillow their father breathed his last; in thy prosperous (Heaven grant it may shine upon thee in some other country!), it will rejoice thee to protect them. We feel ourselves the most exempt from affliction when we relieve it, although we are then the most conscious that it may befall us.

There is one thing here which is not at the disposal of either.

Hannibal. What?

Marcellus. This body

Hannibal. Whither would you be lifted? Men are ready.

Marcellus. I meant not so. My strength is failing. I seem to hear rather what is within than what is without. My sight and my other senses are in confusion. I would have said—This body, when a few bubbles of air shall have left it, is no more worthy of thy notice than of mine; but thy glory will not let thee refuse it to the piety of my family.

Hannibal You would ask something else. I perceive an inquietude not visible till now.

Marcellus. Duty and Death make us think of home sometimes.

Hannibal. Thitherward the thoughts of the conqueror and of the conquered fly together.

Marcellus Hast thou any prisoners from my escort?

Hannibal. A few dying lie about—and let them lie—they are Tuscans. The remainder I saw at a distance, flying, and but one brave man among them—he appeared a Roman—a youth who turned back, though wounded. They surrounded and dragged him away, spurring his horse with their swords. These Etruscans measure their courage carefully, and tack it well together before they put it on, but throw it off again with lordly ease.

Marcellus, why think about them? or does aught else disquiet your thoughts?

Marcellus. I have suppressed it long enough. My son—my beloved son.

Hannibal Where is he? Can it be? Was he with you?

Marcellus He would have shared my fate—and has not. Gods of my Country! beneficent throughout life to me, in death surpassingly beneficent: I render you, for the last time, thanks.

METELLUS AND MARIUS 1829

Metellus Well met, Caius Marius! My orders are to find instantly a centurion who shall mount the walls; one capable of observation, acute in remark, prompt, calm, active, intrepid. The Numantians are sacrificing to the gods in secrecy; they have sounded the horn once only,—and hoarsely and low and mournfully.

Marius. Was that ladder I see yonder among the caper-bushes and purple lilies, under where the fig-tree grows out of the rampart, left for me?

Metellus. Even so, wert thou willing. Wouldst thou mount it?

Marius. Rejoicingly. If none are below or near, may I explore the state of things by entering the city?

Metellus Use thy discretion in that What seest thou? Wouldst thou leap down? Lift the ladder.

Marius. Are there spikes in it where it sticks in the turf? I should slip else.

Metellus How! bravest of the centurions, art even thou afraid? Seest thou any one by?

Marius Ay; some hundreds close beneath me.

Metellus Retire, then. Hasten back, I will protect thy descent.

Marius May I speak, O Metellus, without an offence to discipline?

Metellus. Say.

Marius. Listen! Dost thou not hear?

Metellus. Shame on thee! alight, alight! my shield shall cover thee.

Marius There is a murmur like the hum of bees in the bean-field of Cereate; for the sun is hot, and the ground is thirsty. When will it have drunk up for me the blood that has run, and is yet oozing on it, from those fresh bodies!

Metellus How! We have not fought for many days; what bodies, then, are fresh ones?

Marius Close beneath the wall are those of infants and of girls, in the middle of the road are youths, emaciated; some either unwounded or wounded months ago, some on their spears, others on their swords: no few have received in mutual death the last interchange of friendship; their daggers unite them, hilt to hilt, bosom to bosom.

Metellus Mark rather the living,—what are they about?

Marius About the sacrifice, which portends them, I conjecture, but little good,—it burns sullenly and slowly. The victim will lie upon the pyre till morning, and still be unconsumed, unless they bring more fuel.

I will leap down and walk on cautiously, and return with tidings, if death should spare me.

Never was any race of mortals so unmilitary as these Numantians, no watch, no stations, no palisades across the streets.

Metellus Did they want, then, all the wood for the altar?

Marius. It appears so—I will return anon.

Metellus. The gods speed thee, my brave, honest Marius!

Marius (returned). The ladder should have been better spiked for that slippery ground. I am down again safe, however. Here a man may walk securely, and without picking his steps.

Metellus. Tell me, Caius, what thou sawest.

Marius. The streets of Numantia.

Metellus. Doubtless; but what else?

Marius. The temples and markets and places of exercise and fountains.

Metellus. Art thou crazed, centurion? what more? Speak plainly, at once, and briefly.

Marius. I beheld, then, all Numantia

Metellus. Has terror maddened thee? has thou desecrated nothing of the inhabitants but those carcases under the ramparts?

Marius. Those, O Metellus, lie scattered, although not indeed far asunder. The greater part of the soldiers and citizens—of the fathers, husbands, widows, wives, espoused—were assembled together

Metellus. About the altar?

Marius. Upon it

Metellus. So busy and earnest in devotion! but how all upon it?

Marius. It blazed under them, and over them, and round about them.

Metellus. Immortal gods! Art thou sane, Caius Marius? Thy visage is scorched: thy speech may wander after such an enterprise, thy shield burns my hand Marius. I thought it had cooled again. Why, truly, it seems hot. I now feel it.

Metellus. Wipe off those embers

Marius. 'Twere better: there will be none opposite to shake them upon for some time

The funereal horn, that sounded with such feebleness, sounded not so from the faint heart of him who blew it. Hm! I saw, him only of the living. Should I say it? there was another there was one child whom its parent could not kill, could not part from. She had hidden it in her robe, I suspect, and, when the fire had reached it, either it shrieked or she did. For suddenly a cry pierced through the crackling pinewood, and something of round in figure fell from brand to brand, until it reached the pavement, at the feet of him who had blown the horn. I rushed toward him, for I wanted to hear the whole story, and felt the pressure of time. Condemn not my weakness, O Cælius! I wished an enemy to live an hour longer; for my orders were to explore and bring intelligence. When I gazed on him, in height almost gigantic, I wondered not that the blast of his trumpet was so weak; rather did I wonder that Famine, whose hand had indented every limb and feature, had left him any voice articulate. I rushed toward him, however, ere my eyes had measured either his form or strength. He held the child against me, and staggered under it.

"Behold," he exclaimed, "the glorious ornament of a Roman triumph!"

I stood horror-stricken; when suddenly drops, as of rain, pattered down from the pyre. I looked; and many were the precious stones, many were the amulets and rings and bracelets, and other barbaric ornaments, unknown to me in form or purpose, that tinkled on the hardened and black branches, from mothers and wives and betrothed maids; and some, too, I can imagine, from 10 robuster arms—things of joyance, won in battle. The crowd of incumbent bodies was so dense and heavy, that neither the fire nor the smoke could penetrate upward from among them, and they sank, whole and at 15 once, into the smouldering cavern eating out below. He at whose neck hung the trumpet felt this, and started

"There is yet room," he cried, "and there is strength enough yet, both in the 20 element and in me."

He extended his withered arms, he thrust forward the gaunt links of his throat, and upon gnarled knees, that smote each other audibly, tottered into the civic fire. It— 25 like some hungry and strangest beast on the innermost wild of Africa, pierced, broken, prostrate, motionless, gazed at by its hunter in the impatience of glory, in the delight of awe—panted once more, and seized him

I have seen within this hour, O Metellus, what Rome in the cycle of her triumphs will never see, what the Sun in his eternal course can never show her, what the Earth has borne but now, and must never rear again for her, what Victory herself has envied her,—a Numantian

Metellus. We shall feast tomorrow. Hope, Caius Marius, to become a tribune. 30 trust in fortune.

Marius. Auguries are surer: surest of all is perseverance.

Metellus. I hope the wine has not grown 35 vapid in my tent. I have kept it waiting, and must now report to Scipio the intelligence of our discovery. Come after me, Caius.

Marius (alone). The tribune is the discoverer! the centurion is the scout! Caius 40 Marius must enter more Numantias. Light-hearted Cælius, thou mayest perhaps hereafter, and not with humbled but with exulting pride, take orders from this hand. If Scipio's words are fate, and to me they sound so, the portals of the Capitol may shake before my chariot, as my horses plunge back at the applauses of the people, and Jove in his high domicile¹ may welcome the citizen of Arpinum²

LEOFRIC AND GODIVA¹
1820

Godiva. There is a dearth in the land, my sweet Leofric! Remember how many weeks of drought we have had, even in the deep pastures of Leicestershire; and how many Sundays we have heard the same prayers for rain, and supplications that it would please the Lord in his mercy to turn aside his anger from the poor, pining cattle. You, my dear husband, have imprisoned more than one malefactor for leaving his dead ox in the public way, and other lunds⁴ have fled before you out of the traces, in which they, and their sons and their daughters, and haply their old fathers and mothers, were dragging the abandoned wain homeward. Although we were accompanied by many brave spearmen and skilful archers, it was perilous to pass the creatures which the farm-yard dogs, driven from the hearth by the poverty of their masters, were tearing and devouring; while others, bitten and lamed, filled the air either with long and deep howls or sharp and quick barkings, as they struggled with hunger and feebleness, or were exasperated by heat and pain. Nor could the thyme from the heath, nor the bruised branches of the fir-tree, extinguish or abate the foul odor.

Leofric. And now, Godiva, my darling, thou art afraid we should be eaten up before we enter the gates of Coventry; or perchance that in the gardens there are no roses to greet thee, no sweet herbs for thy mat and pillow.

Godiva. Leofric, I have no such fears. This is the month of roses. I find them everywhere since my blessed marriage. They, and all other sweet herbs, I know not why, seem to greet me wherever I look at them, as though they knew and expected me. Surely they cannot feel that I am fond of them.

Leofric. O light, laughing simpleton! But what wouldst thou? I came not hither to pray; and yet if praying would satisfy thee, or remove the drought, I would ride up straightway to Saint Michael's and pray until morning.

Godiva. I would do the same, O Leofric! but God hath turned away his ear from holier lips than mine. Would my own dear husband hear me, if I implored him for what is easier to accomplish,—what he can do like God?

Leofric. How! what is it?

Godiva. I would not, in the first hurry of your wrath, appeal to you, my loving lord, in behalf of these unhappy men who have offended you.

Leofric. Unhappy! is that all?

Godiva. Unhappy they must surely be, to have offended you so grievously. What a soft air breathes over us! how quiet and serene and still an evening! how calm are the heavens and the earth!—Shall none enjoy them; not even we, my Leofric? The sun is ready to set: let it never set, O Leofric, on your anger. These are not my words: they are better than mine.¹ Should they lose their virtue from my unworthiness in uttering them?

Leofric. Godiva, wouldst thou plead to me for rebels?

Godiva. They have, then, drawn the sword against you? Indeed, I knew it not.

Leofric. They have omitted to send me my dues, established by my ancestors, well knowing of our nuptials, and of the charges and festivities they require, and that in a season of such scarcity my own lands are insufficient.

Godiva. If they were starving, as they said they were—

Leofric. Must I starve too? Is it not enough to lose my vassals?

Godiva. Enough! O God! too much! too much! May you never lose them! Give them life, peace, comfort, contentment. There are those among them who kissed me in my infancy, and who blessed me at the baptismal font. Leofric, Leofric! the first old man I meet I shall think is one of those; and I shall think on the blessing he gave me, and (ah me!) on the blessing I bring back to him. My heart will bleed, will burst; and he will weep at it! he will weep, poor soul, for the wife of a cruel lord who denounces vengeance on him, who carries death into his family!

Leofric. We must hold solemn festivals.

Godiva. We must, indeed

Leofric. Well, then?

Godiva. Is the clamoronsness that succeeds the death of God's dumb creatures, are crowded halls, are slaughtered cattle, festivals?—are maddening songs, and giddy dances, and hireling praises from parti-colored coats? Can the voice of a minstrel tell us better things of ourselves than our own internal one might tell us; or can his breath make our breath softer in sleep? O my beloved! let everything be a joyance to us: it will, if we will. Sad is the day, and worse must follow, when we hear the blackbird in the garden, and do not throb with joy. But, Leofric, the high festival is strown by the servant of God upon the heart of man. It is gladness, it is thanksgiving; it is the orphan, the starveling, pressed to the bosom, and bidden as its first commandment to remember its benefactor. We will hold this festival, the guests are ready, we may keep it up for weeks, and months, and years together, and always be the happier and the richer for it. The beverage of this feast, O Leofric, is sweeter than bee or flower or vine can give us.¹ It flows from heaven; and in heaven will it abundantly be poured out again to him who pours it out here unsparingly.

Leofric. Thou art wild.

Godiva. I have, indeed, lost myself. Some Power, some good kind Power, melts me (body and soul and voice) into tenderness and love. O my husband, we must obey it. Look upon me! look upon me! lift your sweet eyes from the ground! I will not cease to supplicate, I dare not.

Leofric. We may think upon it.

Godiva. Never say that! What! think upon goodness when you can be good? Let not the infants cry for sustenance! The mother of our blessed Lord will hear them, us never, never afterward.

Leofric. Here comes the Bishop: we are but one mile from the walls. Why dismountest thou? no bishop can expect it. Godiva! my honor and rank among men are humbled by this. Earl Godwin will hear of it. Up! up! the Bishop hath seen it: he urgeth his horse onward. Dost thou not hear him now upon the solid turf behind thee?

Godiva. Never, no, never will I rise, O Leofric, until you remit this most impious tax—this tax on hard labor, on hard life.

Leofric. Turn round: look how the fat nag canters, as to the tune of a sinner's psalm, slow and hard-breathing. What reason or right can the people have to complain, while their bishop's steed is so sleek and well caparisoned? Inclination to change, desire to abolish old usages.—Up! up! for shame! They shall smart for it, idlers! Sir Bishop, I must blush for my young bride.

Godiva. My husband, my husband! will you pardon the city?

Leofric. Sir Bishop! I could not think you would have seen her in this plight.

10 Will I pardon? Yea, Godiva, by the holy rood,¹ will I pardon the city, when thou ridest naked at noontide through the streets!

Godiva. O my dear, cruel Leofric, where is the heart you gave me? It was not so: 15 can mine have hardened it?

Bishop. Earl, thou abashest thy spouse; she turneth pale, and weepeth. Lady Godiva, peace be with thee.

Godiva. Thanks, holy man! peace will 20 be with me when peace is with your city. Did you hear my lord's cruel word?

Bishop. I did, lady.

Godiva. Will you remember it, and pray against it?

25 Bishop. Wilt thou forget it, daughter?

Godiva. I am not offended.

Bishop. Angel of peace and purity!

Godiva. But treasure it up in your heart: deem it an incense, good only when it 30 is consumed and spent, ascending with prayer and sacrifice. And, now, what was it?

Bishop. Christ save us! that he will pardon the city when thou ridest naked through 35 the streets at noon.

Godiva. Did he not swear an oath?

Bishop. He swore by the holy rood.

Godiva. My Redeemer, thou hast heard it! save the city!

40 Leofric. We are now upon the beginning of the pavement: these are the suburbs. Let us think of feasting: we may pray afterward; tomorrow we shall rest.

Godiva. No judgments, then, tomorrow.

45 Leofric?

Leofric. None: we will carouse.

Godiva. The saints of heaven have given me strength and confidence; my prayers are heard; the heart of my beloved is now 50 softened.

Leofric (aside). Av, ay—they shall smart, though.

Godiva. Say, dearest Leofric, is there indeed no other hope, no other mediation?

55 Leofric. I have sworn. Beside, thou hast made me redden and turn my face away from thee, and all the knaves have seen it: this adds to the city's crime.

¹ That is, sweeter than mead, which is made of honey, nectar, and wine.

² cross

Godiva. I have blushed too, Leofric, and was not rash nor obdurate.

Leofric. But thou, my sweetest, art given to blushing: there is no conquering it in thee. I wish thou hadst not alighted so hastily and roughly: it hath shaken down a sheaf of thy hair. Take heed thou sit not upon it, lest it anguish thee. Well done! it mingleth now sweetly with the cloth of gold upon the saddle, running here and there, as if it had life and faculties and business, and were working thereupon some newer and cunninger device. O my beautiful Eve! there is a Paradise about thee! the world is refreshed as thou movest and breathest on it. I cannot see or think of evil where thou art. I could throw my arms even here about thee. No signs for me! no shaking of sunbeams! no reproof or frown or wonderment—I will say it—now, then, for worse—I could close with my kisses thy half-open lips, ay, and those lovely and loving eyes, before the people Godiva. Tomorrow you shall kiss me, and they shall bless you for it. I shall be very pale, for tonight I must fast and pray.

Leofric. I do not hear thee; the voices of the folk are so loud under this archway.

Godiva (to herself). God help them! good kind souls! I hope they will not crowd about me so tomorrow. O Leofric! could my name be forgotten, and yours alone remembered! But perhaps my innocence may save me from reproach; and how many as innocent are in fear and famine! No eye will open on me but fresh from tears. What a young mother for so large a family! Shall my youth harm me? Under God's hand it gives me courage. Ah! when will the morning come? Ah! when will the noon be over?

From PERICLES AND ASPASIA
1836

66. PERICLES TO ASPASIA

There are things, Aspasia, beyond the art of Phidias. He may represent Love leaning upon his bow and listening to Philo-50 sophy; but not for hours together: he may represent Love, while he is giving her a kiss for her lesson, twining her arms behind her; loosing them again must be upon 55 another marble

69. PERICLES TO ASPASIA

Do you love me? do you love me? Stay, reason upon it, sweet Aspasia! doubt, hesitate, question, drop it, take it up again, provide, raise obstacles, reply indirectly. Oracles are sacred, and there is a pride in being a diviner.

70. ASPASIA TO PERICLES

I will do none of those things you tell me to do; but I will say something you forgot to say, about the insufficiency of Phidias.

He may represent a hero with unbent brows, a sage with the lyre of Poetry in his hand, Ambition with her face half-averted from the city, but he cannot represent, in the same sculpture, at the same distance, Aphrodite higher than Pallas. He would be derided if he did; and a great man can never do that for which a little man may deride him.

I shall love you even more than I do, if 25 you will love yourself more than me. Did ever lover talk so? Pray tell me, for I have forgotten all they ever talked about. But, Pericles! Pericles! be careful to lose nothing of your glory, or you lose all that can be 30 lost of me; my pride, my happiness, my content; everything but my poor weak love. Keep glory, then, for my sake!

104. PERICLES TO ASPASIA

Send me a note whenever you are idle and thinking of me, dear Aspasia! Send it always by some old slave, ill-dressed. The people will think it a petition, or something 40 as good, and they will be sure to observe the pleasure it throws into my countenance. Two winds at once will blow into my sails, each helping me onward.

If I am tired, your letter will refresh me; 45 if occupied, it will give me activity. Beside, what a deal of time we lose in business!

105. ASPASIA TO PERICLES

Would to heaven, O Pericles! you had no business at all, but the conversation of your friends. You must always be the 50 greatest man in the city, whoever may be the most popular. I wish we could spend the whole day together; must it never be? Are you not already in possession of all you ever contended for?

It is time, methinks, that you should leave off speaking in public, for you begin to be negligent and incorrect. I am to write you a note whenever I am idle and thinking of you!

Pericles! Pericles! how far is it from idleness to think of you! We come to rest before we come to idleness

173 ASPASIA TO PERICLES

When the war is over, as surely it must be in another year, let us sail among the islands of the Ægean, and be young as ever. O that it were permitted us to pass together the remainder of our lives in privacy and retirement! This is never to be hoped for in Athens.

I inherit from my mother a small yet beautiful house in Tenos: I remember it well. Water, clear and cold, ran before the vestibule; a sycamore shaded the whole building. I think Tenos must be nearer to Athens than to Miletus. Could we not go now for a few days? How temperate was the air, how serene the sky, how beautiful the country! the people how quiet, how gentle, how kind-hearted!

Is there any station so happy as an uncontested place in a small community, where manners are simple, where wants are few, where respect is the tribute of probity, and love is the guerdon of beneficence! O Pericles! let us go, we can return at any time

Now the fever is raging, and we are separated, my comfort and delight is in our little Pericles. The letters you send me come less frequently, but I know you write whenever your duties will allow you, and whenever men are found courageous enough to take charge of them. Although you preserved with little care the speeches you delivered formerly, yet you promised me a copy of the latter, and as many of the earlier as you could collect among your friends. Let me have them as soon as possible. Whatever bears the traces of your hand is precious to me: how greatly more precious what is imprest with your genius, what you have meditated and spoken! I shall see your calm thoughtful face while I am reading, and will be cautious not to read aloud lest I lose the illusion of your voice.

194. ASPASIA TO PERICLES

Gratitude to the immortal gods overpowers every other impulse of my breast. You are safe.

Pericles! O my Pericles! come into this purer air! live life over again in the smiles of your child, in the devotion of your Aspasia! Why did you fear for me the plague within the city, the Spartans round it? why did you exact the vow at parting, that nothing but your command should recall me again to Athens? Why did I ever make it? Cruel! to refuse me the full enjoyment of your recovered health! crueller to keep me in ignorance of its decline! The happiest of pillows is not that which Love first presses, it is that which Death has frowned on and passed over

231. ASPASIA TO CLEONE

Where on earth is there so much society as in a beloved child? He accompanies me in my walks, gazes into my eyes for what I am gathering from books, tells me more and better things than they do, and asks me often what neither I nor they can answer. When he is absent I am filled with reflections; when he is present I have room for none beside what I receive from him. The charms of his childhood bring me back to the delights of mine, and I fancy I hear my own words in a sweeter voice. Will he (O how I tremble at the mute oracle of futurity!), will he ever be as happy as I have been? Alas! and must he ever be as subject to fears and apprehensions? No; thanks to the gods! never, never. He carries his father's heart within his breast. I see him already an orator and a leader. I try to teach him daily some of his father's looks and gestures, and I never smile but at his docility and gravity. How his father will love him! the little thunderer! the winner of cities! the vanquisher of Cleones!

233. ASPASIA TO PERICLES

Never tell me, O my Pericles! that you are suddenly changed in appearance. May every change of your figure and countenance be gradual, so that I shall not perceive it; but if you really are altered to such a degree as you describe, I must transfer my affection — from the first Pericles to the second. Are you jealous? If you are, it is I who am to be pitied, whose heart is destined to fly from the one to the other incessantly. In the end it will rest, it shall, it must, on the nearest. I would write a longer letter; but it is a sad and wearisome thing to aim at playfulness where the hand is palsied by affliction. Be well, and all is well; be happy, and Athens rises up again, alert, and blooming, and vigorous, from between war and pestilence. Love me: for love cures all but love. How can we fear to die, how can we die, while we cling or are clung to the beloved?

234. PERICLES TO ARPASIA

The pestilence has taken from me both my sons. You, who were ever so kind and affectionate to them, will receive a tardy recompense, in hearing that the least gentle and the least grateful did acknowledge it.

I mourn for Paroles, because he loved me, for Xanthippos, because he loved me not.

Preserve with all your maternal care our little Pericles. I cannot be fonder of him than I have always been; I can only fear more for him.

Is he not with my Aspasia? What fears then are so irrational as mine? But oh! I am living in a widowed house, a house of desolation; I am living in a city of tombs and torches; and the last I saw before me were for my children.

235. PERICLES TO ASPASIA

It is right and orderly, that he who has partaken so largely in the prosperity of the Athenians, should close the procession of their calamities. The fever that has depopulated our city, returned upon me last night, and Hippocrates and Acon tell me that my end is near.

When we agreed, O Aspasia! in the beginning of our loves, to communicate our thoughts by writing, even while we were both in Athens, and when we had many reasons for it, we little foresaw the more powerful one that has rendered it necessary of late. We never can meet again: the laws forbid it,¹ and love itself enforces them. Let wisdom be heard by you as imperturbably, and affection as authoritatively, as ever; and remember that the sorrow of Pericles can arise but from the bosom of Aspasia. There is only one word of tenderness we could say, which we have not said oftentimes before; and there is no consolation

tion in it. The happy never say, and never hear said, farewell.

Reviewing the course of my life, it appears to me at one moment as if we met but yesterday; at another as if centuries had passed within it; for within it have existed the greater part of those who, since the origin of the world, have been the luminaries of the human race. Damon called me from my music to look at Aristides on his way to exile; and my father pressed the wrist by which he was leading me along, and whispered in my ear:

"Walk quickly by; glance cautiously; it is there Miltiades is in prison."

In my boyhood Pindar took me up in his arms, when he brought to our house the dirge he had composed for the funeral of my grandfather, in my adolescence I offered the rites of hospitality to Empedocles; not long afterward I embraced the neck of Æschylus, about to abandon his country. With Sophocles I have argued on eloquence; with Euripides on polity and ethics, I have discoursed, as became an inquirer, with Protagoras and Democritus, with Anaxagoras and Meton. From Herodotus I have listened to the most instructive history, conveyed in a language the most copious and the most harmonious; a man worthy to carry away the collected suffrages of universal Greece, a man worthy to throw open the temples of Egypt, and to celebrate the exploits of Cyrus. And from Thucydides, who alone can succeed to him, how recently did my Aspasia hear with me the energetic praises of his just supremacy!

As if the festival of life were incomplete, and wanted one great ornament to crown it, Phidias placed before us, in ivory and gold, the tutelary Deity of this land, and the Zeus of Homer and Olympus.

To have lived with such men, to have enjoyed their familiarity and esteem, overpays all labors and anxieties. I were unworthy of the friendships I have commemorated, were I forgetful of the latest. Sacred it ought to be, formed as it was under the portico of Death, my friendship with the most sagacious, the most scientific, the most beneficent of philosophers, Acon and Hippocrates. If mortal could war against Pestilence and Destiny, they had been victorious. I leave them in the field: unfortunate he who finds them among the fallen!

And now, at the close of my day, when every light is dim and every guest departed, let me own that these wane before me, remembering, as I do in the pride and fulness of my heart, that Athens confided her glory, and Aspasia her happiness, to me.

Have I been a faithful guardian? do I resign them to the custody of the gods undiminished and unimpaired? Welcome then, welcome my last hour! After enjoying for so great a number of years, in my public and my private life, what I believe has never been the lot of any other, I now extend my hand to the urn,¹ and take without reluctance or hesitation what is the lot of all.

THE PENTAMERON

1837

FROM FIFTH DAY'S INTERVIEW

THE DREAM OF BOCCACCIO

Boccaccio. In vain had I determined not only to mend in future, but to correct the past, in vain had I prayed most fervently for grace to accomplish it, with a final aspiration to Fiammetta that she would unite with your beloved Laura, and that, gentle and beatified spirits as they are, they would breathe together their purer prayers on mine. See what follows.

Petrarca. Sigh not at it. Before we can see all that follows from their intercession, we must join them again. But let me hear anything in which they are concerned.

Boccaccio. I prayed; and my breast, after some few tears, grew calmer. Yet sleep did not ensue until the break of morning, when the dropping of soft rain on the leaves of the fig-tree at the window, and the chirping of a little bird, to tell another there was shelter under them, brought me repose and slumber. Scarcely had I closed my eyes, if indeed time can be reckoned any more in sleep than in heaven, when my Fiammetta seemed to have led me into the meadow. You will see it below you: turn away that branch: gently! gently! do not break it; for the little bird sat there.

Petrarca. I think, Giovanni, I can divine the place. Although this fig-tree, growing out of the wall between the cellar and us, is fantastic enough in its branches, yet that other which I see yonder, bent down and forced to crawl along the grass by the prepotency of the young shapely walnut-tree, is much more so. It forms a seat, about a cubit above the ground, level and long enough for several.

Boccaccio. Ha! you fancy it must be a favorite spot with me, because of the two strong forked stakes wherewith it is propped and supported!

Petrarca. Poets know the haunts of poets at first sight; and he who loved Laura—O Laura! did I say he who loved thee?—hath whisperings where those feet would wander which have been restless after Fiammetta.

Boccaccio. It is true, my imagination has often conducted her thither, but here in this chamber she appeared to me more visibly in a dream.

“Thy prayers have been heard, O Giovanni,” said she.

I sprang to embrace her.

“Do not spill the water! Ah! you have spilt a part of it.”

I then observed in her hand a crystal vase. A few drops were sparkling on the sides and running down the rim, a few were trickling from the base and from the hand that held it.

“I must go down to the brook,” said she, “and fill it again as it was filled before.”

What a moment of agony was this to me! Could I be certain how long might be her absence? She went. I was following. She made a sign for me to turn back. I disobeyed her only an instant yet my sense of disobedience, increasing my feebleness and confusion, made me lose sight of her. In the next moment she was again at my side, with the cup quite full. I stood motionless.

I feared my breath might shake the water over. I looked her in the face for her commands—and to see it—to see it so calm, so beneficent, so beautiful. I was forgetting what I had prayed for, when she lowered her head, tasted of the cup, and gave it me. I drank; and suddenly sprang forth before me, many groves and palaces and gardens, and their statues and their avenues, and their labyrinths of alaternus and bay, and alcoves of citron, and watchful loopholes in the retirements of impenetrable pomegranate. Farther off, just below where the fountain slipped away from its marble hall and guardian gods, arose, from their beds of moss and drossera and darkest grass, the sisterhood of oleanders, fond of tantalizing with their bosomed flowers and their moist and pouting blossoms the little shy rivulet, and of covering its face with all the colors of the dawn. My dream expanded and moved forward. I trod again the dust of Posilippo, soft as the feathers in the wings of Sleep. I emerged on Baia; I crossed her innumerable arches; I loitered in the breezy sunshine of her mole,¹ I trusted the faithful seclusion of her caverns, the keepers of so many secrets, and I reposed on the buoyancy of her tepid sea. Then Naples, and her theatres and her churches, and grottoes and dells and forts and promontories, rushed forward in confusion, now among soft whispers, now among sweetest sounds, and subsided, and sank, and disappeared. Yet a memory seemed to come fresh from every one each had time enough for its tale, for its pleasure, for its reflection, for its pang. As I mounted with silent steps the narrow staircase of the old palace, how distinctly did I feel against the palm of my hand the coldness of that smooth stonework, and the greater of the cramps of iron in it!

"Ah me! is this forgetting?" cried I anxiously to Fiammetta.

"We must recall these scenes before us," she replied. "such is the punishment of them! Let us hope and believe that the apparition, and the compunction which must follow it, will be accepted as the full penalty, and that both will pass away almost together."

I feared to lose anything attendant on her presence. I feared to approach her forehead with my lips. I feared to touch the lily on its long wavy leaf in her hair, which filled my whole heart with fragrance. Venerating, adoring, I bowed my head at last to kiss her snow-white robe, and trembled at my presumption. And yet the effulgence of her countenance vivified while it chastened me. I loved her—I must not say more than ever—better than ever; it was Fiammetta who had inhabited the skies. As my hand opened toward her,

"Beware!" said she, faintly smiling; "beware, Giovanni! Take only the crystal; take it, and drink again."

"Must all be then forgotten?" said I sorrowfully.

"Remember your prayer and mine, Giovanni. Shall both have been granted—O how much worse than in vain!"

I drank instantly, I drank largely. How cool my bosom grew, how could it grow so cool before her! But it was not to remain in its quiescence; its trials were not yet over. I will not, Francesco! no, I may not commemorate the incidents she related to me, nor which of us said, "I blush for having loved first;" nor which of us replied, "Say least, say least, and blush again."

The charm of the words (for I felt not the encumbrance of the body nor the acuteness of the spirit) seemed to possess me wholly. Although the water gave me strength and comfort, and somewhat of celestial pleasure, many tears fell around the border of the vase as she held it up before me, exhorting me to take courage, and inviting me with more than exhortation to accomplish my deliverance. She came nearer, more tenderly, more earnestly, she held the dewy globe with both hands, leaning forward, and sighed and shook her head, drooping at my pusillanimity. It was only when a ringlet had touched the rim, and perhaps the water (for a sunbeam on the surface could never have given it such a golden hue), that I took courage, clasped it, and exhausted it. Sweet as was the water, sweet as was the serenity it gave me—alas! that also which it moved away from me was sweet!

"This time you can trust me alone," said she, and parted my hair, and kissed my brow. Again she went toward the brook again my agitation, my weakness, my doubt, came over me. nor could I see her while she raised the water, nor knew I whence she drew it. When she returned, she was close to me at once. she smiled. her smile pierced me to the bones. it seemed an angel's. She sprinkled the pure water on me; she looked most fondly, she took my hand; she suffered me to press hers to my bosom, but, whether by design I cannot tell, she let fall a few drops of the chilly element between.

"And now, O my beloved!" said she, "we have consigned to the bosom of God our earthly joys and sorrows. The joys cannot return, let not the sorrows. These alone would trouble my repose among the blessed."

"Trouble thy repose! Fiammetta! Give me the chalice!" cried I—"not a drop will I leave in it, not a drop."

"Take it!" said that soft voice. "O now most dear Giovanni! I know thou hast strength enough, and there is but little—at the bottom lies our first kiss."

"Mine! didst thou say, beloved one? and is that left thee still?"

"Mine," said she, pensively, and as she abased her head, the broad leaf of the lily hid her brow and her eyes, the light of heaven shone through the flower.

"O Fiammetta! Fiammetta!" cried I in agony, "God is the God of mercy, God is the God of love—can I, can I ever?" I struck the chalice against my head, unmindful that I held it; the water covered my face and my feet. I started up, not yet awake, and I heard the name of Fiammetta in the curtains.

Petrarca. Love, O Giovanni, and life itself, are but dreams at best.

BENEATH THE CYPRESS¹ SHADE 1806

I dug, beneath the cypress shade,
What well might seem an elfin's grave,
And every pledge in earth I laid,
That erst thy false affection gave

⁵ I pressed them down the sod beneath,
I placed one mossy stone above,
And twined the rose's fading wreath Around the sepulchre of love

Frail as thy love, the flowers were dead,

OH! BOLD ROBIN HOOD IS A FORESTER GOOD

Oh! bold Robin Hood is a forester good,
As ever drew bow in the merry greenwood.
At his bugle's shrill singing the echoes are ringing,
The wild deer are springing for many a rood.

5 Its summons we follow, through brake,³ over hollow,
The thrice-blown shrill summons of bold Robin Hood.

And what eye hath e'er seen such a sweet Maiden Queen,
As Marian, the pride of the forester's

A sweet garden-flower, she blooms in the bower,

IN THE DAYS OF OLD

In the days of old
Lovers felt true passion, Deeming years of sorrow
By a smile repaid.

5 Now the charms of gold, Spells of pride and fashion,
Bid them sav Good-morrow
To the best-loved maid

Through the forests wild, 10 O'er the mountains lonely,
They were never weary Honor to pursue.
If the damsel smiled
Once in seven years only,

15 All their wanderings dreary Ample guerdon knew.

Now one day's caprice Weighs down years of smiling, Youthful hearts are rovers, 20 Love is bought and sold.
Fortune's gifts may cease,
Love is less beguiling.
Wiser were the lovers
In the days of old.

LOVE AND AGE

I played with you mid cowslips blowing.
When I was six and you were four,
When garlands weaving, flower-balls throw-
ing,
Were pleasures soon to please no more 5 Through groves and meads, o'er grass and heather,
With little playmates, to and fro,
We wandered hand in hand together,
But that was sixty years ago

You grew a lovely roseate maiden, 10 And still our early love was strong;
Still with no care our days were laden,
They glided joyously along,
And I did love you very dearly,
How dearly words want power to show, 15 I thought your heart was touched as nearly,
But that was fifty years ago

Then other lovers came around you,
Your beauty grew from year to year.
And many a splendid circle found you 20 The centre of its glittering sphere
I saw you then, first vows forsaking, On rank and wealth your hand bestow, Oh, then I thought my heart was breaking,—
But that was forty years ago.

25 And I lived on, to wed another;
No cause she gave me to repine,
And when I heard you were a mother,
I did not wish the children mine
My own young flock, in fair progression 30 Made up a pleasant Christmas row:
My joy in them was past expression,—
But that was thirty years ago

You grew a matron plump and comely,
You dwelt in fashion's brightest blaze:
35 My earthly lot was far more homely,

But I too had my festal days.
No merrier eyes have ever glistened Around the hearth-stone's wintry glow, Than when my youngest child was christened,—

40 But that was twenty years ago.

Time passed My eldest girl was married,
And I am now a grandsire gray,
One pet of four years old I've carried Among the wild-flowered meads to play.

45 In our old fields of childish pleasure,
Where now, as then, the cowslips blow,
She fills her basket's ample measure,—
But that is not ten years ago

But though first love's impassioned blindness

50 Has passed away in colder light,
I still have thought of you with kindness,
And shall do, till our last good-night
The ever-rolling silent hours

Will bring a time we shall not know, 55 When our young days of gathering flowers Will be an hundred years ago

WILLIAM COBBETT (1763-1835)

From RURAL RIDES

KENSINGTON,
Friday, 4 Jan., 1832

Got home from Battle I had no time to see the town, having entered the Inn on Wednesday in the dusk of the evening, having been engaged all day yesterday in the Inn, and having come out of it only to get into the coach this morning. I had not time to go even to see Battle Abbey, the seat of the Webster family, now occupied by a man of the name of Alexander! Thus they replace them!¹ It will take a much shorter time than most people imagine to put out all the ancient families. I should think that six years will turn out all those who receive nothing out of taxes. The greatness of the estate is no protection to the owner, for, great or little, it will soon yield him no rents; and, when the produce is nothing in either case, the small estate is as good as the large one. Mr. Curteis said that the land was immovable; yes; but the rents are not. And, if freeholds cannot be seized for common contract debts, the carcass of the owner may. But, in fact, there will be no

rents, and, without these, the ownership is an empty sound. Thus, at last, the burthen will, as I always said it would, fall upon the landowner; and, as the fault of supporting the system has been wholly his, the burthen will fall upon the right back. Whether he will now call in the people to help him to shake it off is more than I can say; but, if he do not, I am sure that he must sink under it. And then, will revolution No. I have been accomplished, but far, and very far indeed, will that be from being the close of the drama!—I cannot quit Battle without observing, that the country is very pretty all about it. All hill, or valley. A great deal of wood-land, in which the under-wood is generally very fine, though the oaks are not very fine, and a good deal covered with moss. This shows that the clay ends before the tap-root of the oak gets as deep as it would go; for, when the clay goes the full depth, the oaks are always fine.—The woods are too large and too near each other for hare-hunting, and as to coursing,¹ it is out of the question here. But it is a fine country for shooting and for harboring game of all sorts.—It was rainy as I came home, but the woodmen were at work. A great many hop-poles are cut here, which makes the coppices more valuable than in many other parts. The women work in the coppices, shaving the bark off the hop-poles, and, indeed, at various other parts of the business. These poles are shaved to prevent maggots from breeding in the bark and accelerating the destruction of the pole. It is curious that the bark of trees should generate maggots; but it has, as well as the wood, a sugary matter in it. The hickory wood in America sends out from the ends of the logs when these are burning, great quantities of the finest syrup that can be imagined. Accordingly, that wood breeds maggots, or worms as they are usually called, surprisingly. Our ash breeds worms very much. When the tree or pole is cut, the moist matter between the outer bark and the wood, putrefies. Thence come the maggots, which soon begin to eat their way into the wood. For this reason the bark is shaved off the hop-poles, as it ought to be off all our timber trees, as soon as cut, especially the ash.—Little boys and girls shave hop-poles and assist in other coppice work very nicely. And, it is pleasant work when the weather is dry over head. The woods, bedded with leaves as they are, are clean and dry underfoot. They are warm too, even in the coldest weather. When the ground is frozen several inches deep in the open fields, it is scarcely frozen at all in a coppice where the underwood is a good plant, and where it is nearly high enough to cut. So that the woodman's is really a pleasant life. We are apt to think that the birds have a hard time of it in winter. But, we forget the warmth of the woods, which far exceeds any thing to be found in farm yards. When Sidmouth started me from my farm, in 1817,¹ I had just planted my farm round with a pretty coppice. But, never mind, Sidmouth and I shall, I dare say, have plenty of time and occasion to talk about that coppice, and many other things, before we die. And, can I, when I think of these things now, pity those to whom Sidmouth owed his power of starting me!—But let me forget the subject for this time at any rate.—Woodland countries are interesting on many accounts. Not so much on account of their masses of green leaves, as on account of the variety of sights and sounds and incidents that they afford. Even in winter the coppices are beautiful to the eye, while they comfort the mind with the idea of shelter and warmth. In spring they change their hue from day to day during two whole months, which is about the time from the first appearance of the delicate leaves of the birch to the full expansion of those of the ash; and, even before the leaves come at all to intercept the view, what in the vegetable creation is so delightful to behold as the bed of a coppice bespangled with primroses and bluebells? The opening of the birch leaves is the signal for the pheasant to begin to crow, for the blackbird to whistle, and the thrush to sing, and, just when the oak-buds begin to look reddish, and not a day before, the whole tribe of finches burst forth in songs from every bough, while the lark, imitating them all, carries the joyous sounds to the sky. These are amongst the means which Providence has benignantly appointed to sweeten the toils by which food and raiment are produced; these the English ploughman could once hear without the sorrowful reflection that he himself was a pauper, and that the bounties of nature had, for him, been scattered in vain! And shall he never see an end to this state of things! Shall he never have the due reward of his labor! Shall unsparing taxation never cease to make him a miserable dejected being, a creature famishing in the midst of abundance, fainting, expiring with hunger's feeble moans, surrounded by a carolling creation! O! accursed paper-money!² Has hell a torment surpassing the wickedness of thy inventor!

THURSDAY,

Wednesday, 26 Oct., 1825.

The weather has been beautiful ever since last Thursday morning; but there has been a white frost every morning, and the days have been coldish. Here, however, I am quite at home in a room, where there is one of my American Fireplaces, bought, by my host,³ of Mr. Judson of Kensington, who has made many a score of families comfortable, instead of sitting shivering in the cold. At the house of the gentleman whose house I am now in, there is a good deal of fuel-wood; and here I see in the parlors, those fine and cheerful fires that make a great part of the happiness of the Americans. But these fires are to be had only in this sort of fireplace. Ten times the fuel; nay, no quantity, would effect the same object, in any other fireplace. It is equally good for coal as for wood, but for pleasure, a wood-fire is the thing. There is, round about almost every gentleman's or great farmer's house, more wood suffered to rot every year, in one shape or another, than would make (with this fireplace) a couple of rooms constantly warm, from October to June. Here, peat, turf, saw-dust, and wood are burnt in these fireplaces. My present host has three of the fireplaces.

Being out a-coursing today, I saw a queer-looking building upon one of the thousands of hills that nature has tossed up in endless variety of form round the skirts of the lofty Hindhead. This building is, it seems, called a Semaphore, or Semphare, or ¹ In 1797, the Bank of England was forbidden to make its payments in gold. The paper-money which was then issued in large quantities gradually depreciated in value until fears of a national bankruptcy became general. It was doubted whether the Bank ever could and would resume cash payments, and Cobbett announced that when that time came he would give himself up to be broiled upon a gridiron. Cash payments were resumed, however, on May 1, 1821. See Martineau's The History of England, 1, 294-99, and 2, 225-30. ³ In 1817, Henry Addington, first Viscount Sidmouth, restricted the liberty of the press because Cobbett's attacks on the government, published in his Weekly Political Register, caused a growing discontent among the working classes. In order to continue his attacks unmolested, Cobbett left his "Farm-house" at Botley, Hampshire, and came to America.

something of that sort. What this word may have been hatched out of I cannot say; but it means a job,¹ I am sure. To call it an alarm-post would not have been so convenient, for people not endued with Scotch intellect might have wondered why we should have to pay for alarm-posts; and might have thought that, with all our "glorious victories,"² we had "brought our hogs to a fine market,"³ if our dread of the enemy were such as to induce us to have alarm-posts all over the country! Such unintellectual people might have thought that we had "conquered France by the immortal Wellington," to little purpose, if we were still in such fear as to build alarm-posts; and they might, in addition, have observed that, for many hundred of years, England stood in need of neither signal-posts nor standing army of mercenaries; but relied safely on the courage and public spirit of the people themselves. By calling the thing by an outlandish name, these reflections amongst the unintellectual are obviated. Alarm-post would be a nasty name; and it would puzzle people exceedingly, when they saw one of these at a place like Ashe, a little village on the north side of the chalk-ridge (called the Hog's Back) going from Guildford to Farnham! What can this be for? Why are these expensive things put up all over the country? Respecting the movements of whom is wanted this alarm-system? Will no member ask this in parliament? Not one: not a man; and yet it is a thing to ask about. Ah! it is in vain, THING,⁴ that you thus are making your preparations; in vain that you are setting your tammels! The debt, the blessed debt, that best ally of the people, will break them all; will snap them, as the hornet does the cobweb; and even these very "Semaphores" contribute towards the force of that ever-blessed debt. Curious to see how things work! The "glorious revolution,"⁵ which was made for the avowed purpose of maintaining the Protestant ascendancy, and which was followed by such terrible persecution of the Catholics; that "glorious" affair, which set aside a race of kings, because they were Catholics, served as the precedent for the American revolution, also called "glorious," and this second revolution compelled the successors of the makers of the first to begin to cease their persecutions of the Catholics! Then again, the debt was made to raise and keep armies on foot to prevent reform of parliament, because, as it was feared by the aristocracy, reform would have humbled them, and this debt, created for this purpose, is fast sweeping the aristocracy out of their estates, as a clown, with his foot, kicks field-mice out of their nests. There was a hope that the debt could have been reduced by stealth, as it were; that the aristocracy could have been saved in this way. That hope now no longer exists. In all likelihood the funds will keep going down. What is to prevent this, if the interest of Exchequer Bills¹ be raised, as the broadsheet² tells us it is to be? What! the funds fall in time of peace; and the French funds not fall in time of peace! However, it will all happen just as it ought to happen. Even the next session of parliament will bring out matters of some interest. The thing is now working in the surest possible way.

The great business of life, in the country, appertains, in some way or other, to the game, and especially at this time of the year. If it were not for the game, a country life would be like an everlasting honey-moon, which would, in about half a century, put an end to the human race. In towns, or large villages, people make a shift to find the means of rubbing the rust off from each other by a vast variety of sources of contest. A couple of wives meeting in the street, and giving each other a wry look, or a look not quite civil enough, will, if the parties be hard pushed for a ground of contention, do pretty well. But in the country, there is, alas! no such resource. Here are no walls for people to take of each other.³ Here they are so placed as to prevent the possibility of such lucky local contact. Here is more than room of every sort, elbow, leg, horse, or carriage, for them all. Even at church (most of the people being in the meeting-houses) the pews are surprisingly too large. Here, therefore, where all circumstances seem calculated to cause never-ceasing concord with its accompanying dullness, there would be no relief at all, were it not for the game. Thus, happily, supplies the place of all other sources of alternate dispute and reconciliation; it keeps all in life and motion, from the lord down to the hedger. When I see two men, whether in a market-room, by the way-side, in a parlor, in a churchyard, or even in the church itself, engaged in manifestly deep and most momentous discourse, I will, if it be any time between September and February, bet ten to one, that it is, in some way or other, about the game. The wives and daughters hear so much of it, that they inevitably get engaged in the disputes, and thus all are kept in a state of vivid animation. I should like very much to be able to take a spot, a circle of 12 miles in diameter, and take an exact amount of all the time spent by each individual, above the age of ten (that is the age they begin at), in talking, during the game season of one year, about the game and about sporting exploits. I verily believe that it would amount, upon an average, to six times as much as all the other talk put together, and, as to the anger, the satisfaction, the scolding, the commendation, the chagrin, the exultation, the envy, the emulation, where are there any of these in the country, unconnected with the game?

There is, however, an important distinction to be made between hunters (including coursers) and shooters. The latter are, as far as relates to their exploits, a disagreeable class, compared with the former; and the reason of this is, their doings are almost wholly their own, while, in the case of the others, the achievements are the property of the dogs. Nobody likes to hear another talk much in praise of his own acts, unless those acts have a manifest tendency to produce some good to the hearer, and shooters do talk much of their own exploits, and those exploits rather tend to humiliate the hearer. Then, a great shooter will, nine times out of ten, go so far as almost to lie a little; and, though people do not tell him of it, they do not like him the better for it; and he but too frequently discovers that they do not believe him. Whereas, hunters are mere followers of the dogs, as mere spectators; their praises, if any are called for, are bestowed on the greyhounds, the hounds, the fox, the hare, or the horses. There is a little rivalry in the riding, or in the behavior of the horses; but this has so little to do with the personal merit of the sportsmen, that it never produces a want of good fellowship in the evening of the day. A shooter who has been missing all day, must have an uncommon share of good sense, not to feel mortified while the slaughterers are relating the adventures of that day; and this is what cannot exist in the case of the hunters. Bring me into a room, with a dozen men in it, who have been sporting all day, or, rather let me be in an adjoining room, where I can hear the sound of their voices, without being able to distinguish the words, and I will bet ten to one that I tell whether they be hunters or shooters.

I was once acquainted with a famous shooter whose name was William Ewing. He was a barrister of Philadelphia, who became far more renowned by his gun than by his law cases. We spent scores of days together a-shooting, and were extremely well matched. I having excellent dogs and caring little about my reputation as a shot, his dogs being good for nothing, and he caring more about his reputation as a shot than as a lawyer. The fact which I am going to relate respecting this gentleman, ought to be a warning to young men, how they become enamored of this species of vanity. We had gone about ten miles from our home, to shoot where partridges were said to be very plentiful. We found them so. In the course of a November day, he had, just before dark, shot, and sent to the farm-house, or kept in his bag, ninety-nine partridges. He made some few double shots, and he might have a miss or two, for he sometimes shot when out of my sight, on account of the woods. However, he said that he killed at every shot, and, as he had counted the birds, when we went to dinner at the farm-house and when he cleaned his gun, he, just before sun-set, knew that he had killed ninety-nine partridges, every one upon the wing, and a great part of them in woods very thickly set with largish trees. It was a grand achievement; but unfortunately, he wanted to make it a hundred. The sun was setting, and, in that country, darkness comes almost at once, it is more like the going out of a candle than that of a fire; and I wanted to be off, as we had a very bad road to go, and as he, being under strict petticoat government, to which he most loyally and dutifully submitted, was compelled to get home that night, taking me with him, the vehicle (horse and gig) being mine. I, therefore, pressed him to come away, and moved on myself towards the house (that of old John Brown, in Bucks county, grandfather of that General Brown, who gave some of our whiskered heroes such a rough handling last war,¹ which was waged for the purpose of "depos-ing James Madison"), at which house I would have stayed all night, but from which I was compelled to go by that watchful government, under which he had the good fortune to live. Therefore I was in haste to be off. No. he would kill the hundredth bird! In vain did I talk of the bad road and its many dangers for want of moon. The poor partridges, which we had scattered about, were calling all around us; and, just at this moment, up got one under his feet, in a field in which the wheat was three or four inches high. He shot and missed. "That's it," said he, running as if to pick up the bird. "What!" said I, "you don't think you killed, do you? Why there is the bird now, not only alive, but calling in that wood". which was at about a hundred yards distance. He, in that form of words usually employed in such cases, asserted that he had shot the bird and saw it fall; and I, in much about the same form of words, asserted, that he had missed, and that I, with my own eyes, saw the bird fly into the wood. This was too much! To miss once out of a hundred times! To lose such a chance of immortality! He was a good-humored man; I liked him very much, and I could not help feeling for him, when he said, "Well, Sir, I killed the bird, and if you choose to go away and take your dog away, so as to prevent me from finding it, you must do it; the dog is yours, to be sure."—"The dog," said I, in a very mild tone; "why, Ewing, there is the spot; and could we not see it, upon this smooth green surface, if it were there?" However, he began to look about; and I called the dog, and affected to join him in the search. Pity for his weakness got the better of my dread of the bad road. After walking backward and forward many times upon about twenty yards square with our eyes to the ground, looking for what both of us knew was not there, I had passed him (he going one way and I the other), and I happened to be turning round just after I had passed him, when I saw him, putting his hand behind him, take a partridge out of his bag and let it fall upon the ground! I felt no temptation to detect him, but turned away my head, and kept looking about. Presently he having returned to the spot where the bird was, called out to me, in a most triumphant tone; "Here! here! Come here!" I went up to him, and he, pointing with his finger down to the bird, and looking hard in my face at the same time, said, "There, Cobbett; I hope that will be a warning to you never to be obstinate again!"—"Well," said I, "come along": and away we went as merry as larks. When we got to Brown's, he told them the story, triumphed over me most clamorously, and, though he often repeated the story to my face, I never had the heart to let him know, that I knew of the imposition, which puerile vanity had induced so sensible and honorable a man to be mean enough to practice

A professed shot is, almost always, a very disagreeable brother sportsman. He must, in the first place, have a head rather of the emptiest to pride himself upon so poor a talent. Then he is always out of temper, if the game fail, or if he miss it. He never participates in that great delight which all sensible men enjoy at beholding the beautiful action, the docility, the zeal, the wonderful sagacity of the pointer and the setter. He is always thinking about himself, always anxious to surpass his companions. I remember that, once, Ewing and I had lost our dog. We were in a wood, and the dog had gone out, and found a covey in a wheat stubble joining the wood. We had been whistling and calling him for, perhaps, half an hour, or more. When we came out of the wood we saw him pointing, with one foot up, and, soon after, he, keeping his feet and body unmoved, gently turned round his head towards the spot where he heard us, as if to bid us to come on, and, when he saw that we saw him, turned his head back again. I was so delighted that I stopped to look with admiration. Ewing, astonished at my want of alacrity, pushed on, shot one of the partridges, and thought no more about the conduct of the dog than if the sagacious creature had had nothing at all to do with the matter. When I left America, in 1800, I gave this dog to Lord Henry Stuart, who was, when he came home, a year or two afterwards, about to bring him to astonish the sportsmen even in England, but, those of Pennsylvania were resolved not to part with him, and, therefore they stole him the night before his Lordship came away. Lord Henry had plenty of pointers after his return, and he saw hundreds, but always declared that he never saw anything approaching in excellence this American dog. For the information of sportsmen I ought to say that this was a small-headed and sharp-nosed pointer, hair as fine as that of a greyhound, little and short ears, very light in the body, very long legged, and swift as a good lurcher. I had him a puppy, and he never had any breaking, but he pointed staunchly at once; and I am of opinion that this sort is, in all respects, better than the heavy breed. Mr. Thornton (I beg his pardon, I believe he is now a Knight of some sort). who was, and perhaps still is, our envoy in Portugal, at the time here referred to, was a sort of partner with Lord Henry in this famous dog; and gratitude (to the memory of the dog, I mean) will, I am sure, or, at least, I hope so, make him bear witness to the truth of my character of him; and, if one could hear an Ambassador speak out, I think that Mr. Thornton would acknowledge that his calling has brought him in pretty close contact with many a man who was possessed of most tremendous political power, without possessing half the sagacity, half the understanding, of this dog, and without being a thousandth part so faithful to his trust.

I am quite satisfied that there are as many sorts of men as there are of dogs.¹ Swift, was a man, and so is Walter the base.² But, is the sort the same? It cannot be education alone that makes the amazing difference that we see. Besides, we see men of the very same rank and riches and education, differing as widely as the pointer does from the pug. The name, man, is common to all the sorts, and hence arises very great mischief. What confusion must there be in rural affairs, if there were no names whereby to distinguish hounds, greyhounds, pointers, spaniels, terriers, and sheep dogs, from each other! And, what pretty work, if, without regard to the sorts of dogs, men were to attempt to employ them! Yet, this is done in the case of men! A man is always a man; and, without the least regard as to the sort, they are promiscuously placed in all kinds of situations. Now, if Mr. Brougham, Doctors Birkbeck, Macculloch and Black, and that profound personage, Lord John Russell, will, in their forthcoming "London University," teach us how to divide men into sorts, instead of teaching us to "augment the capital of the nation," by making paper-money, they will render us a real service. That will be ferelosofy worth attending to. What would be said of the 'Squire who should take a fox-hound out to find partridges for him to shoot at? Yet, would this be more absurd than to set a man to law-making who was manifestly formed for the express purpose of sweeping the streets or digging out sewers?

EAST EVERLEY, Monday Morning.

5 o'clock, 28 Aug., 1836.

A very fine morning; a man, eighty-two years of age, just beginning to mow the short-grass, in the garden; I thought it, even when I was young, the hardest work that man had to do. To look on, this work seems nothing; but it tries every sinew in your frame, if you go upright and do your work well. This old man never knew how to do it well, and he stoops, and he hangs his scythe wrong; but, with all this, it must be a surprising man to mow short-grass, as well as he does, at eighty. I wish I may be able to mow short-grass at eighty! That's all I have to say of the matter. I am just setting off for the source of the Avon, which runs from near Marlborough to Salisbury, and thence to the sea; and I intend to pursue it as far as Salisbury. In the distance of thirty miles, here are, I see by the books, more than thirty churches. I wish to see, with my own eyes, what evidence there is that those thirty churches were built without hands, without money, and without a congregation; and, thus, to find matter, if I can, to justify the mad wretches, who, from Committee-Rooms and elsewhere, are bothering this half-distracted nation to death about a "surplus popalashon, mon."¹

My horse is ready; and the rooks are just gone off to the stubble-fields. These rooks rob the pigs; but, they have a right to do it. I wonder (upon my soul I do) that there is no lawyer, Scotchman, or Parson-Justice, to propose a law to punish the rooks for trespass.

This is that Hamlet the Dane, whom we read of in our youth, and whom we may be said almost to remember in our after-years; he who made that famous soliloquy on life,² who gave the advice to the players,³ who thought "this goodly frame, the earth, a sterile promontory, and this brave o'er-hanging firmament, the air, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire, a foul and pestilent congregation of vapors;"¹ whom "man delighted not, nor woman neither;"² he who talked with the grave-diggers, and moralized on Yorick's skull;³ the school-fellow of Rosencrans and Guildenstern at Wittenberg; the friend of Horatio; the lover of Ophelia; he that was mad and sent to England;⁴ the slow avenger of his father's death; who lived at the court of Horwendillus five hundred years before we were born, but all whose thoughts we seem to know as well as we do our own, because we have read them in Shakespeare.

Hamlet is a name, his speeches and sayings but the idle coinage of the poet's brain. What then, are they not real? They are as real as our own thoughts. Their reality is in the reader's mind. It is we who are Hamlet. This play has a prophetic truth, which is above that of history. Whoever has become thoughtful and melancholy through his own mishaps or those of others; whoever has borne about with him the clouded brow of reflection, and thought himself "too much i' th' sun;"⁵ whoever has seen the golden lamp of day dimmed by envious mists rising in his own breast, and could find in the world before him only a dull blank with nothing left remarkable in it; whoever has known "the pangs of despised love, the insolence of office, or the spurns which patient merit of the unworthy takes;"⁶ he who has felt his mind sink within him, and sadness cling to his heart like a malady, who has had his hopes blighted and his youth staggered by the apparitions of strange things, who cannot be well at ease, while he sees evil hovering near him like a spectre, whose powers of action have been eaten up by thought, he to whom the universe seems infinite, and himself nothing; whose bitterness of soul makes him careless of consequences, and who goes to a play as his best resource to shove off, to a second remove, the evils of life by a mock representation of them—this is the true Hamlet.

We have been so used to this tragedy that we hardly know how to criticize it any more than we should know how to describe our own faces. But we must make such observations as we can. It is the one of Shakespeare's plays that we think of the oftenest, because it abounds most in striking reflections on human life, and because the distresses of Hamlet are transferred, by the turn of his mind, to the general account of humanity. Whatever happens to him we apply to ourselves, because he applies it so himself as a means of general reasoning. He is a great moralizer; and what makes him worth attending to is that he moralizes on his own feelings and experience. He is not a common-place pedant. If Lear shows the greatest depth of passion, Hamlet is the most remarkable for the ingenuity, originality, and unstudied development of character. Shakespear had more magnanimity than any other poet, and he has shown more of it in this play than in any other. There is no attempt to force an interest: everything is left for time and circumstances to unfold. The attention is excited without effort, the incidents succeed each other as matters of course, the characters think and speak and act just as they might do, if left entirely to themselves. There is no set purpose, no straining at a point. The observations are suggested by the passing scene—the gusts of passion come and go like sounds of music borne on the wind. The whole play is an exact transcript of what might be supposed to have taken place at the court of Denmark, at the remote period of time fixed upon,⁷ before the modern refinements in morals and manners were heard of. It would have been interesting enough to have been admitted as a by-stander in such a scene, at such a time, to have heard and seen something of what was going on. But here we are more than spectators. We have not only "the outward pageants and the signs of grief;"⁸ but "we have that within which passes show."⁹ We read the thoughts of the heart, we catch the passions living as they rise. Other dramatic writers give us very fine versions and paraphrases of nature: but Shakespear, together with his own comments, gives us the original text, that we may judge for ourselves. This is a very great advantage.

The character of Hamlet is itself a pure effusion of genius. It is not a character marked by strength of will or even of passion, but by refinement of thought and sentiment. Hamlet is as little of the hero as a man can well be: but he is a young and princely novice, full of high enthusiasm and quick sensibility—the sport of circumstances, questioning with fortune and refining on his own feelings, and forced from the natural bias of his disposition by the strangeness of his situation. He seems incapable of deliberate action, and is only hurried into extremities on the spur of the occasion, when he has no time to reflect, as in the scene where he kills Polonius,¹ and again, where he alters the letters which Rosenberaus and Guildenstern are taking with them to England,² purporting his death. At other times, when he is most bound to act, he remains puzzled, undecided, and skeptical, dallies with his purposes, till the occasion is lost, and always finds some pretence to relapse into indolence and thoughtfulness again. For this reason he refuses to kill the King when he is at his prayers,³ and by a refinement in malice, which is in truth only an excuse for his own want of resolution, defers his revenge to some more fatal opportunity, when he shall be engaged in some act "that has no relish of salvation in it."⁴

He kneels and prays,
And now I'll do 't, and so he goes to heaven,
And so am I reveng'd, that would be scan'd
He kill'd my father, and for that,
I, his sole son, send him to heaven.
Why this is reward, not revenge.
Up sword and know thou a more horrid time,
When he is drunk, asleep, or in a rage.⁵

He is the prince of philosophical speculators, and because he cannot have his revenge perfect, according to the most refined idea his wish can form, he misses it altogether. So he scruples to trust the suggestions of the Ghost, contrives the scene of the play to have surer proof of his uncle's guilt,⁶ and then rests satisfied with this confirmation of his suspicions, and the success of his experiment, instead of acting upon it. Yet he is sensible of his own weakness, taxes himself with it, and tries to reason himself out of it.

How all occasions do inform against me,
And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
If his chief good and market of his time Be but to sleep and feed? A beast; no more Sure he that made us with such large discourse, Looking before and after, gave us not That capability and god-like reason To rust in us unus'd: now whether it be Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple Of thinking too precisely on th' event,—

Witness this army¹ of such mass and charge, Led by a delicate and tender prince,
Whose spirit with divine ambition puff'd, Makes mouths at the invisible event, Exposing what is mortal and unsure
To all that fortune, death and danger dare, Even for an egg-shell 'Tis not to be great,
Never to stir without great argument;
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw,
When honor's at the stake. How stand I then,
That have a father kill'd, a mother stain'd, Excitements of my reason and my blood,
And let all sleep, while to my shame I see The imminent death of twenty thousand men,
That for a fantasy and trick of fame,
Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,
Which is not tomb enough and continent
To hide the slain!—O, from this time forth, My thoughts be bloody or be nothing worth.²

Still he does nothing; and this very speculation on his own infirmity only affords him another occasion for indulging it. It is not for any want of attachment to his father or abhorrence of his murder that Hamlet is thus dilatory, but it is more to his taste to indulge his imagination in reflecting upon the enormity of the crime and refining on his schemes of vengeance, than to put them into immediate practice. His ruling passion is to think, not to act, and any vague pretence that flatters his propensity instantly diverts him from his previous purposes.

The moral perfection of this character has been called in question, we think, by those who did not understand it. It is more interesting than according to rules: amiable, though not faultless. The ethical delineations of "that noble and liberal casuist"³ (as Shakespeare has been well called) do not exhibit the drab-colored quakerism of morality. His plays are not copied either from The Whole Duty of Man or from The Academy of Compliments! We confess, we are a little shocked at the want of refinement in those who are shocked at the want of refinement in Hamlet. The want of punctilious exactness in his behavior either partakes of the "license of the time," or else belongs to the very excess of intellectual refinement in the character, which makes the common rules of life, as well as his own purposes, sit loose upon him.⁴ He may be said to be amenable only to the tribunal of his own thoughts, and is too much taken up with the airy world of contemplation, to lay as much stress as he ought on the practical consequences of things. His habitual principles of action are unhinged and out of joint with the time. His conduct to Ophelia is quite natural in his circumstances. It is that of assumed severity only. It is the effect of disappointed hope, of bitter regrets, of affection suspended, not obliterated, by the distractions of the scene around him! Amidst the natural and piernatural horrors of his situation, he might be excused in delicacy from carrying on a regular courtship. When "his father's spirit was in arms,"¹ it was not a time for the son to make love in. He could neither marry Ophelia, nor wound her mind by explaining the cause of his alienation, which he durst hardly trust himself to think of. It would have taken him years to have come to a direct explanation on the point. In the harassed state of his mind, he could not have done otherwise than he did. His conduct does not contradict what he says when he sees her funeral,

I loved Ophelia forty thousand brothers
'ould not with all their quantity of love
Make up my sum.²

Nothing can be more affecting or beautiful than the Queen's apostrophe to Ophelia on throwing the flowers into the grave.

Sweets to the sweet, farewell.

I hop'd thou should'st have been my Hamlet's wife:

I thought thy bride-bed to have deck'd, sweet maid,

And not have strew'd thy grave.³

Shakespear was thoroughly a master of the mixed motives of human character, and he here shows us the Queen, who was so criminal in some respects, not without sensibility and affection in other relations of life—Ophelia is a character almost too exquisitely touching to be dwelt upon. Oh, rose of May! oh, flower too soon faded! Her love, her madness, her death, are described with the truest touches of tenderness and pathos. It is a character which nobody but Shakespear could have drawn in the way that he has done, and to the conception of which there is not even the smallest approach, except in some of the old romantic ballads.⁴

⁴ "In the account of her death, a friend has pointed out an instance of the poet's exact observation of nature—

The inside of the leaves of the willow next the water, is of a whitish color, and the reflection would therefore be 'hoary.'—Haslitt. The lines quoted are found in Act IV, 7, 167-8.

Her brother, Laertes, is a character we do not like so well: he is too hot and choleric, and somewhat rhodomontade.¹ Polonius is a perfect character in its kind; nor is there any foundation for the objections which have been made to the consistency of this part. It is said that he acts very foolishly and talks very sensibly. There is no inconsistency in that. Again, that he talks wisely at one time and foolishly at another; that his advice to Laertes² is very sensible, and his advice to the King and Queen on the subject of Hamlet's madness³ very ridiculous. But he gives the one as a father, and is sincere in it; he gives the other as a mere courtier, a busy-body, and is accordingly officious, garrulous, and impertinent. In short, Shakespear has been accused of inconsistency in this and other characters, only because he has kept up the distinction which there is in nature, between the understandings and moral habits of men, between the absurdity of their ideas and the absurdity of their motives. Polonius is not a fool, but he makes himself so. His folly, whether in his actions or speeches, comes under the head of impropriety of intention.

We do not like to see our author's plays acted, and least of all, Hamlet. There is no play that suffers so much in being transferred to the stage. Hamlet himself seems hardly capable of being acted. Mr. Kemble unavoidably fails in this character from a want of ease and variety. The character of Hamlet is made up of undulating lines; it has the yielding flexibility of "a wave o' th' sea."⁴ Mr. Kemble plays it like a man in armor, with a determined inveteracy of purpose, in one undeviating straight line, which is as remote from the natural grace and refined susceptibility of the character, as the sharp angles and abrupt starts which Mr. Kean introduces into the part. Mr. Kean's Hamlet is as much too splenetic and rash as Mr. Kemble's is too deliberate and formal. His manner is too strong and pointed. He throws a severity, approaching to virulence, into the common observations and answers. There is nothing of this in Hamlet. He is, as it were, wrapped up in his reflections, and only thinks aloud. There should therefore be no attempt to impress what he says upon others by a studied exaggeration of emphasis or manner; no talking at his hearers. There should be as much of the gentleman and scholar as possible infused into the part, and as little of the actor. A pensive air of sadness should sit reluctantly upon his brow, but no appearance of fixed and sullen gloom. He is full of weakness and melancholy, but there is no harshness in his nature. He is the most amiable of misanthropes.

ON FAMILIAR STYLE

It is not easy to write a familiar style. Many people mistake a familiar for a vulgar style, and suppose that to write without affectation is to write at random. On the contrary, there is nothing that requires more precision, and, if I may so say, purity of expression, than the style I am speaking of. It utterly rejects not only all unmeaning pomp, but all low, cant phrases, and loose, unconnected, slipshod allusions. It is not to take the first word that offers, but the best word in common use; it is not to throw words together in any combination we please, but to follow and avail ourselves of the true idiom of the language. To write a genuine familiar or truly English style, is to write as any one would speak in common conversation, who had a thorough command and choice of words, or who could discourse with ease, force, and perspicuity, setting aside all pedantic and oratorical flourishes. Or to give another illustration, to write naturally is the same thing in regard to common conversation, as to read naturally is in regard to common speech. It does not follow that it is an easy thing to give the true accent and inflection to the words you utter, because you do not attempt to rise above the level of ordinary life and colloquial speaking. You do not assume indeed the solemnity of the pulpit, or the tone of stage-declamation: neither are you at liberty to gabble on at a venture, without emphasis or discretion, or to resort to vulgar dialect or clownish pronunciation. You must steer a middle course. You are tied down to a given and appropriate articulation, which is determined by the habitual associations between sense and sound, and which you can only hit by entering into the author's meaning, as you must find the proper words and style to express yourself by fixing your thoughts on the subject you have to write about. Any one may mouth out a passage with a theatrical cadence, or get upon stilts to tell his thoughts: but to write or speak with propriety and simplicity is a more difficult task. Thus it is easy to affect a pompous style, to use a word twice as big as the thing you want to express: it is not so easy to pitch upon the very word that exactly fits it. Out of eight or ten words equally common, equally intelligible, with nearly equal pretensions, it is a matter of some nicety and discrimination to pick out the very one, the preferableness of which is scarcely perceptible, but decisive. The reason why I object to Dr. Johnson's style is, that there is no discrimination, no selection, no variety in it. He uses none but "tall, opaque words,"¹ taken from the "first row of the rubric:"²—words with the greatest number of syllables, or Latin phrases with merely English terminations. If a fine style depended on this sort of arbitrary pretension, it would be fair to judge of an author's elegance by the measurement of his words, and the substitution of foreign circumlocutions (with no precise associations) for the mother-tongue.³ How simple it is to be dignified without ease, to be pompous without meaning! Surely, it is but a mechanical rule for avoiding what is low to be always pedantic and affected. It is clear you cannot use a vulgar English word, if you never use a common English word at all. A fine tact is shown in adhering to those which are perfectly common, and yet never falling into any expressions which are debased by disgusting circumstances, or which owe their signification and point to technical or professional allusions. A truly natural or familiar style can never be quaint or vulgar, for this reason, that it is of universal force and applicability, and that quaintness and vulgarity arise out of the immediate connection of certain words with coarse and disagreeable, or with confined ideas. The last form what we understand by cant or slang phrases. —To give an example of what is not very clear in the general statement. I should say that the phrase To cut with a knife, or To cut a piece of wood, is perfectly free from vulgarity, because it is perfectly common: but to cut an acquaintance is not quite unexceptionable, because it is not perfectly common or intelligible, and has hardly yet escaped out of the limits of slang phraseology. I should hardly therefore use the word in this sense without putting it in italics as a license of expression, to be received cum grano sales.¹ All provincial or bye-phrases come under the same mark of reprobation—all such as the writer transfers to the page from his fireside or a particular coterie, or that he invents for his own sole use and convenience. I conceive that words are like money, not the worse for being common, but that it is the stamp of custom alone that gives them circulation or value. I am fastidious in this respect, and would almost as soon coin the currency of the realm as counterfeit the King's English. I never invented or gave a new and unauthorized meaning to any word but one single one (the term impersonal applied to feelings) and that was in an abstruse metaphysical discussion to express a very difficult distinction. I have been (I know) loudly accused of revelling in vulgarisms and broken English. I cannot speak to that point: but so far I plead guilty to the determined use of acknowledged idioms and common elliptical expressions. I am not sure that the critics in question know the one from the other, that is, can distinguish any medium between formal pedantry and the most barbarous solecism. As an author, I endeavor to employ plain words and popular modes of construction, as were I a chapman² and dealer, I should common weights and measures.

The proper force of words lies not in the words themselves, but in their application. A word may be a fine-sounding word, of an unusual length, and very imposing from its learning and novelty, and yet in the connection in which it is introduced, may be quite pointless and irrelevant. It is not pomp or pretension, but the adaptation of the expression to the idea that clenches a writer's meaning:—as it is not the size or glossiness of the materials, but their being fitted each to its place, that gives strength to the arch; or as the pegs and nails are as necessary to the support of the building as the larger timbers, and more so than the mere showy, unsubstantial ornaments. I hate anything that occupies more space than it is worth. I hate to see a load of band-boxes go along the street, and I hate to see a parcel of big words without anything in them. A person who does not deliberately dispose of all his thoughts alike in cumbrous draperies and flimsy disguises, may strike out twenty varieties of familiar everyday language, each coming somewhat nearer to the feeling he wants to convey, and at last not hit upon that particular and only one, which may be said to be identical with the exact impression in his mind. This would seem to show that Mr. Cobbett is hardly right in saying that the first word that occurs is always the best.¹

It may be a very good one; and yet a better may present itself on reflection or from time to time. It should be suggested naturally, however, and spontaneously, from a fresh and lively conception of the subject. We seldom succeed by trying at improvement, or by merely substituting one word for another that we are not satisfied with, as we cannot recollect the name of a place or person by merely plaguing ourselves about it. We wander farther from the point by persisting in a wrong scent; but it starts up accidentally in the memory when we least expected it, by touching some link in the chain of previous association.

There are those who hoard up and make a cautious display of nothing but rich and rare phraseology;—ancient medals, obscure coins, and Spanish pieces of eight.² They are very curious to inspect; but I myself would neither offer nor take them in the course of exchange. A sprinkling of archaisms is not amiss, but a tissue of obsolete expressions is more fit for keep than wear. I do not say I would not use any phrase that had been brought into fashion before the middle or the end of the last century, but I should be shy of using any that had not been employed by any approved author during the whole of that time. Words, like clothes, get old-fashioned, or mean and ridiculous, when they have been for some time laid aside. Mr. Lamb is the only imitator of old English style I can read with pleasure, and he is so thoroughly imbued with the spirit of his authors, that the idea of imitation is almost done away. There is an inward uncouthness, a marrowy vein both in the thought and feeling, an intuition, deep and lively, of his subject, that carries off any quaintness or awkwardness arising from an antiquated style and dress. The matter is completely his own, though the manner is assumed. Perhaps his ideas are altogether so marked and individual as to require their point and pungency to be neutralized by the affectation of a singular but traditional form of conveyance. Tricked out in the prevailing costume, they would probably seem more startling and out of the way. The old English authors, Burton, Fuller, Coryate, Sir Thomas

Brown, are a kind of mediators between us and the more eccentric and whimsical modern, reconciling us to his peculiarities. I do not, however, know how far this is the case or not, till he condescends to write like one of us. I must confess that what I like best of his papers under the signature of "Eliu" (still I do not presume, amidst such excellence, to decide what is most excellent) is the account of Mrs. Battle's Opinions on Whist,¹ which is also the most free from obsolete allusions and turns of expression—

To those acquainted with his admired prototypes, these Essays of the ingenious and highly gifted author have the same sort of charm and relish, that Erasmus's Colloquies or a fine piece of modern Latin have to the classical scholar. Certainly, I do not know any borrowed pencil that has more power or felicity of execution than the one of which I have here been speaking.

It is as easy to write a gaudy style without ideas, as it is to spread a pallet of showy colors, or to smear in a flaunting transparency "What do you read?"—"Words, words, words,"—"What is the matter?"—"Nothing," it might be answered. The stolid style is the reverse of the familiar. The last is employed as an unvarnished medium to convey ideas; the first is resorted to as a spangled veil to conceal the want of them. When there is nothing to be set down but words, it costs little to have them fine. Look through the dictionary, and cull out a florilegium,⁴ rival the tulppomania.⁵ Rouge high enough, and never mind the natural complexion. The vulgar, who are not in the secret, will admire the look of preternatural health and vigor, and the fashionable, who regard only appearances, will be delighted with the imposition. Keep to your sounding generalities, your tinkling phrases,⁶ and all will be well. Swell out an unmeaning truism to a perfect tympany⁷ of style. A thought, a distinction is the rock on which all this brittle cargo of verbiage splits at once. Such writers have merely verbal imaginations, that retain nothing but words. Or their puny thoughts have dragon-wings, all green and gold. They soar far above the vulgar failing of the *Sermo humi obrepens*¹—their most ordinary speech is never short of an hyperbole, splendid, imposing, vague, incomprehensible, magniloquent, a cento² of sounding commonplaces. If some of us, whose "ambition is more lowly,"³ pry a little too narrowly into nooks and corners to pick up a number of "unconsidered trifles,"⁴ they never once direct their eyes or lift their hands to seize on any but the most gorgeous, tarnished, thread-bare patch-work set of phrases, the left-off finery of poetic extravagance, transmitted down through successive generations of barren pretenders. If they criticize actors and actresses, a huddled phantasmagoria of feathers, spangles, floods of light, and oceans of sound float before their morbid sense, which they paint in the style of Ancient Pistol.⁵ Not a glimpse can you get of the merits or defects of the performers: they are hidden in a profusion of barbarous epithets and wiful rhodomontade. Our hypercritics are not thinking of these little fantoccini beings—⁶

That strut and fret their hour upon the stage⁷—

but of tall phantoms of words, abstractions, genera and species, sweeping clauses, periods that unite the poles, forced alliterations, astounding antitheses—

And on their pens Fustian sits plumed.⁸

If they describe kings and queens, it is an Eastern pageant. The Coronation at either House is nothing to it. We get at four repeated images—a curtain, a throne, a sceptre, and a foot-stool. These are with them the wardrobe of a lofty imagination; and they turn their servile strains to servile uses. Do we read a description of pictures? It is not a reflection of tones and hues which "nature's own sweet and cunning hand laid on,"⁹ but piles of precious stones, rubies, pearls, emeralds, Golconda's mines, and all the blazonry of art. Such persons are in fact besotted with words, and their brains are turned with the glittering, but empty and sterile phantoms of things. Personifications, capital letters, seas of sunbeams, visions of glory, shining inscriptions, the figures of a transparency, Britannia with her shield, or Hope leaning on an anchor,¹ make up their stock in trade. They may be considered as hieroglyphical writers. Images stand out in their minds isolated and important merely in themselves, without any ground-work of feeling—there is no context in their imaginations. Words affect them in the same way, by the mere sound, that is, by their possible, not by their actual application to the subject in hand. They are fascinated by first appearances, and have no sense of consequences. Nothing more is meant by them than meets the ear:² they understand or feel nothing more than meets their eye. The web and texture of the universe, and of the heart of man, is a mystery to them: they have no faculty that strikes a chord in unison with it. They cannot get beyond the daubings of fancy, the varnish of sentiment. Objects are not linked to feelings, words to things, but images revolve in splendid mockery, words represent themselves in their strange rhapsodies. The categories of such a mind are pride and ignorance—pride in outside show, to which they sacrifice everything, and ignorance of the true worth and hidden structure both of words and things. With a sovereign contempt for what is familiar and natural, they are the slaves of vulgar affectation—of a routine of high-flown phrases. Scorning to imitate realities, they are unable to invent anything, to strike out one original idea. They are not copyists of nature, it is true but they are the poorest of all plagiarists, the plagiarists of words. All is far-fetched, dear-bought, artificial, oriental in subject and allusion: all is mechanical, conventional, vapid, formal, pedantic in style and execution. They startle and confound the understanding of the reader, by the remoteness and obscurity of their illustrations: they soothe the ear by the monotony of the same everlasting round of circuitous metaphors. They are the mock-school in poetry and prose. They flounder about between fustian in expression, and bathos in sentiment. They tantalize the fancy, but never reach the head nor touch the heart. Their Temple of Fame is like a shadowy structure raised by Dulness to Vanity, or like Cowper's description of the Empress of Russia's palace of ice, as "worthless as in show 'twas glittering"—

It smiled, and it was cold!³

THE FIGHT¹

1822

The fight, the fight's the thing, Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king.²

5 Where there's a will, there's a way,—I said to myself, as I walked down Chancery-lane, about half-past six o'clock on Monday the 10th of December, to inquire at Jack Randall's where the fight the next day was to be, and I found "the proverb" nothing 10 "musty"³ in the present instance. I was determined to see this fight, come what would, and see it I did, in great style. It was my first fight, yet it more than answered 15 my expectations. Ladies! it is to you I dedicate this description; nor let it seem out of character for the fair to notice the exploits of the brave. Courage and modesty are the old English virtues; and may they never 20 look cold and askance on one another! Think, ye fairest of the fair, loveliest of the lovely kind, ye practitioners of soft enchantment, how many more ye kill with poisoned baits than ever fell in the ring; and listen with subdued
25 air and without shuddering, to a tale only tragic in appearance, and sacred to the FANCY.⁴

I was going down Chancery-lane, thinking to ask at Jack Randall's where the fight was to be, when looking through the glass-door of the Hole in the Wall, I heard a gentleman asking the same question at Mrs. Randall, as the author of *Waverley*⁵ would express it. Now Mrs. Randall stood answering the gentleman's question, with the authenticity of the lady of the Champion of the Light Weights. Thinks I, I'll wait till this person comes out, and learn from him how it is. For to say a truth, I was not fond of going 30 into this house of call⁶ for heroes and philosophers, ever since the owner of it (for Jack is no gentleman) threatened once upon a time to kick me out of doors for wanting a mutton-chop at his hospitable board, when the conqueror in thirteen battles was more 35 full of *blue run*⁷ than of good manners. I was the more mortified at this repulse, inasmuch as I had heard Mr. James Simpkins, hosiery in the Strand, one day when the character of the Hole in the Wall was brought in question, observe—"The house is a very good house, and the company quite genteel: I have been there myself!" Remembering this unkind treatment of mine host, to which mine hostess was also a party, and not wishing to put her in unquiet thoughts at a time jubilant like the present, I waited at the door, when, who should issue forth but my friend Jo. Toms, and, turning suddenly up Chancery-lane with that quick jerk and impatient stride which distinguishes a lover of the FANCY, I said, "I'll be hanged if that fellow is not going to the fight, and is on his way to get me to go with him." So it proved in effect, and we agreed to adjourn to my lodgings to discuss measures with that cordiality which makes old friends like new, and new friends like old, on great occasions. We are cold to others only when we are dull in ourselves, and have neither thoughts nor feelings to impart to them. Give man a topic in his head, a throb of pleasure in his heart, and he will be glad to share it with the first person he meets. Toms and I, though we seldom meet, were an *alter idem*¹ on this memorable occasion, and had not an idea that we did not candidly impart; and "so carelessly did we fleet the time,"² that I wish no better, when there is another fight, than to have him for a companion on my journey down, and to return with my friend Jack Pigott, talking of what was to happen or of what did happen, with a noble subject always at hand, and liberty to digress to others whenever they offered. Indeed, on my repeating the lines from Spenser in an involuntary fit of enthusiasm,

What more felicity can fall to creature,
Than to enjoy delight with liberty?³

my last-named ingenious friend stopped me by saying that this, translated into the vulgate, meant "Going to see a fight."

Jo. Toms and I could not settle about the method of going down. He said there was a caravan, he understood, to start from Tom Belcher's at two, which would go there right out and back again the next day. Now I never travel at night, and said I should get a cast⁴ to Newbury by one of the mails. Jo swore the thing was impossible, and I could only answer that I had made up my mind to it. In short, he seemed to me to waver, said he only came to see if I was going, had letters to write, a cause coming on the day after, and faintly said at parting (for I was bent on setting out that moment)—"Well, we meet at Philippi!"⁵ I made the best of my way to Piccadilly. The mail coach stand was bare. "They are all gone," said I—"this is always the way with me—in the instant I lose the future²—if I had not stayed to pour that last cup of tea, I should have been just in time"⁶—and cursing my folly and ill-luck together, without inquiring at the coach-office whether the mails were gone or not, I walked on in despite, and to punish my own dilatoriness and want of determination. At any rate I would not turn back. I might get to Hounslow, or perhaps farther, to be on my road the next morning. I passed Hyde Park Corner (my Rubicon), and trusted to fortune. Suddenly I heard the clattering of a Brentford stage, and the fight rushed full upon my fancy. I argued (not unwisely) that even a Brentford coachman was better company than my own thoughts (such as they were just then), and at his invitation mounted the box with him. I immediately stated my case to him—namely, my quarrel with myself for missing the Bath or Bristol mail, and my determination to get on in consequence as well as I could, without any disparagement or insulting comparison between longer or shorter stages. It is a maxim with me that stage-coaches, and consequently stage-coachmen, are respectable in proportion to the distance they have to travel. So I said nothing on that subject to my Brentford friend. Any incipient tendency to an abstract proposition, or (as he might have construed it) to a personal reflection of this kind, was however nipped in the bud; for I had no sooner declared indignantly that I had missed the mails, than he flatly denied that they were gone along, and lo! at the instant three of them drove by in rapid, provoking, orderly succession, as if they would devour the ground before them. Here again I seemed in the contradictory situation of the man in Dryden who exclaims,

I follow Fate, which does too hard pursue!⁷

If I had stopped to inquire at the White Horse Cellar, which would not have taken me a minute, I should now have been driving down the road in all the dignified unconcern and ideal perfection of mechanical conveyance. The Bath mail I had set my mind upon, and I had missed it, as I missed every thing else, by my own absurdity, in putting the will for the deed, and aiming at ends without employing means. "Sir," said he

of the Brentford, "the Bath mail will be up presently, my brother-in-law drives it, and I will engage to stop him if there is a place empty." I almost doubted my good genius, but, sure enough, up it drove like lightning, and stopped directly at the call of the Brentford Jehu.¹ I would not have believed this possible, but the brother-in-law of a mail-coach driver is himself no mean man. I was transferred without loss of time from the top of one coach to that of the other, desired the guard to pay my fare to the Brentford coachman for me as I had no change, was accommodated with a great coat, put up my umbrella to keep off a drizzling mist, and we began to cut through the air like an arrow. The milestones disappeared one after another, the rain kept off; Tom Turtle, the trainer, sat before me on the coach-box, with whom I exchanged civilities as a gentleman going to the fight; the passion that had transported me an hour before was subdued to pensive regret and conjectural musing on the next day's battle; I was promised a place inside at Reading, and upon the whole, I thought myself a lucky fellow. Such is the force of imagination! On the outside of any other coach on the 10th of December, with a Scotch mist drizzling through the cloudy moonlight air, I should have been cold, comfortless, impatient, and, no doubt, wet through; but seated on the Royal mail, I felt warm and comfortable, the air did me good, the ride did me good, I was pleased with the progress we had made, and confident that all would go well through the journey. When I got inside at Reading, I found Turtle and a stout valetudinarian, whose costume bespoke him of one of the FANCY, and who had risen from a three months' sick bed to get into the mail to see the fight. They were intimate, and we fell into a lively discourse. My friend the trainer was confined in his topics to fighting dogs and men, to bears and badgers; beyond this he was "quite chap-fallen,"² had not a word to throw at a dog, or indeed very wisely fell asleep, when any other game was started. The whole art of training (I, however, learnt from him) consists in two things—exercise and abstinence, abstinence and exercise, repeated alternately and without end. A yolk of an egg with a spoonful of rum in it is the first thing in the morning, and then a walk of six miles till breakfast. This meal consists of a plentiful supply of tea and toast and beefsteaks. Then another six or seven miles till dinner-time and another supply of solid beef or mutton with a pint of porter, and perhaps, at the utmost, a couple of glasses of sherry. Martin trains on water, but this increases his infirmity on another very dangerous side. The Gas-man takes now and then a chirping glass (under the rose³) to console him, during a six weeks' probation, for the absence of Mrs. Hickman—an agreeable woman, with (I understand) a pretty fortune of two hundred pounds. How matter presses on me! What stubborn things are facts! How inexhaustible is nature and art! "It is well," as I once heard Mr. Richmond observe, "to see a variety." He was speaking of cock-fighting as an edifying spectacle. I cannot deny but that one learns more of what is (I do not say of what ought to be) in this desultory mode of practical study, than from reading the same book twice over, even though it should be a moral treatise. Where was I? I was sitting at dinner with the candidate for the honors of the ring, "where good digestion waits on appetite, and health on both."⁴ Then follows an hour of social chat and native glee, and afterwards, to another breathing over heathy hill or dale. Back to supper, and then to bed, and up by six again—Our hero

Follows so the ever-running sun With profitable ardor."⁵ to the day that brings him victory or defeat in the green fairy circle. Is not this life more sweet than mine? I was going to say, but I will not libel any life by comparing it to mine, which is (at the date of these presents) bitter as coloquintida and the dregs of acetonium!

The invalid in the Bath mail soared a pitch above the trainer, and did not sleep so sound, because he had "more figures and more fantasies."⁶ We talked the hours away merrily. He had faith in surgery, for he had had three ribs set right, that had been broken in a *turn-up*⁷ at Belcher's, but thought physicians old women, for they had no antidote in their catalogue for brandy. An indigestion is an excellent common-place for two people that never met before. By way of ingratiating myself, I told him the story of my doctor, who, on my earnestly representing to him that I thought his regimen had done me harm, assured me that the whole pharmacopeia contained nothing comparable to the prescription he had given me; and, as a proof of its undoubted efficacy, said that "he had had one gentleman with my complaint under his hands for the last fifteen years." This anecdote made my companion shake the rough sides of his three great coats with boisterous laughter; and Turtle, starting out of his sleep, swore he knew how the fight would go, for he had had a dream about it. Sure enough the rascal told us how the three first rounds went off, but "his dream," like, others, "denoted a foregone conclusion."¹ He knew his men. The moon now rose in silver state, and I ventured, with some hesitation, to point out this object of placid beauty, with the blue serene beyond, to the man of science, to which his ear he "seriously inclined,"² the more as it gave promise *d'un beau jour*³ for the morrow, and showed the ring undrenched by envious showers, arrayed in sunny smiles. Just then, all going on well, I thought of my friend Toms, whom I had left behind, and said innocently, "There was a blockhead of a fellow I left in town, who said there was no possibility of getting down by the mail, and talked of going by a caravan from Belcher's at two in the morning, after he had written some letters"—"Why," said he of the lapels, "I should not wonder if that was the very person we saw running about like mad from one coach-door to another, and asking if anyone had seen a friend of his, a gentleman going to the fight, whom he had missed stupidly enough by staying to write a note."—"Pray, Sir," said my fellow-traveller, "had he a plaid-cloak on?"—"Why, no," said I, "not at the time I left him, but he very well might afterwards, for he offered to lend me one." The plaid-cloak and the letter decided the thing. Joe, sure enough, was in the Bristol mail, which preceded us by about fifty yards. This was droll enough. We had now but a few miles to our place of destination, and the first thing I did on alighting at Newbury, both coaches stopping at the same time, was to call out, "Pray, is there a gentleman in that mail of the name of Toms?"—"No," said Joe, borrowing something of the vein of Gilpin, "for I have just got out"—"Well!" says he, "this is lucky; but you don't know how vexed I was to miss you; for," added he, lowering his voice, "do you know when I left you I went to Belcher's to ask about the caravan, and Mrs. Belcher said very obligingly, she couldn't tell about that, but there were two gentlemen who had taken places by the mail and were gone on in a landau, and she could frank us¹ It's a pity I didn't meet with you; we could then have got down for nothing. But mum's the word." It's the devil for anyone to tell me a secret, for it's sure to come out in print. I do not care so much to gratify a friend, but the public ear is too great a temptation for me.

Our present business was to get beds and supper at an inn, but this was no easy task. The public-houses were full, and where you saw a light at a private house, and people poking their heads out of the casement to see what was going on, they instantly put them in and shut the window, the moment you seemed advancing with a suspicious overture for accommodation. Our guard and coachman thundered away at the outer gate of the Crown for some time without effect—such was the greater noise within;—and when the doors were unbarred, and we got admittance, we found a party assembled in the kitchen round a good hospitable fire, some sleeping, others drinking, others talking on politics and on the fight. A tall English yeoman (something like Matthews in the face, and quite as great a wag)—

was making such a prodigious noise about rents and taxes, and the price of corn³ now and formerly, that he had prevented us from being heard at the gate. The first thing I heard him say was to a shuffling fellow who wanted to be off a bet for a shilling glass of brandy and water—"Confound it, man, don't be insipid!" Thinks I, that is a good phrase. It was a good omen. He kept it up so all night, nor flinched with the approach of morning. He was a fine fellow, with sense, wit, and spirit, a hearty body and a joyous mind, freespoken, frank, convivial—one of that true English breed that went with Harry the Fifth to the siege of Harfleur⁴—"standing like greyhounds in the slips,"⁵ etc. We ordered tea and eggs (beds were soon found to be out of the question) and this fellow's conversation was sauce piquante. It did one's heart good to see him brandish his oaken towel⁶ and to hear him talk. He made mince-meat of a drunken, stupid, red-faced, quarrelsome, frowsy farmer, whose nose "he moralized into a thousand similes,"¹ making it out a firebrand like Bardolph's.² "I'll tell you what my friend," says he, "the landlady has only to keep you here to save fire and candle. If one was to touch your nose, it would go off like a piece of charcoal." At this the other only grinned like an idiot, the sole variety in his purple face being his little peering gray eyes and yellow teeth, called for another glass, swore he would not stand it, and after many attempts to provoke his humorous antagonist to single combat, which the other turned off (after working him up to a ludicrous pitch of choler) with great adroitness, he fell quietly asleep with a glass of liquor in his hand, which he could not lift to his head. His laughing persecutor made a speech over him, and turning to the opposite side of the room, while they were all sleeping in the midst of this "loud and furious fun,"³ said, "There's a scene, by G-d, for Hogarth to paint. I think he and Shakspeare were our two best men at copying life." This confirmed me in my good opinion of him. Hogarth, Shakspeare, and Nature, were just enough for him (indeed for any man) to know I said, "You read Cobbett, don't you? At least," says I, "you talk just as well as he writes." He seemed to doubt this. But I said, "We have an hour to spare: if you'll get pen, ink, and paper, and keep on talking, I'll write down what you say; and if it doesn't make a capital Political Register, I'll forfeit my head. You have kept me alive tonight, however. I don't know what I should have done without you." He did not dislike this view of the thing, nor my asking if he was not about the size of Jem Belcher; and told me soon afterwards, in the confidence of friendship, that "the circumstance which had given him nearly the greatest concern in his life, was Cribb's beating Jem after he had lost his eye by racket-playing."⁴ —The morning dawns; that dim but yet clear light appears, which weighs like solid bars of metal on the sleepless eyelids; the guests drop down from their chambers one by one—but it was too late to think of going to bed now (the clock was on the stroke of seven), we had nothing for it but to find a barber's (the pole that glittered in the morning sun lighted us to his shop), and then a nine miles' march to Hungerford. The day was fine, the sky was blue, the mists were retiring from the marshy ground, the path was tolerably dry, the sitting-up all night had not done us much harm—at least the cause was good; we talked of this and that with amicable difference, roving and sipping of many subjects, but still invariably we returned to the fight. At length, a mile to the left of Hungerford, on a gentle eminence, we saw the ring surrounded by covered carts, gigs, and carriages, of which hundreds had passed us on the road, Tom gave a youthful shout, and we hastened down a narrow lane to the scene of action.

Reader, have you ever seen a fight? If not, you have a pleasure to come, at least if it is a fight like that between the Gas-man and Bill Neate. The crowd was very great when we arrived on the spot, open carriages were coming up, with streamers flying and music playing, and the country-people were pouring in over hedge and ditch in all directions, to see their hero beat or be beaten. The odds were still on Gas, but only about five to four. Gully had been down to try Neate, and had backed him considerably, which was a damper to the sanguine confidence of the adverse party. About two hundred thousand pounds were pending. The Gas says he has lost 3000*l.*, which were promised him by different gentlemen if he had won. He had presumed too much on himself, which had made others presume on him. This spirited and formidable young fellow seems to have taken for his motto the old maxim, that "there are three things necessary to success in life—Impudence! Impudence! Impudence!" It is so in matters of opinion, but not in the FANCY, which is the most practical of all things, though even here confidence is half the battle, but only half. Our friend had vapored and swaggered too much, as if he wanted to grin and bully his adversary out of the fight. "Alas! the Bristol man was not so tamed!"—"This is the grave-digger" (would Tom Hickman exclaim in the moments of intoxication from gin and success, showing his tremendous right hand), "this will send many of them to their long homes; I haven't done with them yet!" Why should he—though he had licked four of the best men within the hour, yet why should he threaten to inflict dishonorable chastisement on my old master Richmond, a veteran going off the stage, and who has borne his sable honors meekly? Magnanimity, my dear Tom, and bravery, should be inseparable. Or why should he go up to his antagonist, the first time he ever saw him at the Fives Court, and measuring him from head to foot with a glance of contempt, as Achilles surveyed Hector, say to him, "What, are you Bill Neate? I'll knock more blood out of that great carcase of thine, this day fortnight, than you ever knock'd out of a bullock's!" It was not manly, 'twas not fighter-like. If he was sure of the victory (as he was not), the less said about it the better. Modesty should accompany the FANCY as its shadow. The best men were always the best behaved. Jem Belcher, the Game Chicken¹ (before whom the Gas-man could not have lived) were civil, silent men. So is Cribb, so is Tom Belcher, the most elegant of sparrers, and not a man for everyone to take by the nose. I enlarged on this topic in the mail (while Turtle was asleep), and said very wisely (as I thought) that impertinence was a part of no profession. A boxer was bound to beat his man, but not to thrust his fist, either actually or by implication, in everyone's face. Even a highwayman, in the way of trade, may blow out your brains, but if he uses foul language at the same time, I should say he was no gentleman. A boxer, I would infer, need not be a blackguard or a coxcomb, more than another. Perhaps I press this point too much on a fallen man—Mr Thomas Hickman has by this time learnt that first of all lessons, "That man was made to mourn!"² He has lost nothing by the late fight but his presumption; and that every man may do as well without! By an overdisplay of this quality, however, the public had been prejudiced against him, and the knowing-ones were taken in. Few but those who had bet on him wished Gas to win. With my own prepossessions on the subject, the result of the 11th of December appeared to me as fine a piece of poetical justice as I had ever witnessed. The difference of weight between the two combatants (14 stone to 12) was nothing to the sporting men. Great, heavy, clumsy, long-armed Bill Neate kicked the beam in the scale of the Gas-man's vanity. The amateurs were frightened at his big words, and thought that they would make up for the difference of six feet and five feet nine. Truly, the FANCY are not men of imagination. They judge of what has been, and cannot conceive of anything that is to be. The Gas-man had won hitherto; therefore he must beat a man half as big again as himself—and that to a certainty. Besides, there are as many feuds, factions, prejudices, pedantic notions in the FANCY as in the state or in the schools. Mr. Gully is almost the only cool, sensible man among them, who exercises an unbiassed discretion, and is not a slave to his passions in these matters. But enough of reflections, and to our tale. The day, as I have said, was fine for a December morning. The grass was wet, and the ground mry, and ploughed up with multitudinous feet, except that, within the ring itself, there was a spot of virgin-green closed in and unprofaned by vulgar tread, that shone with dazzling brightness in the mid-day sun. For it was now noon, and we had an hour to wait. This is the trying time. It is then the heart sickens, as you think what the two champions are about, and how short a time will determine their fate. After the first blow is struck, there is no opportunity for nervous apprehensions; you are swallowed up in the immediate interest of the scene—but

Between the acting of a dreadful thing And the first motion, all the interim is Like a phantasma, or a hideous dream.³

I found it so as I felt the sun's rays clinging to my back, and saw the white wintry clouds sink below the verge of the horizon. "So, I thought, my fondest hopes have faded from my sight!—so will the Gas-man's glory, or that of his adversary, vanish in an hour." The swells were parading in their white box-coats, the outer ring was cleared with some bruises on the heads and shins of the rustic assembly (for the cockneys had been distanced by the sixty-six miles), the time drew near, I had got a good stand; a bustle, a buzz, ran through the crowd, and from the opposite side entered Neate, between his second and bottle-holder. He rolled along, swathed in his loose great coat, his knock-knees bending under his huge bulk, and, with a modest cheerful air, threw his hat into the ring.⁴ He then just looked around, and began quietly to undress; when from the other side there was a similar rush and an opening made, and the Gas-man came forward with a conscious air of anticipated triumph, too much like the cock-of-the-walk. He strutted about more than became a hero, sucked oranges with a supercilious air, and threw away the skin with a toss of his head, and went up and looked at Neate, which was an act of superelevation. The only sensible thing he did was, as he strode away from the modern Ajax, to fling out his arms, as if he wanted to try whether they would do their work that day. By this time they had stripped, and presented a strong contrast in appearance. If Neate was like Ajax, "with Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear"¹ the pugilistic reputation of all Bristol, Hickman might be compared to Diomed, light, vigorous, elastic, and his back glistened in the sun, as he moved about, like a panther's hide. There was now a dead pause—attention was awe-struck. Who at that moment, big with a great event, did not draw his breath short—did not feel his heart throb? All was ready. They tossed up for the sun, and the Gas-man won. They were led up to the scratch—shook hands, and went at it.

In the first round everyone thought it was all over. After making play a short time, the Gas-man flew at his adversary like a tiger, struck five blows in as many seconds, three first, and then following him as he staggered back, two more, right and left, and down he fell, a mighty ruin. There was a shout, and I said, "There is no standing thus." Neate seemed like a lifeless lump of flesh and bone, round which the Gas-man's blows played with the rapidity of electricity or lightning, and you imagined he would only be lifted up to be knocked down again. It was as if Hickman held a sword or a fire in that right hand of his, and directed it against an unarmed body. They met again, and Neate seemed, not cowed, but particularly cautious. I saw his teeth clenched together and his brows knit close against the sun. He held both his arms at full length straight before him, like two sledge-hammers, and raised his left an inch or two higher. The Gas-man could not get over this guard—they struck mutually and fell, but without advantage on either side. It was the same in the next round; but the balance of power was thus restored—the fate of the battle was suspended. No one could tell how it would end. This was the only moment in which opinion was divided; for in the next, the Gas-man aiming a mortal blow at his adversary's neck, with his right hand, and failing from the length he had to reach, the other returned it with his left at full swing, planted a tremendous blow on his cheek-bone and eyebrow, and made a red ruin of that side of his face. The Gas-man went down, and there was another shout—a roar of triumph as the waves of fortune rolled tumultuously from side to side. This was a settler. Hickman got up, and "grinned horrible a ghastly smile,"² yet he was evidently dashed in his opinion of himself; it was the first time he had been so punished; all one side of his face was perfect scarlet, and his right eye was closed in dingy blackness, as he advanced to the fight, less confident, but still determined. After one or two rounds, not receiving another such remembrancer, he rallied and went at it with his former impetuosity. But in vain. His strength had been weakened,—his blows could not tell at such a distance,—he was obliged to fling himself at his adversary, and could not strike from his feet; and almost as regularly as he flew at him with his right hand, Neate warded the blow, or drew back out of its reach, and felled him with the return of his left. There was little cautious sparring—no half-hits—no tapping and trifling, none of the *petit-maitreshipp*³ of the art—they were almost all knock-down blows.—the fight was a good stand-up fight. The wonder was the half-minute time. If there had been a minute or more allowed between each round, it would have been intelligible how they should by degrees recover strength and resolution; but to see two men smashed to the ground, smeared with gore, stunned, senseless, the breath beaten out of their bodies, and then, before you recover from the shock, to see them rise up with new strength and courage, stand steady to inflict or receive mortal offence, and rush upon each other "like two clouds over the Caspian"³—this is the most astonishing thing of all.—This is the high and heroic state of man! From this time forward the event became more certain every round; and about the twelfth it seemed as if it must have been over. Hickman generally stood with his back to me, but in the scuffle, he had changed positions, and Neate just then made a tremendous lunge at him, and hit him full in the face. It was doubtful whether he would fall backwards or forwards; he hung suspended for a second or two, and then fell back, throwing his hands in the air, and with his face lifted up to the sky. I never saw anything more terrific than his aspect just before he fell. All traces of life, of natural expression, were gone from him. His face was like a human skull, a death's head, spouting blood. The eyes were filled with blood, the nose streamed with blood, the mouth gaped blood. He was not like an actual man, but like a preternatural, spectral appearance, or like one of the figures in Dante's Inferno. Yet he fought on after this for several rounds, still striking the first desperate blow, and Neate standing on the defensive, and using the same cautious guard to the last, as if he had still all his work to do; and it was not till the Gas-man was so stunned in the seventeenth or eighteenth round, that his senses forsook him, and he could not come to time, that the battle was declared over.¹ Ye who despise the FANCY, do something to show as much pluck, or as much self-possession as this, before you assume a superiority which you have never given a single proof of by any one action in the whole course of your lives!—When the Gas-man came to himself, the first words he uttered were, "Where am I? What is the matter?"—"Nothing is the matter, Tom—you have lost the battle, but you are the bravest man alive." And Jackson whispered to him, "I am collecting a purse for you, Tom"—Vain sounds, and unheard at that moment! Neate instantly went up and shook him cordially by the hand, and seeming some old acquaintance, began to flourish with his fists, calling out, "Ah, you always said I couldn't fight—What do you think now?" But all in good humor, and without any appearance of arrogance; only it was evident Bill Neate was pleased that he had won the fight. When it was over I asked Cribb if he did not think it was a good one. He said, "Pretty well!" The carrier-pigeons now mounted into the air, and one of them flew with the news of her husband's victory to the bosom of Mrs. Neate. Alas, for Mrs. Hickman!

Mais au revoir,² as Sir Fopling Flutter says.³ I went down with Toms; I returned with Jack Pigott, whom I met on the ground. Toms is a rattlebram; Pigott is a sentimentalist. Now, under favor, I am a sentimentalist too—therefore I say nothing, but that the interest of the excursion did not flag as I came back. Pigott and I marched along the causeway leading from Hungerford to Newbury, now observing the effect of a brilliant sun on the tawny meads or moss-colored cottages, now exulting in the fight, now digressing to some topic of general and elegant literature. My friend was dressed in character for the occasion, or like one of the FANCY, that is, with a double portion of greatcoats, clogs,¹ and overalls: and just as we had agreed with a couple of country-lads to carry his superfluous wearing-apparel to the next town, we were overtaken by a return post-chaise, into which I got, Pigott preferring a seat on the bar.² There were two strangers already in the chaise, and on their observing they supposed I had been to the fight, I said I had, and concluded they had done the same. They appeared, however, a little shy and sore on the subject, and it was not till after several hints dropped, and questions put, that it turned out that they had missed it. One of these friends had undertaken to drive the other there in his gig: they had set out, to make sure work, the day before at three in the afternoon. The owner of the one-horse vehicle scorned to ask his way, and drove right on to Bagshot, instead of turning off at Hounslow: there they stopped all night, and set off the next day across the country to Reading, from whence they took coach, and got down within a mile or two of Hungerford, just half an hour after the fight was over. This might be safely set down as one of the miseries of human life. We parted with these two gentlemen who had been to see the fight, but had returned as they went, at Wolhampton, where we were promised beds (an irresistible temptation, for Pigott had passed the preceding night at Hungerford as we had done at Newbury), and we turned into an old bow-windowed parlor with carpet and a snug fire; and after devouring a quantity of tea, toast, eggs, sat down to consider, during an hour of philosophic leisure, what we should have for supper. In the midst of an Epicurean deliberation between a roasted fowl and mutton chops with mashed potatoes, we were interrupted by an inroad of Goths and Vandals—*O procul este profani*³—not real flash-men,⁴ but interlopers, noisy pretenders, butchers from Tot-hill-fields, brokers from Whitechapel, who called immediately for pipes and tobacco, hoping it would not be disagreeable to the gentlemen, and began to insist that it was a cross.¹ Pigott withdrew from the smoke and noise into another room, and left me to dispute the point with them for a couple of hours sans intermission by the dial. The next morning we rose refreshed, and on observing that Jack had a pocket volume in his hand, in which he read in the intervals of our discourse, I inquired what it was, and learned to my particular satisfaction that it was a volume of the New Eloise. Ladies, after this, will you contend that a love for the FANCY is incompatible with the cultivation of sentiment?—We jogged on as before, my friend setting me up in a genteel drab greatcoat and green silk handkerchief (which I must say became me exceedingly), and after stretching our legs for a few miles, and seeing Jack Randall, Ned Turner, and Scroggins pass on the top of one of the Bath coaches, we engaged with the driver of the second to take us to London for the usual fee. I got inside, and found three other passengers. One of them was an old gentleman with an aquiline nose, powdered hair,² and a pigtail, and who looked as if he had played many a rubber at the Bath rooms. I said to myself, he is very like Mr. Windham; I wish he would enter into conversation, that I might hear what fine observations would come from those finely-turned features. However, nothing passed, till, stopping to dine at Reading, some inquiry was made by the company about the fight, and I gave (as the reader may believe) an eloquent and animated description of it. When we got into the coach again, the old gentleman, after a graceful exordium, said he had, when a boy, been to a fight between the famous Broughton and George Stevenson, who was called the Fighting Coachman, in the year 1770. with the late Mr. Windham. This beginning flattered the spirit of prophecy within me and riveted my attention. He went on—“George Stevenson was coachman to a friend of my father’s. He was an old man when I saw him some years afterwards. He took hold of his own arm and said, ‘there was muscle here once, but now it is no more than this young gentleman’s.’ He added, ‘Well, no matter; I have been here long, I am willing to go hence, and I hope I have done no more harm than another man.’ Once,” said my unknown companion, “I asked him if he had ever beat

Broughton. He said Yes; that he had fought with him three times, and the last time he fairly beat him, though the world did not allow it. ‘I’ll tell you how it was, master. When the seconds lifted us up in the last round, we were so exhausted that neither of us could stand, and we fell upon one another, and as Master Broughton fell uppermost, the mob gave it in his favor, and he was said to have won the battle. But,’ says he, ‘the fact was, that as his second (John Cuthbert) lifted him up, he said to him, ‘I’ll fight no more, I’ve had enough,’ which,” says Stevenson, “you know gave me the victory. And to prove to you that this was the case, when John Cuthbert was on his death-bed, and they asked him if there was anything on his mind which he wished to confess, he answered, ‘Yes, that there was one thing he wished to set right, for that certainly Master Stevenson won that last fight with Master Broughton; for he whispered him as he lifted him up in the last round of all, that he had had enough.’” This,” said the Bath gentleman, “was a bit of human nature;” and I have written this account of the fight on purpose that it might not be lost to the world. He also stated as a proof of the candor of mind in this class of men, that Stevenson acknowledged that Broughton could have beat him in his best day, but that he (Broughton) was getting old in their last encounter. When we stopped in Piccadilly, I wanted to ask the gentleman some questions about the late Mr. Windham, but had not courage. I got out, resigned my coat and green silk handkerchief to Pigott (loth to part with these ornaments of life), and walked home in high spirits.

P. S. Toms called upon me the next day, to ask me if I did not think the fight was a complete thing. I said I thought it was. I hope he will relish my account of it.

ON GOING A JOURNEY

1822

One of the pleasantest things in the world is going a journey, but I like to go by myself. I can enjoy society in a room; but out of doors, nature is company enough for me. I am then never less alone than when alone.

The fields his study, nature was his book.¹

I cannot see the wit of walking and talking at the same time. When I am in the country, I wish to vegetate like the country.

¹ A match, the result of which was prearranged

² The 18th century custom of powdering the hair still persisted

I am not for criticising hedge-rows and black cattle. I go out of town in order to forget the town and all that is in it. There are those who for this purpose go to watering-places, and carry the metropolis with them. I like more elbow-room, and fewer incumbrances. I like solitude, when I give myself up to it, for the sake of solitude, nor do I ask for

A friend in my retreat,
Whom I may whisper, solitude is sweet.¹

The soul of a journey is liberty, perfect liberty, to think, feel, do, just as one pleases. We go a journey chiefly to be free of all impediments and of all inconveniences, to leave ourselves behind, much more to get rid of others. It is because I want a little breathing-space to muse on indifferent matters, where Contemplation

May plume her feathers and let grow her wings,
That in the various bustle of resort Were all too ruffled, and sometimes impair'd;²

that I absent myself from the town for awhile, without feeling at a loss the moment I am left by myself. Instead of a friend in a post-chaise or in a Tilbury,³ to exchange good things with, and vary the same stale topics over again, for once let me have a truce with impertinence. Give me the clear blue sky over my head, and the green turf beneath my feet, a winding road before me, and a three hours' march to dinner—and then to thinking! It is hard if I cannot start some game on these lone heaths. I laugh, I run, I leap, I sing for joy. From the point of yonder rolling cloud, I plunge into my past being, and revel there, as the sun-burnt Indian plunges headlong into the wave that wafts him to his native shore. Then long-forgotten things, like “sunken wrack and sunless treasures,”⁴ burst upon my eager sight, and I begin to feel, think, and be myself again. Instead of an awkward silence, broken by attempts at wit or dull common-places, mine is that undisturbed silence of the heart which alone is perfect eloquence. No one likes puns, alliterations, antitheses, argument, and analysis better than I do; but I sometimes had rather be without them. “Leave, oh, leave me to my repose!”⁵ I have just now other business in hand, which would seem idle to you, but is with me “very stuff of the conscience.”⁶ Is not this wild rose sweet without a comment? Does not this daisy leap to my heart set in its coat of emerald? Yet if I were to explain to you the circumstance that has so endeared it to me, you would only smile. Had I not better then keep it to myself, and let it serve me to brood over, from here to yonder craggy point, and from thence onward to the far-distant horizon?

I should be but bad company all that way, and therefore prefer being alone. I have heard it said that you may, when the moody fit comes on, walk or ride on by yourself, and indulge your reveries. But this looks like a breach of manners, a neglect of others, and you are thinking all the time that you ought to rejoin your party. “Out upon such half-faced fellowship,”⁷ say I. I like to be either entirely to myself, or entirely at the disposal of others; to talk or be silent, to walk or sit still, to be sociable or solitary. I was pleased with an observation of Mr Cobbett's, that “he thought it a bad French custom to drink our wine with our meals, and that an Englishman ought to do only one thing at a time.” So I cannot talk and think, or indulge in melancholy musing and lively conversation by fits and starts. “Let me have a companion of my way,” says Sterne, “were it but to remark how the shadows lengthen as the sun declines.”⁸ It is beautifully said: but in my opinion, this continual comparing of notes interferes with the involuntary impression of things upon the mind, and hurts the sentiment. If you only hint what you feel in a kind of dumb show, it is insipid: if you have to explain it, it is making a toil of a pleasure. You cannot read the book of nature, without being perpetually put to the trouble of translating it for the benefit of others. I am for the synthetical method on a journey, in preference to the analytical. I am content to lay in a stock of ideas then, and to examine and anatomize them afterwards. I want to see my vague notions float like the down of the thistle before the breeze, and not to have them entangled in the briars and thorns of controversy. For once, I like to have it all my own way; and this is impossible unless you are alone, or in such company as I do not covet. I have no objection to argue a point with anyone for twenty miles of measured road, but not for pleasure. If you remark the scent of a bean-field crossing the road, perhaps your fellow-traveller has no smell. If you point to a distant object, perhaps he is short-sighted, and has to take out his glass to look at it. There is a feeling in the air, a tone in the color of a cloud which hits your fancy, but the effect of which you are unable to account for. There is then no sympathy, but an uneasy craving after it, and a dissatisfaction which pursues you on the way, and in the end probably produces ill humor. Now I never quarrel with myself, and take all my own conclusions for granted till I find it necessary to defend them against objections. It is not merely that you may not be of accord on the objects and circumstances that present themselves before you—these may recall a number of objects, and lead to associations too delicate and refined to be possibly communicated to others. Yet these I love to cherish, and sometimes still fondly clutch them, when I can escape from the throng to do so. To give way to our feelings before company, seems extravagance or affectation, and, on the other hand, to have to unravel this mystery of our being at every turn, and to make others take an equal interest in it (otherwise the end is not answered) is a task to which few are competent. We must "give it an understanding, but no tongue."¹ My old friend (—"—,"² however, could do both. He could go on in the most delightful explanatory way over hill and dale, a summer's day, and convert a landscape into a didactic poem or a Pindaric ode. "He talked far above singing."³ If I could so clothe my ideas in sounding and flowing words, I might perhaps wish to have some one with me to admire the swelling theme; or I could be more content, were it possible for me still to hear his echoing voice in the woods of All-Foxden. They had "that fine madness in them which our first poets had;"⁴ and if they could have been caught by some rare instrument, would have breathed such strains as the following:

Here be woods as green
As any, air likewise as fresh and sweet As when smooth Zephyrus plays on the fleet Face of the curled streams, with flow'rs as many As the young spring gives, and as choice as any;
Here be all new delights, cool streams and wells, Arbors o'ergrown with woodbines, caves and dells;
Choose where thou wilt, whilst I sit by and sing,
Or gather rushes, to make many a ring

Had I words and images at command like these, I would attempt to wake the thoughts that he slumbering on golden ridges in the evening clouds: but at the sight of nature my fancy, poor as it is, droops and closes up its leaves, like flowers at sunset. I can make nothing out on the spot:—I must have time to collect myself.—

In general, a good thing spoils out-of-door prospects: it should be reserved for Table-talk. L——² is for this reason, I take it, the worst company in the world out of doors, because he is the best within. I grant, there is one subject on which it is pleasant to talk on a journey, and that is, what one shall have for supper when we get to our inn at night. The open air improves this sort of conversation or friendly altercation, by setting a keener edge on appetite. Every mile of the road heightens the flavor of the viands we expect at the end of it. How fine it is to enter some old town, walled and turreted just at approach of night-fall, or to come to some straggling village, with the lights streaming through the surrounding gloom; and then after inquiring for the best entertainment that the place affords, to "take one's ease at one's inn!"³ These eventful moments in our lives' history are too precious, too full of solid, heart-felt happiness to be frittered and dribbled away in imperfect sympathy. I would have them all to myself, and drain them to the last drop: they will do to talk of or to write about afterwards. What a delicate speculation it is, after drinking whole goblets of tea,

The cups that cheer, but not inebriate,⁴ and letting the fumes ascend into the brain, to sit considering what we shall have for supper—eggs and a rasher, a rabbit smothered in onions, or an excellent veal-cutlet! preparation and the stir in the kitchen—*Procul, O procul este profani!*¹ These hours are sacred to silence and to musing, to be treasured up in the memory, and to feed the source of smiling thoughts hereafter. I would not waste them in idle talk; or if I must have the integrity of fancy broken in upon, I would rather it were by a stranger than a friend. A stranger takes his hue and character from the time and place; he is a part of the furniture and costume of an inn. If he is a Quaker, or from the West Riding of Yorkshire, so much the better. I do not even try to sympathize with him, and he breaks no squares. I associate nothing with my travelling companion but present objects and passing events. In his ignorance of me and my affairs, I in a manner forget myself. But a friend reminds one of other things, rips up old grievances, and destroys the abstraction of the scene. He comes in ungraciously between us and our imaginary character. Something is dropped in the course of conversation that gives a hint of your profession and pursuits, or from having someone with you that knows the less sublime portions of your history, it seems that other people do. You are no longer a citizen of the world but your “unhoused free condition is put into circumspection and confine.”² The incognito of an inn is one of its striking privileges—“lord of one’s self, uncumber’d with a name.”³ Oh! it is great to shake off the trammels of the world and of public opinion—to lose our importunate, tormenting, everlasting personal identity in the elements of nature, and become the creature of the moment, clear of all ties—to hold to the universe only by a dish of sweet-breads, and to owe nothing but the score of the evening—and no longer seeking for applause and meeting with contempt, to be known by no other title than the Gentleman in the parlor! One may take one’s choice of all characters in this romantic state of uncertainty as to one’s real pretensions, and become indefinitely respectable and negatively right-worshipful. We baffle prejudice and disappoint conjecture; and from being so to others, begin to be objects of curiosity and wonder even to ourselves. We are no more those hackneyed common-places that we appear in the world. An inn restores us to the level of nature, and quits scores with society! I have certainly spent some enviable hours at inns—sometimes when I have been left entirely to myself, and have tried to solve some metaphysical problem, as once at Witham-common, where I found out the proof that likeness is not a case of the association of ideas—at other times, when there have been pictures in the room, as at St. Neot’s (I think it was), where I first met with Gribelin’s engravings of the Cartoons,¹ into which I entered at once, and at a little inn on the borders of Wales, where there happened to be hanging some of Westall’s drawings, which I compared triumphantly (for a theory that I had, not for the admired artist) with the figure of a girl who had ferried me over the Severn, standing up in a boat between me and the twilight—at other times I might mention luxuriating in books, with a peculiar interest in this way, as I remember sitting up half the night to read Paul and Virginia, which I picked up at an inn at Bridgewater, after being drenched in the rain all day; and at the same place I got through two volumes of Madame D’Arblay’s Camilla. It was on the 10th of April, 1798, that I sat down to a volume of The New Eloise, at the inn at Llangollen, over a bottle of sherry and a cold chicken. The letter I chose was that in which St. Preux describes his feelings as he first caught a glimpse from the heights of the Jura of the Pays de Vaud,² which I had brought with me as a *bon bouche*³ to crown the evening with. It was my birth-day, and I had for the first time come from a place in the neighborhood to visit this delightful spot. The road to Llangollen turns off between Chirk and Wrexham; and on passing a certain point, you come all at once upon the valley, which opens like an amphitheatre, broad, barren hills rising in majestic state on either side, with “green upland swells that echo to the bleat of flocks”⁴ below, and the river Dee babbling over its stony bed in the midst of them. The valley at this time “glittered green with sunny showers,”⁵ and a budding ash-tree dipped its tender branches in the chiding stream. How proud, how glad I was to walk along the high road that overlooks the delicious prospect, repeating the lines which I have just quoted from Mr. Coleridge’s poems! But besides the prospect which opened be-

Still I would return some time or other to this enchanted spot, but I would return to it alone. What other self could I find to share that influx of thoughts, of regret, and delight, the fragments of which I could hardly conjure up to myself, so much have they been broken and defaced! I could stand on some tall rock, and overlook the precipice of years that separates me from what I then was. I was at that time going shortly to visit the poet whom I have above named. Where is he now?⁴ Not only I myself have changed, the world, which was then new to me, has become old and incorrigible. Yet will I turn to thee in thought, O sylvan Dee, in joy, in youth and gladness as thou then wert, and thou shalt always be to me the river of Paradise, where I will drink of the waters of life freely!⁵

There is hardly anything that shows the short-sightedness or capriciousness of the imagination more than travelling does. With change of place we change our ideas; nay, our opinions and feelings. We can by an effort indeed transport ourselves to old and long-forgotten scenes, and then the picture of the mind revives again; but we forget those that we have just left. It seems that we can think but of one place at a time. The canvas of the fancy is but of a certain extent, and if we paint one set of objects upon it, they immediately efface every other. We cannot enlarge our conceptions, we only shift our point of view. The landscape bares its bosom to the enraptured eye, we take our fill of it, and seem as if we could form no other image of beauty or grandeur. We pass on, and think no more of it: the horizon that shuts it from our sight, also blots it from our memory like a dream. In travelling through a wild barren country, I can form no idea of a woody and cultivated one. It appears to me that all the world must be barren, like what I see of it. In the country we forget the town, and in town we despise the country. "Beyond Hyde Park," says Sir Fopling Flutter, "all is a desert."⁶ All that part of the map that we do not see before us is a blank. The world in our conceit of it is not much bigger than a nutshell. It is not one prospect expanded into another, county joined to county, kingdom to kingdom, land to seas, making an image voluminous and vast;—the mind can form no larger idea of space than the eye can take in at a single glance. The rest is a name written in a map, a calculation of arithmetic. For instance, what is the true signification of that immense mass of territory and population, known by the name of China to us? An inch of paste-board on a wooden globe, of no more account than a China orange! Things near us are seen of the size of life: things at a distance are diminished to the size of the understanding. We measure the universe by ourselves, and even comprehend the texture of our own being only piecemeal. In this way, however, we remember an infinity of things and places. The mind is like a mechanical instrument that plays a great variety of tunes, but it must play them in succession. One idea recalls another, but it at the same time excludes all others. In trying to renew old recollections, we cannot as it were unfold the whole web of our existence; we must pick out the single threads. So in coming to a place where we have formerly lived and with which we have intimate associations, everyone must have found that the feeling grows more vivid the nearer we approach the spot, from the mere anticipation of the actual impression: we remember circumstances, feelings, persons, faces, names that we had not thought of for years; but for the time all the rest of the world is forgotten!—To return to the question I have quitted above.

I have no objection to go to see ruins, aqueducts, pictures, in company with a friend or a party, but rather the contrary, for the former reason reversed. They are intelligible matters, and will bear talking about. The sentiment here is not tacit, but communicable and overt. Salisbury Plain is barren of criticism, but Stonehenge will bear a discussion antiquarian, picturesque, and philosophical. In setting out on a party of pleasure, the first consideration always is where we shall go to: in taking a solitary ramble, the question is what we shall meet with by the way. "The mind is its own place;"¹ nor are we anxious to arrive at the end of our journey. I can myself do the honors indifferently well to works of art and curiosity. I once took a party to Oxford with no mean *éclat*²—showed them that seat of the Muses at a distance,

With glistening spires and pinnacles adorn'd—descanted on the learned air that breathes from the grassy quadrangles and stone walls of halls and colleges—was at home in the Bodleian; and at Blenheim quite superseded the powdered Cicero³ that attended us, and that pointed in vain with his wand to commonplace beauties in matchless pictures.—As another exception to the above reasoning, I should not feel confident in venturing on a journey in a foreign country without a companion. I should want at intervals to hear the sound of my own language. There is an involuntary antipathy in the mind of an Englishman to foreign manners and notions that requires the assistance of social sympathy to carry it off. As the distance from home increases, this relief, which was at first a luxury, becomes a passion and an appetite. A person would almost feel stifled to find himself in the deserts of Arabia without friends and countrymen: there must be allowed to be something in the view of Athens or old Rome that claims the utterance of speech; and I own that the Pyramids are too mighty for any single contemplation. In such situations, so opposite to all one's ordinary train of ideas, one seems a species by one's self, a limb torn off from society, unless one can meet with instant fellowship and support.—Yet I did not feel this want or craving very pressing once, when I first set my foot on the laughing shores of France.⁴ Calais was peopled with novelty and delight. The confused, busy murmur of the place was like oil and wine poured into my ears; nor did the mariners' hymn, which was sung from the top of an old crazy vessel in the harbor, as the sun went down, send an alien sound into my soul. I only breathed the air of general humanity. I walked over "the vine-covered hills and gay regions of France,"⁵ erect and satisfied; for the image of man was not cast down and chained to the foot of arbitrary thrones: I was at no loss for language, for that of all the great schools of painting was open to me. The whole is vanished like a shade. Pictures, heroes, glory, freedom, all are fled; nothing remains but the Bourbons and the French people!⁶—There is undoubtedly a sensation in travelling into foreign parts that is to be had nowhere else: but it is more pleasing at the time than lasting. It is too remote from our habitual associations to be a common topic of discourse or reference, and, like a dream or another state of existence, does not piece into our daily modes of life. It is an animated but a momentary hallucination. It demands an effort to exchange our actual for our ideal identity; and to feel the pulse of our old transports revive very keenly, we must "jump"⁷ all our present comforts and connections. Our romantic and itinerant character is not to be domesticated. Dr. Johnson remarked how little foreign travel added to the facilities of conversation in those who had been abroad.⁸ In fact, the time we have spent there is both delightful and in one sense instructive; but it appears to be cut out of our substantial, downright existence, and never to join kindly on to it. We are not the same, but another, and perhaps more enviable individual, all the time we are out of our own country. We are lost to ourselves, as well as our friends. So the poet somewhat quaintly sings,

Out of my country and myself I go.

Those who wish to forget painful thoughts, do well to absent themselves for a while from the ties and objects that recall them: but we can be said only to fulfill our destiny in the place that gave us birth. I should on this account like well enough to spend the whole of my life in travelling abroad. if I could anywhere borrow another life to spend afterwards at home!

MY FIRST ACQUAINTANCE WITH POETS 1823

My father was a Dissenting Minister at W——m¹ in Shropshire, and in the year 1798 (the figures that compose that date are to me like the "dreaded name of Demogorgon"²) Mr. Coleridge came to Shrewsbury, to succeed Mr. Rowe in the spiritual charge of a Unitarian congregation there. He did not come till late on the Saturday afternoon before he was to preach; and Mr Rowe, who himself went down to the coach in a state of anxiety and expectation, to look for the arrival of his successor, could find no one at all answering the description but a round-faced man in a short black coat (like a shooting-jacket) which hardly seemed to have been made for him, but who seemed to be talking at a great rate to his fellow-passengers. Mr. Rowe had scarce returned to give an account of his disappointment, when the round-faced man in black entered, and dissipated all doubts on the subject by beginning to talk. He did not cease while he staid; nor has he since, that I know of. He held the good town of Shrewsbury in delightful suspense for three weeks that he remained there, "fluttering the proud Salopians like an eagle in a dove-cote;"³ and the Welsh mountains that skirt the horizon with their tempestuous confusion, agree to have heard no such mystic sounds since the days of

High-born Hoel's harp or soft Llewellyn's lay!⁴

As we passed along between W——m and Shrewsbury, and I eyed their blue tops seen through the wintry branches, or the red rustling leaves of the sturdy oak-trees by the roadside, a sound was in my ears as of a Siren's song, I was stunned, startled with it, as from deep sleep, but I had no notion then that I should ever be able to express my admiration to others in motley imagery or quaint allusion, till the light of his genius shone into my soul, like the sun's rays glittering in the puddles of the road. I was at that time dumb, inarticulate, helpless, like a worm by the way-side, crushed, bleeding, lifeless, but now, bursting from the deadly bands that "bound them, my ideas float on winged words, and as they expand their plumes, catch the golden light of other years. My soul has indeed remained in its original bondage, dark, obscure, with longings infinite and unsatisfied, my heart, shut up in the prison-house of this rude clay, has never found, nor will it ever find, a heart to speak to, but that my understanding also did not remain dumb and brutish, or at length found a language to express itself, I owe to Coleridge. But this is not to my purpose.

My father lived ten miles from Shrewsbury, and was in the habit of exchanging visits with Mr Rowe, and with Mr Jenkins of Whitechurch (nine miles farther on) according to the custom of Dissenting Ministers in each other's neighborhood. A line of communication is thus established, by which the flame of civil and religious liberty is kept alive, and nourishes its smouldering fire unquenchable, like the fires in the Agamemnon of Æschylus, placed at different stations, that waited for ten long years to announce with their blazing pyramids the destruction of Troy. Coleridge had agreed to come over and see my father, according to the courtesy of the country, as Mr. Rowe's probable successor, but in the meantime I had gone to hear him preach the Sunday after his arrival. A poet and a philosopher getting up into a Unitarian pulpit to preach the Gospel, was a romance in these degenerate days, a sort of revival of the primitive spirit of Christianity, which was not to be resisted.

It was in January, 1798, that I rose one morning before daylight, to walk ten miles in the mud, and went to hear this celebrated person preach. Never, the longest day I have to live, shall I have such another walk as this cold, raw, comfortless one, in the winter of the year 1798. *Il y a des impressions que ni le tems ni les circonstances peuvent effacer. Dussé-je vivre des siècles entiers, le doux tems de ma jeunesse ne peut renaitre pour moi, ni s'effacer jamais dans ma mémoire*¹. When I got there, the organ was playing the 100th Psalm, and, when it was done, Mr Coleridge rose and gave out his text, "And he went up into the mountain to pray, HIMSELF, ALONE."² As he gave out this text, his voice "rose like a steam of rich distilled perfumes,"¹ and when he came to the two last words, which he pronounced loud, deep, and distinct, it seemed to me, who was then young, as if the sounds had echoed from the bottom of the human heart, and as if that prayer might have floated in solemn silence through the universe. The idea of St John came into mind, "of one crying in the wilderness, who had his loins girt about, and whose food was locusts and wild honey."² The preacher then launched into his subject, like an eagle dallying with the wind. The sermon was upon peace and war; upon church and state—not their alliance, but their separation—on the spirit of the world and the spirit of Christianity, not as the same, but as opposed to one another. He talked of those who had "inscribed the cross of Christ on banners dripping with human gore." He made a poetical and pastoral excursion, —and to show the fatal effects of war, drew a striking contrast between the simple shepherd boy, driving his team afield, or sitting under the hawthorn, piping to his flock, "as though he should never be old,"³ and the same poor country-lad, cramped, kidnapped, brought into town, made drunk at an ale-house, turned into a wretched drummer-boy, with his hair sticking on end with powder and pomatum, a long cue at his back, and tricked out in the loathsome finery of the profession of blood.

Such were the notes our once-lov'd poet sung.⁴

And for myself, I could not have been more delighted if I had heard the music of the spheres.⁵ Poetry and Philosophy had met together, Truth and Genius had embraced⁶ under the eye and with the sanction of Religion. This was even beyond my hopes. I returned home well satisfied. The sun that was still labouring pale and wan through the sky, obscured by thick mists, seemed an emblem of the good cause, and the cold dank drops of dew that hung half melted on the beard of the thistle, had something genial and refreshing in them; for there was a spirit of hope and youth in all nature, that turned everything into good. The face of nature had not then the brand of *Jus Divinum*⁷ on it.

Like to that sanguine flower inscrib'd with woe.¹

On the Tuesday following, the half-inspired speaker came. I was called down into the room where he was, and went half-hoping, half-afraid. He received me very graciously, and I listened for a long time without uttering a word. I did not suffer in his opinion by my silence. "For those two hours," he afterwards was pleased to say, "he was conversing with W H's forehead!" His appearance was different from what I had anticipated from seeing him before. At a distance, and in the dim light of the chapel, there was to me a strange wildness in his aspect, a dusky obscurity, and I thought him pitted with the small-pox. His complexion was at that time clear, and even bright—

As are the children of yon azure sheen.²

His forehead was broad and high, light as if built of ivory, with large projecting eyebrows, and his eyes rolling beneath them like a sea with darkened lustre. "A certain tender bloom his face o'erspread,"³ a purple tinge as we see it in the pale thoughtful complexions of the Spanish portrait-painters, Murillo and Velasquez. His mouth was gross, voluptuous, open, eloquent, his chin good-humored and round, but his nose, the ruler of the face, the index of the will, was small, feeble, nothing—like what he has done. It might seem that the genius of his face as from a height surveyed and projected him (with sufficient capacity and huge aspiration) into the world unknown of thought and imagination, with nothing to support or guide his veering purpose, as if Columbus had launched his adventurous course for the New World in a scallop, without oars or compass. So at least I comment on it after the event. Coleridge in his person was rather above the common size, inclining to the corpulent, or like Lord Hamlet, "somewhat fat and puffy."⁴ His hair (now, alas! gray) was then black and glossy as the raven's, and fell in smooth masses over his forehead. This long pendulous hair is peculiar to enthusiasts, to those whose minds tend heavenward, and is traditionally inseparable (though of a different color) from the pictures of Christ.

It ought to belong, as a character, to all who preach Christ crucified, and Coleridge was at that time one of those!

It was curious to observe the contrast between him and my father, who was a veteran in the cause, and then declining into the vale of years. He had been a poor Irish lad, carefully brought up by his parents, and sent to the University of Glasgow (where he studied under Adam Smith) to prepare him for his future destination. It was his mother's proudest wish to see her son a Dissenting Minister. So if we look back to past generations (as far as eye can reach) we see the same hopes, fears, wishes, followed by the same disappointments, throbbing in the human heart; and so we may see them (if we look forward) rising up forever, and disappearing, like vaporish bubbles, in the human breast! After being tossed about from congregation to congregation in the heats of the Unitarian controversy, and squabbles about the American war, he had been relegated to an obscure village, where he was to spend the last thirty years of his life, far from the only converse that he loved, the talk about disputed texts of Scripture and the cause of civil and religious liberty. Here he passed his days, repining but resigned, in the study of the Bible, and the perusal of the Commentators, — huge folios, not easily got through, one of which would outlast a winter! Why did he pore on these from morn to night (with the exception of a walk in the fields or a turn in the garden to gather brocoli-plants¹ or kidney-beans of his own rearing, with no small degree of pride and pleasure)? Here was "no figures nor no fantasies,"² — neither poetry nor philosophy — nothing to dazzle, nothing to excite modern curiosity; but to his lacklustre eyes there appeared, within the pages of the ponderous, unwieldy, neglected tomes, the sacred name of JEHOVAH in Hebrew capitals: pressed down by the weight of the style, worn to the last fading thinness of the understanding, there were glimpses, glimmering notions of the patriarchal wanderings, with palm-trees hovering on the horizon, and processions of camels at the distance of three thousand years; there was Moses with the Burning Bush, the number of the Twelve Tribes, types, shadows, glosses on the law and the prophets; there were discussions (dull enough) on the age of Methuselah, a mighty speculation! there were outlines, rude guesses at the shape of Noah's Ark and of the riches of Solomon's Temple; questions as to the date of the creation, predictions of the end of all things; the great lapses of time, the strange mutations of the globe were unfolded with the voluminous leaf, as it turned over; and though the soul might slumber with an hieroglyphic veil of inscrutable mysteries drawn over it, yet it was in a slumber ill-exchanged for all the sharpened realities of sense, wit, fancy, or reason. My father's life was comparatively a dream; but it was a dream of infinity and eternity, of death, the resurrection, and a judgment to come!

No two individuals were ever more unlike than were the host and his guest. A poet was to my father a sort of nondescript: yet whatever added grace to the Unitarian cause was to him welcome. He could hardly have been more surprised and pleased, if our visitor had worn wings. Indeed, his thoughts had wings; and as the silken sounds rustled round our little wainscoted parlor, my father threw back his spectacles over his forehead, his white hairs mixing with its sanguine hue; and a smile of delight beamed across his rugged cordial face, to think that Truth had found a new ally in Fancy! Besides, Coleridge seemed to take considerable notice of me, and that of itself was enough. He talked very familiarly, but agreeably, and glanced over a variety of subjects. At dinner-time he grew more animated, and dilated in a very edifying manner on Mary Wolstonecraft and Mackintosh. The last, he said, he considered (on my father's speaking of his Vindicta Gallica as a capital performance) as a clever scholastic man — a master of the topics, — or as the ready warehouseman of letters, who knew exactly where to lay his hand on what he wanted, though the goods were not his own. He thought him no match for Burke, either in style or matter. Burke was a metaphysician, Mackintosh a mere logician. Burke was an orator (almost a poet) who reasoned in figures, because he had an eye for nature. Mackintosh, on the other hand, was a rhetorician, who had only an eye to common-places. On this I ventured to say that I had always entertained a great opinion of Burke, and that (as far as I could find) the speaking of him with contempt might be made

¹ "My father was one of those who mistook his talent after all. He used to be very much dissatisfied that I preferred his Letters to his Sermons. the test of a vulgar democratical mind. This was the first observation I ever made to Coleridge, and he said it was a very just and striking one. I remember the leg of Welsh mutton and the turnips on the table that day had the finest flavor imaginable. Coleridge added that Mackintosh and Tom Wedgwood (of whom, however, he spoke highly) had expressed a very indifferent opinion of his friend Mr. Wordsworth, on which he remarked to them—"He strides on so far before you, that he dwindles in the distance!" Godwin had once boasted to him of having carried on an argument with Mackintosh for three hours with dubious success; Coleridge told him—"If there had been a man of genius in the room, he would have settled the question in five minutes." He asked me if I had ever seen Mary Wolstonecraft, and I said, I had once for a few moments, and that she seemed to me to turn off Godwin's objections to something she advanced with quite a playful, easy air. He replied, that "this was only one instance of the ascendancy which people of imagination exercised over those of mere intellect." He did not rate Godwin very high¹ (this was caprice or prejudice, real or affected) but he had a great idea of Mrs. Wolstonecraft's powers of conversation, none at all of her talent for book-making. We talked a little about Holcroft. He had been asked if he was not much struck with him, and he said, he thought himself in more danger of being struck by him. I complained that he would not let me get on at all, for he required a definition of even the commonest word, exclaiming, "What do you mean by a sensation, Sir? What do you mean by an idea?" This, Coleridge said, was barricading the road to truth:—it was setting up a turnpike-gate at every step we took. I forget a great number of things, many more than I remember; but the day passed off pleasantly, and the next morning Mr. Coleridge was to return to Shrewsbury. When I came down to breakfast, I found that he had just received a letter from his friend, T. Wedgwood, making him an offer of £150 a year if he chose to waive his present pursuit, and devote himself entirely to the study of poetry and philosophy. Coleridge seemed to make up his mind to close with this proposal in the act of tying on one of his shoes. It threw an additional damp on his departure. It took the wayward enthusiast quite from us to cast him into Deva's winding vales, or by the shores of old romance.¹ Instead of living at ten miles distance, and being the pastor of a Dissenting congregation at Shrewsbury, he was henceforth to inhabit the Hill of Parnassus, to be a Shepherd on the Delectable Mountains.² Alas! I knew not the way thither, and felt very little gratitude for Mr. Wedgwood's bounty. I was pleasantly relieved from this dilemma; for Mr. Coleridge asking for a pen and ink, and going to a table to write something on a bit of card, advanced towards me with undulating step, and giving me the precious document, said that that was his address, Mr. Coleridge, Nether-Stowey, Somersetshire; and that he should be glad to see me there in a few weeks' time, and, if I chose, would come half-way to meet me. I was not less surprised than the shepherd-boy (this simile is to be found in Cassandra) when he sees a thunder-bolt fall close at his feet. I stammered out my acknowledgments and acceptance of this offer (I thought Mr. Wedgwood's annuity a trifle to it) as well as I could; and this mighty business being settled, the poet-preacher took leave, and I accompanied him six miles on the road. It was a fine morning in the middle of winter, and he talked the whole way. The scholar in Chaucer is described as going

Sounding on his way.³

So Coleridge went on his. In digressing, in dilating, in passing from subject to subject, he appeared to me to float in air, to slide on ice. He told me in confidence (going along) that he should have preached two sermons before he accepted the situation at Shrewsbury, one on Infant Baptism, the other on the Lord's Supper, showing that he could not administer either, which would have effectually disqualified him for the object in view. I observed that he continually crossed me on the way by shifting from one side of the foot-path to the other. This struck me as an odd movement; but I did not at that time connect it with any instability of purpose or involuntary change of principle, as I have done since. He seemed unable to keep on in a straight line. He spoke slightly of Hume (whose Essay on Miracles he said was stolen from an objection started in one of South's Sermons—*Credat Judæus Apella!*¹) I was not very much pleased at this account of Hume, for I had just been reading, with infinite relish, that completest of all metaphysical choke-pears, his Treatise on Human Nature, to which the Essays, in point of scholastic subtlety and close reasoning, are mere elegant trifling, light summer-reading. Coleridge even denied the excellence of Hume's general style, which I think betrayed a want of taste or candor. He however made me amends by the manner in which he spoke of Berkeley. He dwelt particularly on his Essay on Vision as a masterpiece of analytical reasoning. So it undoubtedly is. He was exceedingly angry with Dr. Johnson for striking the stone with his foot, in allusion to this author's Theory of Matter and Spirit, and saying, "Thus I confute him, Sir."² Coleridge drew a parallel (I don't know how he brought about the connection) between Bishop Berkeley and Tom Paine. He said the one was an instance of a subtle, the other of an acute, mind, than which no two things could be more distinct. The one was a shop-boy's quality, the other the characteristic of a philosopher. He considered Bishop Butler as a true philosopher, a profound and conscientious thinker, a genuine reader of nature and his own mind. He did not speak of his Analogy, but of his Sermons at the Rolls' Chapel, of which I had never heard. Coleridge somehow always contrived to prefer the unknown to the known. In this instance he was right. The Analogy is a tissue of sophistry, of winedrawn, theological special-pleading; the Sermons (with the Preface to them) are in a fine vein of deep, matured reflection, a candid appeal to our observation of human nature, without pedantry and without bias. I told Coleridge I had written a few remarks, and was sometimes foolish enough to believe that I had made a discovery on the same subject (the Natural Disinterestedness of the Human Mind)³—and I tried to explain my view of it to Coleridge, who listened with great willingness, but I did not succeed in making myself understood. I sat down to the task shortly afterwards for the twentieth time, got new pens and paper, determined to make clear work of it, wrote a few meagre sentences in the skeleton-style of a mathematical demonstration, stopped half-way down the second page; and, after trying in vain to pump up any words, images, notions, apprehensions, facts, or observations, from that gulf of abstraction in which I had plunged myself for four or five years preceding, gave up the attempt as labor in vain, and shed tears of helpless despondency on the blank unfinished paper. I can write fast enough now. Am I better than I was then? Oh no! One truth discovered, one pang of regret at not being able to express it, is better than all the fluency and flippancy in the world. Would that I could go back to what I then was! Why can we not revive past times as we can revisit old places? If I had the quaint Muse of Sir Philip Sidney to assist me, I would write a Sonnet to the Road between W—m and Shrewsbury, and immortalize every step of it by some fond enigmatical conceit. I would swear that the very milestones had ears, and that Harmer-hill stooped with all its pines, to listen to a poet, as he passed! I remember but one other topic of discourse in this walk. He mentioned Paley, praised the naturalness and clearness of his style, but condemned his sentiments, thought him a mere time-serving casuist, and said that "the fact of his work on Moral and Political Philosophy being made a text-book in our Universities was a disgrace to the national character." We parted at the six-mile stone; and I returned homeward, pensive but much pleased. I had met with unexpected notice from a person, whom I believed to have been prejudiced against me "Kind and affable to me had been his condescension, and should be honored ever with suitable regard."⁴ He was the first poet I had known, and he certainly answered to that inspired name. I had heard a great deal of his powers of conversation, and was not disappointed. In fact, I never met with anything at all like them, either before or since I could easily credit the accounts which were circulated of his holding forth to a large party of ladies and gentlemen, an evening or two before, on the Berkeleyian Theory, when he made the whole material universe look like a transparency of fine words; and another story (which I believe he has somewhere told himself⁵)—of his being asked to a party at Birmingham, of his smoking tobacco and going to sleep after dinner on a sofa, where the company found him, to their no small surprise, which was increased to wonder when he started up of a sudden, and rubbing his eyes, looked about him, and launched into a three-hours' description of the third heaven, of which he had had a dream, very different from Mr. Southey's *Vision of Judgment*¹ and also from that other Vision of Judgment,² which Mr. Murray, the Secretary of the Bridge-street Junto, has taken into his especial keeping!

On my way back, I had a sound in my ears, it was the voice of Fancy. I had a light before me, it was the face of Poetry. The one still lingers there, the other has not quitted my side! Coleridge in truth met me half-way on the ground of philosophy, or I should not have been won over to his imaginative creed. I had an uneasy, pleasurable sensation all the time, till I was to visit him. During those months the chill breath of winter gave me a welcoming; the vernal air was balm and inspiration to me. The golden sunsets, the silver star of evening, lighted me on my way to new hopes and prospects. I was to visit Coleridge in the spring. This circumstance was never absent from my thoughts, and mingled with all my feelings. I wrote to him at the time proposed, and received an answer postponing my intended visit for a week or two, but very cordially urging me to complete my promise then. This delay did not damp, but rather increased, my ardor. In the meantime I went to Llangollen Vale, by way of initiating myself in the mysteries of natural scenery; and I must say I was enchanted with it. I had been reading Coleridge's description of England, in his fine Ode on the Departing Year,³ and I applied it, con amore,⁴ to the objects before me. That valley was to me (in a manner) the cradle of a new existence: in the river that winds through it, my spirit was baptized in the waters of Helicon!

I returned home, and soon after set out on my journey with unworn heart and untired feet. My way lay through Worcester and Gloucester, and by Upton, where I thought of Tom Jones and the adventure of the muff.¹ I remember getting completely wet through one day, and stopping at an inn (I think it was at Tewkesbury²) where I sat up all night to read Paul and Virginia. Sweet were the showers in early youth that drenched my body, and sweet the drops of pity that fell upon the books I read! I recollect a remark of Coleridge's upon this very book, that nothing could show the gross indecency of French manners and the entire corruption of their imagination more strongly than the behavior of the heroine in the last fatal scene, who turns away from a person on board the sinking vessel, that offers to save her life, because he has thrown off his clothes to assist him in swimming. Was this a time to think of such a circumstance? I once hunted to Wordsworth, as we were sailing in his boat on Grasmere lake, that I thought he had borrowed the idea of his *Poems on the Naming of Places*³ from the local inscriptions of the same kind in Paul and Virginia. He did not own the obligation, and stated some distinction without a difference, in defence of his claim to originality. Any the slightest variation would be sufficient for this purpose in his mind; for whatever he added or omitted would inevitably be worth all that any one else had done, and contain the marrow of the sentiment. I was still two days before the time fixed for my arrival, for I had taken care to set out early enough. I stopped these two days at Bridgewater, and when I was tired of sauntering on the banks of its muddy river, returned to the inn, and read Camilla. So have I loitered my life away, reading books, looking at pictures, going to plays, hearing, thinking, writing on what pleased me best. I have wanted only one thing to make me happy; but wanting that, have wanted everything!

I arrived, and was well received. The country about Nether Stowey is beautiful, green and hilly, and near the sea-shore. I saw it but the other day, after an interval of twenty years, from a hill near Taunton. How was the map of my life spread out before me, as the map of the country lay at my feet! In the afternoon Coleridge took me over to All-Foxden, a romantic old family-mansion of the St. Aubins, where Wordsworth lived. It was then in the possession of a friend of the poet's, who gave him the free use of it.¹ Somehow that period (the time just after the French Revolution) was not a time when nothing was given for nothing. The mind opened, and a softness might be perceived coming over the heart of individuals, beneath "the scales that fence" our self-interest. Wordsworth himself was from home, but his sister kept house, and set before us a frugal repast; and we had free access to her brother's poems, the Lyrical Ballads, which were still in manuscript, or in the form of Sybilline Leaves. I dipped into a few of these with great satisfaction, and with the faith of a novice. I slept that night in an old room with blue hangings, and covered with the round-faced family-portraits of the age of George I and II and from the wooded declivity of the adjoining park that over-looked my window, at the dawn of day, could Hear the loud stag speak.

In the outset of life (and particularly at this time I felt it so) our imagination has a body to it. We are in a state between sleeping and waking, and have indistinct but glorious glimpses of strange shapes, and there is always something to come better than what we see. As in our dreams the fulness of the blood gives warmth and reality to the coinage of the brain, so in youth our ideas are clothed, and fed, and pampered with our good spirits; we breathe thick with thoughtless happiness, the weight of future years presses on the strong pulses of the heart, and we repose with undisturbed faith in truth and good. As we advance, we exhaust our fund of enjoyment and of hope. We are no longer wrapped in lamb's-wool, lulled in Elysium. As we taste the pleasures of life, their spirit evaporates, the sense palls, and nothing is left but the phantoms, the lifeless shadows of what has been!

That morning, as soon as breakfast was over, we strolled out into the park, and seating ourselves on the trunk of an old ash-tree that stretched along the ground, Coleridge read aloud with a sonorous and musical voice The Ballad of Betty Foy. I was not critically or skeptically inclined. I saw touches of truth and nature, and took the rest for granted. But in The Thorn,² The Mad Mother,³ and The Complaint of a Poor Indian Woman, I felt that deeper power and pathos which have been since acknowledged, In spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,¹ as the characteristics of this author; and the sense of a new style and a new spirit in poetry came over me. It had to me something of the effect that arises from the turning up of the fresh soil, or of the first welcome breath of spring:

While yet the trembling year is unconfirmed.²

Coleridge and myself walked back to Stowey that evening, and his voice sounded high as we passed through echoing grove, by fairy stream or waterfall, gleaming in the summer moonlight! He lamented that Wordsworth was not prone enough to believe in the traditional superstitions of the place, and that there was a something corporeal, a matter-of-fact-ness,⁴ a clinging to the palpable, or often to the petty, in his poetry, in consequence. His genius was not a spirit that descended to him through the air; it sprung out of the ground like a flower, or unfolded itself from a green spray, on which the gold-finch sang. He said, however (if I remember right) that this objection must be confined to his descriptive pieces, that his philosophic poetry had a grand and comprehensive spirit in it, so that his soul seemed to inhabit the universe like a palace, and to discover truth by intuition, rather than by deduction.⁵ The next day Wordsworth arrived from Bristol at Coleridge's cottage. I think I see him now. He answered in some degree to his friend's description of him, but was more gaunt and Don Quixote-like. He was quaintly dressed (according to the costume of that unconstrained period) in a brown fustian jacket and striped pantaloons. There was something of a roll, a lounge, in his gait, not unlike his own Peter Bell. There was a severe, worn pressure of thought about his temples, a fire in his eye (as if he saw something in objects more than the outward appearance), an intense high narrow forehead, a Roman nose, cheeks furrowed by strong purpose and feeling, and a convulsive inclination to laughter about the mouth, a good deal at variance with the solemn, stately expression of the rest of his face. Chantry's bust wants the marking traits; but he was teased into making it regular and heavy: Haydon's head of him, introduced into The Entrance of Christ into Jerusalem, is the most like his drooping weight of thought and expression. He sat down and talked very naturally and freely, with a mixture of clear, gushing accents in his voice, a deep guttural intonation, and a strong tincture of the northern burr,¹ like the crust on wine. He instantly began to make havoc of the half of a Cheshire cheese on the table, and said triumphantly that "his marriage with experience had not been so productive as Mr. Southey's in teaching him a knowledge of the good things of life." He had been to see The Castle Spectre, by Monk Lewis, while at Bristol, and described it very well. He said "it fitted the taste of the audience like a glove." This *ad captandum*² merit was however by no means a recommendation of it, according to the severe principles of the new school,³ which reject rather than court popular effect. Wordsworth, looking out of the low, latticed window, said, "How beautifully the sun sets on that yellow bank!" I thought within myself, "With what eyes these poets see nature!" and ever after, when I saw the sunset stream upon the objects facing it, conceived I had made a discovery, or thanked Mr. Wordsworth for having made one for me! We went over to All-Foxden again the day following, and Wordsworth read us the story of Peter Bell in the open air, and the comment made upon it by his face and voice was very different from that of some later critics! Whatever might be thought of the poem, "his face was as a book where men might read strange matters,"⁴ and he announced the fate of his hero in prophetic tones. There is a chaunt in the recitation both of Coleridge and Wordsworth, which acts as a spell upon the hearer, and disarms the judgment. Perhaps they have deceived themselves by making habitual use of this ambiguous accompaniment. Coleridge's manner is more full, animated, and varied; Wordsworth's more equable, sustained, and internal. The one might be termed more dramatic, the other more lyrical. Coleridge has told me that he himself liked to compose in walking over uneven ground, or breaking through the straggling branches of a copse-wood; whereas Wordsworth always wrote (if he could) walking up and down a straight gravel-walk, or in some spot where the continuity of his verse met with no collateral interruption. Returning that same evening, I got into a metaphysical argument with Wordsworth, while Coleridge was explaining the different notes of the nightingale to his sister, in which we neither of us succeeded in making ourselves perfectly clear and intelligible. Thus I passed three weeks at Nether Stowey and in the neighborhood, generally devoting the afternoons to a delightful chat in an arbor made of bark by the poet's friend Tom Poole, sitting under two fine elm-trees, and listening to the bees humming round us, while we quaffed our flip.⁵ It was agreed, among other things, that we should make a jaunt down the Bristol-Channel, as far as Lanton. We set off together on foot, Coleridge, John Chester, and I. This Chester was a native of Nether Stowey, one of those who were attracted to Coleridge's discourse as flies are to honey, or bees in swarming-time to the sound of a brass pan. He "followed in the chase like a dog who hunts, not like one that made up the cry."⁶ He had on a brown cloth coat, boots, and corduroy breeches, was low in stature, bow-legged, had a drag in his walk like a drover, which he assisted by a hazel switch, and kept on a sort of trot by the side of Coleridge, like a running footman by a state coach, that he might not lose a syllable or sound, that fell from Coleridge's lips. He told me his private opinion, that Coleridge was a wonderful man. He scarcely opened his lips, much less offered an opinion the whole way: yet of the three, had I to choose during that journey, I would be John Chester. He afterwards followed Coleridge into Germany,⁷ where the Kantian philosophers were puzzled how to bring him under any of their categories.⁸ When he sat down at table with his idol, John's felicity was complete; Sir Walter Scott's or Mr. Blackwood's, when they sat down at the same table with the King,⁹ was not more so. We passed Dunster on our right, a small town between the brow of a hill and the sea. I remember eying it wistfully as it lay below us: contrasted with the woody scene around, it looked as clear, as pure, as embrowned and ideal as any landscape I have seen since, of Gaspar Poussin's or Domenichino's. We had a long day's march—(our feet kept time to the echoes of Coleridge's tongue)—through Minehead and by the Blue Anchor, and on to Linton, which we did not reach till near midnight, and where we had some difficulty in making a lodgment. We however knocked the people of the house up at last, and we were repaid for our apprehensions and fatigue by some excellent rashers of fried bacon and eggs. The view in coming along had been splendid. We walked for miles and miles on dark brown heaths overlooking the channel, with the Welsh hills beyond, and at times descended into little sheltered valleys close by the sea-side, with a smuggler's face scowling by us, and then had to ascend conical hills with a path winding up through a coppice to a barren top, like a monk's shaven crown, from one of which I pointed out to Coleridge's notice the bare masts of a vessel on the very edge of the horizon and within the red-orbed disk of the setting sun, like his own spectre-ship in The Ancient Mariner.¹ At Linton the character of the sea-coast becomes more marked and rugged. There is a place called The Valley of Rocks (I suspect this was only the poetical name for it) bedded among precipices overhanging the sea, with rocky caverns beneath, into which the waves dash, and where the sea-gull forever wheels its screaming flight. On the tops of these are huge stones thrown transverse, as if an earthquake had tossed them there, and behind these is a network of perpendicular rocks, something like The Giant's Causeway. A thunder-storm came on while we were at the inn, and Coleridge was running out bare-headed to enjoy the commotion of the elements in The Valley of Rocks, but as if in spite, the clouds only muttered a few angry sounds, and let fall a few refreshing drops. Coleridge told me that he and Wordsworth were to have made this place the scene of a prose-tale, which was to have been in the manner of, but far superior to, The Death of Abel, but they had relinquished the design. In the morning of the second day, we breakfasted luxuriously in an old-fashioned parlor, on tea, toast, eggs, and honey, in the very sight of the bee-hives from which it had been taken, and a garden full of thyme and wild flowers that had produced it. On this occasion Coleridge spoke of Virgil's

Georgics, but not well. I do not think he had much feeling for the classical or elegant. It was in this room that we found a little worn-out copy of The Seasons, lying in a window-seat, on which Coleridge exclaimed, "That is true fame!" He said Thomson was a great poet, rather than a good one, his style was as meretricious as his thoughts were natural. He spoke of Cowper as the best modern poet. He said the Lyrical Ballads were an experiment about to be tried by him and Wordsworth, to see how far the public taste would endure poetry written in a more natural and simple style than had hitherto been attempted; totally discarding the artifices of poetical diction, and making use only of such words as had probably been common, in the most ordinary language since the days of Henry II.¹ Some comparison was introduced between Shakespear and Milton. He said "he hardly knew which to prefer. Shakespear appeared to him a mere stripling in the art, he was as tall and as strong, with infinitely more activity than Milton, but he never appeared to have come to man's estate; or if he had, he would not have been a man, but a monster." He spoke with contempt of Gray, and with intolerance of Pope.² He did not like the versification of the latter. He observed that "the ears of these couplet-writers might be charged with having short memories, that could not retain the harmony of whole passages." He thought little of Junius as a writer,³ he had a dislike of Dr Johnson, and a much higher opinion of Burke as an orator and politician, than of Fox or Pitt. He however thought him very inferior in richness of style and imagery to some of our elder prose-writers, particularly Jeremy Taylor. He liked Richardson, but not Fielding, nor could I get him to enter into the merits of Caleb Williams.⁴ In short, he was profound and discriminating with respect to those authors whom he liked, and where he gave his judg-

⁴ "He had no idea of pictures, of Claude or Raphael, and at this time I had as little as he. He sometimes gives a striking account at present of the Cartoons at Pisa, by Buffamaleo and others; of one in particular where Death is seen in the air brandishing his scythe, and the great and mighty of the earth shudder at his approach, while the beggars and the wretched kneel to him as their deliverer. ment fair play; capricious, perverse, and prejudiced in his antipathies and distastes. We loitered on the "ribbed sea-sands,"¹ in such talk as this, a whole morning, and I recollect met with a curious sea-weed, of which John Chester told us the country name! A fisherman gave Coleridge an account of a boy that had been drowned the day before, and that they had tried to save him at the risk of their own lives. He said "he did not know how it was that they ventured, but, sm, we have a nature towards one another." This expression, Coleridge remarked to me, was a fine illustration of that theory of disinterestedness which I (in common with Butler) had adopted. I broached to him an argument of mine to prove that likeness was not mere association of ideas. I said that the mark in the sand put one in mind of a man's foot, not because it was part of a former impression of a man's foot (for it was quite new) but because it was like the shape of a man's foot. He assented to the justness of this distinction (which I have explained at length elsewhere, for the benefit of the curious), and John Chester listened; not from any interest in the subject, but because he was astonished that I should be able to suggest anything to Coleridge that he did not already know. We returned on the third morning, and Coleridge remarked the silent cottage-smoke curling up the valleys where, a few evenings before, we had seen the lights gleaming through the dark.

In a day or two after we arrived at Stowey, we set out, I on my return home, and he for Germany. It was a Sunday morning, and he was to preach that day for Dr. Toulmin of Taunton. I asked him if he had prepared anything for the occasion? He said he had not even thought of the text, but should as soon as we parted. I did not go to hear him,—this was a fault,—but we met in the evening at Bridgewater. The next day we had a long day's walk to Bristol, and sat down, I recollect, by a well-side on the road, to cool ourselves and satisfy our thirst, when Coleridge repeated to me some descriptive lines of his tragedy of Remorse, which I must say became his mouth and that occasion better than they, some years after, did Mr. Elliston's and the Drury-lane boards,—Oh memory! shield me from the world's poor strife, during which period he had been wandering in the Hartz Forest in Germany; and his return was cometary, meteorous, unlike his setting out. It was not till some time after that I knew his friends Lamb and Southey. The last always appears to me (as I first saw him) with a common-place-book under his arm, and the first with a *bon-mot*¹ in his mouth. It was at Godwin's that I met him with Holcroft and Coleridge,² where they were disputing fiercely which was the best—Man as he was, or man as he is to be. "Give me," says Lamb, "man as he is not to be." This saying was the beginning of a friendship between us, which I believe still continues.—Enough of this for the present.

And give those scenes thine everlasting life.

But there is matter for another rhyme,
And I to this may add a second tale.³

20 ON THE FEELING OF IMMORTALITY IN YOUTH

1827

Life is a pure flame, and we live by an invisible sun within us.—SIR THOMAS BROWNE.⁴

No young man believes he shall ever die. It was a saying of my brother's,⁵ and a fine one. There is a feeling of Eternity in youth, which makes us amends for everything. To be young is to be as one of the Immortal Gods. One half of time indeed is flown—the other half remains in store for us with all its countless treasures; for there is no line drawn, and we see no limit to our hopes and wishes. We make the coming age our own.—

The vast, the unbounded prospect lies before us.⁶

Death, old age, are words without a meaning, that pass by us like the idle air which we regard not. Others may have undergone, or may still be liable to them—we "bear a charmed life,"⁷ which laughs to scorn all such sickly fancies. As in setting out on a delightful journey, we strain our eager gaze forward—

Bidding the lovely scene at distance hail,⁸ and see no end to the landscape, new objects presenting themselves as we advance; so, in the commencement of life, we set no bounds to our inclinations, nor to the unrestricted opportunities of gratifying them. We have as yet found no obstacle, no disposition to flag; and it seems that we can go on so for—ever. We look round in a new world, full of life, and motion, and ceaseless progress; and feel in ourselves all the vigor and spirit to keep pace with it, and do not foresee from any present symptoms how we shall be left behind in the natural course of things, decline into old age, and drop into the grave. It is the simplicity, and as it were abstractedness of our feelings in youth, that (so to speak) identifies us with nature, and (our experience being slight and our passions strong) deludes us into a belief of being immortal like it. Our short-lived connection with existence, we fondly flatter ourselves, is an indissoluble and lasting union—a honey-moon that knows neither coldness, jar, nor separation. As infants smile and sleep, we are rocked in the cradle of our wayward fancies, and lulled into security by the roar of the universe around us—we quaff the cup of life with eager haste without draining it, instead of which it only overflows the more—objects press around us, filling the mind with their magnitude and with the throng of desires that wait upon them, so that we have no room for the thoughts of death. From the plenitude of our being, we cannot change all at once to dust and ashes, we cannot imagine “this sensible, warm motion, to become a kneaded clod”¹—we are too much dazzled by the brightness of the waking dream around us to look into the darkness of the tomb. We no more see our end than our beginning: the one is lost in oblivion and vacancy, as the other is hid from us by the crowd and hurry of approaching events. Or the grim shadow is seen lingering in the horizon, which we are doomed never to overtake, or whose last, faint, glimmering outline touches upon Heaven and translates us to the skies! Nor would the hold that life has taken of us permit us to detach our thoughts from the present objects and pursuits, even if we would. What is there more opposed to health, than sickness; to strength and beauty, than decay and dissolution; to the active search of knowledge than mere oblivion? Or is there none of the usual advantage to bar the approach of Death, and mock his idle threats; Hope supplies their place, and draws a veil over the abrupt termination of all our cherished schemes. While the spirit of youth remains unimpaired, ere the “wine of life is drank up,”² we are like people intoxicated or in a fever, who are hurried away by the violence of their own sensations: it is only as present objects begin to pall upon the sense, as we have been disappointed in our favorite pursuits, cut off from our closest ties, that passion loosens its hold upon the breast, that we by degrees become weaned from the world, and allow ourselves to contemplate, “as in a glass, darkly,”³ the possibility of parting with it for good. The example of others, the voice of experience, has no effect upon us whatever. Casualties we must avoid: the slow and deliberate advances of age we can play at hide-and-seek with. We think ourselves too lusty and too nimble for that bleary-eyed decrepid old gentleman to catch us. Like the foolish fat scullion, in Sterne,⁴ when she hears that Master Bobby is dead, our only reflection is—“So am not I!” The idea of death, instead of staggering our confidence, rather seems to strengthen and enhance our possession and our enjoyment of life. Others may fall around like leaves, or be mowed down like flowers by the scythe of Time—these are but tropes and figures to the unreflecting ears and overweening presumption of youth. It is not till we see the flowers of Love, Hope, and Joy, withering around us, and our own pleasures cut up by the roots, that we bring the moral home to ourselves, that we abate something of the wanton extravagance of our pretensions, or that the emptiness and dreariness of the prospect before us reconciles us to the stillness of the grave!

Life! thou strange thing, thou has a power to feel Thou art, and to perceive that others are.⁵

Well might the poet begin his indignant invective against an art, whose professed object is its destruction, with this animated apostrophe to life. Life is indeed a strange gift, and its privileges are most miraculous. Nor is it singular that when the splendid boon is first granted us, our gratitude, our admiration, and our delight should prevent us from reflecting on our own nothingness, or from thinking it will ever be recalled. Our first and strongest impressions are taken from the mighty scene that is opened to us, and we very innocently transfer its durability as well as magnificence to ourselves. So newly found, we cannot make up our minds to parting with it yet and at least put off that consideration to an indefinite term. Like a clown at a fair, we are full of amazement and rapture, and have no thoughts of going home, or that it will soon be night. We know our existence only from external objects, and we measure it by them. We can never be satisfied with gazing; and nature will still want us to look on and applaud. Otherwise, the sumptuous entertainment, "the feast of reason and the flow of soul,"¹ to which they were invited, seems little better than mockery and a cruel insult. We do not go from a play till the scene is ended, and the lights are ready to be extinguished. But the fair face of things still shines on; shall we be called away, before the curtain falls, or ere we have scarce had a glimpse of what is going on? Like children, our step-mother Nature holds us up to see the rare-show² of the universe; and then, as if life were a burthen to support, lets us instantly down again. Yet in that short interval, what "brave sublunary things"³ does not the spectacle unfold; like a bubble, at one minute reflecting the universe, and the next, shook to air!—To see the golden sun and the azure sky, the outstretched ocean, to walk upon the green earth, and to be lord of a thousand creatures, to look down the giddy precipices or over the distant flowery vales, to see the world spread out under one's finger in a map, to bring the stars near, to view the smallest insects in a microscope, to read history, and witness the revolutions of empires and the succession of generations, to hear of the glory of Sidon and Tyre, of Babylon and Susa, as of a faded pageant, and to say all these were, and are now nothing, to think that we exist in such a point of time, and in such a corner of space, to be at once spectators and a part of the moving scene, to watch the return of the seasons of spring and autumn, to hear

to traverse desert wilderness, to listen to the midnight choir, to visit lighted halls, or plunge into the dungeon's gloom, or sit in crowded theatres and see life itself mocked, to feel heat and cold, pleasure and pain, right and wrong, truth and falsehood, to study the works of art and refine the sense of beauty to agony, to worship fame and to dream of immortality, to have read Shakespeare and belong to the same species as Sir

Isaac Newton,⁴ to be and to do all this, and then in a moment to be nothing, to have it

¹ "Lady Wortley Montagu says, in one of her letters, that she would much rather be a rich effendi,^a with all his ignorance, than Sir Isaac Newton, with all his knowledge."^b This was not perhaps an impolitic choice, as she had a better chance of becoming one than the other, there being many rich effendis to one Sir Isaac Newton. The wish was not a very intellectual one. The same petulance of rank and sex breaks out everywhere in these Letters. She is constantly reducing the poets or philosophers who have the misfortune of her acquaintance, to the figure they might make at her Ladyship's levee or toilette, not considering that the public mind does not sympathize with this process of a fastidious imagination. In the same spirit, she declares of Pope and Swift, that 'had it not been for the good-nature of mankind, these two superior beings were entitled, by their birth and hereditary fortune, to be only a couple of link-boys,^c Guillier's Travels, and The Rape of the Lock, go for nothing in this critical estimate, and the world raised the authors to the rank of superior beings, in spite of their disadvantages of birth and fortune, out of pure good-nature! So again, she says of Richardson, that he had never got beyond the servant's hall, and was utterly unfit to describe the manners of people of quality, till in the capricious workings of her vanity, she persuades herself that Clarissa is very like what she was at her age, and that Sir Thomas and Lady Grandison strongly resembled what she had heard of her mother and remembered of her father.^d It is one of the beauties and advantages of literature, that it is the means of abstracting the mind from the narrowness of local and personal prejudices, and of enabling us to judge of truth and excellence by their inherent merits alone. Were we to the pen that would undo this fine illusion (the only reality), and teach us to regulate our notions of genius and virtue by the circumstances in which they happen to be placed.^e You would not expect a person whom you saw in a servant's hall, or behind a counter, to write Clarissa; but after he had written the work, to pre-judge it from the situation of the writer, is an unpardonable piece of injustice and folly. His merit could only be the greater from the contrast. If literature is an elegant accomplishment, which none but persons of birth and fashion should be allowed to excel in, or to exercise with advantage to the public, let them by all means take upon them the task of enlightening and refining mankind; if they decline this responsibility as too heavy for their shoulders, let those who do the drudgery in their stead, however inadequately, for want of their polite example, receive the meed that is their due, and not be treated as low pretenders who have encroached upon the provinces of their betters. Suppose Richardson to have been acquainted with the great man's steward, or valet, instead of the great man himself, I will venture to say that there was more difference between him who lived in an ideal world, and had the genius and felicity to open that world to others, and his friend the steward, than between the lacquey and the mere lord, or between those who lived in different rooms of the same house, who dined on the same luxuries at different tables, who rode outside or inside of the same coach, and were proud of wearing or of beall snatched from one like a juggler's ball or a phantasmagoria; there is something revolting and incredible to sense in the transition, and no wonder that, aided by youth and warm blood, and the flush of enthusiasm, the mind contrives for a long time to reject it with disdain and loathing as a monstrous and improbable fiction, like a monkey on a house-top, that is loath, amidst its fine discoveries and specious antics, to be tumbled headlong into the street, and crushed to atoms, the sport and laughter of the multitude!

The change, from the commencement to the close of life, appears like a fable, after it had taken place; how should we treat it stowing the same tawdry livery. If the lord is distinguished from his valet by anything else, it is by education and talent, which he has in common with the author. But if the latter shows these in the highest degree, it is asked 'What are his pretensions?' Not birth or fortune, for neither of these would enable him to write Clorissa. One man is born with a title and estate, another with genius. That is sufficient, and we have no right to question the genius for want of the gentility, unless the former ran in families, or could be bequeathed with a fortune, which is not the case. Were it so, the flowers of literature, like jewels and embroidery, would be confined to the fashionable circles; and there would be no pretenders to taste or elegance but those whose names were found in the court list. No one objects to Claude's Landscapes as the work of a pastry-cook, or withholds from Raphael the epithet of divine, because his parents were not rich. This impertinence is confined to men of letters; the evidence of the senses baffles the envy and foppery of mankind. No quarter ought to be given to this aristocratic tone of criticism whenever it appears. People of quality are not contented with carrying all the external advantages for their own share, but would persuade you that all the intellectual ones are packed up in the same bundle. Lord Byron was a later instance of this double and unwarrantable style of pretension—*monstrum ingens, bifforme. He could not endure a lord who was not a wit, nor a poet who was not a lord. Nobody but himself answered to his own standard of perfection. Mr. Moore carries a proxy in his pocket from some noble persons to estimate literary merit by the same rule. Lady Mary calls Fielding names, but she afterwards makes atonement by doing justice to his frank, free, hearty nature, where she says 'his spirits gave him raptures with his cook-maid, and cheerfulness when he was starving in a garret, and his happy constitution made him forget everything when he was placed before a venison-pasty or over a flask of champagne'. She does not want shrewdness and spirit when her petulance and conceit do not get the better of her, and she has done ample and merited execution on Lord Bolingbroke. She is, however, very angry at the freedoms taken with the Great; smells a rat in this indiscriminate scribbling, and the familiarity of writers with the reading public; and inspired by her Turkish costume, foretells a French and English revolution as the consequence of transferring the patronage of letters from the quality to the mob, and of supposing that ordinary writers or readers can have any notions in common with their superiors."—Hast otherwise than as a chimera before it has come to pass. There are some things that happened so long ago, places or persons we have formerly seen, of which such dim traces remain, we hardly know whether it was sleeping or waking they occurred, they are like dreams within the dream of life, a mist, a film before the eye of memory, which, as we try to recall them more distinctly, elude our notice altogether. It is but natural that the lone interval that we thus look back upon, should have appeared long and endless in prospect. There are others so distinct and fresh, they seem but of yesterday—their very vividness might be deemed a pledge of their permanence. Then, however far back our impressions may go, we find others still older (for our years are multiplied in youth); descriptions of scenes that we had read, and people before our time, Priam and the Trojan war; and even then, Nestor was old and dwelt delighted on his youth, and spoke of the race, of heroes that were no more,—what wonder that, seeing this long line of beings pictured in our minds, and reviving as it were in us, we should give ourselves involuntary credit for an indeterminate existence? In the Cathedral at Peterborough there is a monument to Mary, Queen of Scots, at which I used to gaze when a boy, while the events of the period, all that had happened since, passed in review before me. If all this mass of feeling and imagination could be crowded into a moment's compass, what might not the whole of life be supposed to contain? We are heirs of the past, we count on the future as our natural reversion. Besides, there are some of our early impressions so exquisitely tempered, it appears that they must always last—nothing can add or take away from their sweetness and purity—the first breath of spring, the hyacinth dipped in the dew, the mild lustre of the evening-star, the rainbow after a storm—while we have the full enjoyment of these, we must be young, and what can ever alter us in this respect? Truth, friendship, love, books, are also proof against the canker of time; and while we live, but for them, we can never grow old. We take out a new lease of existence from the objects on which we set our affections, and become abstracted, impassive, immortal in them. We cannot conceive how certain sentiments should ever decay or grow cold in our breasts; and, consequently, to maintain them in their first youthful glow and vigor, the flame of life must continue to burn as bright as ever, or rather, they are the fuel that feed the sacred lamp, that kindle "the purple light of love,"¹ and spread a golden cloud around our heads! Again, we not only flourish and survive in our affections (in which we will not listen to the possibility of a change, any more than we foresee the wrinkles on the brow of a mistress), but we have a farther guarantee against the thoughts of death in our favorite studies and pursuits and in their continual advance. Art we know is long, life, we feel, should be so too. We see no end of the difficulties we have to encounter: perfection is slow of attainment, and we must have time to accomplish it in. Rubens complained that when he had just learned his art, he was snatched away from it. we trust we shall be more fortunate! A wrinkle in an old head takes whole days to finish it properly, but to catch "the Raphael grace, the Guido air,"² no limit should be put to our endeavors. What a prospect for the future! What a task we have entered upon! and shall we be arrested in the middle of it? We do not reckon our time thus employed lost, or our pains thrown away, or our progress slow—we do not droop or grow tired, but "gain a new vigor at our endless task,"³—and shall Time grudge us the opportunity to finish what we have auspiciously begun, and have formed a sort of compact with nature to achieve? The fame of the great names we look up to is also imperishable, and shall not we, who contemplate it with such intense yearnings, imbibe a portion of ethereal fire, the divina particula auræ,⁴ which nothing can extinguish? I remember to have looked at a print of Rembrandt for hours together, without being conscious of the flight of time, trying to resolve it into its component parts, to connect its strong and sharp gradations, to learn the secret of its reflected lights, and found neither satiety nor pause in the prosecution of my studies. The print over which I was poring would last long enough; why should the idea of my mind, which was finer, more unpalpable, perish before it? At this, I redoubled the ardor of my pursuit, and by the very subtlety and refinement of my inquiries, seemed to bespeak for them an exemption from corruption and the rude grasp of Death.⁵

them, have that singleness and integrity of impression that it seems as if nothing could destroy or obliterate them, so firmly are they stamped and riveted on the brain. We repose on them with a sort of voluptuous indolence, in full faith and boundless confidence. We are absorbed in the present moment, or return to the same point—idling away a great deal of time in youth, thinking we have enough to spare. There is often a local feeling in the air, which is as fixed as if it were marble; we loiter in dim cloisters, losing ourselves in thought and in their glimmering arches; a winding road before us seems as long as the journey of life, and as full of events. Time and experience dissipate this illusion, and by reducing them to detail, circumscribe the limits of our expectations. It is only as the pageant of life passes by and the masques turn their backs upon us, that we see through the deception, or believe that the train will have an end. In many cases, the slow progress and monotonous texture of our lives, before we mingle with the world and are embroiled in its affairs, has a tendency to aid the same feeling. We have a difficulty, when left to ourselves, and without the resource of books or some more lively pursuit, to "beguile the slow and creeping hours of time,"¹ and argue that if it moves on always at this tedious snail's-pace, it can never come to an end. We are willing to skip over certain portions of it that separate us from favorite objects, that irritate ourselves at the unnecessary delay. The young are prodigal of life from a superabundance of it, the old are tenacious on the same score, because they have little left, and cannot enjoy even what remains of it.

For my part, I set out in life with the French Revolution, and that event had considerable influence on my early feelings, as on those of others. Youth was then doubly such. It was the dawn of a new era, a new impulse had been given to men's minds, and the sun of Liberty rose upon the sun of Life in the same day, and both were proud to run their race together. Little did I dream, while my first hopes and wishes went hand in hand with those of the human race, that long before my eyes should close, that dawn would be overcast, and set once more in the night of despotism²—"total eclipse!" Happy that I did not. I felt for years, and during the best part of my existence, heart-whole in that cause, and triumphed in the triumphs over the enemies of man! At that time, while the fairest aspirations of the human mind seemed about to be realized, ere the image of man was defaced and his breast mangled in scorn, philosophy took a higher, poetry could afford a deeper range. At that time, to read The Robbers, was indeed delicious,¹ and to hear could be borne only amidst the fulness of hope, the crash of the fall of the strongholds of power, and the exulting sounds of the march of human freedom. What feelings the death-scene in *Don Carlos*³ sent into the soul! In that headlong career of lofty enthusiasm, and the joyous opening of the prospects of the world and our own, the thought of death crossing it, smote doubly cold upon the mind; there was a stifling sense of oppression and confinement, an impatience of our present knowledge, a desire to grasp the whole of our existence in one strong embrace, to sound the mystery of life and death, and in order to put an end to the agony of doubt and dread, to burst through our prison-house, and confront the King of Terrors in his grisly palace!—As I was writing out this passage, my miniature picture when a child lay on the mantle-piece, and I took it out of the case to look at it. I could perceive few traces of myself in it; but there was the same placid brow, the dimpled mouth, the same timid, inquisitive glance as ever. But its careless smile did not seem to reproach me with having become recreant to the sentiments that were then sown in my mind, or with having written a sentence that could call up a blush in this image of ingenuous youth!

"That time is past with all its giddy raptures."⁴ Since the future was barred to my progress, I have turned for consolation to the past, gathering up the fragments of my early recollections, and putting them into form that might live. It is thus, that when we find our personal and substantial identity vanishing from us, we strive to gain a reflected and substituted one in our thoughts: we do not like to perish wholly, and wish to bequeath our names at least to posterity. As long as we can keep alive our cherished thoughts and nearest interests in the minds of others, we do not appear to have retired altogether from the stage, we still occupy a place in the estimation of mankind, exercise a powerful influence over them, and it is only our bodies that are trampled into dust or dispersed to air. Our darling speculations still find favor and encouragement, and we make as good a figure in the eyes of our descendants, nay, perhaps, a better than we did in our life-time. This is one point gained; the demands of our self-love are so far satisfied. Besides, if by the proofs of intellectual superiority we survive ourselves in this world, by exemplary virtue or unblemished faith, we are taught to ensure an interest in another and a higher state of being, and to anticipate at the same time the applauses of men and angels.

Even from the tomb the voice of nature cries,
Even in our ashes live their wonted fires.⁵

As we advance in life, we acquire a keener sense of the value of time. Nothing else, indeed, seems of any consequence; and we become misers in this respect. We try to arrest its few last tottering steps, and to make it linger on the brink of the grave. We can never leave off wondering how that which has ever been should cease to be, and would still live on, that we may wonder at our own shadow, and when "all the life of life is flown,"⁶ dwell on the retrospect of the past. This is accompanied by a mechanical tenaciousness of whatever we possess, by a distrust and a sense of fallacious hollowness in all we see. Instead of the full, pulpy feeling of youth, everything is flat and insipid. The world is a painted witch, that puts us off with false shows and tempting appearances. The ease, the jocund gaiety, the unsuspecting security of youth are fled: nor can we, without flying in the face of common sense,

From the last dregs of life, hope to receive What its first sprightly runnings could not give.⁷

If we can slip out of the world without notice or mischance, can tamper with bodily infirmity, and frame our minds to the becoming composure of still-life, before we sink into total insensibility, it is as much as we ought to expect. We do not in the regular course of nature die all at once: we have mouldered away gradually long before; faculty after faculty, attachment after attachment, we are torn from ourselves piece-meal while living; year after year takes something from us; and death only consigns the last remnant of what we were to the grave. The revulsion is not so great, and a quiet *euthanasia*¹ is a winding-up of the plot, that is not out of reason or nature.

That we should thus in a manner outlive ourselves, and dwindle imperceptibly into nothing, is not surprising, when even in our prime the strongest impressions leave so little traces of themselves behind, and the last object is driven out by the succeeding one. How little effect is produced on us at any time by the books we have read, the scenes we have witnessed, the sufferings we have gone through! Think only of the variety of feelings we experience in reading an interesting romance, or being present at a fine play—what beauty, what sublimity, what soothing, what heart-rending emotions! You would suppose these would last forever, or at least subdue the mind to a correspondent tone and harmony—while we turn over the page, while the scene is passing before us, it seems as if nothing could ever after shake our resolution, that “treason domestic, foreign levy, nothing could touch us farther!”² The first splash of mud we get, on entering the street, the first pettifoggish shop-keeper that cheats us out of two-pence, and the whole vanishes clean out of our remembrance, and we become the idle prey of the most petty and annoying circumstances. The mind soars by an effort to the grand and lofty—it is at home, in the grovelling, the disagreeable, and the little. This happens in the height and hey-day of our existence, when novelty gives a stronger impulse to the blood and takes a faster hold of the brain. (I have known the impression on coming out of a gallery of pictures then last half a day)—as we grow old, we become more feeble and querulous, every object “reverbs its own hollowness,”³ and both worlds are not enough to satisfy the peevish importunity and extravagant presumption of our desires! There are a few superior, happy beings, who are born with a temper exempt from every trifling annoyance. This spirit sits serene and smiling as in its native skies, and a divine harmony (whether heard or not) plays around them.⁴ This is to be at peace. Without this, it is in vain to fly into deserts, or to build a hermitage on the top of rocks, if regret and ill-humor follow us there: and with this, it is needless to make the experiment. The only true retirement is that of the heart; the only true leisure is the repose of the passions. To such persons it makes little difference whether they are young or old; and they die as they have lived, with graceful resignation.

THOMAS DE QUINCEY (1785-1859) CONFESSIONS OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM- EATER

1820-22

1821-22

From PRELIMINARY CONFESSIONS

I have often been asked how I came to be a regular opium-eater; and have suffered, very unjustly, in the opinion of my acquaintance, from being reputed to have brought upon myself all the sufferings which I shall have to record, by a long course of indulgence in this practice purely for the sake of creating an artificial state of pleasurable excitement. This, however, is a misrepresentation of my case. True it is, that for nearly ten years I did occasionally take opium for the sake of the exquisite pleasure it gave me: but, so long as I took it with this view, I was effectually protected from all material bad consequences by the necessity of interposing long intervals between the several acts of indulgence, in order to renew the pleasurable sensations. It was not for the purpose of creating pleasure, but of mitigating pain in the severest degree, that I first began to use opium as an article of daily diet. In the twenty-eighth year of my age, a most painful affection of the stomach, which I had first experienced about ten years before, attacked me in great strength. This affection had originally been caused by extremities of hunger, suffered in my boyish days. During the season of hope and redundant happiness which succeeded (that is, from eighteen to twenty-four) it had slumbered: for the three following years it had revived at intervals: and now, under unfavorable circumstances, from depression of spirits, it attacked me with a violence that yielded to no remedies but opium. As the youthful sufferings which first produced this derangement of the stomach, were interesting in themselves, and in the circumstances that attended them, I shall here briefly retrace them.

My father died when I was about seven years old, and left me to the care of four

guardians. I was sent to various schools,¹ great and small; and was very early distinguished for my classical attainments, especially for my knowledge of Greek. At thirteen I wrote Greek with ease, and at fifteen my command of that language was so great that I not only composed Greek verses in lyric metres, but could converse in Greek fluently, and without embarrassment—an accomplishment which I have not since met with in any scholar of my times, and which, in my case, was owing to the practice of daily reading off the newspapers into the best Greek I could furnish extempore for the necessity of ransacking my memory and invention for all sorts and combinations of periphrastic expressions, as equivalents for modern ideas, images, relations of things, etc., gave me a compass of diction which would never have been called out by a dull translation of moral essays, etc. "That boy," said one of my masters,² pointing the attention of a stranger to me, "that boy could harangue an Athenian mob better than you or I could address an English one." He who honored me with this eulogy, was a scholar, "and a ripe and good one,"³ and, of all my tutors, was the only one whom I loved or revered. Unfortunately for me (and, as I afterwards learned, to this worthy man's great indignation), I was transferred to the care, first of a block-head,⁴ who was in a perpetual panic lest I should expose his ignorance, and finally, to that of a respectable scholar,⁵ at the head of a great school on an ancient foundation. This man had been appointed to his situation by [Brasenose] College, Oxford; and was a sound, well-built scholar, but, like most men whom I have known from that college, coarse, clumsy, and inelegant. A miserable contrast he presented, in my eyes, to the Etonian brilliancy⁷ of my favorite master: and, besides, he could not disguise from my hourly notice the poverty and meagreness of his understanding. It is a bad thing for a boy to be, and to know himself, far beyond his tutors, whether in knowledge or in power of mind. This was the case, so far as regarded knowledge at least, not with myself only for the two boys, who jointly with myself composed the first form, were better Grecians¹ than the head-master, though not more elegant scholars, nor at all more accustomed to sacrifice to the graces. When I first entered, I remember that we read Sophocles; and it was a constant matter of triumph to us, the learned triumvirate of the first form, to see our Archididascalus,² as he loved to be called, conning our lesson before we went up, and laying a regular train, with lexicon and grammar, for blowing up and blasting, as it were, any difficulties he found in the choruses, whilst we never condescended to open our books until the moment of going up, and were generally employed in writing epigrams upon his wig, or some such important matter. My two class-fellows were poor, and dependent for their future prospects at the university, on the recommendation of the head-master. But I, who had a small patrimonial property, the income of which was sufficient to support me at college, wished to be sent thither immediately. I made earnest representations on the subject to my guardians, but all to no purpose. One, who was more reasonable, and had more knowledge of the world than the rest, lived at a distance: two of the other three resigned all their authority into the hands of the fourth,³ and this fourth, with whom I had to negotiate, was a worthy man in his way, but haughty, obstinate, and intolerant of all opposition to his will. After a certain number of letters and personal interviews, I found that I had nothing to hope for, not even a compromise of the matter, from my guardian: unconditional submission was what he demanded: and I prepared myself, therefore, for other measures. Summer was now coming on with hasty steps, and my seventeenth birthday was fast approaching, after which day I had sworn within myself that I would no longer be numbered amongst schoolboys. Money being what I chiefly wanted, I wrote to a woman of high rank,⁴ who, though young herself, had known me from a child, and had latterly treated me with great distinction, requesting that she would "lend" me five guineas. For upwards of a week no answer came; and I was beginning to despond, when, at length, a servant put into my hands a double letter, with a coronet on the seal. The letter was kind and obliging: the fair writer was on the sea-coast, and in that way the delay had arisen: she enclosed double of what I had asked, and good-naturedly hinted that if I should never repay her it would not absolutely ruin her. Now, then, I was prepared for my scheme: ten guineas, added to about two which I had remaining from my pocket money, seemed to me sufficient for an indefinite length of time: and at that happy age, if no definite boundary can be assigned to one's power, the spirit of hope and pleasure makes it virtually infinite.

It is a just remark of Dr. Johnson's, and, what cannot often be said of his remarks, it is a very feeling one, that we never do anything consciously for the last time—of things, that is, which we have long been in the habit of doing—without sadness of heart.¹ This truth I felt deeply, when I came to leave [Manchester], a place which I did not love, and where I had not been happy. On the evening before I left [Manchester] forever, I grieved when the ancient and lofty school-room resounded with the evening service, performed for the last time in my hearing, and at night, when the muster-roll of names was called over, and mine, as usual, was called first, I stepped forward, and, passing the head-master, who was standing by, I bowed to him, and looked earnestly in his face, thinking to myself, "He is old and infirm, and in this world I shall not see him again." I was right. I never did see him again, nor ever shall. He looked at me complacently, smiled good-naturedly, returned my salutation, or rather my valediction, and we parted, though he knew it not, forever. I could not reverence him intellectually: but he had been uniformly kind to me, and had allowed me many indulgences: and I grieved at the thought of the mortification I should inflict upon him.

The morning came which was to launch me into the world, and from which my whole succeeding life has, in many important points, taken its coloring. I lodged in the head-master's house, and had been allowed, from my first entrance, the indulgence of a private room, which I used both as a sleeping-room and as a study. At half after three I rose, and gazed with deep emotion at the ancient towers of [the Collegiate Church], "dressed in earliest light," and beginning to crimson with the radiant lustre of a cloudless July morning. I was firm and immovable in my purpose. but yet agitated by anticipation of uncertain danger and troubles, and, if I could have foreseen the hurricane and perfect hail-storm of affliction which soon fell upon me, well might I have been agitated. To this agitation the deep peace of the morning presented an affecting contrast, and in some degree a medicine. The silence was more profound than that of midnight: and to me the silence of a summer morning is more touching than all other silence,² because, the light being broad and strong, as that of noon-day at other seasons of the year, it seems to differ from perfect day chiefly because man is not yet abroad; and thus the peace of nature, and of the innocent creatures of God, seems to be secure and deep, only so long as the presence of man, and his restless and unquiet spirit, are not there to trouble its sanctity. I dressed myself, took my hat and gloves, and lingered a little in the room. For the last year and a half this room had been my "pensive citadel":³ here I had read and studied through all the hours of night: and, though true it was that for the latter part of this time I, who was framed for love and gentle affections, had lost my gaiety and happiness, during the strife and fever of contention with my guardian; yet, on the other hand, as a boy so passionately fond of books, and dedicated to intellectual pursuits, I could not fail to have enjoyed many happy hours in the midst of general dejection. I wept as I looked round on the chair, hearth, writing-table, and other familiar objects, knowing too certainly that I looked upon them for the last time. Whilst I write this, it is eighteen years ago: and yet, at this moment, I see distinctly as if it were yesterday the lineaments and expression of the object on which I fixed my parting gaze: it was a picture of the lovely —,⁴ which hung over the mantle-piece: the eyes and mouth of which were so beautiful, and the whole countenance so radiant with benignity and divine tranquillity, that I had a thousand times laid down my pen or my book, to gather consolation from it, as a devotee from his patron saint. Whilst I was yet gazing upon it, the deep tones of [Manchester] clock proclaimed that it was four o'clock. I went up to the picture, kissed it, and then gently walked out, and closed the door forever!

So blended and intertwined in this life are occasions of laughter and of tears, that I cannot yet recall, without smiling, an incident which occurred at that time, and which had nearly put a stop to the immediate execution of my plan. I had a trunk of immense weight; for, besides my clothes, it contained nearly all my library. The difficulty was to get this removed to a carrier's: my room was at an aerial elevation in the house, and (what was worse) the staircase, which communicated with this angle of the building, was accessible only by a gallery which passed the head-master's chamber-door. I was a favorite with all the servants; and, knowing that any of them would screen me, and act confidentially, I communicated my embarrassment to a groom of the head-master's. The groom swore he would do anything I wished; and, when the time arrived, went up stairs to bring the trunk down. This I feared was beyond the strength of any one man: however, the groom was a man—

Of Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear and had a back as spacious as Salisbury plain. Accordingly, he persisted in bringing down the trunk alone, whilst I stood waiting at the foot of the last flight, in anxiety for the event. For some time I heard him descending with slow and firm steps: but, unfortunately, from his trepidation as he drew near the dangerous quarter, within a few steps of the gallery, his foot slipped; and the mighty burden, falling from his shoulders, gained such increase of impetus at each step of the descent, that, on reaching the bottom, it tumbled, or rather leaped, right across, with the noise of twenty devils, against the very bedroom door of the Archididascalus. My first thought was that all was lost, and that my only chance for executing a retreat was to sacrifice my baggage. However, on reflection, I determined to abide the issue. The groom was in the utmost alarm, both on his own account and on mine: but, in spite of this, so irresistibly had the sense of the ludicrous, in this unhappy contretemps,² taken possession of his fancy, that he sang out a long, loud, and canorous³ peal of laughter, that might have wakened the Seven Sleepers. At the sound of this resonant merriment, within the very ears of insulted authority, I could not myself forbear joining in it: subdued to this, not so much by the unhappy *étourderie*¹ of the trunk, as by the effect it had upon the groom. We both expected, as a matter of course, that Dr. [Lawson] would sally out of his room: for, in general, if but a mouse stirred, he sprang out like a mastiff from his kennel. Strange to say, however, on this occasion, when the noise of laughter had ceased, no sound, or rustling even, was to be heard in the bedroom. Dr. [Lawson] had a painful complaint, which, sometimes keeping him awake, made his sleep, perhaps, when it did come, the deeper. Gathering courage from the silence, the groom hoisted his burden again, and accomplished the remainder of his descent without accident. I waited until I saw the trunk placed on a wheel-barrow, and on its road to the carrier's: then, "with Providence my guide,"² I set off on foot,—carrying a small parcel, with some articles of dress, under my arm, a favorite English poet in one pocket, and a small 12mo volume, containing about nine plays of Euripides, in the other.
The weight of mightiest monarchies!

It had been my intention originally to proceed to Westmoreland, both from the love I bore to that country, and on other personal accounts.³ Accidents, however, gave a different direction to my wanderings, and I bent my steps towards North Wales.

After wandering about for some time in Denbighshire, Merionethshire, and Carnarvonshire, I took lodgings in a small neat house in B[angor]. Here I might have stayed with great comfort for many weeks; for provisions were cheap at B[angor], from the scarcity of other markets for the surplus produce of a wide agricultural district. An accident, however, in which, perhaps, no offence was designed, drove me out to wander again. I know not whether my reader may have remarked, but I have often remarked, that the proudest class of people in England, or, at any rate, the class whose pride is most apparent, are the families of bishops. Noblemen and their children carry about with them, in their very titles, a sufficient notification of their rank. Nay, their very names, and this applies also to the children of many untitled houses, are often to the English ear adequate exponents of high birth or descent. Sackville, Mannerv, Fitzroy, Paulet, Cavendish, and scores of others, tell their own tale. Such persons, therefore, find everywhere a due sense of their claims already established, except among those who are ignorant of the world by virtue of their own obscurity: "Not to know them, argues one's self unknown."¹ Their manners take a suitable tone and coloring; and, for once that they find it necessary to impress a sense of their consequence upon others, they meet with a thousand occasions for moderating and tempering this sense by acts of courteous condescension. With the families of bishops it is otherwise: with them it is all uphill work to make known their pretensions: for the proportion of the episcopal bench taken from noble families is not at any time very large; and the succession to these dignities is so rapid that the public ear seldom has time to become familiar with them, unless where they are connected with some literary reputation. Hence it is, that the children of bishops carry about with them an austere and repulsive air, indicative of claims not generally acknowledged, a sort of *noli me tangere*² manner, nervously apprehensive of too familiar approach, and shrinking with the sensitiveness of a gouty man, from all contact with the οἱ πολλοί.³ Doubtless, a powerful understanding, or unusual goodness of nature, will preserve a man from such weakness: but, in general, the truth of my representation will be acknowledged: pride, if not of deeper root in such families, appears, at least, more upon the surface of their manners. The spirit of manners naturally communicates itself to their domestics and other dependents. Now, my landlady had been a lady's maid, or a nurse, in the family of the Bishop of [Bangor]; and had but lately married away and "settled" (as such people express it) for life. In a little town like B[angor] merely to have lived in the bishop's family conferred some distinction: and my good landlady had rather more than her share of the pride I have noticed on that score. What "my lord" said, and what "my lord" did, how useful he was in Parliament, and how indispensable at Oxford, formed the daily burden of her talk. All this I bore very well: for I was too good-natured to laugh in anybody's face, and I could make an ample allowance for the garrulity of an old servant. Of necessity, however, I must have appeared in her eyes very inadequately impressed with the bishop's importance: and, perhaps, to punish me for my indifference, or possibly by accident, she one day repeated to me a conversation in which I was indirectly a party concerned. She had been to the palace to pay her respects to the family; and, dinner being over, was summoned into the dining-room. In giving an account of her household economy, she happened to mention that she had let her apartments. Thereupon the good bishop (it seemed) had taken occasion to caution her as to her selection of inmates: "for," said he, "you must recollect, Betty, that this place is in the high road to the Head;¹ so that multitudes of Irish swindlers, running away from their debts into England—and of English swindlers, running away from their debts to the Isle of Man, are likely to take this place in their route." This advice was certainly not without reasonable grounds: but rather fitted to be stored up for Mrs. Betty's private meditations, than specially reported to me. What followed, however, was somewhat worse:—"Oh, my lord," answered my landlady (according to her own representation of the matter), "I really don't think this young gentleman is a swindler; because——" —"You don't think me a swindler?" said I, interrupting her, in a tumult of indignation "for the future I shall spare you the trouble of thinking about it." And without delay I prepared for my departure. Some concessions the good woman seemed disposed to make: but a harsh and contemptuous expression which I fear that I applied to the learned dignitary himself, roused her indignation in turn: and reconciliation then became impossible. I was, indeed, greatly irritated at the bishop's having suggested any grounds of suspicion, however remotely, against a person whom he had never seen: and I thought of letting him know my mind in Greek: which, at the same time that it would furnish some presumption that I was no swindler, would also, I hoped, compel the bishop to reply in the same language; in which case, I doubted not to make it appear, that if I was not so rich as his lordship, I was a better Grecian. Calmer thoughts, however, drove this boyish design out of my mind: for I considered that the bishop was in the right to counsel an old servant; that he could not have designed that his advice should be reported to me; and that the same coarseness of mind which had led Mrs. Betty to repeat the advice at all might have colored it in a way more agreeable to her own style of thinking than to the actual expressions of the worthy bishop.

I left the lodgings the same hour, and this turned out a very unfortunate occurrence for me: because, living henceforward at inns, I was drained of my money very rapidly. In a fortnight I was reduced to short allowance; that is, I could allow myself only one meal a day. From the keen appetite produced by constant exercise and mountain air acting on a youthful stomach, I soon began to suffer greatly on this slender regimen; for the single meal which I could venture to order was coffee or tea. Even this, however, was at length withdrawn: and afterwards, so long as I remained in Wales, I subsisted either on blackberries, hips, haws, etc., or on the casual hospitalities which I now and then received, in return for such little service as I had an opportunity of rendering. Sometimes I wrote letters of business for cottagers, who happened to have relatives in Liverpool, or in London: more often I wrote love-letters to their sweethearts for young women who had lived as servants in Shrewsbury, or other towns on the English border. On all such occasions I gave great satisfaction to my humble friends, and was generally treated with hospitality: and once, in particular, near the village of Llan-y-tyndw (or some such name), in a sequestered part of Merionethshire, I was entertained for upwards of three days by a family of young people, with an affectionate and fraternal kindness that left an impression upon my heart not yet impaired. The family consisted, at that time, of four sisters and three brothers, all grown up, and all remarkable for elegance and delicacy of manners. So much beauty, and so much native good-breeding and refinement, I do not remember to have seen before or since in any cottage, except once or twice in Westmoreland and Devonshire. They spoke English, an accomplishment not often met with in so many members of one family, especially in villages remote from the high road. Here I wrote, on my first introduction, a letter about prize-money, for one of the brothers, who had served on board an English man-of-war; and more privately, two love-letters for two of the sisters. They were both interesting looking girls, and one of uncommon loveliness. In the midst of their confusion and blushes, whilst dictating, or rather giving me general instructions, it did not require any great penetration to discover that what they wished was, that their letters should be as kind as was consistent with proper maidenly pride. I contrived so to temper my expressions as to reconcile the gratification of both feelings: and they were as much pleased with the way in which I had expressed their thoughts, as, in their simplicity, they were astonished at my having so readily discovered them. The reception one meets with from the women of a family generally determines the tenor of one's whole entertainment. In this case I had discharged my confidential duties as secretary so much to the general satisfaction, perhaps also amusing them with my conversation, that I was pressed to stay with a cordiality which I had little inclination to resist. I slept with the brothers, the only unoccupied bed standing in the apartment of the young women: but in all other points they treated me with a respect not usually paid to purses as light as mine; as if my scholarship were sufficient evidence that I was of "gentle blood." Thus I lived with them for three days, and a greater part of a fourth: and from the undiminished kindness which they continued to show me, I believe I might have stayed with them up to this time, if their power had corresponded with their wishes. On the last morning, however, I perceived upon their countenances, as they sat at breakfast, the expression of some unpleasant communication which was at hand, and soon after one of the brothers explained to me that their parents had gone, the day before my arrival, to an annual meeting of Methodists, held at Carnarvon, and were that day expected to return; "and if they should not be so civil as they ought to be," he begged, on the part of all the young people, that I would not take it amiss. The parents returned, with churlish faces, and "Dym Sassenach" (no English), in answer to all my addresses. I saw how matters stood; and so, taking an affectionate leave of my kind and interesting young hosts, I went my way. For, though they spoke warmly to their parents in my behalf, and often excused the manner of the old people, by saying that it was "only their way," yet I easily understood that my talent for writing love-letters would do as little to recommend me with two grave sexagenarian Welsh Methodists, as my Greek Sapphics or Alcaics¹ and what had been hospitality, when offered to me with the gracious courtesy of my young friends,

would become charity, when connected with the harsh demeanor of these old people. Certainly, Mr. Shelley is right in his notions about old age:¹ unless, powerfully counteracted by all sorts of opposite agencies, it is a miserable corrupter and blighter to the genial charities of the human heart

Soon after this, I contrived, by means which I must omit for want of room,² to transfer myself to London. And now began the latter and fiercer stage of my long sufferings, without using a disproportionate expression, I might say, of my agony. For I now suffered, for upwards of sixteen weeks, the physical anguish of hunger in various degrees of intensity; but as bitter, perhaps, as ever any human being can have suffered who has survived it I would not needlessly harass my reader's feelings by a detail of all that I endured for extremities such as these, under any circumstances of heaviest misconduct or guilt, cannot be contemplated even in description without a rueful pity that is painful to the natural goodness of the human heart. Let it suffice, at least on this occasion, to say that a few fragments of bread from the breakfast-table of one individual,³ who supposed me to be ill, but did not know of my being in utter want, and these at uncertain intervals, constituted my whole support. During the former part of my sufferings, that is, generally in Wales, and always for the first two months in London, I was houseless, and very seldom slept under a roof. To this constant exposure to the open air I ascribe it mainly that I did not sink under my torments. Latterly, however, when colder and more inclement weather came on, and when, from the length of my sufferings, I had begun to sink into a more languishing condition, it was, no doubt, fortunate for me that the same person to whose breakfast-table I had access allowed me to sleep in a large unoccupied house, of which he was tenant. Unoccupied, I call it, for there was no household or establishment in it; nor any furniture indeed, except for a table and a few chairs. But I found, on taking possession of my new quarters, that the house already contained one single inmate, a poor friendless child, apparently ten years old; but she seemed hunger-bitten; and sufferings of that sort often make children look older than they are. From this forlorn child I learned that she had slept and lived there alone for some time before I came. and great joy the poor creature expressed, when she found that I was, in future, to be her companion through the hours of darkness. The house was large, and, from the want of furniture, the noise of the rats made a prodigious echoing on the spacious staircase and hall; and, amidst the real fleshly ills of cold, and, I fear, hunger, the forsaken child had found leisure to suffer still more, it appeared, from the self-created one of ghosts. I promised her protection against all ghosts whatsoever but, alas! I could offer her no other assistance. We lay upon the floor, with a bundle of cursed law papers for a pillow but with no other covering than a sort of large horseman's cloak: afterwards, however, we discovered, in a garret, an old sofa-cover, a small piece of rug, and some fragments of other articles, which added a little to our warmth. The poor child crept close to me for warmth, and for security against her ghostly enemies. When I was not more than usually ill, I took her into my arms, so that, in general, she was tolerably warm, and often slept when I could not for, during the last two months of my sufferings, I slept much in the day-time, and was apt to fall into transient dozing at all hours. But my sleep distressed me more than my watching for, besides the tumultuousness of my dreams, which were only not so awful as those which I shall have to describe hereafter as produced by opium, my sleep was never more than what is called dogsleep. so that I could hear myself moaning, and was often, as it seemed to me, wakened suddenly by my own voice; and, about this time, a hideous sensation began to haunt me as soon as I fell into a slumber, which has since returned upon me at different periods of my life, viz., a sort of twitching, I know not where, but apparently about the region of the stomach, which compelled me violently to throw out my feet for the sake of relieving it. This sensation coming on as soon as I began to sleep, and the effort to relieve it constantly awaking me, at length I slept only from exhaustion; and from increasing weakness, as I said before, I was constantly falling asleep, and constantly awaking. Meantime, the master of the house sometimes came in upon us suddenly, and very early, sometimes not till ten o'clock, sometimes not at all. He was in constant fear of bailiffs improving on the plan of Cromwell,¹ every night he slept in a different quarter of London; and I observed that he never failed to examine through a private window the appearance of those who knocked at the door, before he would allow it to be opened. He breakfasted alone: indeed, his tea equipage would hardly have admitted of his hazarding an invitation to a second person—any more than the quantity of esculent matériel, which, for the most part, was little more than a roll, or a few biscuits, which he had bought on his road from the place where he had slept. Or, if he had asked a party, as I once learnedly and facetiously observed to him—the several members of it must have stood in the relation to each other (not sat in any relation whatever) of succession, as the metaphysicians have it, and not of co-existence; in the relation of the parts of time, and not of the parts of space. During his breakfast, I generally contrived a reason for lounging in; and, with an air of as much indifference as I could assume, took up such fragments as he had left—sometimes, indeed, there were none at all. In doing this, I committed no robbery except upon the man himself, who was thus obliged, I believe, now and then to send out at noon for an extra biscuit; for, as to the poor child, she was never admitted into his study, if I may give that name to his chief depository of parchments, law writings, etc.; that room was to her the Bluebeard room of the house, being regularly locked on his departure to dinner, about six o'clock, which usually was his final departure for the night. Whether this child were an illegitimate daughter of Mr. [Brunell], or only a servant, I could not ascertain; she did not herself know; but certainly she was treated altogether as a menial servant. No sooner did Mr. [Brunell] make his appearance, than she went below stairs, brushed his shoes, coat, etc.; and, except when she was summoned to run an errand, she never emerged from the dismal Tartarus of the kitchens, etc. to the upper air, until my welcome knock at night called up her little trembling footsteps to the front door. Of her life during the daytime, however, I knew little but what I gathered from her own account at night; for, as soon as the hours of business commenced, I saw that my absence would be acceptable; and, in general, therefore, I went off, and sat in the parks, or elsewhere, until nightfall.

But who, and what, meantime, was the master of the house himself? Reader, he was one of those anomalous practitioners in lower departments of the law, who—what shall I say?—who, on prudential reasons, or from necessity, deny themselves all indulgence in the luxury of too delicate a conscience: (a periphrasis which might be abridged considerably, but that I leave to the reader's taste:) in many walks of life, a conscience is a more expensive encumbrance, than a wife or a carriage; and just as people talk of "laying down" their carriages, so I suppose my friend, Mr [Brunell], had "laid down" his conscience for a time, meaning, doubtless, to resume it as soon as he could afford it. The inner economy of such a man's daily life would present a most strange picture, if I could allow myself to amuse the reader at his expense. Even with my limited opportunities for observing what went on, I saw many scenes of London intrigues, and complex chicanery "cycle and epicycle, orb in orb," at which I sometimes smile to this day—and at which I smiled then, in spite of my misery. My situation, however, at that time, gave me little experience, in my own person, of any qualities in Mr. [Brunell]'s character but such as did him honor, and of his whole strange composition I must forget everything but that towards me he was obliging and, to the extent of his power, generous.

That power was not, indeed, very extensive; however, in common with the rats, I sat rent free; and, as Dr Johnson has recorded, that he never but once in his life had as much wall-fruit as he could eat,² so let me be grateful, that on that single occasion I had as large a choice of apartments in a London mansion as I could possibly desire. Except the Bluebeard room, which the poor child believed to be haunted, all others, from the attics to the cellars, were at our service; "the world was all before us";³ and we pitched our tent for the night in any spot we chose. This house I have already described as a large one; it stands in a conspicuous situation, and in a well-known part of London. Many of my readers will have passed it, I doubt not, within a few hours of reading this. For myself, I never fail to visit it when business draws me to London; about ten o'clock, this very night, August 15, 1821, being my birthday, —I turned aside from my evening walk, down Oxford Street, purposely to take a glance at it: it is now occupied by a respectable family; and, by the lights in the front drawing-room, I observed a domestic party, assembled perhaps at tea, and apparently cheerful and gay. Marvellous contrast in my eyes to the darkness—cold—silence—and desolation of that same house eighteen years ago, when its nightly occupants were one famishing scholar, and a neglected child. —Her, by the bye, in after years, I vainly endeavored to trace. Apart from her situation, she was not what would be called an interesting child: she was neither pretty, nor quick in understanding, nor remarkably pleasing in manners. But, thank God! even in those years I needed not the embellishments of novel accessaries to conciliate my affections; plain human nature, in its humblest and most homely apparel, was enough for me: and I loved the child because she was my partner in wretchedness. If she is now living, she is probably a mother, with children of her own; but, as I have said, I could never trace her.

This I regret, but another person there was at that time, whom I have since sought to trace with far deeper earnestness, and with far deeper sorrow at my failure. This person was a young woman, and one of that unhappy class who subsist upon the wages of prostitution. I feel no shame, nor have any reason to feel it, in avowing that I was then on familiar and friendly terms with many women in that unfortunate condition. The reader needs neither smile at this avowal, nor frown. For, not to remind my classical readers of the old Latin proverb—"Sine Cere, &c." etc., it may well be supposed that in the existing state of my purse my connection with such women could not have been an impure one. But the truth is, that at no time of my life have I been a person to hold myself polluted by the touch or approach of any creature that wore a human shape: on the contrary, from my very earliest youth it has been my pride to converse familiarly, more Socratico,³ with all human beings, man, woman, and child, that chance might fling in my way: a practice which is friendly to the knowledge of human nature, to good feelings, and to that frankness of address which becomes a man who would be thought a philosopher. For a philosopher should not see with the eyes of the poor liminary creature calling himself a man of the world, and filled with narrow and self-regarding prejudices of birth and education, but should look upon himself as a catholic creature, and as standing in an equal relation to high and low—to educated and uneducated, to the guilty and the innocent. Being myself at that time of necessity a peripatetic, or a walker of the streets, I naturally fell in more frequently with those female peripatetics who are technically called street-walkers. Many of these women had occasionally taken my part against watchmen who wished to drive me off the steps of houses where I was sitting. But one amongst them, the one on whose account I have at all introduced this subject—yet no! let me not class thee, oh noble-minded Ann —, with that order of women; let me find, if it be possible, some gentler name to designate the condition of her to whose bounty and compassion, ministering to my necessities when all the world had forsaken me, I owe it that I am at this time alive.—For many weeks I had walked at nights with this poor friendless girl up and down Oxford Street, or had rested with her on steps and under the shelter of porticoes. She could not be so old as myself: she told me, indeed, that she had not completed her sixteenth year. By such questions as my interest about her prompted, I had gradually drawn forth her simple history. Hers was a case of ordinary occurrence (as I have since had reason to think), and one in which, if London beneficence had better adapted its arrangements to meet it, the power of the law might oftener be interposed to protect, and to avenge. But the stream of London charity flows in a channel which, though deep and mighty, is yet noiseless and underground; not obvious or readily accessible to poor houseless wanderers: and it cannot be denied that the outside air and framework of London society is harsh, cruel, and repulsive. In any case, however, I saw that part of her injuries might easily have been redressed; and I urged her often and earnestly to lay her complaint before a magistrate: friendless as she was, I assured her that she would meet with immediate attention; and that English justice, which was no respecter of persons, would speedily and amply avenge her on the brutal ruffian who had plundered her little property. She promised me often that she would; but she delayed taking the steps I pointed out from time to time: for she was timid and dejected to a degree which showed how deeply sorrow had taken hold of her young heart: and perhaps she thought justly that the most upright judge, and the most righteous tribunals, could do nothing to repair her heaviest wrongs. Something, however, would perhaps have been done: for it had been settled between us at length, but unhappily on the very last time but one that I was ever to see her, that in a day or two we should go together before a magistrate, and that I should speak on her behalf. This little service it was destined, however, that I should never realize. Meantime, that which she rendered to me, and which was greater than I could ever have repaid her, was this:—One night, when we were pacing slowly along Oxford Street, and after a day when I had felt more than usually ill and faint, I requested her to turn off with me into Soho Square: thither we went; and we sat down on the steps of a house, which, to this hour, I never pass without a pang of grief, and an inner act of homage to the spirit of that unhappy girl, in memory of the noble action which she there performed. Suddenly, as we sat, I grew much worse: I had been leaning my head against her bosom; and all at once I sank from her arms and fell backwards on the step. From the sensations I then had, I felt an inner conviction of the liveliest kind that without some powerful and reviving stimulus, I should either have died on the spot—or should at least have sunk to a point of exhaustion from which all re-ascent under my friendless circumstances would soon have become hopeless. Then it was, at this crisis of my fate, that my poor orphan companion—who had herself met with little but injuries in this world—stretched out a saving hand to me. Uttering a cry of terror, but without a moment's delay, she ran off into Oxford Street, and in less time than could be imagined, returned to me with a glass of port wine and spices, that acted upon my empty stomach (which at that time would have rejected all solid food) with an instantaneous power of restoration: and for this glass the generous girl without a murmur paid out of her own humble purse at a time—be it remembered!—when she had scarcely wherewithal to purchase the bare necessities of life, and when she could have no reason to expect that I should ever be able to reimburse her.—Oh! youthful benefactress! how often in succeeding years, standing in solitary places, and thinking of thee with grief of heart and perfect love, how often have I wished that, as in ancient times the curse of a father was believed to have a supernatural power, and to pursue its object with a fatal necessity of self-fulfilment,—even so the benediction of a heart oppressed with gratitude might have a like prerogative; might have power given it from above to chase—to haunt—to way-lay¹—to overtake—to pursue thee into the central darkness of a London brothel, or, if it were possible, into the darkness of the grave—there to awaken thee with an authentic message of peace and forgiveness, and of final reconciliation!

² after the manner of Socrates.—A. C., by questions and answers

I do not often weep: for not only do my thoughts on subjects connected with the chief interests of man daily, nay hourly, descend a thousand fathoms “too deep for tears”;² not only does the sternness of my habits of thought present an antagonism to the feelings which prompt tears—wanting of necessity to those who, being protected usually by their levity from any tendency to meditative sorrow, would by that same levity be made incapable of resisting it on any casual access of such feelings.—but also, I believe that all minds which have contemplated such objects as deeply as I have done, must, for their own protection from utter despondency, have early encouraged and cherished some tranquillizing belief as to the future balances and the hieroglyphic meanings of human sufferings. On these accounts, I am cheerful to this hour, and, as I have said, I do not often weep. Yet some feelings, though not deeper or more passionate, are more tender than others, and often, when I walk at this time in Oxford Street by dreamy lamp-light, and hear those airs played on a barrel-organ which years ago solaced me and my dear companion, as I must always call her, I shed tears, and muse with myself at the mysterious dispensation which so suddenly and so critically separated us forever. How it happened, the reader will understand from what remains of this introductory narration.

Soon after the period of the last incident I have recorded, I met, in Albemarle Street, a gentleman of his late majesty's³ household. This gentleman had received hospital-

ities, on different occasions, from my family: and he challenged me upon the strength of my family likeness. I did not attempt any disguise. I answered his questions ingenuously,—and, on his pledging his word of honor that he would not betray me to my guardians, I gave him an address to my friend the attorney's. The next day I received from him a £10 Bank-note. The letter enclosing it was delivered with other letters of business to the attorney; but, though his look and manner informed me that he suspected its contents, he gave it up to me honorably and without demur.

This present, from the particular service to which it was applied, leads me naturally to speak of the purpose which had allured me up to London, and which I had been (to use a forensic word) soliciting from the first day of my arrival in London, to that of my final departure.

In so mighty a world as London, it will surprise my readers that I should not have found some means of staving off the last extremities of penury: and it will strike them that two resources at least must have been open to me,—viz., either to seek assistance from the friends of my family, or to turn my youthful talents and attainments into some channel of pecuniary emolument. As to the first course, I may observe, generally, that what I dreaded beyond all other evils was the chance of being reclaimed by my guardians, not doubting that whatever power the law gave them would have been enforced against me to the utmost; that is, to the extremity of forcibly restoring me to the school which I had quitted: a restoration which as it would in my eyes have been a dishonor even if submitted to voluntarily, could not fail, when extorted from me in contempt and defiance of my known wishes and efforts, to have been a humiliation worse to me than death, and which would indeed have terminated in death. I was, therefore, shy enough of applying for assistance even in those quarters where I was sure of receiving it—at the risk of furnishing my guardians with any clue for recovering me. But, as to London in particular, though, doubtless, my father had in his lifetime had many friends there, yet, as ten years had passed since his death, I remembered few of them even by name: and never having seen London before, except once for a few hours, I knew not the address of even those few. To this mode of gaining help, therefore, in part the difficulty, but much more the paramount fear which I have mentioned, habitually indisposed me. In regard to the other mode, I now feel half inclined to join my reader in wondering that I should have overlooked it. As a corrector of Greek proofs, if in no other way, I might doubtless have gained enough for my slender wants. Such an office as this I could have discharged with an exemplary and punctual accuracy that would soon have gained me the confidence of my employers. But it must not be forgotten that, even for such an office as this, it was necessary that I should first of all have an introduction to some respectable publisher: and this I had no means of obtaining. To say the truth, however, it had never once occurred to me to think of literary labors as a source of profit. No mode sufficiently speedy of obtaining money had ever occurred to me but that of borrowing it on the strength of my future claims and expectations. This mode I sought by every avenue to compass, and amongst other persons I applied to a Jew named D[ell].¹

To this Jew, and to other advertising money-lenders, some of whom were, I believe, also Jews, I had introduced myself with an account of my expectations; which account, on examining my father's will at Doctor's Commons, they had ascertained to be correct. The person there mentioned as the second son of —, was found to have all the claims, or more than all, that I had stated: but one question still remained, which the faces of the Jews pretty significantly suggested,—was I that person? This doubt had never occurred to me as a possible one: I had rather feared, whenever my Jewish friends scrutinized me keenly, that I might be too well known to be that person—and that some scheme might be passing in their minds for entrapping me, and selling me to my guardians. It was strange to me to find my own self, *materialiter*¹ considered (so I expressed it, for I doted on logical accuracy of distinctions), accused, or at least suspected, of counterfeiting my own self, *formaliter*² considered. However, to satisfy their scruples, I took the only course in my power. Whilst I was in Wales, I had received various letters from young friends: these I produced: for I carried them constantly in my pocket—being, indeed, by this time, almost the only relics of my personal incumbrances (excepting the clothes I wore) which I had not in one way or other disposed of. Most of these letters were from the Earl of [Altamont], who was at this time my chief, or rather only, confidential friend. These letters were dated from Eton. I had also some from the Marquess of [Sligo], his father, who, though absorbed in agricultural pursuits, yet having been an Etonian himself, and as good a scholar as a nobleman needs to be—still retained an affection for classical studies, and for youthful scholars. He had, accordingly, from the time that I was fifteen, corresponded with me; sometimes upon the great improvements which he had made, or was meditating, in the counties of M[ayo] and Sl[igo] since I had been there; sometimes upon the merits of a Latin poet; at other times suggesting subjects to me on which he wished me to write verses.

¹ "To this same Jew, by the way, some eighteen months afterwards, I applied again on the same business, and, dating at that time from a respectable college, I was fortunate enough to gain his serious attention to my proposals. My necessities had not arisen from any extravagance or youthful levities (these my habits and the nature of my pleasures raised me far above), but simply from the vindictive malice of my guardian, who, when he found himself no longer able to prevent me from going to the university, had, as a parting token of his good nature refused to sign an order for granting me a shilling beyond the allowance made to me at school—viz., £100 per annum. Upon this sum it was, in my time, barely possible to have lived in college, and not possible to a man who, though above the paltry affectation of ostentatious disregard for money, and without any expensive tastes, confided nevertheless rather too much in servants, and did not delight in the petty details of minute economy. I soon, therefore, became embarrassed, and at length, after a most voluminous negotiation with the Jew (some parts of which, if I had leisure to rehearse them, would greatly amuse my readers), I was put in possession of the sum I asked for, on the 'regular' terms of paying the Jew seventeen and a half per cent by way of annuity on all the money furnished, Israel, on his part, graciously resuming no more than about ninety guineas of the said money, on account of an attorney's bill (for what services, to whom rendered, and when whether at the siege of Jerusalem—at the building of the Second Temple—or on some earlier occasion, I have not yet been able to discover). How many perches this bill measured I really forget; but I still keep it in a cabinet of natural curiosities, and sometime or other I believe I shall present it to the British Museum."—De Quincey.

On reading the letters, one of my Jewish friends agreed to furnish two or three hundred pounds on my personal security—provided I could persuade the young Earl, who was, by the way, not older than myself, to guarantee the payment on our coming of age: the Jew's final object being, as I now suppose, not the trifling profit he could expect to make by me, but the prospect of establishing a connection with my noble friend, whose immense expectations were well known to him. In pursuance of this proposal on the part of the Jew, about eight or nine days after I had received the £10, I prepared to go down to Eton. Nearly £3 of the money I had given to my money-lending friend, on his alleging that the stamps must be bought, in order that the writings might be preparing whilst I was away from London. I thought in my heart that he was lying; but I did not wish to give him any excuse for charging his own delays upon me. A smaller sum I had given to my friend the attorney, who was connected with the money-lenders as their lawyer, to which, indeed, he was entitled for his unfurnished lodgings. About fifteen shillings I had employed in re-establishing, though in a very humble way, my dress. Of the remainder I gave one-quarter to Ann, meaning on my return to have divided with her whatever might remain. These arrangements made,—soon after six o'clock, on a dark winter evening, I set off, accompanied by Ann, towards Piccadilly, for it was my intention to go down as far as Salt Hill on the Bath or Bristol mail. Our course lay through a part of the town which has now all disappeared, so that I can no longer retrace its ancient boundaries: Swallow Street, I think it was called. Having time enough before us, however, we bore away to the left until we came into Golden Square: there, near the corner of Sherrard Street, we sat down, not wishing to part in the tumult and blaze of Piccadilly. I had told her of my plans some time before: and I now assured her again that she should share in my good fortune, if I met with any; and that I would never forsake her, as soon as I had power to protect her. This I fully intended, as much from inclination as from a sense of duty: for, setting aside gratitude, which in any case must have made me her debtor for life, I loved her as affectionately as if she had been my sister: and at this moment, with sevenfold tenderness, from pity at witnessing her extreme dejection. I had, apparently, most reason for dejection, because I was leaving the savior of my life: yet I, considering the shock my health had received, was cheerful and full of hope. She, on the contrary, who was parting with one who had little means of serving her, except by kindness and brotherly treatment, was overcome by sorrow; so that, when I kissed her at our final farewell, she put her arms about my neck, and wept without speaking a word. I hoped to return in a week at farthest, and I agreed with her that on the fifth night from that, and every night afterwards, she should wait for me at six o'clock near the bottom of Great Titchfield Street, which had been our customary haven, as it were, of rendezvous, to prevent our missing each other in the great Mediterranean of Oxford Street. This and other measures of precaution I took: one only I forgot. She had either never told me, or (as a matter of no great interest) I had forgotten, her surname. It is a general practice, indeed, with girls of humble rank in her unhappy condition, not (as novel-reading women of higher pretensions) to style themselves—Miss Douglas, Miss Montague, etc., but simply by their Christian names, Mary, Jane, Frances, etc. Her surname, as the surest means of tracing her hereafter, I ought now to have inquired: but the truth is, having no reason to think that our meeting could, in consequence of a short interruption, be more difficult or uncertain than it had been for so many weeks, I had scarcely for a moment adverted to it as necessary, or placed it amongst my memoranda against this parting interview: and, my final anxieties being spent in comforting her with hopes, and in pressing upon her the necessity of getting some medicines for a violent cough and hoarseness with which she was troubled, I wholly forgot it until it was too late to recall her.

It was past eight o'clock when I reached the Gloucester coffee-house: and, the Bristol mail being on the point of going off, I mounted on the outside. The fine fluent motion¹ of this mail soon laid me asleep: it is somewhat remarkable that the first easy or refreshing sleep which I had enjoyed for some months was on the outside of a mail-coach—a bed which, at this day, I find rather an uneasy one. Connected with this sleep was a little incident, which served, as hundreds of others did at that time, to convince me how easily a man who has never been in any great distress may pass through life without knowing, in his own person at least, anything of the possible goodness of the human heart—or, as I must add with a sigh, of its possible vileness. So thick a curtain of manners is drawn over the features and expression of men's natures, that to the ordinary observer the two extremities, and the infinite field of varieties which lie between them, are all confounded—the vast and multitudinous compass of their several harmonies reduced to the meagre outline of differences expressed in the gamut or alphabet of elementary sounds. The case was this: for the first four or five miles from London, I annoyed my fellow-passenger on the roof by occasionally falling against him when the coach gave a lurch to his side; and indeed, if the road had been less smooth and level than it is, I should have fallen off from weakness. Of this annoyance he complained heavily, as perhaps in the same circumstances most people would; he expressed his complaint, however, more morosely than the occasion seemed to warrant; and, if I had parted with him at that moment, I should have thought of him, if I had considered it worth while to think of him at all, as a surly and almost brutal fellow. However, I was conscious that I had given him some cause for complaint: and, therefore, I apologized to him, and assured him that I would do what I could to avoid falling asleep for the future; and, at the same time, in as few words as possible, I explained to him that I was ill and in a weak state from long suffering; and that I could not afford at that time to take an inside place. The man's manner changed, upon hearing this explanation, in an instant: and when I next woke for a minute from the noise and lights of Hounslow (for in spite of my wishes and efforts I had fallen asleep again within two minutes from the time I had spoken to him), I found that he had put his arm around me to protect me from falling off: and for the rest of my journey he behaved to me with the gentleness of a woman, so that, at length, I almost lay in his arms: and this was the more kind, as he could not have known that I was not going the whole way to Bath or Bristol. Unfortunately, indeed, I did go rather farther than I intended: for so genial and refreshing was my sleep, that the next time after leaving Hounslow that I fully awoke, was upon the sudden pulling up of the mail, possibly at a post-office, and on inquiry, I found that we had reached Maidenhead—six or seven miles, I think, ahead of Salt Hill. Here I alighted: and for the half-minute that the mail stopped, I was entreated by my friendly companion, who, from the transient glimpse I had had of him in Piccadilly, seemed to me to be a gentleman's butler—or person of that rank, to go to bed without delay. This I promised, though with no intention of doing so: and in fact, I immediately set forward, or rather backward, on foot. It must then have been nearly midnight: but so slowly did I creep along, that I heard a clock in a cottage strike four before I turned down the lane from Slough to Eton. The air and the sleep had both refreshed me; but I was weary nevertheless. I remember a thought, obvious enough, and which has been prettily expressed by a Roman poet,¹ which gave me some consolation at that moment under my poverty. There had been some time before a murder committed on or near Hounslow Heath I think I cannot be mistaken when I say that the name of the murdered person was Steele, and that he was the owner of a lavender² plantation in that neighborhood. Every step of my progress was bringing me nearer to the heath and it naturally occurred to me that I and the accursed murderer, if he were that night abroad, might at every instant be unconsciously approaching each other through the darkness in which case, said I,—supposing that I, instead of being, as indeed I am, little better than an outcast,—

Lord of my learning and no land beside,³ were, like my friend, Lord [Altamont], heir by general repute to £70,000 per ann, what a panic should I be under at this moment about my throat!—indeed, it was not likely that Lord [Altamont] should ever be in my situation. But nevertheless, the spirit of the remark remains true—that vast power and possessions make a man shamefully afraid of dying and I am convinced that many of the most intrepid adventurers who, by fortunately being poor, enjoy the full use of their natural courage, would, if at the very instant of going into action news were brought to them that they had unexpectedly succeeded to an estate in England of £50,000 a year, feel their dislike to bullets considerably sharpened⁴—and their efforts at perfect equanimity and self-possession proportionably difficult. So true it is, in the language of a wise man whose own experience had made him acquainted with both fortunes, that riches are better fitted—

To slacken virtue, and abate her edge,
Than tempt her to do aught may merit praise

I dally with my subject because, to myself, the remembrance of these times is profoundly interesting. But my reader shall not have any further cause to complain for I now hasten to its close.—In the road between Slough and Eton, I fell asleep; and, just as the morning began to dawn, I was awakened by the voice of a man standing over me and surveying me. I know not what he was: he was an ill-looking fellow—but not therefore of necessity an ill-meaning fellow: or, if he were, I suppose he thought that no person sleeping out-of-doors in winter would be worth robbing. In which conclusion, however, as it regarded myself, I beg to assure him, if he should be among my readers, that he was mistaken. After a slight remark he passed on and I was not sorry at his disturbance, as it enabled me to pass through Eton before people were generally up. The night had been heavy and lowering but towards the morning it had changed to a slight frost and the ground and the trees were now covered with rime. I slipped through Eton unobserved, washed myself, and, as far as possible, adjusted my dress at a little public-house in Windsor; and about eight o'clock went down towards Pote's. On my road I met some junior boys of whom I made inquiries: an Etonian is always a gentleman, and, in spite of my shabby habiliments, they answered me civilly. My friend, Lord [Altamont], was gone to the University of [Cambridge]. "Ibi omnis effusus labor!" I had, however, other friends at Eton but it is not to all who wear that name in prosperity that a man is willing to present himself in distress. On recollecting myself, however, I asked for the Earl of D[esart], to whom (though my acquaintance with him was not so intimate as with some others) I should not have shrunk from presenting myself under any circumstances. He was still at Eton, though I believe on the wing for Cambridge. I called, was received kindly, and asked to breakfast.

Here let me stop for a moment to check my reader from any erroneous conclusion: because I have had occasion incidentally to speak of various patrician friends, it must not be supposed that I have myself any pretensions to rank or high blood. I thank God that I have not.—I am the son of a plain English merchant, esteemed during his life for his great integrity, and strongly attached to literary pursuits; indeed, he was himself, anonymously, an author: if he had lived, it was expected that he would have been very rich; but, dying prematurely, he left no more than about £30,000, amongst seven different claimants. My mother I may mention with honor, as still more highly gifted. For, though unpretending to the name and honors of a literary woman, I shall presume to call her (what many literary women are not) an intellectual woman: and I believe that if ever her letters should be collected and published,¹ they would be thought generally to exhibit as much strong and masculine sense, delivered in as pure "mother English," racy and fresh with idiomatic graces, as any in our language—hardly excepting those of Lady M. W. Montagu. —These are my honors of descent: I have no others: and I have thanked God sincerely that I have not, because, in my judgment, a station which raises a man too eminently above the level of his fellow-creatures is not the most favorable to moral, or to intellectual qualities.

Lord D[esart] placed before me a most magnificent breakfast. It was really so; but in my eyes it seemed trebly magnificent—from being the first regular meal, the first "good man's table," that I had sat down to for months. Strange to say, however, I could scarcely eat anything. On the day when I first received my £10 Bank-note, I had gone to a baker's shop and bought a couple of rolls: this very shop I had two months or six weeks before surveyed with an eagerness of desire which it was almost humiliating to me to recollect. I remembered the story about Otway,² and feared that there might be danger in eating too rapidly. But I had no need for alarm, my appetite was quite sunk, and I became sick before I had eaten half of what I had bought. This effect from eating what approached to a meal, I continued to feel for weeks: or, when I did not experience any nausea, part of what I ate was rejected, sometimes with acidity, sometimes immediately, and without any acidity. On the present occasion, at Lord D[esart]'s table, I found myself not at all better than usual: and, in the midst of luxuries, I had no appetite. I had, however, unfortunately, at all times a craving for wine. I explained my situation, therefore, to Lord D[esart], and gave him a short account of my late sufferings, at which he expressed great compassion, and called for wine. This gave me a momentary relief and pleasure; and on all occasions when I had an opportunity, I never failed to drink wine—which I worshipped then as I have since worshipped opium. I am convinced, however, that this indulgence in wine contributed to strengthen my malady; for the tone of my stomach was apparently quite sunk, but by a better regimen it might sooner, and perhaps effectually, have been revived. I hope that it was not from this love of wine that I lingered in the neighborhood of my Eton friends: I persuaded myself then that it was from reluctance to ask of Lord D[esart], on whom I was conscious I had not sufficient claims, the particular service in quest of which I had come down to Eton. I was, however, unwilling to lose my journey, and—I asked it. Lord D[esart], whose good nature was unbounded, and which, in regard to myself had been measured rather by his compassion perhaps for my condition, and his knowledge of my intimacy with some of his relatives, than by an over-rigorous inquiry into the extent of my own direct claims, faltered, nevertheless, at this request. He acknowledged that he did not like to have any dealings with money-lenders, and feared lest such a transaction might come to the ears of his connections. Moreover, he doubted whether his signature, whose expectations were so much more bounded than those of [his cousin], would avail with my unchristian friends. However, he did not wish, as it seemed, to mortify me by an absolute refusal: for after a little consideration, he promised, under certain conditions which he pointed out, to give his security. Lord D[esart] was at this time not eighteen years of age: but I have often doubted, on recollecting since the good sense and prudence which on this occasion he mingled with so much urbanity of manner, an urbanity which in him wore the grace of youthful sincerity, whether any statesman—the oldest and the most accomplished in diplomacy—could have acquitted himself better under the same circumstances. Most people, indeed, cannot be addressed on such a business without surveying you with looks as austere and unpropitious as those of a Saracen's head.³ worst that I had pictured to myself as possible, I returned in a Windsor coach to London three days after I had quitted it. And now I come to the end of my story:—the Jews did not approve of Lord D[esart]'s terms; whether they would in the end have acceded to them, and were only seeking time for making due inquiries, I know not; but many delays were made—time passed on—the small fragment of my Bank-note had just melted away; and before any conclusion could have been put to the business, I must have relapsed into my former state of wretchedness. Suddenly, however, at this crisis, an opening was made, almost by accident, for reconciliation with my friends.¹ I quitted London, in haste, for a remote part of England:² after some time, I proceeded to the university,³ and it was not until many months had passed away that I had it in my power again to revisit the ground which had become so interesting to me, and to this day remains so, as the chief scene of my youthful sufferings.

Meantime, what had become of poor Ann? For her I have reserved my concluding words: according to our agreement, I sought her daily, and waited for her every night, so long as I stayed in London, at the corner of Titchfield Street. I inquired for her of every one who was likely to know her; and during the last hours of my stay in London I put into activity every means of tracing her that my knowledge of London suggested, and the limited extent of my power made possible. The street where she had lodged I knew, but not the house: and I remembered at last some account which she had given me of ill treatment from her landlord, which made it probable that she had quitted those lodgings before we parted. She had few acquaintance; most people, besides, thought that the earnestness of my inquiries arose from motives which moved their laughter, or their slight regard; and others, thinking I was in chase of a girl who had robbed me of some trifles, were naturally and excusably indisposed to give me any clue to her, if, indeed, they had any to give. Finally, as my despairing resource, on the day I left London I put into the hands of the only person who (I was sure) must know Ann by sight, from having been in company with us once or twice, an address to — in —shire,⁴ at that time the residence of my family. But, to this hour, I have never heard a syllable about her.¹ This, amongst such troubles as most men meet with in this life, has been my heaviest affliction.—If she lived, doubtless we must have been sometimes in search of each other, at the very same moment, through the mighty labyrinths of London; perhaps even within a few feet of each other—a barrier no wider in a London street often amounting in the end to a separation for eternity! During some years, I hoped that she did live; and I suppose that, in the literal and unrhetoical use of the word myriad, I may say that on my different visits to London, I have looked into many, many myriads of female faces, in the hope of meeting her. I should know her again amongst a thousand, if I saw her for a moment, for, though not handsome, she had a sweet expression of countenance, and a peculiar and graceful carriage of the head.—I sought her, I have said, in hope. So it was for years; but now I should fear to see her; and her cough, which grieved me when I parted with her, is now my consolation. I now wish to see her no longer, but think of her, more gladly, as one long since laid in the grave; in the grave, I would hope, of a Magdalen; taken away, before injuries and cruelty had blotted out and transfigured her ingenuous nature, or the brutalities of ruffians had completed the ruin they had begun.

So then, Oxford Street, stony-hearted step-mother! thou that listenest to the sighs of orphans, and drinkest the tears of children, at length I was dismissed from thee: the time was come at last that I no more should pace in anguish thy never-ending terraces; no more should dream, and wake in captivity to the pangs of hunger. Successors, too many, to myself and Ann, have, doubtless, since trodden in our footsteps,—inheritors of our calamities. Other orphans than Ann have sighed: tears have been shed by other children: and thou, Oxford Street, hast since, doubtless, echoed to the groans of innumerable hearts. For myself, however, the storm which I had outlived seemed to have been the pledge of a long fair-weather; the premature sufferings which I had paid down to have been accepted as a ransom for many years to come, as a price of long immunity from sorrow: and if again I walked in London, a solitary and contemplative man (as oftentimes I did), I walked for the most part in serenity and peace of mind. And, although it is true that the calamities of my novice in London had struck root so deeply in my bodily constitution that afterwards they shot up and flourished afresh, and grew into a noxious umbrage that has overshadowed and darkened my latter years, yet these second assaults of suffering were met with a fortitude more confirmed, with the resources of a maturer intellect, and with alleviations from sympathizing affection—how deep and tender!

Thus, however, with whatsoever alleviations, years that were far asunder were bound together by subtle links of suffering derived from a common root. And herein I notice an instance of the short-sightedness of human desires, that oftentimes on moonlight nights, during my first mournful abode in London, my consolation was (if such it could be thought) to gaze from Oxford Street up every avenue in succession which pierces through the heart of Marylebone to the fields and the woods; and that, said I, travelling with my eyes up the long vistas which lay part in light and part in shade, "that is the road to the north, and therefore to [Grasmere], and if I had the wings of a dove, that way I would fly for comfort!" Thus I said, and thus I wished, in my blindness, yet, even in that very northern region it was, even in that very valley, nay, in that very house to which my erroneous wishes pointed, that this second birth of my sufferings began;² and that they again threatened to besiege the citadel of life and hope. There it was, that for years I was persecuted by visions as ugly, and as ghastly phantoms as ever haunted the couch of Orestes³ and in this unhappier than he, that sleep which comes to all as a respite and a restoration, and to him especially, as a blessed⁴ balm for his wounded heart and his haunted brain, visited me as my bitterest scourge. Thus blind was I in my desires; yet, if a veil interposes between the dim-sightedness of man and his future calamities, the same veil hides from him their alleviations; and a grief which had not been feared is met by consolations which had not been hoped. I, therefore, who participated, as it were, in the troubles of Orestes (excepting only in his agitated conscience), participated no less in all his supports: my Eumenides, like his, were at my bed-feet, and stared in upon me through the curtains: but, watching by my pillow, or defrauding herself of sleep to bear me company through the heavy watches of the night, sat my Electra. for thou, beloved [Margaret],¹ dear companion of my later years, thou wast my Electra¹ and neither in nobility of mind nor in long-suffering affection, wouldst permit that a Grecian sister should excel an English wife. For thou thoughtest not much to stoop to humble offices of kindness, and to servile² ministrations of tenderest affection,—to wipe away for years the unwholesome dew upon the forehead, or to refresh the lips when parched and baked with fever; nor, even when thy own peaceful slumbers had by long sympathy become infected with the spectacle of my dread contest with phantoms and shadowy enemies that oftentimes bade me "sleep no more!"³—not even then, didst thou utter a complaint or any murmur, nor withdraw thy angelic smiles, nor shrink from thy service of love more than Electra did of old. For she too, though she was a Grecian woman, and the daughter of the king⁴ of men, yet wept sometimes, and hid her face⁵ in her robe.

But these troubles are past; and thou wilt read these records of a period so dolorous to us both as the legend of some hideous dream that can return no more. Meantime, I am again in London: and again I pace the terraces of Oxford Street by night and oftentimes, when I am oppressed by anxieties that demand all my philosophy and the comfort of thy presence to support, and yet remember that I am separated from thee by three hundred miles, and the length of three dreary months,—I look up the streets that run northwards from Oxford Street, upon moonlight nights, and recollect my youthful ejaculation of anguish;—and remembering that thou art sitting alone in that same valley, and mistress of that very house to which my heart turned in its blindness nineteen years ago, I think that, though blind indeed, and scattered to the winds of late, the promptings of my heart may yet have had reference to a remoter time, and may be justified if read in another meaning:—and, if I could allow myself to descend again to the impotent wishes of childhood, I should again say to myself, as I look to the north, “Oh, that I had the wings of a dove—” and with how just a confidence in thy good and gracious nature might I add the other half of my early ejaculation—“And that way I would fly for comfort”

THE PLEASURES OF OPIUM

It is so long since I first took opium that if it had been a trifling incident in my life I might have forgotten its date: but cardinal events are not to be forgotten; and from circumstances connected with it I remember that it must be referred to the autumn of 1804. During that season I was in London, having come thither for the first time since my entrance at college. And my introduction to opium arose in the following way. From an early age I had been accustomed to wash my head in cold water at least once a day: being suddenly seized with toothache, I attributed it to some relaxation caused by an accidental intermission of that practice; jumped out of bed; plunged my head into a basin of cold water; and with hair thus wetted went to sleep. The next morning, as I need hardly say, I awoke with excruciating rheumatic pains of the head and face, from which I had hardly any respite for about twenty days. On the twenty-first day, I think it was, and on a Sunday, that I went out into the streets, rather to run away, if possible, from my torments, than with any distinct purpose. By accident I met a college acquaintance who recommended opium. Opium! dread agent of unimaginable pleasure and pain! I had heard of it as I had of manna or of ambrosia, but no further: how unmeaning a sound was it at that time! what solemn chords does it now strike upon my heart!

what heart-quaking vibrations of sad and happy remembrances! Reverting for a moment to these, I feel a mystic importance attached to the minutest circumstances connected with the place and the time, and the man, if man he was, that first laid open to me the Paradise of Opium-eaters. It was a Sunday afternoon, wet and cheerless: and a duller spectacle this earth of ours has not to show than a rainy Sunday in London. My road homewards lay through Oxford Street; and near “the stately Pantheon,” as Mr. Wordsworth has obligingly called it, I saw a druggist’s shop. The druggist, unconscious minister of celestial pleasures!—as if in sympathy with the rainy Sunday, looked dull and stupid, just as any mortal druggist might be expected to look on a Sunday: and, when I asked for the tincture of opium, he gave it to me as any other man might do: and furthermore, out of my shilling, returned me what seemed to be real copper halfpence, taken out of a real wooden drawer. Nevertheless, in spite of such indications of humanity, he has ever since existed in my mind as the beatific vision of an immortal druggist, sent down to earth on a special mission to myself. And it confirms me in this way of considering him, that, when I next came up to London, I sought him near the stately Pantheon, and found him not: and thus to me, who knew not his name (if indeed he had one), he seemed rather to have vanished from Oxford Street than to have removed in any bodily fashion. The reader may choose to think of him as, possibly, no more than a sublunary druggist: it may be so: but my faith is better: I believe him to have evanesced,² or evaporated. So unwillingly would I connect any mortal remembrances with that hour, and place, and creature, that first brought me acquainted with the celestial drug.

² “Evanesced—This way of going off the stage of life appears to have been well known in the seventeenth century, but at that time to have been considered a peculiar privilege of blood-royal, and by no means to be allowed to druggists. For about the year 1680, a poet of rather ominous name (and who, by the by, did ample justice to his name)—viz., Mr. Flatman, in speaking of the death of Charles II, expresses his surprise that any prince should commit so absurd an act as dying: because, says he,

‘Kings should disdain to die, and only disappear.’

They should abscond, that is, into the other world.”—De Quincey. For the line quoted, see Thomas Flatman’s On the Much lamented Death of our late Sovereign Lord King Charles II of Blessed Memory, 14, 25

Arrived at my lodgings, it may be supposed that I lost not a moment in taking the quantity prescribed. I was necessarily ignorant of the whole art and mystery of opium-taking: and, what I took, I took under every disadvantage. But I took it:—and in an hour, oh! heavens! what a revulsion! what an upheaving, from its lowest depths, of the inner spirit! what an apocalypse of the world within me! That my pains had vanished, was now a trifle in my eyes.—this negative effect was swallowed up in the immensity of those positive effects which had opened before me—in the abyss of divine enjoyment thus suddenly revealed. Here was a panacea—a *φάρμακον ὑπερβολῆς*¹ for all human woes: here was the secret of happiness, about which philosophers had disputed for so many ages, at once discovered: happiness might now be bought for a penny, and carried in the waistcoat pocket: portable ecstasies might be had corked up in a pint bottle: and peace of mind could be sent down in gallons by the mail-coach. But, if I talk in this way, the reader will think I am laughing: and I can assure him, that nobody will laugh long who deals much with opium: its pleasures even are of a grave and solemn complexion; and in his happiest state, the opium-eater cannot present himself in the character of “L’Allegro”:² even then, he speaks and thinks as becomes “Il Penseroso.”³ Nevertheless, I have a very reprehensible way of jesting at times in the midst of my own misery: and, unless when I am checked by some more powerful feelings, I am afraid I shall be guilty of this indecent practice even in these annals of suffering or enjoyment. The reader must allow a little to my infirm nature in this respect: and with a few indulgences of that sort, I shall endeavor to be as grave, if not drowsy, as fits a theme like opium, so anti-mercurial as it really is, and so drowsy as it is falsely reputed.

And, first, one word with respect to its bodily effects: for upon all that has been hitherto written on the subject of opium, whether by travellers in Turkey, who may plead their privilege of lying as an old immemorial right, or by professors of medicine, writing ex cathedra,⁴—I have but one emphatic criticism to pronounce—Lies! lies! lies! I remember once, in passing a book-stall, to have caught these words from a page of some satiric author:—“By this time I became convinced that the London newspapers spoke truth at least twice a week, viz., on Tuesday and Saturday, and might safely be depended upon for—the list of bankrupts.” In like manner, I do by no means deny that some truths have been delivered to the world in regard to opium: thus it has been repeatedly affirmed by the learned that opium is a dusky brown in color, and thus, take notice, I grant: secondly, that it is rather dear; which I also grant, for in my time, East-India opium has been three guineas a pound, and Turkey eight: and, thirdly, that if you eat a good deal of it, most probably you must do what is particularly disagreeable to any man of regular habits, viz., die.⁵ These weighty propositions are, all and singular, true: I cannot gainsay them: and truth ever was, and will be, commendable. But in these three theorems, I believe we have exhausted the stock of knowledge as yet accumulated by man on the subject of opium. And therefore, worthy doctors, as there seems to be room for further discoveries, stand aside, and allow me to come forward and lecture on this matter.

First, then, it is not so much affirmed as taken for granted by all who ever mention opium, formally or incidentally, that it does, or can, produce intoxication. Now, reader, assure yourself, meo periculo,² that no quantity of opium ever did, or could intoxicate. As to the tincture of opium (commonly called laudanum) that might certainly intoxicate if a man could bear to take enough of it; but why? because it contains so much proof spirit, and not because it contains so much opium. But crude opium, I affirm peremptorily, is incapable of producing any state of body at all resembling that which is produced by alcohol: and not in degree only incapable, but even in kind: it is not in the quantity of its effects merely, but in the quality, that it differs altogether. The pleasure given by wine is always mounting, and tending to a crisis, after which it declines: that from opium, when once generated, is stationary for eight or ten hours: the first, to borrow a technical distinction from medicine, is a case of acute—the second, of chronic pleasure: the one is a flame, the other a steady and equable glow. But the main distinction lies in this, and whereas wine disorders the mental faculties, opium, on the contrary, if taken in a proper manner, introduces amongst them the most exquisite order, legislation, and harmony. Wine robs a man of his self-possession: opium greatly invigorates it. Wine unsettles and clouds the judgment, and gives a preternatural brightness and a vivid exaltation to the contempts and the admirations, the loves and the hatreds, of the drinker: opium on the contrary communicates serenity and equipoise to all the faculties, active or passive: and with respect to the temper and moral feelings in general, it gives simply that sort of vital warmth which is approved by the judgment, and which would probably always accompany a bodily constitution of primeval or antediluvian health. Thus, for instance, opium, like wine, gives an expansion to the heart and the benevolent affections: but then, with this remarkable difference, that in the sudden development of kind-heartedness which accompanies inebriation, there is always more or less of a maudlin character, which exposes it to the contempt of the bystander. Men shake hands, swear eternal friendship, and shed tears—no mortal knows why: and the sensual creature is clearly uppermost. But the expansion of the benigner feelings incident to opium, is no feverish access, but a healthy restoration to that state which the mind would naturally recover upon the removal of any deep-seated irritation of pain that had disturbed and quarrelled with the impulses of a heart originally just and good. True it is, that even wine, up to a certain point, and with certain men, rather tends to exalt and to steady the intellect: I myself, who have never been a great wine-drinker, used to find that half a dozen glasses of wine advantageously affected the faculties—brightened and intensified the consciousness—and gave to the mind a feeling of being "ponderibus librata suis":¹ and certainly it is most absurdly said in popular language of any man that he is disguised in liquor: for, on the contrary, most men are disguised by sobriety; and it is when they are drinking (as some old gentleman says in Athenæus), that men *ἐαυτοὺς ἐμφανίζουσιν ὀλίγῳ εἰσι*²—display themselves in their true complexion of character,—which surely is not disguising themselves. But still, wine constantly leads a man to the brink of absurdity and extravagance; and, beyond a certain point, it is sure to volatilize and to disperse the intellectual energies: whereas opium always seems to compose what has been agitated, and to concentrate what had been distracted. In short, to sum up all in one word, a man who is inebriated, or tending to inebriation, is, and feels that he is, in a condition which calls up into supremacy the merely human, too often the brutal, part of his nature: but the opium-eater (I speak of him who is not suffering from any disease, or other remote effects of opium) feels that the diviner part of his nature is paramount, that is, the moral affections are in a state of cloudless serenity; and over all is the great light of the majestic intellect.

This is the doctrine of the true church on the subject of opium of which church I acknowledge myself to be the only member—the alpha and the omega—but then it is to be recollected that I speak from the ground of a large and profound personal experience: whereas most of the unscientific authors who have at all treated of opium, and even of those who have written expressly on the materia medica, make it evident, from the horror they express of it, that their experimental knowledge of its action is none at all. I will, however,
